Who writes whose speeches is a moot question these days. The first President Roosevelt, T. R., wrote his own. He wouldn't tolerate a ghost writer. Like Lincoln before him and Churchill after him, his heart and his personality lay graven in his words. Woodrow Wilson picked out his words on an old typewriter; alone in an alcove at Princeton for his first inaugural, and on the south porch of the White House when he wrote his famous message to Congress, April 2, 1917: "The right is more precious than peace"—the message that brought us into World War I. Harding didn't use a ghost writer. That was his trouble; he should have. Calvin Coolidge wrote all but one of his speeches. The time he had to dedicate Aeolian Hall in Boston he wisely got help from a member of the Boston Symphony. But when a collection of his speeches was being edited, he insisted that that speech be omitted: "It isn't mine. Keep it out!" Herbert Hoover says that he never delivered a ghost-written speech. But F.D.R. apparently never delivered one he wrote himself. Judge Rosenman, Harry Hopkins, Rex Tugwell, Donald Richberg, Bob Sherwood, Adolf Berle, Stanley High, Raymond Moley—sometimes two, sometimes three worked together on a single speech. But the President polished and trimmed, and in the end made it his own. The famous lines that will go down through history, however, belong to the many: "Rendezvous with destiny" was Tommy Corcoran's; "Economic royalist" was Stanley High's; "Horse-and-buggy age" came through Stephen Early from his brother-in-law. (From Ghosts in the White House, by Dr. Claude Moore Fuess, American Heritage.)

It is ironic that in his last published book John Marquand should have intertwined so purposefully the present and the past, and in a study of an actual old-timer given so unstintedly of himself. TIMOTHY DEXTER REVISITED (Little, Brown), though written around the so-called "gentleman" Dexter, an odd character of old Newburyport, is a revelation of John Marquand. Here are his reflections, his memories, his deep, deep love of New England, to which he was so inextricably bound. As entertainment the book has all the wit and urbanity of his novels. It is history, it is a "biography" of Newburyport, with almost incredible stories and characters. But above all it is Marquand. Those who knew him can hear his voice resounding from the pages.

Here's one particular scene out of his boyhood, when he lived in Newburyport with his aunt. It was a snowy night and he had to drive the horse and sleigh home through the drifts piled up by a big storm. You feel the numbing cold as he held tight to the reins, and the welcome warmth of the barn when he finally made it, the lanternlight, and the smell of leather as he unharnessed the horse. These were the smells and the feel of another day, something that the present generation can never quite catch: it was born too late. Only when his own generation dies off, said Marquand, will the real split with the past come about. Then none will be left who can remember the simplicity and peacefulness and dignity of that other day.

This feeling for the past runs through all his books. It is a note of genuine sadness that comes from one whose sensations were superlatively keen, who experienced to the full the joy and delight and drama of life's single moments. But nothing lasts. Each of those moments has gone, and only the memory persists. . . . No other writer of our time—except Proust, whom he is of our time—has established so effectively this sense of time passing, of time remembered. None has felt it more deeply. We are happy that all his later best books were first serialized in the Journal.

SPAM® DANDY
SKILLET SUPPERS

SPAM STROGANOFF

Here's luxurious eating . . . quickly fixed!

Melt 1½ tbsp. butter in hot skillet. Add 1 7 oz. can mushroom pieces, with liquid. Cook until liquid has evaporated. Add 2 tbsp. minced onion. Cook until yellow. Add 1 can cream of mushroom soup, ½ c. milk. Stir over heat until blended. Stir in salt, pepper, ¼ tsp. dry mustard, 1 can SPAM sliced, then diced. Blend in 1 c. dairy sour cream. Serve in toast cups or over wide egg noodles.

HONG KONG SPAM SKILLET

. . . with a delightful Oriental accent!

Pour into large skillet 2 cans chicken-rice soup, 2 cans water. Add 2 c. sliced green celery. Boil 3 min. Stir in ¼ c. cornstarch dissolved in ¼ c. cold water. Sprinkle on salt, paprika. Add 1 can bean sprouts, drained. Boil 10 min. Stir in 1 tsp. soy sauce. Top with lightly browned SPAM slices. Serve hot over crisp chow mein noodles.

Because it's made from sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham (choice meat . . . rich in protein) only SPAM tastes like SPAM

NOW MARKETED IN CANADA

HORMEL

SPAM is the registered trademark for a pure pork product packed only by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., General Offices, Austin, Minn., U.S.A.

TEEN-TIME BILLIONAIRES

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEEN-AGERS

Cash in on Your Future! This morning my oldest daughter, Cherry, aged six, cleaned me out of pennies for her piggy bank—and while she was happily feeding the hungry pig, do you know whom I was thinking about?

You, my friend. Y-O-U!

First I was remembering when I, myself, at the age of nine, graduated from feeding the ol' piggy bank out of my daddy's pockets to my first business venture, selling buttercups on Granny White Pike near our house in Nashville, Tennessee. The buttercups grew in our front yard and all I had to do was pick a bunch of 'em and then stand on the corner and look hopeful. I had no fixed price, and when people stopped I'd say, "Whatever you want to pay"—which, I know now, was very unbusinesslike, but very profitable. At any rate, sometimes I took home as much as a dollar to my own hungry pig! I felt that soon I could retire for life.

Then I began wondering when Cherry would go "into business" and whether it would be bunches of her mother's daffodils or homemade lemonade or a five-cent amateur performance in our garage.

But what led me to think of Y-O-U was the fact that though the step from the carefree days of pennies for piggy banks and five cents for homemade lemonade to Big Business, with all its financial responsibilities, challenges and headaches, looks like a very big one, actually it isn't. It's just that one short step from childhood to teen time.

Teenagers are Big Business. You are Big Business!

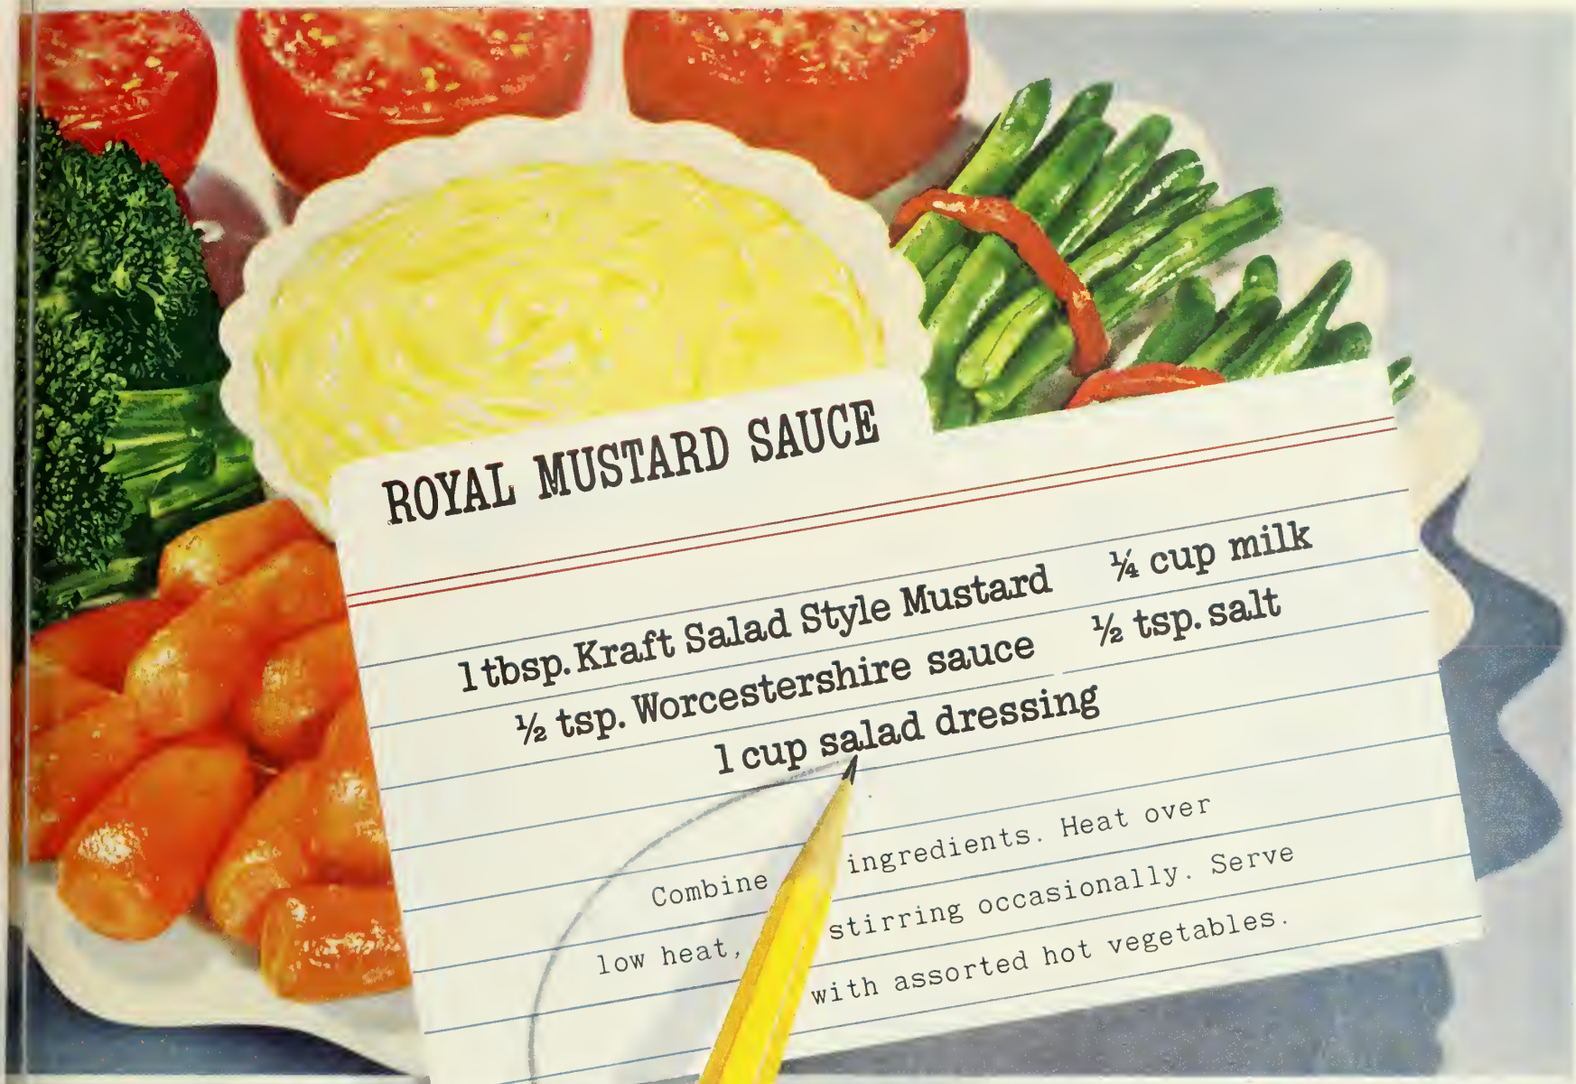
So you don't believe me? Well, here are some amazin' statistics.

The Teenage Billionaire Spenders: According to a recent report in a news magazine, during the last fifteen years the average pocket money of teenagers in the United States has increased from $2.50 to $10.00 per week. Together you teenagers represent a whopping nine and a half billion in purchasing power yearly. That's a lot of buttercups!



Now, from piggy-bank penny purchasers to billionaire spenders is a big jump! And a whale of a responsibility too. So while I was thinking of Cherry and the jump she'd shortly make to her first business venture, I was also thinking even more about you and wondering if there was any way I could help you from my own experience to take that even bigger jump without falling into some of the booby traps that lie waiting on the path to financial maturity and financial security.

The Art of Earning: I've heard it said by pious folk that "money is the root of all evil"—and they seemed to think they were voicing a profound truth from the Bible. Actually, what the Bible says is that "the love of money is the root of all evil." And when you look around at the results of greed, selfishness, insane ambition—well, you have to agree that there is such a thing as liking money too well. The idea is not to love money so much that our life revolves CONTINUED ON PAGE 27

DI PIETRO

Money need not be loved, but it does deserve respect. How you handle it reveals a lot about your maturity.

One simple change will make a remarkable difference in this sauce...just cross out "salad dressing"...specify

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than a "salad dressing." It is a truly different dressing, luxuriously rich and smooth . . . and so wonderful tasting.

To make Miracle Whip, Kraft uses more expensive ingredients and more of them—plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.

And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A lively, teasing, uniquely delicious flavor that no one has ever been able to copy.

Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing by Kraft is America's favorite by far.

richer in NATURAL corn cream!

Not just good eating . . . superb eating, that's Libby's Cream Style Corn. It's pedigreed . . . bred to produce plump, juicy kernels; then knowingly blended to start the flow of that rich natural corn cream. The flavor, the texture are your tests that Libby's is the superior brand.

Corn and Wiener Roast—In baking dish, stir 2 tbsp. prepared mustard into 2 #303 cans Libby's Cream Style Corn. Add 8 wieners, gashed and stuffed with sharp cheese. Dot corn with butter and bake in mod. oven 20 min. Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago 4, Ill.

Libby's cream-style corn

TINUED FROM PAGE 24

d it, but to understand how to make it o respect it sufficiently so that we never he lack of it.

re's a great thing to know: the statistics that roughly a third of the nine and a billions you spend you earn yourselves at ime work and summer jobs. The other irds comes to you in the form of allow- and gifts—but the older you get, the the percentage alters until, by the time ave reached legal maturity, the allow- and gifts have almost disappeared and re supposed to be a self-supporting So if at any point you're having trouble g, let me pass on to you a tip I got when in my teens from a very bright, success- ung lawyer.

described a time when he was trying to arted in his profession, when his kids small and the bills and budget just didn't "Love money!" he said. "I loved it, it, feared it—did everything but make d then I found out what money actually t's a symbol of gratitude—nothing more. rically the symbol changes—once it was coins, nuggets, wampum. Its only value at we give it. I decided that whatever y I receive is a symbol of somebody's ude for something I've done. If I'm not ing enough, then I'm not short of . I'm short of the kind of service that's ciated!"

d that, to me, has remained one of the ules I know for preventing lack without g overambitious. That's the "art of ne of the greatest laborsaving in- entions of today is tomorrow.

IRISH DIGEST

g" in one well-turned phrase. If you making enough, find out where you can more service to someone, agree to perform rvice, do it to the best of your ability—and t your pay as a symbol of gratitude. Now, akes it sound pretty easy; but the funny is that in America, making money doesn't to be the biggest problem—at least it was in my experience. And I'm proud in agreement here with a venerable ican philosopher, Thoreau, who said: ost any man knows how to earn money, t one in a million knows how to spend o which your personal and not-so- able philosopher, P. Boone, would like 1: or invest it, save it, budget it, or even, imes, find the time to make as much as eem to need. Let me show you what I from personal experience.

ce and Romance:

rley and I were a teenage bride and n. We eloped in the beginning of my more year in college when we were both en, and though I wouldn't change a e of it, the chief problem it presented time-money hassle.

decided that to be "old enough" to get ed meant we could manage to support lves, that I could work and still finish e without "allowances or gifts" from ts. Now this, pal, turned out to be a tall , particularly when "we two" became hree" a little over a year later.

ieve me, if Ol' Shirl hadn't been the kind she is, balanced, loving, grown up for ge, and if I hadn't learned not only how n but something about saving and spend- hate to think what might have happened r love match under the early pressures ensions most young couples face.

ese are problems for you to think about now because the most popular marryin' right the other side of the teenage fence he expert opinions are that a teenage or young marriage has fifty per cent less e of survival than older ones.

alked not long ago with Judge Roger Pfaff, who presides over the Conciliation Court of Los Angeles County (they try to e magic back into a relationship after a ce has been asked for). The judge felt that one of the main things lacking in early marriages is "get-along skills."

"Too many teenagers and young people," he said, "starting with 'nothing but love' are faced with not much know-how. The husband doesn't know how to make a living. The wife doesn't know how to run a house. Neither knows how to manage money. If this is the case, you can see that they're not mature enough to set up on their own. They still need dad to make the living, mom to run the house, and a weekly allowance."

So I guess it's just as important for you to practice some good money habits (while you spend these teen-time billions) as it was for Shirley and me!

Here was our situation. As newlyweds we rented a small apartment near David Lipscomb College, furnished with odds and ends from family attics. I worked at Station WSIX, studying as I went along. And when I wasn't working I was attending classes—oh, I was managing to work and go to college—but there wasn't much time left over for being married! And, though I was supporting us independently, there wasn't much money left over either. Much? There wasn't any. We were out of the "billionaire spender" class.

In my sophomore year we took our five-month-old marriage and all our worldly goods down to Texas to see if things would be easier "somewhere else." They weren't. Let me warn you now that you can't move away from your problems. They ride right along with you until you solve 'em.

In Denton, Texas, where I was attending North Texas State Teachers' College, earning a salary of $44.50 a week at WPAB-TV in Fort Worth, and my bride and I were expecting our first heavenly bundle, we faced up to our problem—the money hassle—and licked it.

I was making as much as I could in the amount of time available—so an increase in income for welcome service wasn't our solution. I invested all our savings—$1200—with Russ Dyer in his chinchilla ranch. Shirley thought I was nuts, but our first pair promptly had quintuplets, and we'd tripled our investment! We were delirious with joy—and later just delirious. Because soon after, the chinchilla business was taken over by big operators, and small ranchers like Russ were squeezed out. We were left holding the pelt. So there we were—with $44.50 a week and each other.

Here was the secret we discovered:

If you are aware of every penny you can make, money goes a lot farther than if you treat it as a "pocketful of change." For instance, I handled the money. It seemed fitting and proper, since I was the head of the house. And I put every cent in the bank. However, we had a joint checking account, since marriage is still a fifty-fifty working partnership. So we could both sign checks. But we kept an accurate account of everything spent. If Shirley needed $24.00 for groceries and a maternity dress (this sure solved her clothes problem) and she wrote the check for $25.00, she accounted for the extra hundred pennies. I did the same. We found that a dollar itemized is more carefully tended than $5.00 in change that just seems to slide through holes in your pocket.

Our "entertainment budget" was 70 cents a week for the two of us. North Texas State had an amateur stage show and a movie every Saturday night which cost 35 cents per head if you had a student-body card. We found a lot of free fun, too, going to other couples' apartments or having them to ours, yakking, or watching TV, or playing Scrabble. Or we'd make the drive from Denton to Fort Worth and instead of buying a soda or a sundae in the big town, we'd have a nickel snow cone.

We didn't have much money. We didn't need it. But we did have fun using what we had—sensibly. And you'll be a step ahead of the game if you start developing some controls and disciplines now, during the teen days. Sure, you could just "blow" all those billions, and have a big ball—but! When the allowance days suddenly come to an end, and the rent-food-light-gas-doctor-bill days begin . . . you may be hollerin' "Help!"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

CORRECTOL—the woman's gentle laxative for easy relief

A single tablet helps take care of nature's tardiness

Because you're a woman, you may have very special needs when you're constipated. The laxative you use should be extra gentle to your sensitive system, and extra dependable, too—one you can count on to stimulate the normal movement so essential to regularity.

Correctol® is made to meet these special needs of women. It contains a medical discovery that softens waste for easy, relaxed elimination, plus a small amount of mild laxative that moves the waste gently.

Working together, these ingredients bring a comforting kind of relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can.

Hospital-proved Correctol is recommended even when your system is particularly sensitive—from adolescence through the older years. Try it today.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Now...just pat the lint away!

"SCOTCH" BRAND

Lint Removers

6 pads only 29¢

It's so easy! Just slip new "Scotch" Lint Remover over hand, peel off protective liner. Pat clothing lightly—lint sticks to pad! Removes lint from felt hats, suede shoes, clothing. Ideal for furniture and auto upholstery.

Slips into your purse, pocket or luggage. At stores everywhere—try it now!

"SCOTCH" IS A REGISTERED TRADEMARK OF 3M CO., ST. PAUL 6, MINN.

© 3M CO. 1960

MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY

...WHERE RESEARCH IS THE KEY TO TOMORROW

3M COMPANY

Blue Bonnet

Looks, Cooks and Tastes Like The "High-Price" Spread

It's Nature That Helps Give Blue Bonnet Flavor Like the "High-Price" Spread

The wonderful, fresh taste of the "high-price" spread comes from Nature herself. And it's Nature that helps flavor BLUE BONNET, too! Yes, Nature's own flavor-maker is part of the famous BLUE BONNET recipe, giving BLUE BONNET a true taste, a fresh taste, a taste like the "high-price" spread.

BLUE BONNET's rich and golden goodness makes its way into everything you spread it on, melt it on, or cook it with . . . makes everything just naturally taste better.

Everything's Better With Blue Bonnet On It!

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF STANDARD BRANDS I

O INUED FROM PAGE 27

l ire hope we can prepare Cherry to meet he problems as well as her mommy did. an I hope you can do even better!

o Financial Personality:

l ght now, this minute, you already have f ancial personality, an attitude toward nc y, and a method of handling it, that is as ef te and as revealing as your manners, ot smile, the way you look or think or pe . It can be attractive—or the opposite; ut 's an inescapable part of you and you ar hide it.

ur financial personality is partially or d by your education and environment— ot family's financial circumstance, how they ar e their money, what they've taught you. lu art of it has to do with what kind of guy t l you are inside, and how well you're dj ing to reality and how mature you're et g to be.

l 's have a look at the three most obvious fi ncial personality" types and see if you pc ourself in the crowd.

l st, Sam Spendthrift. Young Spendthrift ev has any money left two days after

ONLY THE HEART

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Only the heart breaks . . . nothing more:
Not so much as a flower of heather;
Not so much as a linnet's feather;
Not one shell on the long white shore.

Not one lichen dies on a stone;
Not one leaf of the oak is tattered;
Not one pod of the thistle's shattered:
Only the heart: it breaks alone.

all ance time, and rarely has much to show for hat he spent. He goes on a jag the minute he ts a few bucks, has a ball, and then sits ho the rest of the week. If he carries this pe nality into the adult world, he's apt to ha a $44.50 entertainment budget and noth- ing ut a sick smile for the landlord.

he may become a leading contender in the ace to "keep up with the Joneses." This is orry game, a panicky game with no peace in that can last a lifetime once the ball sta rolling. But why? Why can't the spend- thr resist spending? Why must he "show off with his money, buy a car he can't afford? Or hy will she, the spendthrift*ess*, blow her ba roll on a jazzy sweater "like Jean's" wh she has twelve sweaters and needs new sa e shoes?

lways seems to me to stem from a lack of f-confidence, a need to buy approval and po larity. The spendthrift loves money as ma as the miser. He places undue impor- tan on things, and thinks that what he has an what he spends are more important than w he is. But unfortunately the spendthrift ste s what he is by his financial personality aa loesn't fool anybody n Tightwad is No. 2. He is selfish no do t about it—and his selfishness is sad. It's ba l on insecurity. A certain amount of sav- ing "does something for you"—it gives you pe of mind, independence, freedom. But the penny pincher who "collects" money is cu ng his financial circulation, getting noth- ing n return for the services he renders but mo and dust on his treasure. The realist will in that he doesn't get much of a message ro a pile of dollar bills in a shoe box.

ext, meet Daisy Dreamer—another case of mplete lack of realism. She schemes— oh ow she schemes—for the quick buck and the grand windfall. I know. I once met a chinchilla, remember? And she dreams—a thousand-dollar bill found on the sidewalk, a long-lost uncle who leaves a diamond mine in Africa. Ring a bell for you? Me too! There's a little of Daisy in all of us, just as we all have our mad spendthrift moments, and then our penance of penny pinching. But the perpetual dreamer has millions in his head, holes in his socks. He knows everything about money except how to start realistically with 50 cents an hour, or 5 cents for lemonade, and grow up to the big-income department. For the dreamer, "tomorrow" things will always be terrific, but each "today" brings those evils of "lack."

Three Tips for Balancing the Financial You:

The balanced budget and the balanced personality seem to me to depend on three things: saving, spending and sharing.

Now, spending is obviously the most popular and natural way to use money. And proper spending, Shirley and I discovered, had to be our first consideration. We had to budget salary or income against expenses like rent, food, clothing, and so on. That's pretty cut and dried—very little choice here—and a sound solution requires third-grade math plus practiced discipline.

You can start practicing the discipline now.

"Free spending," or what to do with the money that was "ours," was a question of choice. We had to be careful that good credit (keeping our bills paid promptly) didn't lead us into the trap of installment buying beyond what we could swing! We knew what would happen to our credit—and the tension of debt we could build up—if we agreed to monthly payments not covered by our income budget.

Then we learned what to do about buying "things and stuff" that caught our fancy. We'd ask ourselves four questions: Do we like it? Do we need it? Can we afford it? Will we still like it tomorrow or next week and not be sorry we spent our "loose" money this way? You'd be surprised how that little waiting period can change your mind.

The second tip on balancing yourself is that, from the very first dollar you earn, you should pay yourself first. In other words, save! Your savings are your security, your peace of mind, your freedom to change jobs and to keep chuggin' right on through bad times as well as good. Now there are lots of ways to save There are insurance, and savings accounts which pay interest, and stocks and bonds, and learning about them by experience is a very exciting business. You don't have to start with a million. You can start with a buck. But if you start now, you'll be laying a strong foundation of financial framework on which to build your future.

Salt away at least a little hunk—5, 10, or even 2 per cent of everything you make—for yourself, starting now! If I hadn't done that at your age, Shirley and I could never have been married when we were. I had been saving "for a rainy day"—and believe it or not, we were married on a rainy day!

And the last third of the balanced financial personality to me is giving—sharing. Miz B. and I don't ever think of this as a sign of generosity—but of thanksgiving for what we have received. Giving in the Christian sense is different from "lending" or "borrowing"—about which every man must make up his own mind. Giving is sharing freely with others what has been given to you. It acknowledges that the true source of everything we have is "Our Father."

We believe we must share a part of everything we receive. Farmers return their best seed to the land to perpetuate their crops, and "keep the show going." Not as a bribe, nor as a charity; but to establish the fact that we recognize God as the source of all our good, we make it a rule to give first of whatever we have to the work of the church, to reseed the spiritual land whence our harvest comes.

If we can believe that we are simply stewards or overseers of the many gifts God has given this great land, if we make an effort to become wise stewards, starting at the buttercup stage, we will find our total budgets balanced not only in our homes, in our country, in the world, but on God's ledger where the most important books of all are kept. END

"How I use Murine to soothe my eyes and so relax tension"

EDDIE SHIPSTAD
Co-producer of Ice Follies

"After the bright lights and tension of a show, I find a couple of drops of Murine a welcome comfort to my eyes. And when my eyes feel rested, I seem to relax better all over." Try Eddie's trick. Keep Murine handy—at home, in your car. Then use Murine whenever you feel the need to soothe your eyes and so relax tension.

Murine is also available in the familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE for your eyes

THE MURINE [illegible] A.
*TRADEMARKS RE[illegible]

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS "We can see, not only in Russian children but in plenty of our own, that the children who are guided firmly are not only pleasanter to live with but are much more happy themselves."

RUSSIAN CHILDREN DON'T WHINE, SQUABBLE OR BREAK THINGS —WHY?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

It helps me to gain a perspective on American children and their upbringing to read about child rearing in other countries. Nothing I've read recently has given me more to think about than two reports on Russian children. One was a book by Herschel and Edith Alt called *Russia's Children. The other was an article by Dr. Milton Senn, How Russians Bring Up Their Children.†

Edith Alt has had a distinguished career in medical social work. Herschel Alt has for years been head of a social agency in New York, the Jewish Board of Guardians, which provides a variety of expert services for normal children as well as those with problems, through child-guidance clinics, nurseries, and special-treatment schools and special-treatment homes for disturbed and delinquent children. So the Alts know about all kinds and ages of American children and what we try to provide for them. They were particularly interested in learning how the Russians treat their delinquents, and with what success, since their ideas about psychiatry and psychology are amazingly different from ours. (They won't even use intelligence tests because they think it would imply that they believe children are born with different capabilities and cannot be changed by environment.) The Russian officials blocked the efforts of the Alts to see an institution for delinquents, with dozens of excuses.

But the Alts did visit all-day nurseries for children up through three years of age and all-day kindergartens for those from four to seven. What struck them most was the conforming, co-operative behavior of these children:

"What was startling was that, as we went from room to room, children of two years and two and a half, in groups of at least twenty in each room, were awakening without sound. Some in each room were still sleeping, but those whom we observed had their eyes open; they looked up at us but remained impassive. At no point did we see any of the awakening children jump up, cry out, demand attention or do anything that was mischievous, demanding or spirited. It was the lack of any impulsive behavior and the degree of control in the way they were awakening that startled and troubled us. Never had we seen a group of healthy children awaken after afternoon naps in this fashion."

The Alts describe an outdoor scene in an all-day kindergarten: "Despite earlier CONTINUED ON PAGE 32

*Bookman Associates, N. Y., 1959 †McCall's, 1958

"Visitors to a playground were struck by the absence of jostling and horseplay. Only occasionally did a child give another a poke, and when he did it was a very gentle poke."

HENRI CARTIER BRESSON-MAGNUM

Bringing Up Baby,® Hints Collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, Mother of 5

social life from a small-fry viewpoint

When your baby and you step out to see friends, it's sometimes a bit of a problem to keep your tyke amused in strange surroundings. One mother's happy solution: a special toy kit used only for visiting. Secret is to choose toys baby hasn't seen for a while. In the joy of re-discovery, he's apt to stay engrossed longer, forget the unfamiliar surroundings.

Social butterfly babies or stay-at-homes, all need plenty of protein to keep 'em on the go and grow. Gerber Strained and Junior Meats are protein-rich and provide important B-vitamins, too. Made from selected Armour* cuts, they're specially processed to remove most of the fat for easy digestibility.

Armour Meat Protein is complete protein, supplying all the essential amino acids that build and re-build vital body tissues.

Your baby's nutrition is usually bettered through use of a variety of foods. In addition to the meats, Gerber offers over 50 strained foods so you can select the foods that give him the nutrients he needs.

Rx for stranger-itis. When your baby and you visit someone baby hasn't seen a lot, you may find he'll turn shy at the sight of the strange face. If you let baby inspect comparative strangers from the protective custody of your arms, chances are he'll soon feel at home.

Of routine interest. Should baby and you go calling for any extended period, it's wise to stick to his regular routines as closely as possible. Naps should not be canceled or meals delayed. If the visit is going to extend beyond baby's bedtime, take his sleeping togs along, so you won't have to undress a sleepy baby when you get home.

Babies are our business . . . our only business! ®

Nutrition notation from Dan Gerber. "May I tell you how we work in the interest of better nutrition for your baby? For example: Gerber Cereals are important because they supply the proper amounts of iron and copper to help baby build good red blood. Our laboratories have developed an exclusive formula containing a special form of iron that can be easily assimilated by infants, plus enough copper to make the iron work effectively."

FREMONT, MICHIGAN
5 CEREALS · OVER 100
STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS

Freedom From Painful Feet

Helps keep you young looking!

CORNS
CALLOUSES
BUNIONS
SORE TOES

cause lines of pain ...make you look older than your years!

Pain stops when you use instant-acting
Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads!

Any painful rubbing, pinching or pressing of a shoe on a corn, callous, bunion, sore or tender spot can make you wince with every step you take.

Now, whenever a shoe starts doing any of these things to your feet, promptly protect the sensitive spots with soft, soothing, cushioning Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. You'll have no more pain and marvel how good the same shoe feels. And at the same time you will also stop a corn or callous before it develops.

Corns, Sore Toes, Tender Spots

Collouses, Burning Tenderness Here

Bunions, Enlorged Joints, Sore Heels

Corns Between Toes, Soreness Back of the Little Toe

Instep Ridges Binding Straps

But That's Not All!

If you already have corns or callouses, Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads will remove them one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate Medications included in each box. Special sizes and shapes for Corns, Sore Toes, Callouses, Bunions, Corns Between Toes. At Drug, Shoe, Dept., 5-10¢ Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops.

Super-Soft... Super Cushioning

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

FREE! Mail coupon to DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. 13Z4 213 West Schiller St., Chicago 10, Ill. for

SAMPLE PACKET OF ALL SIZES

With it you will receive complete directions on how each size Zino-pad is used, also Dr. Scholl's 64-page booklet on FOOT CARE.

Name

Address

City Zone State

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 30

rain, the day had turned out beautiful, the sun was shining, and the children were working, studying and playing in small groups in the spacious grounds. Fine fruit trees and delightful walks were interspersed with elaborate flower beds arranged in great precision. Again we were told the children themselves had planted and tended these flowers, and again it was hard to believe. The boys and girls were playing, laughing and listening to teachers tell stories, and seemed unrestrained, free and enjoying themselves.

"At five o'clock these youngsters who had been in the kindergarten since eight o'clock in the morning prepared to go home. We followed them to the locker rooms. As they moved about, changing their clothes, sitting on the benches, putting on their shoes, we were struck by the absence of any of the jostling and horseplay seen at home under similar circumstances. Only occasionally did a child give another a poke, and when he did it was a very gentle poke.

"We commented to the director on this perfect conformity of behavior. 'But some children must misbehave,' we said. 'What do you do with them?'

"She pointed out one little boy who was meticulously folding his uniform and putting it in his locker.

"'At the beginning of the term,' she said, 'Boris was rebellious, disobedient and destructive. We gave him jobs we knew would interest him and brought up his status and prestige in the eyes of the other children.'

> When you point a finger of scorn at somebody else, take a look at your hand. You'll see that three fingers are pointing back at you.
>
> PERSIAN PROVERB

"Again and again we met with an overrational common-sense attitude. There was no probing into possible causes, as to how a child might be feeling; there were just matter-of-fact 'sensible' methods based on social approval."

When American parents and professional people see a child behaving in such a docile, polite manner, their first thought is that he is perhaps being treated too harshly, or at least too strictly and coldly. This question must have occurred to the Alts. Yet they keep reminding themselves and the reader that they saw no such signs. Quite the contrary: "In our visit to this nursery we were favorably impressed, as in other institutions, with the quality of serious dedication we observed in the women caring for the children. The staff are serious-looking people, involved in their responsibilities toward the children; they give the impression of warmth and kindness. The cleanliness, orderliness and general quiet set these places off as markedly different from similar institutions in the United States."

An even more favorable impression was made on Dr. Milton Senn. He is professor of pediatrics and child psychiatry at Yale, where they study normal children in nursery school and well-child clinics, as well as sick ones. Dr. Senn did not say he was impressed but troubled by the behavior of Russian children. Though he is a scientist not given to easy enthusiasm, he was moved to admiration and delight by them. He watched them not only in nurseries, kindergartens and schools, but also on the street with parents, and in playgrounds near their homes: "They are good-humored, easygoing, carefree and friendly. Yet they are remarkably well behaved. They are not given to yelling, fighting or breaking things. They play together in notable harmony, even when there is a remarkable disparity in their ages. They never seem to whine; they cry only when they hurt themselves, and then only briefly. They are warm, spontaneous, polite and generous; and it is impossible, from one's hiding place on the park bench, to keep from falling in love with them."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 31

Secret Hug bra: wire lift without w Latex ribbon in cups lifts, can't p or slip $5. For store, write Olga, J 7915 Haskell, Van Nuys, Cal. pat. p

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get y down." To get the kind of relief t doesn't cause weakness, be sure to Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Does cause cramps. Contains ingredie that act to soften waste, stimul intestines without causing upsett digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Ol Tablets rated 71% better, on the av age, than other laxatives tested. Th included candy and chewing gum l atives, so-called "liver" pills, a w known bulk laxative, milk of m nesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief wi out distressing weakness. Ask Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today

Stops Bad Breat INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offen

No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-cloc freedom from odors of strong foo alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., tak wonder-working, pleasant-tastin "ENNDS" Tablets containing th miracle extract, Daratol®

"ENNDS" act internally where spray mouthwashes, toothpastes simply can reach. Can't upset the stomach. Tri size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

NEVER GO TO BED WITH A COLD

...without Vicks VapoRub

Only the VapoRub way gives 10-hour "sleep-thru" relief of nose, throat, chest...works more than twice as long as aspirin or ordinary cold tablets

Don't wait for that sick cry in the night when your child has a cold. Make sure he gets all-night relief . . . not just the four-hour action of most tablets.

Rub your child's chest, throat, neck and back with warming Vicks VapoRub at bedtime. Starts easing muscular soreness and chest tightness instantly. And for 10 full hours, penetrating vapor medications go straight inside stuffy head passages, inside sore throat, deep inside congested bronchial areas.

All night long, VapoRub works to help clear away mucus, break up bronchial congestion, calm coughing . . . makes breathing easier. Helps your child sleep the night through and wake up feeling so much better in the morning.

Do it every cold . . . for every member of the family . . . never go to bed with a cold without . . .

Medicates cold-congested nose, throat, chest all at once . . . all night long. VapoRub's deep penetrating vapor medications start relieving in 7 seconds, keep on relieving for 10 full hours. And there's no internal dosing . . . no stomach or emotional upsets.

Vicks VapoRub®
VAPORIZING OINTMENT

World's most widely used colds medication . . . use as a rub, in steam, around the nose.

EARLY RISER...

busy day ahead . . . as she explores around her own small world. Best choice for a brand new walker: one of Stride Rite's three "beginner" styles . . . designed to suit a baby's age and weight and walking habits . . . shoes with famous Stride Rite fit, built in to stay. Other features: the broad heel seats, snug heel-fit and firm counters so many doctors recommend. Start her out in Stride Rites, and keep her there . . . through every year of childhood.

THE STRIDE RITE SHOE
THE SHOE THAT UNDERSTANDS CHILDREN
Green Shoe Mfg. Co., Boston, Mass.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 32

Dr. Senn, too, emphasized that the nurses and teachers were models of kindness and patience. They obviously enjoyed caring for children. "One late evening in Moscow, just at the end of my visit to Russia, I saw a boy of four or five years walking down the street between his mother and father. He was dawdling a little and looking cranky. The mother stepped back and made a little motion to slap him on the backside. She did not actually hit him—just threatened. I watched with great curiosity, not realizing at first why I found the scene so startling. Then it came to me. During the weeks of day-and-night observing I had done in Russia, I had never before seen a hand raised against a child."

Well, it all sounds like the millennium, doesn't it? Such descriptions make some of our American children seem rather disagreeable by comparison.

Do the Russians have some magic secrets of child rearing which we lack? Or at least could we learn a few pointers from them?

It takes a wise sociologist months or years of living in a nation to gain an understanding of the roots of the character of the people. I'm not a sociologist and I've never been in Russia. But I do have guesses about some of the factors that might help to explain this stable behavior of Russian children, based on familiarity with different kinds of American families, and on various descriptions of life in Soviet Russia.

In America we recognize that children raised in stable homogeneous communities are better behaved on the average than those growing up in changing, mixed neighborhoods. Parents who have little self-control are not usually able to control their offspring. Families with strong religious convictions are less likely to have difficult children than families with no such beliefs. Studies of certain religious sects whose people live in isolated communities show this difference even more strikingly.

When we discuss Russian people it's important for us not to be thinking of those Soviet leaders of the past forty years who have been belligerent and ruthless. Travelers from America and England stress the friendliness, the sincerity of most of the people they talk with. Despite all that the Russians have been told about the aggressive militarism of America, they remain eager to be friends with us as human beings. They are only troubled as to why we allow ourselves to be governed by leaders who they believe are warmongers and oppressors. They have no idea that their nation appears threatening to us.

As a result of the intensive indoctrination they have received from their leaders for two generations now, and the pressure to conform which is exerted on them by committees of their fellows at their places of work and residence (even in the early school years a great part of the guidance and correction of uncooperative individuals is carried out by committees of earnest fellow pupils), the great majority of the Russian people have a very strong sense of common purpose. They are convinced that they are creating a nobler political and economic system than has ever existed before and that the other peoples on the earth will want to join with them as soon as they can be free of their present leaders. They are proud to be playing their individual roles in such a mighty effort. They don't feel any of the indignation or oppression that we Americans would at the idea that a citizen's only important purpose is to serve the state. They have never in their history been familiar with our Western credo, derived from democratic and Christian traditions, that the welfare and salvation of the individual are the ultimate good and that the state is only the servant of the people in this quest.

About 85 per cent of women of working age are employed by the state. Of the young children, somewhere between 10 and 20 per cent spend the day in nurseries and kindergartens; many of the rest of them are being cared for by grandmothers, either their own or someone else's.

There is tremendous striving on the part of a large proportion of the people for more education. Adults who work a full day then take technical courses or cultural cours. Visitors sometimes get the impression at almost everyone in public is reading a bo. Citizens pack lectures and concerts and theat and exhibitions. All this is not only for th own advancement and enrichment. They're encouraged to feel—and do feel—that it a service to their country.

What influence would this earnest, dedicat way of life have on the raising of childr ? Herschel and Edith Alt quote from the wt- ings of Anton Makarenko, the educator wo had more to do than anyone else with es- lishing the principles of child rearing d education in Russia. "In the struggle or Communism . . . our moral code should mak in the van of both our economic structure d our laws. Only if we do this shall we main n that high moral sense which now distinguishes our society so strongly from any other." d the decisive factor in successful child rea g lies "in the constant, active and conscious fulfillment by parents of their civic duty- ward Soviet society . . . where this duti s really felt . . . no failure or catastrophes e possible."

Mr. Alt had a conversation with the dir- tor of research in the children's division a psychiatric hospital: "'In America,' I said o her, 'we are very much concerned with t feelings of the individual. We observe th we record them, you might say we virtu y put them under the microscope.'

"'Our workers,' she said earnestly, 'e interested in feelings, too, but feelings, Alt, must be directed to a useful purpose.'

When the Alts asked a kindergarten direc r to explain the conformity of the children, e said, "The good behavior you see is the re t of the clarity and agreement on the part of t teachers as to their expectations from th r children."

If you have been able to keep from feel g angered by the tone of moral superiority r suffocated by the picture of unprotesting c - formity, you can see the point I am raisin I am inclined to agree with these Russ n spokesmen that one reason—perhaps e most important reason—why most Russ n children are so well behaved is that th are clarity and agreement everywhere. e parents and child-care professionals are l devoted to a common cause that inspires the They understand the social importance f their jobs. They are proud of their contri - tions. They are unanimous about the quali s and ideals that are to be inculcated in c - dren—industriousness, love of education, operativeness, dedication to country. e children sense the consistency that surrou s them, in both the adults and the other childr . They accept this uniform guidance with re- tive ease. They show no signs of having b n intimidated or made resentful, as they wo l if they had been trained too severely.

You can see that the aspects of the Sov t philosophies of life and child rearing that I s selected sound quite opposite from our ow . In America the ideals of different families v y considerably. An ambition that a lot of s share—getting ahead in the world—does t

CONTINUED ON PAGE 7

"Every woman over 2 years of age wears Spanky Pants!"

That's because Spanky Pants come in sizes for everybody—sisters and mothers, grandmas and aunties, too. Colors? The prettiest! Prints? The perkiest! Comfort? The very same that Carter's puts into its famous soft cotton knit baby clothes. And no woman is ever too old for that kind of babying!

Women's S-M-L, 85¢-$1.15.
Junior 7-15, 79-89¢.
Teen 8-16, 79-89¢.
Girls' 2-16, 69-89¢.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO. NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

"So much happens to Andy between breakfast and lunc but with a good hot oatmeal breakfast to go on he'l make it all right...oatmeal sticks to his ribs...and, in a way, helps him 'keep his chin up'...oatmeal a bother? Not when it's for him..."

(from a taped interview with a Winnetka, Ill. housewife)

YOU KNOW YOU'VE DONE YOUR BEST_WITH HOT QUAKER OATS OR MOTHER'S OAT

NUED FROM PAGE 34

; together but puts us in competition ie another. We have a great belief in s, but this makes for changes in our 's rather than stability. Education is not hought of by Americans as primarily a of making a greater contribution to or as enrichment of the soul, but as he road to a better job (or matrimony).
f these common American attitudes is hy. It is only that they do not serve to nd inspire us. Religious beliefs which, n colonial days, provided the main and guide for man's existence seem to st much of their intensity for many of ple, especially in the twentieth century.
rica in earlier generations was excited, fied to a degree, by the drives to push e frontier, found a new nation, welioneers and freedom seekers from all urope, create plenty for everyone by alization. In two world wars there odigious feats of total mobilization in se of saving our country and of prepar-way for a better world. But after each sense of high purpose gave way to pation with individual and material s.

ably the fact that our population has uilt up of a mixture from many naackgrounds, all impatiently seeking a
, has been a potent factor in delaying rgence of a deeply unifying philosophy.
also think that the problem for us American parents of finding a set of hich would give us a strong sense of > ur son at five is your master, > a ten your slave, at fifteen your > uble, and after that your friend > foe, depending on his bringing

>
> BEN HAMELEK VELTANAZIR
> HASDAI

n in raising our children has been treisly complicated by revolutionary de-ents in the fields of education, psyand pediatrics. Perhaps it is our very deep traditions which has rendered us arly open to new trends. In any case, lern concepts came in a veritable flood.
n educators such as Dewey and Kilrealized clearly that children do not great deal that is usable in life by docile nce of what books say, or by rote . Children are by nature curious and us to grow up. When schoolwork is riate for their age and interests, they stically try to explore it and master it.
quire lasting wisdom through oppor-
to experience, feel, think, experiment, co-operate—when guided by skillful
s. I believe that these principles have oved sound when applied expertly and . They help to explain the eagerness, fulness, mental flexibility of our young and the impressive numbers who go igher education. But these new trends cation were misinterpreted by some They drew the conclusion that the lea was simply to lessen supervision trol by the teacher.

the epochal work of Freud and his s in the psychoanalysis of neurotic in-ls came the discoveries about the functhe unconscious mind, the childhood tations of sexual interest, the primary nce of love, the distortions of the lity caused by hostility, anxiety and ough Freud and the other analysts did mpt to translate these findings into a tem of child rearing, many other pro-l people and parents who heard about
d. There was considerable misinterpreand misapplication, as it turned out.
who lacked confidence in their own n sense became anxious about the harm they might do their children if ibited them or made them resentful discipline. They decided that when in was better not to interfere. A certain of children became somewhat in-ecause of insufficient guidance.

One more big change came in the mid-1940's when pediatricians, who had held to strictness in infant feeding for half a century in their efforts to overcome the scourge of infant diarrhea, concluded that rigidity in schedules and amounts was not medically necessary after all and was psychologically unwise. Some hesitant parents took this to mean that babies should be allowed to decide most things for themselves, without parental guidance, and this led to sleep problems and toilet-training problems.

So to sum it up, I think that a certain number of American parents of this century have been deprived of comfortable security in two ways. They began without having their feet firmly planted on a solid base of tradition. Then when the winds of new doctrines began to blow they were easily buffeted around. Eager to bring up well-adjusted children according to the new theories but anxious about all the pitfalls, they have leaned over backward to avoid severity. Their children have felt a lack of direction, and often acted up. The parents have tried to suppress their irritation at the misbehavior. But each time their patience has broken they have felt guilty and tried harder to suppress the irritation. I think that this kind of conflict in parents—between irritation and guilt—is what has allowed a lot (not all) of the minor squabbling, whining, inconsiderateness, abuse of toys and furnishings which are so common in American children.

How do Russian parents manage to avoid these exasperating faults? Part of the answer, I think, is that they don't have to worry about different theories of rearing or whether they will know how to bring up their child. They don't have to wonder what particular attitudes they will want him to develop or whether they are entitled to ask him to conform to their wishes. They take it for granted that they only need to pass on to him the straightforward ideals to which the entire nation is devoted and that these will guide him to a productive, satisfying life. This serene trust combined with a very genuine love of children seems to work.

Can we learn anything from this contrast? I think it should encourage us to set high enough standards for our children so that they are respectful of us, of one another, of their homes and possessions, of themselves. We should be clear about what we expect, and this does not imply parental severity. We can see not only in Russian children but in plenty of our own that the children who are guided firmly are not only pleasanter to live with but they are much more happy themselves.

We Americans certainly won't ever want to let our leaders set the goals all by themselves, and impose them on us. But this does not mean that we have to choose between a purposeful communism and a democracy without common aims. Many countries with democratic governments have developed a strong sense of national purpose which gave meaning and direction to every aspect of life. The most dramatic modern example is Israel: A band of idealists established a new nation, provided refuge and opportunity for hundreds of thousands of the oppressed from all over the world, made the desert bloom, created industries, founded universities, all with free discussion and democratic leadership. I have never spoken to a traveler returned from Israel who was not moved by the fervor of the people.

There are plenty of causes crying for America's concern. We urgently need more and better schools and universities, new housing, more adequate provisions for medical care, a solution for our racial discrimination. The poor, underdeveloped countries of the world are begging for our technical, educational, medical and financial assistance. The Communist nations which are out to beat us in every field of competition are gaining in productivity, giving more assistance to backward peoples, winning allies and friends faster than we. We only need to rouse ourselves, with the inspiration of bold leaders, and we'll have enough crusades to absorb us for decades. Then we might simultaneously find ourselves, save the world from destruction and give our children a new sense of dedication and worth.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

Most Powerful All-Purpose Cleaner

NEW Sunbeam
DUAL DELUXE VACUUM CLEANER

Best "on-the-floor" cleaning
. . . less than 2" high nozzle cleans under lowest furniture. Also cleans right up to the baseboard.

Best "above-the-floor" cleaning
Exclusive nozzle design plus greater suction cleans the heaviest fabrics—suction control for light fabrics.

- Compact, Lightweight, Easiest to Use
- Stands on end for stairway cleaning
- Dirt-filled super-capacity disposable bag out in seconds
- Powerful suction reduces to gentle flow for delicate jobs
- Complete with attachments that always lock securely; release easily
- Quality made by Sunbeam for years of service

EXCLUSIVE!
Sunbeam Turbine Brush*
Power-pampers rugs and carpets! Amazing new air-driven revolving brush action and penetrating suction power beauty-grooms, deep-cleans carpets.
*Attachment available at extra cost

Sunbeam THE BEST ELECTRIC APPLIANCES MADE
SUNBEAM CORPORATION ©S. C. ®SUNBEAM
Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois • Canada: Toronto 18

Want to look lovelier, more Exciting?

World-famous, temporary

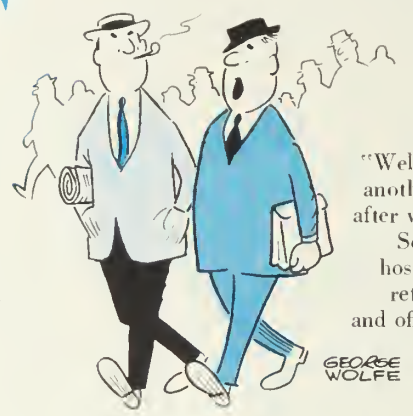
Nestle Hair Color

GIVES YOU INSTANT GLAMOUR

Nestle Colorinse—quick, easy-to-use. Glorifies your natural hair shade, lights-up every strand with beautiful color-highlights. Removes dulling soap film, makes hair easier to manage. 12 shades stay color true till your next shampoo. 35¢
NESTLE COLORINSE

Nestle Colortint intensifies your own hair shade OR gives you thrilling NEW color. Colortint also beautifies gray and white hair... blends-in gray and faded streaks. Stronger than a rinse... but not a permanent dye. Colortint lasts through 3 shampoos. 10 exquisite shades. 35¢
NESTLE COLORTINT

Nestle Hair Sprays add the final touch of perfection as they set hair in soft, lovely lasting waves... keep hair perfectly controlled in all kinds of weather. 2 formulas—Spraze for hard-to-hold hair... Soft Spraze for easy-to-manage hair. 4 oz. 49¢, 7 oz. 69¢, Giant size 89¢
NESTLE SPRAZE or SOFT SPRAZE



Nestle

COLORS YOUR HAIR
WITHOUT BLEACHING or DYEING

Ask your beautician for professional applications

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Well, another day, another six forty-th after withholding tax, Social Security, hospitalization, retirement fund and office collections!

I'm a good listener; but when three persons interrupted me when I tried to utter one short sentence it riled me, as I'd just interrupted them. (Maybe we're all too stimulating?)

A brave-new-world touch at the country club:
two babies asleep in a playpen while their young mothers play bridge.

My Dream Girl is deeply fascinated by Vardis Fisher's giant novel, Orphans in Gethsemane, but she hints that maybe it's too sexy for me to waste my time.

As an ex-teenager myself, I can advise the high-school boys who cruise around downtown streets in convertibles with the top down, aprowl for girls, that they'd get more and better dates if they made a few phone cal

A hamburger king at the next village boasts he uses "beef grown on our own farm and ground from nose to tail when prime."
That does seem fairer and more democratic, doesn't it, than diverting the better meat?

A gallant ex-bachelor at our lunch table boasts he used to remember 150 phone numbers. Now if the operator asks "What number did you dial?" he has to look it up again.

I'm in favor of establishing Son-in-Law Day as a new American holiday, perhaps in August. Merely as a token of affection and to coax 'em into bringing wife and children for a visit.

Once upon a time I courted my Dream Girl with planked steak at the tearoom, and now she rewards me with tenderized flank steak when she decrees I've been a good husband.

Our teenangels think they invented the modern sandwich of a thin slice of bread between two thick slices of meat. Shucks, that's what made us run hungrily all the way home from school!

"Naturally I buy dresses I don't ever wear very much," admits our village's most extravagant wife. "How else would I ever have any to give to the rummage sales?"

To humor the members, our town's club serves 'em a hefty buffet dinner once a month at $2.75 for all they can eat: sea food, turkey, ribs and 19 other dishes. Eyewitnesses swear they've seen some members stow away 10,000 calories.

My newest slimmer primer reveals that dancing uses up 2 calories a minute; swimming, 6.06 calories a minute; but walking upstairs consumes 10 a minute. Maybe that's the easiest outlet for us wallflowers.

What really awes us parents on a P.T.A. trip to our children's classes is not the teachers alone—it's also the lists of uncommon words on the blackboards, and the geometry and algebra and arithmetic problems.

If my wife gets bored with the football game at our alma mater, it helps her a lot to tune in on some music with the little transistor set she hides under her stadium coat's fur collar. Luckily, she's seldom bored.

Shucks, even if your man for President loses in the November election the winner will look a lot better to you the day after the voting than he did the day before. A few extra votes make him seem godly and inevitable.

My Lady Love has quit rebelling against her monthly chore of adding up the bills and writing the checks. She's discovered that most wives do it, and how much like a goddess it makes her look to me.

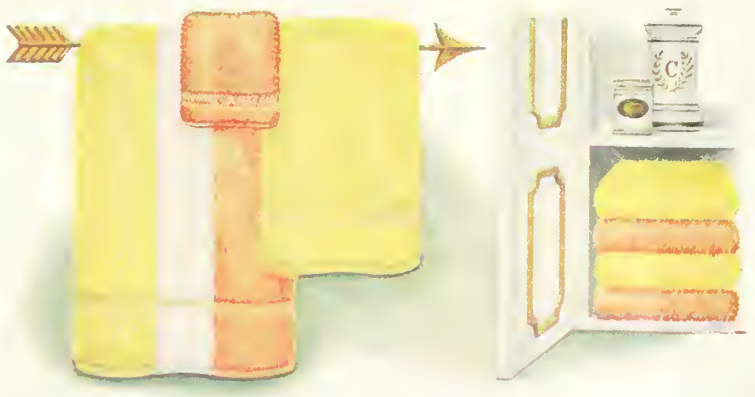
Occasionally we see our old convertible around town, the one we turned in on our sport car, and it always puts us in a glow. We've even found it parked and looked at the registration card to see who owns it now.

Just as a man's necktie and shirt collar are the focal points of his grooming, so is a woman's neckline vastly important. It may be definitely V-necked or circular or oval or square, but never nondescript!

. . . When Junior takes us to the same ocean beach where we took him when he was seven and seventeen,
. . . Or our Patrick, a naturalist at six, asks over long distance, "How is your garter snake?"
. . . And our daughter remembers to put pretty commemoratives on letters to me because I like handsome stamps,
. . . Or Cyclone (Harlan III) reports over the phone from the air base that his fingernail will be entirely healed in four months,
. . . And our daughter-in-law's homemade draperies look better than our $700 ones,
. . . Or our youngest forgives me swiftly after I've lost my temper, and acts as if nothing had happened,
Then I want to find our marriage certificate and frame it and hang it beside my wife's master of arts degree.

Defies hottest hot, coldest cold, yet it's so beautiful, so easy to clean! Truly amazing, freeze-cook-serve Corning Ware can go straight from icy freezer to red-hot burner or oven, then to the table handsomely! Possible only because it's made from fabulous missile material, Pyroceram®! A dream to wash! Saucepans and skillets do double duty as casseroles. Also available, percolators and a teapot. Pieces from $3.95. Sets, $14.95 to $34.95. Detachable, lock-on handle, just $2. Prices slightly higher in Canada • Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.

CORNING ✻ WARE



NOW! CANNON

new fashion towels designed to

Newest and brightest solid color towel for $1... Cannon's Champion. Prove to yourself this is the best dollar towel value you can find... for softness, absorbency and long wear. And so decorator-right!

Cheer up, blend sunny colors! Stripe ensembled with solids

Think pink! Mix solids and floral... and vice versa!

Cannon brings you so much quality.

FASHION-MATES at $1

coordinate in decorator florals, stripes and solid colors

Now you can "do" your bath as charmingly as the rest of your home—with Cannon's Carefree Fashion-Mates at $1. They're decorator-right, let you dream up dozens of beautiful combinations for dramatic changes of scene.

1. choose three complete ensembles, Garden Glory floral, Modern Mood stripe and Champion solid . . . in one color or in different colors

2. then mix your florals, stripes, solids in many exciting ways . . . 27 ensemble possibilities in all

Of course, every Cannon towel stays soft, thirsty, wears for years, because of Cannon's Beauti-Fluff process. The Cannon label is your assurance.

Accent the blues! Try floral and solid with a deep green wash cloth Gather pinks and roses. Colors of stripe in hand towel, wash cloth

Add spice to the yellows of the hand towel, wash cloth

Harmonize the blues! Floral, stripe with coordinating solid ensemble

TRADE MARK CANNON MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 WORTH STREET, NEW YORK 13, NEW YORK • TOWELS SHEETS • BEDSPREADS • DRAPERIES • STOCKINGS • TERRY CLOTH

so much style, for so little money

Prices shown are approximate

DIVORCED AT 23

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D. Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

"I WANTED TO PROVE YOU ALL WRONG"

Dear Dr. Adams: You may not remember me, but I was a student and active participant in discussions in your marriage course two years ago.

I'm writing to give you another actual case that bears out all the things you teach. When I took your course, I was going steady with Sam, who was twenty-three and had not gone to college. He was from a respectable but poor family, and had the interests one would expect with his background. I was the daughter of a prominent professional family. I had never gone steady and hadn't dated much, but I was active in my sorority and was used to the "good things of life."

Every statistic and recommendation you presented concerning married happiness was against us. This, plus the fact that my parents were completely opposed, should at least have made me look around a bit before getting married. However, being naturally stubborn, I was determined to prove you all wrong. Consequently, Sam and I eloped and kept our marriage secret for eight months. When we finally announced our secret marriage, we moved to New Jersey, where we spent two months living with relatives and friends, again a situation far removed from normal wholesome married life. When we at last started living "alone together," we were very close, since neither of us knew many people, and all we had was each other. This situation was intensified by the fact that we started working in the same neighborhood. We went to work together, lunched together, came home together, and spent all our evenings together.

However, two months later my company moved to a new location, and as a result the people in the department in which I worked began to get closer. The staff are all industrial-relations people, which correctly implies college educations, interest in social life, and more sophistication than that involved in my husband's work, which was clerical. A month passed and then Sam's work shift changed. Because of this I "branched out" even more. My department would have cocktail parties after work, luncheons for special events, and other functions in which my husband showed no interest. Whereas up to now I had known and worked mainly with the girls in my department, I was starting to get the normal attention men pay to reasonably attractive women at work, for which I was more than glad, since Sam had in a short year lost all interest in compliments, conversation and social graces. When I found myself becoming attracted to a man at work, I realized that something had to be done, because I am a romantic at heart—I believe firmly in love and marriage—and I knew that if my marriage didn't change, I might begin to cheat on my husband.

He and I had a long talk, both agreeing to try to be better. But Sam was fully convinced that everything was my fault and did not try to make any changes. Maybe deep down I didn't either, but by this time I didn't really care. We tried a trial separation, which lasted only a month because I felt sorry for him and for myself; but after four more weeks of really trying to make it work, I realized that the differences between us were just too great.

I am now getting ready to file for a divorce, have moved into my own place, and am now for the first time learning what it means to be alone. The first week I felt there wasn't a person in the world who cared about me—but after several weeks, I'm getting used to it. I get sick to death of myself, but I'm still happier than I was in a marriage where I dreaded weekends and holidays and actually looked forward to going to work. I have a good job as secretary to a top business executive, I'm only twenty-three, and I think I've learned more about myself from this experience than I could have from anything else.

At present I have a mild attachment to a man engaged to be married in December—a shocking statement, I know—but it is an attachment mainly for intellectual reasons. We share many of the same interests, and we are both intelligent enough not to expect any violent declarations of love or promises that will never be kept.

More support for your lectures: You frequently said that sexual satisfaction, though important, was seldom enough to make marriage work; my husband and I were perfectly suited sexually—but sex alone was not enough to keep us together.

I left out one thing of reasonable importance. During my last college semester I had several dates with a fraternity man, unbeknown to my fiancé-to-be. When Sam questioned me about becoming officially engaged, I went to a counselor outside your department. I couldn't come to you because I knew what your answer would be. The counselor told me I wouldn't have the guy buy me a ring if I weren't sure. Which didn't answer my question, and yet didn't tell me not to marry Sam. Had I come to you, I probably wouldn't be a twenty-three-year-old divorcee!

Thanks for letting me bend your ear, and I hope I have helped some of your students and readers look a little more closely at their lives. I realize you're a busy man, but I'd be interested in your comments on all this.

Sincerely, LILA S——

It wasn't easy for Lila to write this courageous letter. But if the experience helps her to face the future as honestly as she now sees the past, she may be able to achieve a happy marriage in the years ahead. Extracts from my reply follow:

Dear Lila: Thank you for sharing your story with our students and readers. I hope that my comments will help them—and you—to face up to the realities of marriage.

In spite of the fact that you were a college graduate, you were less ready for marriage than many girls your age. Having dated infrequently, you had not identified the qualities you wanted and needed in a husband. Since Sam was your only "steady," and your dating experience limited, you had no standards by which to compare him with other men.

Further, you are a romantic and not a realist. You recognized the differences between you and Sam, but the major weakness of the romantic is an inability to face the realities.

The opposition of your parents was a warning. They anticipated the consequences and differences in education, in socioeconomic backgrounds, in interests and values, and in temperaments (for example, you are outgoing, Sam prefers a quiet at-home evening). Remember, too, that parental opposition is a handicap in itself.

Another handicap was that you were unable to test your love and companionability by frequent association during engagement. Since you were in college and Sam wasn't, your courtship was insufficient to prove that the two of you were ready for marriage. When you were together, you were too happy just in seeing each other to plan for the future.

While informally but not officially engaged, you dated another man and became interested in him. This should have warned you that formal engagement or marriage should be delayed. You did consult a counselor, and I am sure that he wanted to help you, but you may have been so positive and seemingly self-assured that he took a completely neutral position. He should have helped you identify and evaluate all the differences between you and Sam, and should have suggested that you postpone official engagement until your doubts had been resolved. Perhaps he tried (or wanted to), but your "stubbornness" may have stood in the way.

Furthermore, Lila, you admit that you knew you were disregarding all you had learned in my course and from your parents, but that you were determined to prove us all wrong. One thing I have always emphasized is that elopement-secret marriages are practically never justified. That you would go to such extremes almost proves that you knew you were making a mistake. This must be construed as rebelliousness and not simple stubbornness. You made all the mistakes, including beginning your marriage (once it was announced) by living with relatives and friends. But that is water over the dam now that your divorce will soon be final.

What about the future, Lila? You say that you have learned more about yourself, but have you learned more about marriage and the responsibilities that a wife must accept in making it work? Are you less stubborn, less rebellious, and more willing to consider the rights and opinions of others? I am dismayed that you have begun an association with a man committed to another woman which you describe as "an attachment mainly for intellectual reasons." You imply that no commitments or "promises that will never be kept" have been made, but what about this man's fiancée, her family and his obligations to them?

Don't you agree that you really need personal counseling? You are only twenty-three, your whole life is ahead of you. It can be a wonderful life without heartaches for you or others—or it can be a succession of failures of which you have already had one. Yes, you are only twenty-three, Lila, but take care, for it may be later than you think. I do not wish to seem stern, but I do want to help you be realistic. Believe me, that is necessary if you are to find the happiness I hope will someday be yours.

Sincerely yours,
Your former teacher,
CLIFFORD R. ADAMS

DO YOU AGREE?

How can I get my husband to spend more time with me?

By discussing and doing things with him that he particularly likes.

ASK YOURSELF:

Am I Impetuous?

Whether single or married, many women complicate their daily living by acting thoughtlessly and impulsively. Weigh each question carefully before answering "Yes" or "No."

Do you often:

1. Speak your mind without thinking?
2. Buy things on the spur of the moment?
3. Find it hard to be punctual?
4. Run out of some household staple?
5. Lose your temper?
6. Misjudge the motives of others?
7. Oversleep mornings, stay up late at night?
8. Overspend your allowance?
9. Seem rushed and off schedule?
10. Forget or overlook appointments?
11. Return purchases or make exchanges?
12. Neglect answering letters promptly?
13. Pay bills too late for discounts?
14. Make decisions without thinking?

If you answered "Yes" to five or more of the above items, you are probably a trial to yourself and your husband (or sweetheart). Why not try to improve the situation by: 1—Making a plan and time schedule of your activities at least a week ahead; 2—Preparing a shopping list and sticking to it when you go to the stores; 3—Listing your most annoying traits and habits, and doing your best to correct them?

Wesson® Glorifies the Little Hen

...as only pure vegetable oil can

RECIPE FOR CORNISH GAME HENS

made with poly-unsaturated Wesson, the pure vegetable oil

Split 2 Cornish hens in half. Lightly sprinkle with mixture of ½ cup flour, 1 teaspoon salt, dash pepper, 2 teaspoons paprika. Fry in moderately hot Wesson (350°) to the depth of 1 inch in skillet, turning to brown well. Remove hens, keep warm. Drain off all but 2 tablespoons drippings. Add 3 cups hot cooked rice, ¼ cup chopped parsley, 1 can (4 ounces) sliced mushrooms with juice, toss lightly. Replace the hens, heat. 4 servings, about 575 calories each.

Free cook book, "101 Glorious Ways to Cook Chicken". Write The Wesson People, New Orleans 12, La.

What heavenly eating! And how pleasant to cut down on saturated fat in your skillet by using Wesson instead of shortening. You see, shortening is hydrogenated to make it solid. But Wesson is never hydrogenated and so it is poly-unsaturated as only pure vegetable oil can be. So clear, so fresh, so pretty as it pours, Wesson brightens all food flavors—never ever adds taste of its own as some oils do. How nice that Wesson costs so little, too.

When your physician recommends modifying your diet and specifies pure vegetable oil to replace solid fats, Wesson is unexcelled among all leading brands.

Feel young...feel Enna Jettick

Enjoy walking and working . . . keep the high energy to have fun with the children . . . to go all over town in the sublime comfort of Cush Un Soft Enna Jetticks. Try one smart-looking pair, and they'll be your pet shoes from now on. Fremont (left), with stacked leather heel, and Monaco, on a tapered wall last, are $12.95 each. ENNA JETTICK SHOES, Inc., Auburn, N. Y.

other Enna Jetticks

$9.95 to $12.95

(Far West slightly higher)

How can women of all ages keep that young-skin look?

Three ages of woman . . . living proof that time won't tell when it doesn't show.

Jewels by CARTIER

New cosmetic discovery helps you replace young-skin oils that nature robs you of as years go by!

Y, you can look younger! Science has discovered the first cl e match for the silkening, smoothing effects of your own n ural young-skin oils! N.O.R.*, Natural Oil Replacement, in- tr uced for the first time in 'CRÈME PARADOX'.

'C ME PARADOX' is power-packed with N.O.R.*, plus polyun- sa rates, panthenol and placentine. Innocent of hormones, la lin, sticky oils, it's greaseless . . . rapidly absorbed. Richest ve sheerest of nutrient creams, 'CRÈME PARADOX' is soft as a w sper, gentle as a lullaby. Works deep down to bring dewy freshness and soft, silken smoothness to dry, lined, flaky skin.

So little does so much—so quickly. A fluffy fingertipful each night is all you need to "sleep back" the look of youth. 'CRÈME PARADOX' in luxurious French Empire jars, $12.50 and $5.00.

Introductory Special! For a limited time only, Du Barry offers a special introductory jar of 'CRÈME PARADOX'—a $3.50 value—for only $2.50. Offer expires Dec. 31st, 1960.

Prices plus tax

 Patent applied for*

Crème Paradox

New Nutrient Beauty-Sleep Cream by DU BARRY

©960 Du Barry

Ceil Chapman's dreams begin with a maidenform girdle

the dream of a dress:

Ceil Chapman's black and brief beauty of whisper-soft silk crepe. The chic of the matter: sleeves which barely exist, the V (for vamp!) neckline, and a whittled, belittled waist from which the drape draws its artistry. Clearly, the urbane manner of Ceil Chapman dictates that the figure of fall fashion is slim, slimmer, slimmest (helped to who knows what extent by the girdle beneath)!

the dream of a girdle:

Maidenform Variation* girdles are weightless will o'-the-wisps that are the very soul of restraint an self-control. Seamless (and seemingly endless powers of persuasion gently prompt your figure t sheath-worthy trimness. Select from seven flat tening, flattering Variation styles. In whitest whit that stays white. Pantie girdle illustrated just 2.95

TELL ME, DOCTOR

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler will discuss some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names which are used are fictitious.

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M. D.

ABBOT MILLS

"Doctor, I think I have incurable cancer, so what's the use of operations and a lot of fuss? Won't you help me make Dr. Scott and my family see it that way?"

Well, Mrs. Jarrett, what is this argument you've been having with Dr. Scott? He's a very good man, you know, one of the best. You sound rather worked up over the phone!"

Not really, Doctor," Mrs. Jarrett answered. "I don't blame Dr. Scott for being put out with me. I am sure he is doing the right thing from his viewpoint. I guess I just look at certain matters differently from most people."

Let's begin at the beginning. You are forty-eight, you have two married children and one in college. Dr. Scott wants you to go to the hospital for biopsy, dilatation and curettage. He requested permission to perform a hysterectomy if his findings warrant it. You refuse to go to the hospital or to have any further tests."

I asked Dr. Scott if he would mind if I came to see you instead," Mrs. Jarrett contributed, smiling faintly. "He begged me to. Said maybe you could knock some sense into my head!"

I'm. What caused you to seek a doctor in the first place, Mrs. Jarrett?"

The main reason was occasional itching, and a slight vaginal discharge that seemed to be increasing. My periods are still regular, but Dr. Scott got rather excited when I told him I had noticed a few drops of blood between periods. He said my trouble might simply be a yeast infestation—monilia, he called it. He said he found a little erosion on the cervix that might account for the spotting. But I know it's cancer."

What gave you that idea?"

I overheard Dr. Scott talking over the phone to the laboratory. He had taken several smears, you see, for the Papanicolaou test. I heard him get the report on the last one. That's why I refused to go to the hospital, put my family through the trouble and expense of useless operations."

What is when Dr. Scott got cross with you?"

Well, he said I was talking nonsense, that I had a very good chance of needing nothing more than the biopsy and curettage. But he wouldn't promise that would be all. I know a woman who went to the hospital for a biopsy and curettage and had all her pelvic organs removed! I don't mean just the female organs. I don't propose to have anybody do that to me!"

Just because Dr. Scott wants a more thorough diagnosis, you have jumped to the conclusion that he is going to remove all the organs from your pelvis? Don't you think you are taking quite a lot for granted?"

Mrs. Jarrett leaned forward, spoke earnestly. "No, Doctor, I don't. You see, Dr. Scott didn't know I was in the next room when he was talking to the lab. He was asking them about the 'suspicious cells' and I heard him say 'Class Three—are you sure?' It was right after that he wanted me to go to the hospital immediately, and give my consent to a hysterectomy if he should find it necessary. So I know it's cancer.

I'm something of a fatalist, Doctor. I've had a good and happy life. Why burden my husband and children by drawing out the agony? I want you to help me persuade Dr. Scott and my family that the quicker I can have this all over with, the happier I will be."

I gather you didn't tell Dr. Scott you had overheard this conversation about Class Three?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 50

For dry skins
MAX FACTOR creates a fountain of beauty—
Pan-Stik* make-up

Only PAN-STIK can create a flawless complexion and—simultaneously—bathe your skin in a 'fountain' of soft, dewy beauty. For PAN-STIK is enriched with precious oils that hold moisture in, keep dryness out.

And only PAN-STIK strokes on make-up from a swivel stick, as easily as a lipstick! $1.75

MAX FACTOR...master of make-up artistry for over fifty years.

*PAN-STIK (TRADEMARK) MEANS MAX FACTOR CREAM-TYPE MAKE-UP ©1960, MAX FACTOR & CO.

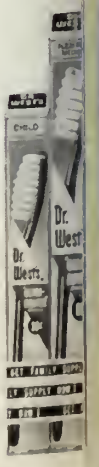
2 out of 3 toothbrushes ...have "gone to pot"

American Dental Association survey finds 2 out of 3 people need a new toothbrush. Now you can...

SAVE UP TO 70¢ ON DR. WEST'S "DOUBLE BARGAIN BUY

SAVE 40¢ HERE!



$1.38 VALUE ONLY 98¢

Buy these two Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" brand toothbrushes in the famous glass tubes—get both for only 98¢. A 40¢ saving! They're precision-made—designed to reach every tooth surface, inside, outside, in-between. Exton brand bristles won't wilt, won't pull out. Look for this special offer at your drug counter!

SAVE 30¢ HERE!

$1.28 VALUE ONLY 98¢

You'd pay 89¢ for this adult Flexi-Tuft alone if you bought it at the regular price. Now you can get these two (one for you, one for your child) for only 98¢. They're Dr. West's newest dentist-preferred designs. "Germ-Fighter" treated. Firm, yet pliant Flexi-Tuft bristles. Supply your family and save money, today!

Copr. 1960 by Weco Products Co.

STOP BRUSHING YOUR TEETH WITHOUT CLEANING YOUR TEETH—YOU NEED A NEW DR. WEST'S

New medicated beauty care gives you a Complete Complexion Clean-up!

It's 3 ways better for your skin!

1 Cleans up dirt.
Cleans like soap, but it's better because it doesn't dry skin. Put Noxzema on, wash it off with a wet facecloth. It's greaseless, washes off with water. Leaves your skin "soap-clean," but not dried out or drawn.

2 Cleans up dry skin.
Softens like cream, but it's never "butter-y" or greasy. Doesn't clog pores. Helps skin stay moist, helps to fight dry skin as only a moisturizer does . . . leaves skin "cream-soft," but so fresh and clean.

3 Cleans up blemishes.*
Helps clear skin because it's medicated. Five medicinal ingredients help heal surface blemishes fast. Regular beauty care with Noxzema helps "wake-up" a dull, lifeless complexion to new glowing vitality.

Makes your skin look lovely —even without make-up!

Imagine you with a skin so fresh and clear and radiant! Regular Noxzema beauty care gives you a complete complexion clean-up every day.

Use Noxzema for cleansing, a make-up base, a night cream. See a beautiful difference in days. Get Noxzema Skin Cream today.

MEDICATED · GREASELESS

*surface blemishes

Better than aspirin—even aspirin with buffering for

TENSE, NERVOUS HEADACHES

Acts Instantly to Give More Complete Pain Relief

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles . . .

2. . . . puts painful pressure on nerves.

3. Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

Tense, nervous headaches need the special medication in Anacin. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever and no special medication to relieve nervous tension. But Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients—each with a specific purpose. Anacin not only relieves pain incredibly fast but also contains special medication to relax tension, release painful pressure on nerves—assuring a better 'total' effect—more complete relief from pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients in . . .

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

"Well, no, I didn't. I figured it was no use. He would probably just deny it."

"Mrs. Jarrett, I have to admire your courage and unselfishness—but what does Class Three mean to you? When applied to a Papanicolaou smear test, that is?"

Mrs. Jarrett looked surprised. "Why, the worst possible. Just the way a third-degree burn is worse than a first or second degree."

The doctor shook his head. "You could scarcely be more wrong—very fortunately! However, it isn't surprising. We doctors, too, used to think of cancer as just cancer. That is, you either had a cancer or you didn't. But we have learned that cancers don't materialize out of thin air. There is a preliminary stage, in which normal cells gradually turn into malignant ones. We are picking up cells now, in fact, that are just beginning to lose the controls or restraints—what these are we still don't know—that keep cells behaving normally instead of running amuck. Roughly speaking, six classes have been worked out from the Papanicolaou test. They go from Class One, where cells are absolutely normal—not malignant at all—through nonmalignant abnormalities such as infection, next vaguely suspicious types and so forth to the wild proliferation of full-blown carcinoma."

Mrs. Jarrett was following him now with painful attention. "And what are Class Three? Are they malignant?"

"They are just what you heard Dr. Scott say over the phone. Class Three indicates the earliest—the very first—suspicion of malignancy. Since I know that Scott is an excellent pathologist as well as gynecologist, I don't need to repeat the tests. I would say he has found some nests or patches of cells with very minute peculiarities. But their nature is such that he feels he must investigate further. There is doubtless no malignancy as yet; it is not likely that you have cancer in the actual sense of the word. In fact, you may never have one. These cells may only resemble early cancer cells. On the other hand, they may be precursors of cancer. But found at this stage, the chances of cure are practically one hundred per cent."

The doctor saw a variety of expressions cross Mrs. Jarrett's face—bewilderment, relief, followed by embarrassment. "You mean there's nothing to worry about? Why, Doctor, I had the hymns all picked out for my funeral!"

The doctor smiled. "Those hymns are going to have to wait a long time in your case."

"Doctor, that sounds wonderful!" Then Mrs. Jarrett sobered. "But I still don't know whether or not I have a cancer, do I?"

"It's impossible to say absolutely until the suspicious cells can be studied in their environment—that is to say, in tissue from your cervix or uterus. Diagnosis in these very early stages doesn't depend so much on how the cells look by themselves as how they act among the tissues where they are growing.

"Dr. Scott's investigation could show that the yeast infestation he mentioned accounts for the bleeding—the only symptom you have that's characteristic of cancer. Or the suspicious cells may be an early stage of what is called 'intraepithelial cancer' or 'carcinoma in situ.' Both these terms mean the same thing—suspicious cells that are noninvasive or 'contained,' as we say, in the tissues of the cervix or uterus; but which hold a possibility of someday becoming real cancer and invading other organs. Dr. Scott will have to perform a biopsy and curettage before he can find out for sure exactly what the situation is."

"But do I have to go to the hospital for that? I know ever so many women who have had biopsies in the doctor's office."

"What is called a 'punch biopsy' can be done in the doctor's office. Let's say that in making a routine vaginal examination, the doctor sees a suspicious-looking area on the cervix. He punches out a little chunk of tissue, just enough to study under the microscope, to see if there are cancer cells in that particular area. But with so small a specimen, it is easy to miss other tiny nests of cells just beginning to change. In your case, suspicious cells have been found through the Papanicolaou smear test. That calls for a cone biopsy, plus dila tion and curettage done under anesthesi

"Dr. Scott mentioned cone biopsy."

"I imagine he did. It is much more th ough than the punch biopsy. First we cu rather complete cone out of the inside lin of the cervical canal. This specimen conta most of the inner surface of the cervix. A suspicious areas are of course examined w particular care. But a good pathologist a takes samples from the tissue all the w around the cone, so it is almost impossible islands of abnormal cells in the cervix to cape detection, no matter how small th are."

"I see," said Mrs. Jarrett. "But why dilatation and curettage then? I wish y would tell me what those are. I've re known, really."

"The curette is a sharp-edged instrum shaped like a spoon, only with the middle the bowl cut out. It is used to scrape out t entire top layer of the lining of the uterus a withdraw it for examination. That is curetta First, though, the small opening of the cer has to be stretched—the dilatation part—that the curette can be introduced into t main cavity of the uterus.

"Examining the material extracted by t curette, we may find that spotting—that's o of the important cancer signs, you know—h been caused by polyps. Those are little sc wartlike growths which generally are har less. Or it may be caused by an erosion in t cervix. Such a place may bleed easily, but rarely malignant. Or we may find that anotl sort of cancer is starting to grow inside t uterus. You can see that when curettage f lows a cone biopsy, we find out what is ha pening in the innermost parts of these orga That is the great advantage of these diagnos methods."

> Few men have ever repented of silence. PATRICK HENRY

"If precancerous cells are found, or th 'carcinoma in situ' you mentioned, the doct does a hysterectomy?"

"Not always, especially if the patient is younger woman who would like to have ch dren. We can watch carefully by taking r peated smears and doing occasional biopsi We can operate the minute it appears adv able—but a young woman may be able to ha one or even several children first. There ha been cases, too, where the abnormal ce actually seemed to disappear.

"Just the same, it's a bit risky. Where a malignancy is found, in however early a sta in my opinion older women, in particular, a better off to have total hysterectomy, inclu ing tubes and ovaries."

"There isn't any chance that Dr. Scott w take out all my pelvic organs?"

"Absolutely not. There are surgeons no adays who do this for cancers we used consider inoperable—that is to say, past t curable stage. It may give a longer lease of l than the patients would have otherwise. B that has nothing to do with Class Three cel

"Dr. Scott knows his business, Mrs. Ja rett. If he doesn't find any cancerous or pr cancerous cells in a cone biopsy and curettag you get a pretty clean bill of health. All yo have to do is be very conscientious about g ing back to him for tests when he tells y to."

"Don't worry, Doctor, I've learned n lesson! I'm really grateful to you for being patient and understanding with me."

"That's an important part of our oblig tion, Mrs. Jarrett. And there's another thi I'd like you to understand. Generous-heart women like you are apt to underestimate th importance of the good years which rema ahead for you—important to your families well as to yourselves. With cancer diagnos and treatment developed to their prese point, there is no excuse for throwing in th sponge at age forty-eight!"

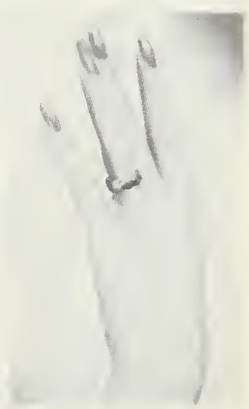
Next month Dr Schauffler discusses problems of beg ning menstruation.

To the 8 women in 9 who do their own housework:

Your hands deserve this super-lotion that works after others wash away!

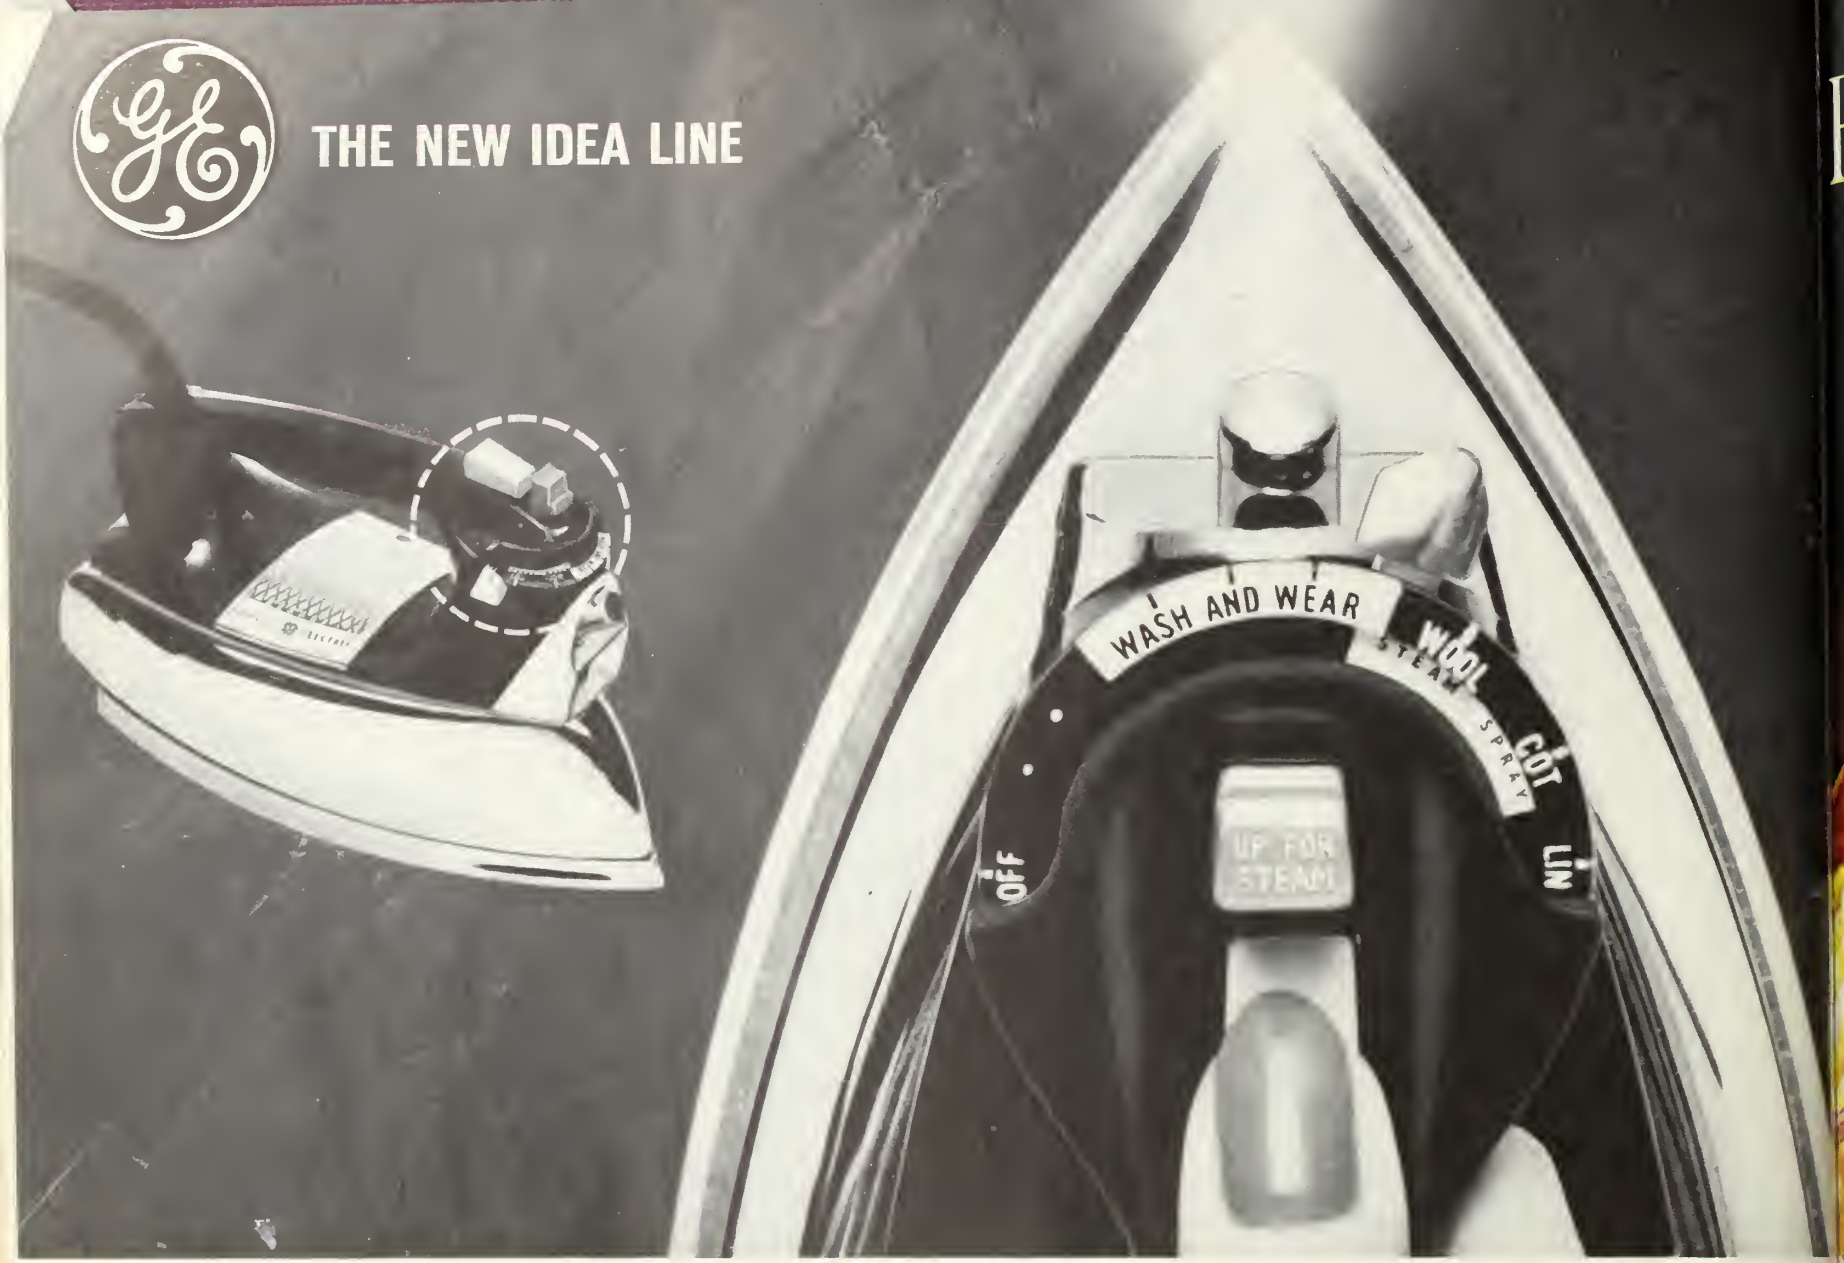
Back when almost everybody had help around the house, all you needed from a hand lotion was a pleasant scent and a soothing sensation. Nowadays you need a super-lotion that works as hard as you do. And that's precisely what you can expect from Revlon Medicated 'Silicare.'

'Silicare' does more than cosmetic lotions do. 'Silicare' sinks in ... then seals in! That's why it: 1. Banishes dry rough red skin. 2. Helps heal cuts, chafes and scratches . . . 3. Protects with an invisible silicone "glove."



And 'Silicare' keeps working after other lotions wash away. You've seen how harsh detergents cut through grease. They wash away ordinary lotions fast. But 'Silicare's' sealed-in protection lasts through as many as five ordinary hand washings.

'Silicare' costs slightly more than other lotions. But when your hands are at stake, the difference in protection is more than worth the difference in cost. And 'Silicare' lasts longer because it protects longer than ordinary lotions.



Choose 'Silicare' lotion or cream. Use it regularly for one week. You'll see there really is a difference among hand lotions.

Physicians: Write for clinical data. Revlon Pharmacal Division, 666 5th Ave., New York 36, N. Y.

©REVLON, INC. 1960

Revlon 'Silicare' MEDICATED'

New! Three wash and wear settings instead of one synthetic setting

Sprays . . . steams . . . new wash and wear settings!

Now . . . all of your ironing problems are solved by a single iron . . . The new General Electric Spray, Steam and Dry Iron.

It sprinkles as you iron. Press a button and even the heaviest wrinkles are sprayed damp—ironed flat in a shake.

A new sensitive even heat system solves ironing problems formerly left to guesswork. Even the most delicate new synthetics and wash and wear fabrics can be ironed with complete safety . . . In fact you can even steam iron many fabrics you wouldn't dare before!

We seriously doubt whether any dry, steam, 2-way or 10-way iron can match this one in versatility . . . See for yourself at your General Electric dealer's.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

General Electric Company, Portable Appliance Department, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.

A toaster and "oven", too! General Electric Toast-R-Oven makes toast on top—makes melted cheese sandwiches in "oven" below.

Beats, whips, mixes drinks—now sharpens knives! New General Electric Portable Mixer has optional knife-sharpener accessory.

Reheats without reperking! Automatic Coffee Maker has special reheat setting. Easy-to-clean stainless steel protects flavor.

Fresh-shucked flavor in a can

NIBLETS ITALIANO. Heat, season and butter Niblets Brand corn. Add thin sautéed ringlets of purple Italian onions for an interesting flavor and color accent.

All the fun of corn-on-the-cob—without the cob. The Green Giant quick-cooks his Niblets Brand corn to save the fresh-shucked flavor, color and nourishment. He vacuum packs it so every kernel stays crisp. The one-and-only Niblets. Open up a can of fresh-shucked flavor today.

Green Giant®

Good things from the garden

Add excitement to ground beef ... add Tabasco®!

The unique Tabasco flavor begins with this pepper . . . the proud variety that Edmund McIlhenny developed more than a century ago. We carefully tend it in the fields of Avery Island until red-ripe . . . mellow it like fine wine, for years in oaken casks. Only now is this liquid pepper seasoning worthy of the name Tabasco* . . . and in this famous bottle is ready to spread singing flavor through all your favorite foods. Try . . .

*Tabasco is the registered trademark for McIlhenny Co., Pepper Sauce

FAMILY HAMBURGER STEAK

For 6 generous servings, mix 2 pounds of lean ground beef with Worcestershire sauce, garlic salt, onion or celery salt and Tabasco, of course. Brown on the outside, as rare as you like on the inside. Slicing will be an event!

KABOB-BURGERS

Mellow Tabasco brightens flavor in the meat balls which you arrange on skewers with pineapple chunks and green pepper pieces. Broil over charcoal or in the oven, basting with pure vegetable oil laced with Tabasco. Ah!

HEAP BIG MEAT DISH

Starts with 1 pound ground beef, 1 cup cooked rice, Tabasco, herbs, and an egg to hold it together. Stuff the mixture into green peppers and on halved tomatoes crowned with onion rings. Bake 30 mins.—get set for applause.

CHILI ON BUN

You'll be so proud of this chili you make with chunks of browned ground beef, plump red beans and chili so lively with Tabasco. A favorite chili recipe from the Tabasco booklet.†

STUFFED MEAT LOAF

Your favorite meat loaf recipe is even more exciting when you add hard cooked eggs or stuffed green olives baked whole inside the loaf. Easy . . . but pretty fancy.

ALL-AMERICAN HAMBURGERS

Perfection—with only 4 ingredients: 1 pound ground beef, ½ teaspoon Tabasco, ½ cup milk, 1 teaspoon salt. Combine, shape into 4 large burgers, cook in lightly oiled skillet, serve on buns with "fixin's."

Tabasco*... the liquid pepper seasoning

†40-PAGE BOOKLET – dozens of exciting recipes . . . ground beef recipes, too. Send inside flap from Tabasco carton or 10c to Tabasco, Dept. LH-10, Avery Island, Louisiana.

"Tabasco" is also available in Canada.

Copyright 1960, McIlhenny Co., Avery Island, La.

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

GRAND FINALE: The Journal Cookbook's "cast of characters" celebrate a happy ending.

journal about town

WHERE WE GO...
WHAT WE DO...
WHOM WE MEET

Louella Shouer's food staff made 20 giant apple pies. What for? Pictures for the Journal cookbook preview, page 62. They used 14 pounds of shortening, rolled enough crust to cover the floor of our studio (25′ square). Nancy Wood estimates 2 bushels of tart green apples went into the baking. Carol Truax, who helped edit the book, prefers her pie with cheese, but admits that cream or à la mode is a tasty substitute. Secret of flaky piecrust: keep dough cool (there's a rolling pin hollowed out to hold ice water—prevents pastry from getting warm and tough). What happened to all 20 pies afterward? No problem. Eager staffers disposed of them in apple-pie order. Here's one time when we really had our just desserts!

The late John Marquand will be especially mourned by Journal readers since many recent novels crowning his years of distinctive literary achievement were published first in Ladies' Home Journal as serials. It was wryly noted at the time of his death that most reviewers of his lifework, giving him great critical acclaim, mentioned that his earlier works (described as "slick" and "glib") were published in popular magazines—but none which this editor saw mentioned that a long succession of his later, greater works up to the time of his death were regularly printed in Ladies' Home Journal. Could they be underestimating the power (and taste) of women—millions of women?

Times change and so do tastes; for instance, who serves terrapin any more? The dish, once thought fit only for slaves, was fantastically popular 50 years ago (turtle stew in a sherried sauce), is found on few modern menus, is very expensive, has almost become obsolete. While 1960 boasts a new look in flatware: free-flowing form, shorter fork tines and knife blades. "It may be an expression of our era," says John Stevens, who sparked an international design competition. "Beauty must be functional today. A shorter blade makes cutting easier."

Do authors become authors early? We asked some Journal writers. Will Stanton submitted his first piece at 14, went down to the newsstand the next week and was disappointed not to find it there. Hortense Calisher (story on page 78) was writing at 7. But youngest of all was Frances Gray Patton, who composed a nature poem at the very tender age of 3. It went: "The wind is blowing sof'ly; The birds are singing awf'ly." It wasn't until some years later, though, that we bought The Terrible Miss Dove, one bird that sang very well indeed.

Do you have trouble waking up? With days growing shorter, our staff searches for various ways to rise and shine. Dawn Norman has two alarm clocks named Diana (7) and Cynthia (10), who "never fail to go off on time." Hal Williams uses Western Union's Wake-Up Service: "A soft feminine voice purrs, 'It's seven o'clock, sir.' I even look forward to it!" Betty Coe Spicer confesses she's still searching for the perfect eye opener. She used to set her clock radio to rock 'n' roll, but the crazy beat curdled her temper. Talk about a me-e-ean awakening! Mr. Gould just wakes up—but regrets it.

Nobody believes in ghosts any more—do they? Halloween spirited us to ask if editors are superstitious. Elaine Ward-Hanna tempts fate by living with a black cat. When Bill McCleery's first Broadway play opened, he learned never to whistle in dressing rooms: "Makes everyone nervous." Which is just how we felt after hearing Jean Anderson's chilling tale: "Don't scoff—I actually live in a haunted apartment. 'Something' knocks over lamps, opens doors, climbs stairs. We've had detectives working on it—so far, no explanation." Maybe the house will give up the ghost!

Observant readers will notice (page 87) that some Parisians are more fashion-minded than flag-conscious—the clothes seasons ahead in style, Old Glory two stars behind the times.

Women drivers, attention! It's National Auto Show Week and we talked with Mrs. John Ramsey, who was the first woman ever to drive coast to coast (in 1909). Despite male cynics and countless obstacles (no maps, no roads), she made the trip in 41 days. Women are apt to be more cautious than men, but "good driving has nothing to do with sex. It's all above the collar." What makes a good driver? "Manners, good disposition, patience. You may not get there as fast, but you'll arrive in better shape!" She knows, too: in over half a century she's never had a ticket (unless you count three for parking). And at 73 she still travels cross-country; average driving time today: 52.5 hours!

Pioneer Ramsey at the wheel, in 1909.

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

5 YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

... explosion rocked the newspaper offices of the Los Angeles Times in October, 1910. ... ng nineteen. Tenor John McCormack ... a spellbinder with his Mother Machree. ... the fastest plane in the world flew at ...v-one miles per hour. Women's skirts ...ed upward—from the anklebone to the ... of their high fourteen-button shoes.

...omen monopolize the virtue of un-...shness," claims Editor Bok in the ...ober, 1910, Journal. "This is bad for ... husband and it spoils the children. ...thers miss the consideration they ...uld have, but it is their own fault. Their ... to should be, 'Never do anything ...rself which you can get anybody else ...lo.'"

"...we an Apple Revel some autumn evening ...your friends—roasting apples, bobbing ... apples, biting apples suspended from ...ngs, and fortunes told by apple peelings ...wn around the head or apple seeds laid ...he eyelids."

...rries Josephine: "I have been criticized ... allowing my fiancé to hold my hand ...le others are about. Is this improper?" ...ly: "Yes. Most of us prefer to imagine ...e-making rather than actually see it."

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

...ow we reached our readers 50 years ago.

This tense, dramatic story is fiction:
but it carries a greater amount of truth about a situation which affects every one of us than many factual articles can convey.
That is one of the reasons why we publish it.
THE EDITORS.

PEACEABLE LANE

Matthew Rice Jones was in no shape to recognize a portent, still less to deal with one, on that Sunday afternoon in May. It was a bright day in the fullness of spring, and Matt was collapsed on an aluminum lounge in his back yard, living out the last gentle melancholy of a Sunday hang-over. The sun, filtering down through the fresh green canopy of the maples, was soothingly warm, while the first page of The New York Times lay athwart his nose as a shield against the light.

Matt Jones was an average medium-young man, enjoying a degree of material success slightly above average. He had one car, a mortgage which caused him alternate pride and distress, a blond wife whom he loved and who loved him, and a son they both adored. Life thus far had tended to be more generous to him than demanding.

In fact, he thought comfortably, I feel a lot better than I probably deserve. Suddenly he remembered the source of the hang-over. They had gone to the spring dance at the Grassy Tor Club up on the hill. Had he had a good time? He could remember a succession of flushed, jovial, laughing faces, but they tended to fuzz out into unidentifiable blurs. I must have bought a drink or two. A drink or two, nuts; I must have bought drinks for the entire membership. CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

© 1960 by Keith Wheeler

By KEITH WHEELER

"Once we're in, this bunch can't touch us." Lamar Winter grinned. "They won't like it, but they'll have to take it—they're upper-class folks, and they're stuck with being civilized."

PEACEABLE
is soon to be published in bo
by Simon & S

6 WLISSMAN
5 CUSACK
7 CAVANIDIS
4 KELLY
8 ABRAM
3 GOLD
9 DRAPER
2 JONES
10 YALE
SOLD
11 OUTERBRIDGE
PEACEABLE LANE

Synopsis of Part I

A pretty bank teller, Kelly Sherwood, twenty-six, is ambushed in her garage one night by an admitted killer. Threatening bodily harm to her seventeen-year-old sister, Toby, he demands Kelly's co-operation in robbing the bank of $100,000. The Sherwood sisters, orphaned six years ago, are easy prey. Kelly stealthily phones the FBI. Agent John Ripley is soon able to relate the Sherwood case to the murder or suicide of a call girl, Nancy Ashton. He also meets Popcorn, a derelict informer who seems to have news of the killer's plans. Ripley has the patient co-operation of Peg, FBI receptionist he has been dating. But Kelly has been warned against confiding in Pete Morrow, her romantic interest in the escrow department. Nor has Toby been permitted to tell Jack, her high-school beau. Only Mr. Burkhardt, bank manager, knows of the threat. After being harassed by phone calls and notes, Kelly is told to take the Angel's Flight cable-car railroad to make contact for final instructions. FBI agents and police are posted in the area. Kelly hesitates after getting off the cable car and a thin man suggests that she might be looking for him. Gripping her arm, he hurries her into a nearby car and pushes the button locking the door.

Operation Terror

"I'll be all right. Don't worry," said Kelly. She squeezed Toby tightly. If anything did happen . . . Toby would manage. Second part of an exciting serial.

By THE GORDONS

II The moment Kelly Sherwood got into the car Rip left the co-ordinating room. He took the steps two at a time, dropping so fast that he clutched the old carved railing once to keep from falling. He went out the back door over ground mapped out previously. He knew where the clothesline was, and a stack of cartons piled high, and a hose stretched across a walk. Beyond the yard was a passageway, and he hurried down it, in almost total darkness. As he came into the street, Bradley pulled up a black Bureau car that carried no identifying marks. He slowed to an easy stop to keep the brakes from screeching. Rip slid into the car, and Bradley continued down the street. . . .

The man drove straight down Olive to Wilshire where he turned west. He drove rapidly but carefully, respecting stop signals and keeping up with the flow of traffic which ran heavy on Wilshire at all hours. Kelly hugged the door, her hand close to the handle. She had no intention of using it, but its nearness supplied her with a childish assurance that she could if she so wished.

His hand reached over and patted her on the leg. "Come on over. They build these seats too wide." When she didn't move, he grabbed her unexpectedly by the arm and pulled her over. "That's better," he said. He studied her. "You're a funny one."

Bullock's slipped by, and the Sheraton West and the Wiltern Theater, and then the busy, bright Miracle Mile shopping district. He patted CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

Copyright © 1960 by Mildred and Gordon Gordon

"I thought
I loved him.
I don't know how it happened."

the WHITE DRESS

By CATHARINE BOYD

Barefoot, wearing her old red bathrobe. Margaret felt her way down the dark front stairs. She passed the grandfather clock in the hall, and turned to go through the den to the dimly lighted kitchen. It was after one—ten minutes after, to be exact; she had learned to read clocks long ago without really looking.

Janice had had her orders: be home at twelve-thirty sharp.

In the den Margaret paused at the sight of her opened sewing machine, where a tumble of organdy lay in a shadowy heap. There was something about its whiteness, its virginal crispness, that caught at her throat—the ghost of a graduation dress to be worn three weeks from Friday. Commencement day!

Where is she now? Margaret worried. With Kenny, of course. In a car, but where? Why isn't she home? Oh, how I wish she were safe in her bed like the others, safe and sound. Remember how I used to tuck in her soft pink blankets?

She loosened the tug in her throat with a good-natured chuckle, her only defense. A wonder they'd ever agreed on The Dress at all! Every detail was a compromise between two generations—kind of material, style of sleeves, length of skirt, even the width of the waistband.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 103

What she had done would change her whole life . . . and theirs.

"As American as apple pie..."

all America, with love– the best of this country's wonderful wealth of food, in the big, new Ladies' Home Journal Cookbook!

Imagine a platter piled high with Maine lobsters, steaming hot, and dripping in butter; or the flavor and elegance of a succulent Louisiana jambalaya, rich in ham and Southern tradition; or a recipe for THE apple pie to end them all, with the flakiest crust, the sweetest, spiciest, melt-in-your-mouth apple filling. Around the end of October, the very best of this country's wonderful heritage of delicious food will be found between the covers of the beautiful new Ladies' Home Journal Cookbook.* This book is in the nature of a command performance. For nearly eighty years the Ladies' Home Journal has published the best recipes for the very best food in the whole world. Our great-grandmothers began clipping the recipes, copying them from one another, borrowing them and, literally, wearing them out till they looked like shreds of rare old lace. And the Journal has been besieged with pleas for a solid, durable treasure-trove of its best, most-sought-after recipes, in book form. Now, at long last, it's here—THE Cookbook. Frankly, it's a knockout—as you will see when you turn the page and begin our mouth-watering preview of its more than 2000 delectable dishes! And if you decide to start eating your way straight through the whole cookbook, we predict you'll have a lovely time!

THE APPLE PIE

Pastry for 9" two-crust pie
8 green, tart apples, peeled, cored and cut into eighths
1 cup brown sugar or ¾ cup white
¼ teaspoon nutmeg
Dash cinnamon
¼ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon lemon juice
Grated rind ½ lemon
2 tablespoons butter
Cheddar cheese (garnish)
Cream (optional)

Line the pie plate with pastry and arrange the tart, green-apple slices in layers. Sprinkle each layer lightly with a mixture of sugar, spices, salt, lemon juice and rind. Save out enough for the top. When plate is full, dot with butter and cover with top crust. Seal and crimp edges. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 15–20 minutes, then reduce heat to moderate, 350° F., for 20–30 minutes more, until the crust is brown and apples are tender. Serve hot or cold, with cheese. Serve a pitcher of cream on the side. Eight servings.

*Ladies' Home Journal Cookbook.
New and basic recipes, edited by Carol Truax.
Published by Doubleday & Co., Inc.
Regular edition $4.95, de luxe thumb-indexed edition $5.95. To order your copy, use the coupon found on page 173 of this issue of LADIES' HOME JOURNAL—or buy it at your favorite bookstore.

a delicious heritage from

New England

In the New England tradition, a family dinner table with a dozen grandchildren needs a steaming tureen of corn chowder, afloat with flecks of golden corn and savory bacon; a platter of scarlet lobsters, stuffed with seasoned crumbs, served with melted butter and lemon wedges: a creamy, classic coleslaw plus squares of feathery johnnycake, and cranberry sauce. Dessert is upside-down peach gingerbread, ringed with fluffs of whipped cream.

CORN CHOWDER

6 slices bacon, diced
½ cup chopped onion
2 (1-lb.) cans cream-style corn
1 can (12-oz.) whole-kernel corn
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon salt
1 quart milk
2 cups light cream
Popcorn (garnish)

Sauté the bacon in a saucepan until crisp. Drain on paper toweling. Add onion to 3 tablespoons of the bacon drippings and sauté until the onion is tender; then add corn, pepper, salt, milk and cream. Simmer (do not boil) for 15 minutes. Crumble bacon into soup. Serve very hot. Garnish with popcorn if you wish. Yield: about 2½ quarts.

CREAMED SLAW

1 can (15-oz.) sweetened condensed milk
1½ teaspoons dry mustard
2 teaspoons salt
1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
¾ cup cider vinegar
1 medium head cabbage, shredded
4 carrots, coarsely grated
3 green peppers, seeded and chopped
1 Spanish onion, chopped (optional)
1 teaspoon caraway seed (optional)

Make the dressing first. Heat the condensed milk in a double boiler for 10 minutes; cool and put into a mixing bowl. Add mustard, salt and Worcestershire sauce.

B rapidly with rotary beater and gradually add the vinegar. Continue beating fo minute after all vinegar has been added. Refrigerate dressing until thickened.
M cabbage, carrots, peppers, and onion if you wish. Be sure they are crisp and cold.
A our and a half before serving, mix dressing with vegetables and refrigerate again.
If u wish to use caraway seed, add them when you are mixing the slaw. Six servings.

BROILED STUFFED LOBSTER

3 ½-lb.) live lobsters, split art soft bread crumbs cups butter
clove garlic, crushed
–3 dashes liquid pepper seasoning
½ teaspoon tarragon
⅛ teaspoon salt
Dash pepper
Lemon wedges

H e the fishman split the lobsters in half and crack claws. Remove the tomalley a coral (the tomalley is the greenish liver and is delicious; the coral is the roe) fr the lobsters and set aside. Wash lobsters and remove intestinal veins.
D n and wipe dry. Make a stuffing by sautéing the bread crumbs in ¾ cup butter w l golden. Add the garlic, liquid pepper seasoning, tarragon, salt and pepper.
M h the tomalley and coral and add to the mixture. Place lobsters on rack, shell si up, and broil for 5 minutes. Turn, brush with melted butter and broil another 1(inutes. Fill the cavity and cover most of the body with stuffing. Place under b er just long enough to brown. Serve with a little bowl or pitcher of hot b er and lemon wedges. Six servings.

UPSIDE-DOWN PEACH GINGERBREAD

2 (1-lb.-4-oz.) cans sliced cling peaches
1 cup butter
1 cup brown sugar
2 tablespoons light corn syrup
Maraschino cherry halves, drained
Pecan halves
½ cup chopped pecans
1 cup sugar
2 cups flour
1½ teaspoons ginger
1 teaspoon nutmeg
1 teaspoon baking soda
½ teaspoon salt
½ cup molasses
½ cup boiling water
2 eggs
1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
Whipped cream (optional)

Drain the peaches as dry as possible on paper toweling. Melt ½ cup butter in a heavy 10" skillet with an ovenproof handle. Add the brown sugar and corn syrup. Stir over medium heat until blended. Allow to cool. Now arrange the peach slices in a circular pattern on top, covering as much of the sugar as possible. Fill in any spaces with maraschino cherry and pecan halves. Sprinkle with chopped nuts. Cream ½ cup butter with 1 cup sugar until light and fluffy. Sift the flour, ginger, nutmeg, baking soda and salt together twice. In a separate bowl, mix the molasses and boiling water. Add the eggs, one at a time, to the creamed butter and sugar, beating well after each addition. Flavor with grated lemon rind. Add the dry ingredients alternately with the molasses. Spread evenly in the skillet. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 1½ hours. Cool slightly. Loosen the sides with a spatula and turn out onto a platter. Serve hot or cold with whipped cream. Eight to ten servings.

ALL FOOD PORTFOLIO PHOTOGRAPHS BY STUART-FOWLER

from

The South

savory perfection

Mention of the Old South brings to mind a moonlit-and-magnolias kind of land where people prided themselves on exquisitely appointed tables and spoke lyrically and lovingly of food: of She-Crab Soup, Hoppin' John, of country ham tenderly cured to piquant perfection of featheriest breads served oven-hot.

With America's first successful colony in Jamestown (1607) came the English influence of lordly roasts on a spit, hearty steamed pudding. Down the Great Smokies' chain moved the Germans, Dutch and Italians, bringing their own magnificent broths and sweet breads. From

KENTUCKY CHICKEN

1 young capon (4–5-lb.) or 2 (2½–3-lb.) chickens cut up as for frying
1 loaf stale unsliced bread
¾ cup grated Parmesan or Romano cheese
¼ cup chopped parsley
1 clove garlic, crushed
2 teaspoons salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 cup melted butter

Remove the crust from bread and grate bread into fine crumbs, using the coarse side of the grater. There should be 2 cups crumbs. Spread out on flat pan to dry overnight. Mix the crumbs with the cheese, parsley, garlic, salt and pepper. Dip each piece of chicken into melted butter, then into the crumb mixture. Be sure each piece is well coated. Arrange in an even shallow roasting pan. Pour remaining butter over all and bake 1 hour until fork-tender, in moderate oven, 350° F. Capon will take a little longer. Do not turn chicken, but baste frequently with pan drippings. Four to six servings.

SALLY LUNN

1 package active dry or compressed yeast
¼ cup lukewarm water
¾ cup milk
½ cup butter
⅓ cup sugar
3 eggs
1 teaspoon salt
4 cups flour

Soften the yeast in the lukewarm water. Heat the milk to lukewarm. Combine with yeast. Cream the butter and sugar together. Add the well-beaten eggs and mix. Add salt to the flour and stir the flour into the butter-sugar mixture alternately with the milk-and-yeast mixture. Beat well with a wooden spoon and turn into a buttered bowl. Let rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk 1–1½ hours. Beat again and pour into a well-buttered 3½″ x 10″ ring mold or angel-cake pan. Let rise again until doubled in bulk, about 40 minutes. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., for 45 minutes. Unmold and serve warm. Six servings.

l Spanish sailing ships plied the Gulf of Mexico l settlements there originated the memorable New leans cuisine.

Time, tradition and the magic touch of truly magicent cooks have created the cuisine we relish today Southern and superb. Here we offer you four glorious orites: Kentucky chicken, irresistibly crisp and suc-ent; that most golden and soufflé-light of breads—ly Lunn; a robust New Orleans jambalaya; and an nost-too-good-to-be-true nutty-brown Southern Pecan
.

SOUTHERN PECAN PIE

try for 9" pie shell up pecan halves ggs blespoon melted butter
1 cup light corn syrup
½ teaspoon vanilla
1 cup sugar
1 tablespoon flour

ange the pecan halves in the bottom of the pie shell. Beat eggs; add the butter, corn syrup and vanilla. Stir until well nded. Combine the sugar and flour and blend this with the mixture. Pour over nuts in the pie shell. Let stand until nuts rise to the surface. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 45 minutes. The nuts will glaze during baking. Six servings.

HAM-AND-SAUSAGE JAMBALAYA

1 pound hard Italian sausage, sliced thin
2 tablespoons shortening or salad oil
1½ cups chopped onion
½ cup diced celery
½ cup chopped green pepper
8 scallions, chopped
2 cloves garlic, crushed
2 cups canned tomatoes
2 bay leaves, crushed
2 teaspoons salt
½ teaspoon thyme
2 cups diced cooked ham
2 tablespoons chopped parsley
3 cups raw rice
4 cups water

Sauté the sausage in the shortening with onion, celery, green pepper, scallions and garlic until lightly browned. Add the tomatoes. Season with bay leaves, salt and thyme. Simmer about 10–15 minutes. Add the ham and parsley, rice and water. Cover tight, and simmer over low heat for about half an hour until the liquid is absorbed and flavors are well blended. Twelve servings.

fabulous food from

The Plains States

The heart of our country belongs to the Middle West, where rich farmlands roll westward from Ohio into the great plains of Kansas and Nebraska beyond the Mississippi. In these states of musical Indian names, women feed their men food which borrows some of the grandeur and vastness of the countryside—great, satisfying steaks and roasts, juicy and thick. We've chosen plump, golden Illinois pork chops, with a hearty apple stuffing, baked slowly to a melt-in-your-mouth tenderness, garlanded with lots of onions, plump carrots and bright green peas. There's a casserole of scalloped potatoes, crunchy on the outside, the inside soft and rich with cheese and cream. To accompany, a confetti-bright corn-and-pepper relish. For the salad, tender young spinach leaves are drifted with an egg-and-bacon dressing. There's a sweet, creamy cherry-tapioca pudding; Indiana contributes the "picnic cake," rich in spices, and blanketed with a marshmallow-pecan topping.

Menu

APPLE-STUFFED PORK CHOPS
SCALLOPED POTATOES WITH CHEESE
WILTED SPINACH SALAD
SWEET-CORN RELISH
CHERRY-TAPIOCA PUDDING
INDIANA PICNIC CAKE

APPLE-STUFFED PORK CHOPS

6 pork rib chops cut 2″ thick
1 teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
5 tablespoons chopped onion
1½ cups crumbled dry bread
3 tablespoons butter
1 large green apple, peeled, cored and sliced thin
5 tablespoons seedless raisins
½ teaspoon nutmeg
¼ teaspoon cinnamon
2–3 tablespoons water

Split the chops through the middle from the outer edge toward the bone, leaving meat attached to the bone. Spread open like a book. Pound both sides thin with a mallet or edge of saucer. Maybe your butcher will attend to all this. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and the pepper. Stuffing: Sauté the onion and bread crumbs in butter in a heavy skillet. Add the apple slices, raisins, ½ teaspoon salt, nutmeg, cinnamon and the water. Mix everything together. Spread the dressing in even portions on the six chops. Fold over and fasten with toothpicks. Put chops in a shallow roasting pan. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until tender, about 1½ hours. Turn once during baking time and drain off excess fat. Six servings.

SCALLOPED POTATOES WITH CHEESE

4 large baking potatoes
¼ cup butter
½ pound grated Cheddar cheese
1 cup minced onion
½ cup minced parsley
1 tablespoon salt
1 teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon savory
½ teaspoon paprika
2½ cups milk and light cream mixed

Wash and peel the potatoes and slice thin as a dime. Put in ice water for a little while and then drain. Meanwhile, butter bottom and sides of a baking dish, 12″ x 8″ x 2″. Put a layer of potatoes into the dish; dot with butter and sprinkle generously with cheese, onion, parsley, salt, pepper, savory and paprika. Repeat until you have four layers. Save ¼ cup Cheddar cheese to sprinkle on top later. Pour in the milk and cream to cover the potatoes. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 10 minutes, then reduce to moderate, 350° F. Sprinkle on the ¼ cup cheese and bake until potatoes are tender, about 2 hours. Six servings.

SWEET-CORN RELISH

18 ears corn
4 large onions, chopped
2 green peppers, chopped
1 sweet red pepper, chopped
1 pound light brown sugar
¼ cup salt
3 tablespoons celery seed
3½ tablespoons dry mustard
2 quarts vinegar

Cut the kernels from the ears of corn with a sharp knife. Mix with onions and green and red peppers. Add the sugar, salt, celery seed, mustard and vinegar. Cook slowly for 20 minutes in an open kettle. Pack into sterilized hot jars and seal at once. Yield: about 8 pints.

WILTED-SPINACH SALAD

2 pounds young tender spinach
5 slices bacon
6 scallions cut into rounds
3 hard-cooked eggs
½ teaspoon freshly ground pepper
3 tablespoons sugar
½ cup vinegar
½ cup water

Wash spinach, remove stems. Drain. Store leaves in refrigerator. Use only the small leaves—the large ones are fine for cooking, but not for salad. Prepare the spinach the day before so it will be crisp. The dressing may be made in advance, but must be reheated to boiling point just before it is added to spinach. Fry bacon. Drain on paper toweling and break into pieces. Add scallions, 1 chopped hard-cooked egg, pepper, sugar, vinegar and water to drippings in the skillet. Pour boiling hot over spinach, add bacon and toss well. Garnish with 2 hard-cooked eggs cut into thin slices. Six servings.

CHERRY-TAPIOCA PUDDING

¼ cup quick-cooking tapioca
½ cup sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
1 can (1-lb.-4-oz.) pitted sour red cherries
½ teaspoon almond flavoring
2 teaspoons lemon juice
Cream (optional)

Mix the tapioca, sugar and salt in a saucepan. Add the syrup from the cherries with enough water to make 2½ cups. Cook the mixture until it comes to a full boil. Cool and stir occasionally. Add the cherries, almond flavoring and lemon juice. Pour into sherbet glasses, chill, and serve with cream if you wish. Six servings.

INDIANA PICNIC CAKE

½ cup butter
1½ cups light brown sugar
2 eggs
2½ cups flour
1 tablespoon baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
1 cup milk
1 teaspoon vanilla

TOPPING FOR CAKE
10 large marshmallows
½ cup light brown sugar
½ cup pecans, chopped coarsely

Cream the butter well with sugar until light and fluffy. Add the eggs one at a time, and beat well. Sift together the flour, baking powder and salt. Stir the dry ingredients into the creamed mixture alternately with a mixture of the milk and vanilla. Beat smooth after each addition. Grease and flour the bottom of a 9″ x 9″ x 2″ cake pan. Pour in the batter. Topping for the cake: Cut the marshmallows in half and arrange round side up on top of batter. Mix the brown sugar with pecans. Sprinkle over top of the batter. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., for 50 minutes. It will shrink slightly from the sides of the pan. Cool in the pan before cutting. Six servings.

In The West,

a way with good food

The wonderful food of the Golden West has pioneered its way across the country, adding gusto and a new zest to American cooking. Big cubes of beef sirloin are marinated in soy sauce, skewered with onions, mushrooms and green-pepper slices, and broiled till rare and juicy. The succulent avocado is one of the most welcome arrivals from the West, stuffed with firm chunks of pink crab meat, and dressed with a creamy dressing, spicy but suave. As for salads—the kinds and varieties of Western salads are endless, but one of the most delectable and inventive is our Catalina Salad, crisp and fresh, sporting a touch of garlic, a touch of cheese, golden croutons and a tangy dressing. What could be more perfect to end this meal than a fruit dessert? A luscious array of pineapple chunks, apple slices, melon balls, green grapes and pear sections is bathed in a magical tangerine-pineapple sauce, crisp with water chestnuts!

Menu

CRAB LOUIS IN AVOCADO HALVES

BEEF KEBABS

CATALINA SALAD

FRESH FRUIT AND FRUIT SAUCE WITH WATER CHESTNUTS

BEEF KEBABS

1½ pounds sirloin beef cut into 1" cubes
¾ cup soy sauce
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
¼ teaspoon garlic salt
12 small cooked whole onions
½ pound mushrooms
1 green pepper cut into 1" squares
3 tomatoes cut into quarters
¼ cup butter

Marinate the meat in soy sauce, salt, pepper and garlic salt for at least 2 hours, turning once or twice. Alternate on skewers the meat, onions, mushrooms, tomatoes and green pepper. Brush with melted butter. Broil 5–15 minutes on each side, depending on how you like your beef; brush several times with butter. Serve with noodles, rice or wheat pilaf. Four servings. Double recipe to serve 6–8.

CATALINA SALAD

1 clove garlic, cut
6 tablespoons olive or salad oil
1 large head lettuce
1 head romaine
2 cups cubed bread
3 tablespoons small pickled onions, quartered
⅓ cup sliced pitted black olives
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
⅓ cup grated Parmesan cheese
1 egg
3 tablespoons lemon juice
2 tomatoes (optional)

Soak the garlic in the oil overnight. Make the croutons by browning the bread cubes in 2 tablespoons garlic salad oil. Wash, dry and chill the greens. Tear into bite-size pieces and put into a large salad bowl. Add the onions, olives, ¼ cup of the garlic-flavored oil, salt and pepper, and the cheese. Drop a raw egg on top of the greens. Pour the lemon juice on the egg. Toss the salad over and over and adjust seasoning. Add croutons and toss once more. Garnish with tomato wedges if you wish. Six servings.

CRAB LOUIS

1 pound crab meat
1 tablespoon prepared horse-radish
¼ cup chili sauce
2 tablespoons chopped green pepper
2 tablespoons chopped pickle
1 tablespoon chopped scallion
1 tablespoon lemon juice
½ cup mayonnaise or boiled dressing
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
Dash Worcestershire sauce

Mix all ingredients except crab meat and add salt and pepper to taste. The quantity of salt and pepper will depend on how highly seasoned the dressing is. Bone the crab meat and mix carefully into the sauce. Serve on lettuce leaves in avocado halves, or in scooped-out peeled tomatoes if you wish. Six servings.

FRUIT SAUCE WITH WATER CHESTNUTS

2 tablespoons butter
1 can (5-oz.) water chestnuts, sliced
1 can (1-lb.-4-oz.) pineapple juice
1 can (6-oz.) frozen tangerine-juice concentrate 2 sticks cinnamon
½ cup sugar
¼ cup cornstarch
¼ teaspoon ginger
⅛ teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons lemon juice
2 teaspoons grated lemon rind

Heat 1 tablespoon butter in a skillet; add the water chestnuts. Stir until butter is absorbed and water chestnuts lightly browned. Remove from heat. In a large saucepan mix the pineapple juice with enough water to make 3 cups. Add the tangerine juice and cinnamon sticks. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer for 5 minutes. Meanwhile, mix the sugar, cornstarch, ginger and salt in a bowl. Blend thoroughly. Pour a little of the fruit juices into the cornstarch mixture. Stir until smooth. Return to fruit juices and cook, stirring, until clear and thickened. Remove from heat. Add the lemon juice, lemon rind and 1 tablespoon butter. Cool to room temperature. When cool, remove cinnamon sticks and chill. Just before serving, add the water chestnuts. This sauce keeps well for about a week. Serve with a combination of fresh fruits. Yield: 3 cups.

When Nina Lord isn't engaged in sales work at her shop, she's likely to be out selling people on their duty to vote.

DI PIETRO

Senator John F. Kennedy, campaigning in New Jersey, is greeted by Mr. and Mrs. Thorn Lord.

Committeewoman Nina Lord gets acquainted and discusses voter registration with Mrs. Ferdinand P. Schoettle, a new neighbor in Lawrence Township, New Jersey.

For the past 16 years as a Democratic committeewoman, Nina has been phoning neighbors and urging them to vote.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY MARGARET HICKEY

Candidate's wife

"I do not think women should be segregated from men in politics," says Mrs. Thorn Lord, who has worked at the grass-roots level for 16 years and is now campaigning for her husband's election to the U. S. Senate.

As the wife of a candidate for public office, Nina Lord has assumed many new responsibilities, not the least of which is bringing fresh air into smoke-filled rooms.

"I like to think of it as the fresh air of ideas," says Nina, who was dismayed to discover that smoke-filled rooms really do ignite politics. Furthermore, the rooms were very often in her own house.

"That made it easy," Nina admits, noting that it also gave her entree to gatherings she would not have attended ordinarily. She firmly believes that informed, interested women could help to dispel the smoky haze of the political scene.

Nina's project began last February in a smoke-filled room from which she was excluded. After a Democratic fund-raising dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria, her husband, Thorn, went on to another meeting of New Jersey party chiefs.

Fifteen minutes later, Nina answered the telephone in another room in the hotel. New Jersey's Gov. Robert B. Meyner asked whether she had any objections to her husband's running for the U. S. Senate. He explained that Thorn had been selected as the party candidate.

"Now wasn't that silly!" Nina exclaimed, recalling the circumstances some time later. She was complimented, of course, to be consulted. But she doesn't want anyone to conclude that she might stand in the way of Thorn's political career. CONTINUED ON PAGE 194

By BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD

Politics today is a husband-wife partnership. In the not too distant past, the candidate's wife sat at home, going about the business of caring for her family as if she were untouched by election issues and the trials of the campaign. Not that she wasn't interested. She was. But it wasn't her proper role to do anything about her husband's candidacy except to offer quiet support and personal encouragement from their hearthside.

Today's candidate for office and his wife are likely to hit the campaign trail together. Even the children may be taken along because of their strong voter appeal. This is grueling work, but both the candidate and the public find satisfaction in the vision of a family pulling together in a common cause.

"You just can't beat a wife who can meet all kinds of people," Howard Edmondson, Oklahoma's youngest governor, believes.

Mrs. J. Frank Houghton, wife of a Florida state senator, found that being a "lifelong Republican" wasn't enough when her husband ran for office in 1948. She was dismayed at his defeat—by a mere 1000 votes. The next year she worked actively in every campaign in Pinellas County, ringing doorbells for the entire Republican ticket. The participation was so vigorous that she herself received several responsible assignments in local, county and state Republican organizations. Her husband was elected to the Florida state senate in 1952, re-elected in 1956. For each session of the legislature she moves her entire family from their home in St. Petersburg to Tallahassee, happily "digs in," attending to church, school, club and political work.

"When the homemaker herself decides to run for office, she needs the wholehearted interest of her husband," comments Mrs. Alice Leopold, who campaigned successfully for representative in the General Assembly and other elective offices in Connecticut before undertaking her present assignment as Assistant to the Secretary of Labor in Washington. "Once she is certain of her husband's interest, she will find that a discussion of issues with him helps to crystallize her own ideas. If she happens to have school-age children, she will find their enthusiasm for their mother can go so far as soapbox speeches at student assembly. In fact, any woman running for political office has a built-in team who without any promises or patronage can be counted on to vote for her."

The appreciation, sympathy and intelligent support which present-day candidates receive from their families can be more valuable than thousands of dollars spent in the campaign. Women especially know that holding public office, living up to the highest standards of public responsibility, results ultimately in good government. If this means a sacrifice in the pattern of family living for a time, they are finding better government worth the cost.

BECAUSE WOMEN CARE

"The women of America hold this country right in the palms of their hands," says Mrs. Clare B. Williams, assistant chairman of the Republican National Committee. "Good politics, like good behavior, begins at home where both parents set an example of citizenship and responsibility," says Mrs. Margaret Price, vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee. In this the third of its series, "Because Women Care," the JOURNAL salutes five women for the political leadership they have shown.

JANET HILL GORDON, of Norwich, New York . . . Republican member of New York senate. Slim, chic Janet Hill Gordon began her political career in her teens when she campaigned for her father, the late Judge James P. Hill. Her career as a lawyer began in 1940 when her father swore her in as a member of the New York State Bar, the youngest woman ever to be admitted. Two years later she married her law partner, William J. Gordon, who shares also her political views, applauds her service in the legislature. Their daughter Gail was born in 1950 during the second of her mother's six prior terms in the assembly. The minority leader in a controversial mood said Gail was the only worth-while thing the legislature produced that year.

MRS. DAVID G. FERNALD, of Upper Montclair, New Jersey . . . cochairman, Young Republican National Federation. When pretty, vibrant Judy Gregg Fernald first joined a Young Republican Club in 1950, she discovered that once you work in politics as a volunteer, "it's just something you keep wanting more and more to do." Since then she has filled assignments on all levels. Today, at 32, she is cochairman of the Young Republican National Federation, helping oversee the activities of 600,000 teenagers in 5000 clubs. With the encouragement of her husband, who is treasurer of the Upper Montclair Republican club, she goes around the country, conducting leadership-training programs, recruiting and instructing new voters.

MRS. JERRY K. GREEN, of Charlotte, North Carolina . . . Young Republican Club volunteer. "My prestige in politics, if I have any, has come not from my own activities but from being the wife of Jerry," Charlotte Green says. Her husband just completed a term as a vice chairman of the Young Republican National Federation, now is chairman of his state federation. "By both of us being interested, our spare time can be spent together." This young mother, determined to bring the two-party system to North Carolina, has made telephone calls, rung doorbells, written letters, held coffee hours, canvassed voters, worked at the polls for many hours at a stretch, and served as precinct chairman in Mecklenburg County.

MARGARET CROSS HOFFMAN, of Hammond, Indiana . . . Republican precinct vice committeewoman. Margaret Cross Hoffman and husband, George, local precinct committeeman, have worked as an active political team since 1945, when they were newlyweds and did battle together for the election of a Republican mayor for their town. Indiana is referred to as a Republican state, but the town of Hammond is thoroughly unpredictable. The successful fight they waged for mayor that year whetted their appetites for the game of politics and they are in it now to stay. The Hoffmans have five sons ranging in age from two to eleven years—Kurt, Kent, Karl, Dale, Dean—all being reared to be true and faithful Republicans.

You too can be beautiful in 24 hours

...and more beautiful in 24 days

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

Your face is square, your jaw line too determined. New beauty, for you, lies in your talent to add a rosy glow of femininity to your entire appearance. Patricia Meravi's mother wrote: "Patricia is attractive in her own plain way, but she could be so pretty if she'd only try." Her pictures, taken a day apart, prove the point! For Pat, and for all other determined-faced girls, we recommend: a glamorously feminine hairdo designed to add an illusion of symmetry to the face. Pat's new, high-rising arrangement, full on top and at the sides and narrowing softly at the ears, is so flattering. "Curves" are the clue to your best make-up. See how Pat's newly arched eyebrows, enriched with brown pencil, add interest to the entire eye area. The slightly more rounded lip line (achieved with a lip brush which you can dip into wax for firmness, or with a lipstick pencil) softens her face. Other accents on femininity: the narrow drop earrings (instead of anything round or square), the long pearls (no chokers for you), the V (for victory over a square face) neckline, the rich clothes colors for over-all loveliness. Pat's into-the-future beauty plans are based on her new discovery that there are no limits to the appearance improvements a girl can make—provided she is continuously eager to try.

Can you put yourself in the place of any one of the women or girls shown on these four pages? These five readers came to us with basic beauty problems familiar to most women—and you may have one of your own, somewhat similar. Thrilled with their quick changes, each of these women plans to go a step further to achieve additional beauty goals. For one, a two-week diet will shed a pudgy five pounds. For another, the refurbishing of a wardrobe will help. For all, more imaginative attention to themselves from top to toe should complete the transformation. Look them over! Find the one who once shared your problem. Then follow her Journal lead to new and lasting loveliness.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

Monotone coloring is your problem. Overly pale lashes, brows and skin give you a washed-out look. Mrs. Camille Bain, Portland, Oregon, housewife and mother, wrote: "Whatever would you do if you were confronted with a face such as mine?" Camille's "after" picture speaks for itself. Here are the steps that led to her wonderful new look. All "monotone girls" take note. First, a new and exciting hairdo. Camille's old French twist with its dated pompadour effect in front looked dull and dowdy. See how her "after" hairdo, with its soft fullness and feather bangs, youthfully frames and prettily reproportions her face. "Gentlemen prefer" blondes should take the same cue, and make much of their enviable hair coloring. Most flattering make-up for pale faces: foundation base (creamy in consistency to soften and protect fair skin) in a shade to heighten your coloring subtly. Try beige with a pink undertone for powder as well as the base. (See how the base blended evenly and lightly over Camille's face and neck successfully subdues her freckles. Special bleaching creams also help lighten freckles.) Colorless eyebrows come to life with warm-brown eyebrow pencil. Almost invisible eyelashes can seem luxuriant with a deep brown mascara. (Black is too harsh for fair-skinned girls.) Eye shadows in shades from misty green to turquoise to hyacinth blue (the best shade is the one that dramatizes the color of your eyes) add a glamour touch for special occasions. Camille's pinky-red lipstick seems made to order for a redhead. You may prefer coral or a rich red touched with blue. Whichever, the effect should be dashing!

Your face is round, your neck is short and (alas) you have passed that "pleasantly plump" stage. Potentially pretty Mary Gossage, young housewife and mother from Addison, Illinois, wrote wistfully: "I am not plain, yet I'm far from being pretty. I have several features which could be assets if only I knew what to do with them." Our plan for Mary was one we would make for any girl who shares her problem. First: give yourself a lift! By snipping several inches off Mary's unflatteringly long hairdo, and sweeping it up from her shoulders and away from her neck, a slimmer, more delicate look is immediately achieved. The new hairdo, cut in layers all over the head, was set in rollers to achieve height. (An extra "plus" is that it makes you taller too.) For fine hair, such as Mary's, a soft permanent will help hold fullness so that "pinups" are necessary only two or three times each week. Round faces "slim down" with make-up very slightly deeper-toned than natural skin coloring. An uptilt at the outer tips of the eyebrows (as opposed to a downward curve) gives a light and airy look. Often just "five pounds off" can make the pretty difference in the way a dress looks and feels. By three weeks' worth of skipping desserts, cutting down on fats, starches and portions in general, any almost-fat girl can easily solve her weight worries before they seriously begin.

You too can be beautiful in 24 hours

...and more beautiful in 24 days

Your face is long and narrow, your forehead too high. You are all for looking "interesting"—but not formidable!
Yours is the easiest beauty problem to solve—do it now! Young career girl Alys Acworth discovered her beauty do-over not only took care of her physical shortcomings, but provided a psychological boost as well. As a result of her prettier, more relaxed look, she has become more personable. To counteract a long-face problem, let "controlled casualness" take the place of (unintended) austerity. Alys's "before" hairdo, with its halfhearted upsweep in front and plain twist in back, gave her a forbidding look. Cut drastically (three to four inches in length all over her head), and set to achieve fullness, with turned-up ends and bangs, she immediately looked prettier, friendlier! Too-thick eyebrows (which can suggest a frown) should be thinned and delicately arched. A touch of pink rouge adds cheer while it also interrupts a too-long expansion of face. By using a lip brush to fill out a too-thin upper lip slightly, another soft touch can be added. A delectable dress color and charming accessories bring on a really grand finale! Long-range beauty for long-faced girls centers on a consistent effort to maintain the hairdo, make-up and clothes that suggest liveliness—as well as loveliness.

A florid complexion combined with heavy features (and a heavy heart?) leaves you at a beauty loss.
Handsome Mrs. Jane Ross, widowed mother of two teenage daughters, had, through the years, gradually given up on make-up. "I used to do the works," she told us, "but nowadays I've lost my interest—and my touch." The "touch" for Mrs. Ross—and for all others who are tempted similarly to despair—is surprisingly simple. The big aim is to achieve as light a look as possible. An upswept hairdo can gracefully and flatteringly take the place of a nondescript shoulder bob. A clear-beige make-up (in foundation base and powder) softly subdues and smooths out florid skin tones. Heavy eyebrows can be quickly thinned and prettily arched. Drab colors are out. See how the soft white against her face in Mrs. Ross's "after" picture, combined with the cheerful, brilliant turquoise necklace and earrings, freshens up her entire look. Bright lipstick (Jane didn't even bother with that!) adds needed sparkle.
Beauty is as much attitude as application. And a gay appearance is a tonic guaranteed to put a lift in your heart, a lilt in your step, a light in your eyes. Try it—today!

Mrs. Fay Dines On Zebra

Robert met her for the first time that night—but suddenly recognition came with a rush.

"So that's it," he thought. "I knew it all the time!"

By HORTENSE CALISHER

Arietta Minot Fay, at thirty-seven, still lived in the house in which she, her father and all their male forebears but the first had been born, a white, Hudson River bracketed house, much winged and gabled but with a Revolutionary cottage at its core, set in a tiny village, once only a road, on the west shore of the river, about twenty-five miles from New York.

On this particular summer Saturday evening at about seven o'clock, Arietta, dressed to go out in her one still respectable cocktail dress, sat in the dimming upstairs parlor of the house that had been hers since the death a year ago, within a few months of each other, of her father and her husband. Saturday was shopping day for the week, and that morning, hold back as she might on things like paper napkins—they would use the linen ones—she had not been able to avoid spending eighteen dollars on food. Her nine-year-old son Roger, away for the night at a friend's house, would consume that almost unaided during the school week. Even the Light & Power, usually so kindly, had begun to press her about last winter's heating bill. There had been no cleaning woman for a year. Behind her, the rooms, receding wing on wing into the hillside with the depressed elegance of a miniature château, showed, beside the distinguished stainings of nearly two hundred years, the thin, gradual grime of amateur care. The house, free and clear for a century until the thirties, was hers thanks to her father's single quirk of hereditary thrift, hidden from them until the otherwise worthless will was read—mortgage insurance. It was worth about $20,000, possibly a little more to one of that new race of antiquarians aching to "restore" some old place, and able to—viz., the Lampeys, where she was going that evening. But its sale, if she could bring herself to sell, would be slow. Here she sat in it, then, in the richest country in the world. In addition to the house, she had a CONTINUED ON PAGE 119

ILLUSTRATED BY JOE BOWER

His look hung between them, like an avowal of love.

Father of five boys,
the beloved Old Groaner airs his goals for his daughter—and his ideas for giving her a different upbringing.

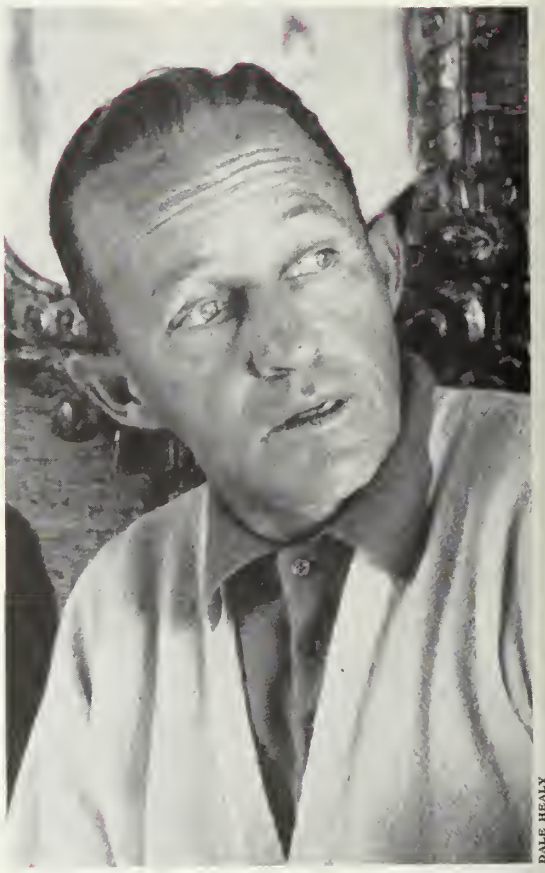
How I Want to Bring Up My Daughter—by Bing Crosby

AS TOLD to BOB WILLETT

Although I've been lucky enough to have had many big moments in my life, it's easy for me to pick the biggest. I've never experienced anything that topped the elation I felt aronnd 7:30 A.M. on September 14 of last year. It was only a couple of hours after my wife, Kathryn, and I had checked in at the hospital. Dr. Abner Moss almost floored me with the announcement that I'd become the father of a fine baby girl.

The evening of the next day, I went to a Dodger game with Phil Harris, wearing a big It's a Girl button. Phil kidded me about not wanting to skip the game because the Coliseum crowd was about right size to suit my urge to broadcast the glad tidings.



Once we got Mary Frances home, my reaction could only be called timidity. She was so dainty and delicate—so completely feminine—she overwhelmed me. Young Harry had been lusty and broad-shouldered at birth, but nobody could have mistaken Mary for a boy. She was all girl, and so petite I waited for days before I got around to even poking her.

Being on hand when a baby arrives is usually a big thing for a father. The only reason I single out the birth of my daughter is the long wait I had before getting a little girl. Having proudly fathered five sons in a row, I was beginning to think the trend would never be reversed.

All along, I'd secretly envied fathers of daughters. I'd dreamed about being one for more than twenty years. Still, I was all but resigned to being only a father of sons, particularly after Kathryn had presented me with Harry Lillis Jr. in 1958.

It was Kathryn's mother who decided his monicker should be the same as mine. We'd had only one name picked out—Mary Frances—because my wife had been so sure she'd have a girl.

She felt the same way, only more so, the second time we dated the stork. She was, therefore, nowhere near as astonished as I at the arrival of our daughter. She took it in stride, and started right in treating Mary Frances much the same way she'd treated little Tex. They're decidedly different in temperament. Already our daughter has displayed definite ideas about what she wants and doesn't want. CONTINUED ON PAGE 188

DALE HEALY

"For twenty years I'd envied fathers of daughters. How wonderful, I thought, to have one of those cute little objects with curls and giggles and a way with men."

"I'm kind of proud of this picture of the two children," says camera-fan Bing. "No shadows on their faces."

"Kathryn would rather play with the children every afternoon than play an Oscar-caliber part in a picture. A couple of years ago her interest turned from acting to nursing—she now attends classes."

"Whenever you pick Princess up," writes Bing, "she invariably stands, as in this shot with my mother and brother Bob's boy, Chris." Blue-eyed, with red-blond hair, the child takes after Bing's mother.

You'll wear your Winter Coat

No wonder it's a major purchase. You spend more for it and more time in it than anything else. The coat itself must be all things to your wardrobe, must prove its success by the way it relates. It goes over your important suits as easily and becomingly as over your knitted casual or your brilliant chiffon evening dress. It is at home in city or country, or traveling anywhere in the world. The color of your coat is often a key to your wardrobe adding vitality to your blacks, browns and neutrals, also lovely with matching or contrasting colors. If it is worth its salt, it should last for several years, staying in fashion all the time, reflecting your taste and personality. There is no room in today's hectic life (or your wardrobe) for a coat that doesn't take over. Here are six important coats with small, well-planned wardrobes.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

DRAWINGS BY JOHN CHAVARRI

If anything could be more basic and useful than a simple black or brown coat, it is a black-and-brown one with the tones repeated in a lapin lining (by David Kidd of Arthur Jablow). Wear it with color, as photographed, with a red two-piece wool; or, as sketched, with combinations of black, brown and coral. The black daytime wool with beige satin details and the black-trimmed brown taffeta by Ben Barrack. A coral chiffon evening dress by Leonard Arkin. Big brown handbag by Barra.

least 100 times a year!

CHESTERFIELD with an otter collar by Gunther Oppenheim, newest, slim-coat of the year, a revival of tailored "boyish" fashions that have a way of ng intensely feminine. Combine it with a gray flannel dress and a catchy blue plaid by Jacques Heim and a black-and-brown chiffon into-evening dress by Ferand, all designed for David Crystal, bright green hat by Janet Sloane.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

All-time flattery: the FOX-COLLARED COAT in a new pearl-gray shade used with beige, a beautiful coat for tall, slim women, and one that takes many color combinations. By David Kidd of Arthur Jablow. A black cardigan suit, a slipper satin in pale violet by Leonard Arkin and a beige wool dress by Ben Barrack are three widely different costumes that go with this coat all hours and places.

THE BEIGE COAT, a world-wide, round-the-year fashion of unquestioned status, traveling anywhere or staying at home anywhere, now and for years to come. With this beige coat, a moss-green wool jacket dress, a violet-colored wool dress, a black-and-brown brocaded silk afternoon and dinner dress. Soft, easy fur or jersey hats, brown and black handbags and gloves. All by Hattie Carnegie.

PHOTOGRAPH BY HENRY CLARKE

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

THE FUR-LINED COAT (above) is a rare combination of night and day, city and country fashion, equally right with casuals or evening clothes. When both fur and fabric are in the neutral tones such as this beige-and-gray coat, lined with mink, by Ben Reig, combinations are virtually limitless. Beautiful choices: a gray wool dress as photographed; sketched, an olive-green wool jacket dress with a velvet collar and hat, a beige wool, and a chiffon shirtwaist dress for dinner and theater in a topaz shade.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Your Winter Coat and wardrobe ideas

DRAWINGS BY JOHN CHAVARRI

FUR-FABRIC BORGANA is a marvel of usefulness, beauty and easy affordability. The leopard-cloth collar of this coat by Sandy Smith is so realistic that it can be worn with the real thing in spotted furs in handbags or hats (leopard bag by Esther Dorothy). Exciting as photographed with a gold wool dress by Andrew Arkin. Planned also with an off-white jersey costume by Ben Barrack, a flaming-red tweed jacket dress by Andrew Arkin, and a devastating little black late-day dress that could call for sables but looks wonderful with Borgana. All this glamour in a coat for less than $100.

Satin evening coat by Cardin—the stole also worn as a hood.

Black taffeta with a bow back, full skirt. Castillo of Lanvin.

PARIS in AMERICA

PHOTOGRAPHED IN PARIS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Fashion of the cape, fashion of the two-color costume with a fur collar by Nina Ricci, worn with Paris's version of the sou'wester.

So wearable

The best clothes in the Par collections are easy and adap able, and seem especially d signed for American wome

Cape enchantment

Newest, most romantic fashio in Paris, capes and capeli coats swish and swirl over sli dresses and two-piece suits. Th slim look is slim with pleats with easy fullness. The ove blouse is everywhere and th sleeveless fashion here to sta

Fur and more fur

From sleek ponyskin and curl lamb to sable and badger . . . fu linings and collars, fur hats an handbags and bandings.

Hemlines

are in the limelight—stitched fringed, bordered, braided edged with fur. The skirt lengt is as you like it. Some to th knee, but we suggest mid-ca or an inch above.

Spectrum of fashion

Flaming red, violet mauve an lilac against a background gray, beige and black. Als charming Ming blues, inky blues bright and shell pink. Idea de tails: a jewel pinned on a velve cockade; a waistline define with a bow; hand-knit touche in hats, scarves, turtle neck lines, waistbands and collars

By WILHELA CUSHMA
Fashion Edit

Another beautiful cape and suit by Nina Ricci. Worn with fox-brimmed hat.

Important overblouse in red wool with a jewel on a velvet bow by Cardin. Right: reversible black-and-checked cape-collar coat by Castillo of Lanvin.

The Journal selects the most beautiful trend-making fashions...

to be adapted for you in the U.S.A.

Left: The dress with a fur-lined jacket—red wool with sable by Chanel. Below: pale violet suit in soft wool edged with braid by Chanel. Right: greatcoat, jacket and sleeveless overblouse dress in inky blue by Christian Dior.

Knitted stole and hat also an important trend-maker.

Barbara Journal, as everyone knows, is purely hypothetical—and yet she is very real. Typical of the real Barbara J.'s are Martha Wolford and Phyllis Dillon. Each has a responsible job—one in an office, one at home. Beyond this they hold in common the fact that

They Both Kno

The Career Girl . . .

Martha Wolford left her home state of Ohio to work in New York. As a computer programmer, she writes instructions for intricate computing machines. For the office, Martha loves a good classic—always dresses simply and immaculately. For evenings, she likes to add glamour. As her first fall investment, Martha wanted a costume for all-day, everyday wear. One that would not dip too much into future fall fashion $'s and with accessory changes would take her right out from work as well.

To the Office

Martha Wolford wears her new black-and-white worsted jacket dress. For everyday, she likes to accent with classic gold jewelry. Her new black bag, $2.98, will go with her winter coat and shoes (black and beige) already in her wardrobe. Jacket dress, $22.95.

PRIGENT

For Evening Glamour

Martha adds lots of pearls to the neckline of the dress, a wide cummerbund with her large "diamond" pin. On another occasion the dress would take equally well to vivid color.

A Special Luncheon

Martha accents her new costume with a bright color. The beret is turquoise velveteen and is $3.98. Pearls at the neckline, a pin accenting the pocket detail add to her dressed-up look.

low to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

The Housewife...

Phyllis Dillon and her husband Dick live in the suburbs. With four children to buy for and her reliance on more-casual clothes for household chores, Phyllis's fashion investments are not so frequent as our career girl's. However, the type of costume she likes is very much the same. The two investments, a good suit and dress which total $40.00, might be the only ones she makes over a long period of time. But they are basic and seasonless enough to wear indefinitely. By BET HART

In Town Shopping

Phyllis Dillon and her two oldest children, Richard, four, and Patty, three. Phyllis's suit is in her favorite color, blue. She especially liked the pleated skirt, short cardigan jacket. $25.00.
SUIT BY JESS PERLMUTH

Sunday Best Look

Phyllis wears the jacket buttoned, pearls at the neckline and a flower which could be real or make-believe. The veil, $2.98, is a plus for a dressier look too.

A Party

at another couple's home or their own. Phyllis wears her new dress. She looks especially pretty in bright colors as this shocking pink. The dress and cummerbund is Vogue Design No. 9989 and costs about $15.00. She can make a matching cummerbund or add more color with a contrasting pink one.*

*For other views, sizes and price, see page 134.

© VOGUE

THE JOURNAL'S

GEM OF A WARDROBE

Red wool and pink silk combine happily. Our tweed cardigan suit is a perfect show window for the pink silk-twill blouse with a tie neckline. Pleated skirt would also be pretty with a matching sweater. Slightly fitted jacket has three-quarter sleeves. All, Vogue Design No. 4141.

This lovely double-breasted coat is made of a medium-weight oatmeal wool tweed. It swings freely from the shoulders and will go nicely over a suit or dress. The flattering notched collar is set away from the neckline. Accessories are all pale beige. Vogue Design No. 4148.

HAT BY EMME

Beautiful classic clothes endure and can survive even changing fashions. With this in mind we planned our "Gem" of a wardrobe around an oatmeal tweed coat. Its ease and comfort are obvious, and the two-piece beige dress is made of crisp wool crepe that holds pleats to perfection. A bright suit is both gay and practical. Also, it combines with an assortment of blouses. Many women find a jacket dress the answer to a "when in doubt" party. Ours, in blue silk brocade, would suit most occasions. Good clothes deserve appropriate accessories. For this wardrobe, we have chosen a lovely fur hat and an alligator bag in the same pale shade as the coat. By NORA O'LEARY Pattern Editor

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

A jacket dress is a favorite in most every closet. This one, in royal-blue silk brocade, is especially useful and practical. The slim sleeveless dress with an open neckline is topped by a short jacket with a becoming wide collar that ties in the front. Vogue Design No. 4149.

This two-piece dress of pale beige crisp wool crepe is a daytime classic. Its beautifully pleated skirt falls from a yoke for slimness. The over-blouse buttons down the back and has a snug casing to hold it secure at the waistline. Sleeve length is optional. Vogue Design No. 5079.

JEWELRY BY SEAMAN SCHEPPS

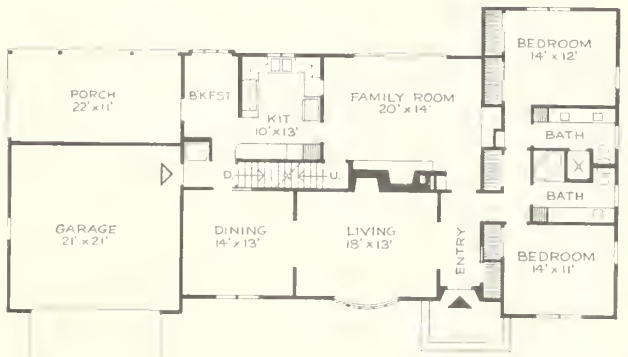
Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 119.
Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Calif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered. © Vogue

CLASSIC SIMPLICITY

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROBERT STAHMAN

BY JOHN BRENNEMAN ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

This house has all the classic refinement one expects but seldom finds in a French Provincial design. The simple roof line, neatly arranged windows and soft colors all suggest elegance and good taste.



Inside is a good, conventionally arranged plan. In this house the living and dining rooms make no attempt at indoor-outdoor atmosphere; they are very frankly formal and self-contained, and that is just what a lot of people want in their entertaining areas. These rooms are therefore located sensibly toward the front of the house.

The family room, kitchen and breakfast room at the back are well arranged for informal living. They open to a secluded terrace.

The two baths are very roomy and easy to use. In fact, this whole house is roomy, done on the comfortable scale of the old days.

For the bigger family there is a huge attic, and this is a house on which dormers would look good.

It isn't a cheap house; good traditional design never is. It is a fine house of basic, conservative excellence.

Separate dining and breakfast rooms add to family room's usefulness.

ARCHITECTS: FOLGER & PEARSON, A.I.A.
AREA: 1920 SQUARE FEET
COST: $27,000 TO $36,000 PLUS LAND

Secluded terrace echoes French charm of house.

Elizabeth arrived in 1959, before the Hatfields' house was entirely finished. Mark Jr. came a year later.

Asked what he values most in his wife, Mark says, "I have trouble unwinding. She can get me to relax."

He's 38, she's 31, and one of the few flaws in their life is their lack of sufficient time to be together.

The Young Governor Hatfields At Home

They just roll their eyes when they think what they've spent in the last two years. But how can you build a "Governor's Mansion," entertain hundreds of guests at a time and have two babies in two years—all on a newlyweds' budget?

"My dear, how do you expect to perform the role of first lady and entertain on a large scale, coming as you do from such a meager background?"

A legislator's wife had the effrontery to bludgeon young Mrs. Mark Hatfield with this social club soon after the nation's second-youngest governor took office—but Antoinette Hatfield does not crush easily. "What that woman didn't realize," she said later, "is that the instinct for hospitality isn't confined to blue blood. I've never known truer hospitality than I saw in my parents' home." Antoinette is a second-generation American, of Yugoslavian descent.

Her husband, Oregon's handsome Republican governor, is the son of a railroad blacksmith and a political-science teacher. Together, Mark and Antoinette Hatfield have come very far.

"When Mark made the nominating speech for Mr. Nixon, I felt so excited and choked up that the tears started coming. But a television camera was aimed at me, so I didn't dare cry. I was so proud of him I could have burst!"

Many hard-shelled politicians expect big things of Mark Hatfield too. There's a rumor that they want the governor to run against Wayne Morse for the Senate in 1962. It's an uncontested fact that his pretty, friendly wife is a big campaign asset. "Antoinette is genuinely interested in everybody," Hatfield says. "Once, at a county fair, a boy explained why Guernseys give better milk than Jerseys. A year later, at a concert at Oregon State College, a student came up. 'Why, I remember you,' Antoinette said. 'You're the one at the Tillamook County Fair who told me Guernseys are better milk givers than Jerseys because they have a broader rib cage.'"

Antoinette's memory for people was thoroughly tested during the months of campaigning that immediately followed their quiet honeymoon. She met them by the thousands. At the Beefeaters' dinner in Ashland, they even ran into an old girl of Mark's. He didn't recognize her, but Antoinette made him go back and speak. "After all, she was old enough to vote."

Between trips across state, Antoinette wrote wedding-present thank-you notes endlessly in their tiny $90-a-month apartment. "If I ever wrote the story of that period, I'd call it 'Many, Many Thanks.'"

"Or you might call it 'Interrupted Love,'" her husband suggested.

She giggled. "We couldn't even have breakfast alone together, because that would have been wasting time. Mark always saw party leaders then."

Her worst household problem was trying to do the laundry and get enough clean clothes ahead for each junket. "Whenever we got to Portland to stay overnight, my mother would wash and iron Mark's shirts and pamper both of us. She and daddy were Democrats until Mark and I were engaged, but now they're two of his best drumbeaters."

Like her parents and her in-laws, Antoinette never once doubted how the election would turn out. "I planned an Election Night buffet way ahead. I had a caterer plank a salmon, but I watched so I could do it myself the next time. And I roasted a turkey and had petits fours decorated with elephants and Mark's name." She also fixed a specialty of her own that often appears on her company menus: bean salad, with three kinds of beans marinated overnight. The thirty guests ate with gusto, and celebrated late. At ten the next morning the press arrived in full cry, to interview Oregon's twenty-ninth governor and his lady. "So I fed them the rest of the cold turkey and salad for lunch."

The phone never stopped jangling that day, so they got an unlisted number. One of the last calls on the old number was from Vice President Nixon, congratulating Hatfield on being one of the few Republicans who had scored a smashing victory in a lean year for elephants.

Oregon doesn't provide a governor's mansion, so when the Vice President came to Salem a couple of months later, the state's first lady entertained him at lunch—roast and salad—in the apartment's cramped little dinette at one end of the kitchen. "I had burlap dyed yellow for a tablecloth, and when Mr. Nixon got up from the table he had yellow fuzz all over his dark suit. He seemed to think it was a good joke." At an official banquet that evening, she sat on the Vice President's right, and was surprised and pleased when, during his speech, he told the assembly their first lady was as charming a hostess as she was a good cook.

Hatfield says the thing he's always liked best about his wife as a homemaker is "her orderliness and the smooth way she organizes. I like it because we always have flowers on the table and service plates even when we're alone. And she takes good care of my clothes. She packs for me whenever I go on a trip, and there's never anything missing, down to the last cuff link."

His wife put in, "I'm better than a valet. I'm more well rounded."

The newlyweds' apartment was furnished in what the governor calls "early matrimony period," a hodgepodge of family hand-me-downs and the antiques the couple were lovingly collecting. Antoinette cleaned, cooked, ordered engraved note paper that said chastely The Governor's Residence, and between rounds of official functions kept shopping with her husband for a house worthy of the title.

Oregon provides a sleek black Cadillac limousine with a No. 1 license and a uniformed driver for its governor, plus a $17,500 yearly salary, but the Hatfields wanted a home to suit their own tastes and budget.

They solved the problem by buying a high, narrow, shabby eighty-seven-year-old house for $8500. They had planned to spend $18,000 on remodeling, and they went far above this figure. (They don't say how much—they just roll their eyes.) "We wouldn't have done it just for ourselves, but we felt this had to be a governor's house." They got a regular savings-and-loan mortgage, and are paying $350 a month on that, and $250 more in payments on furnishings and appliances. Carpeting was much the biggest item: $4000.

The governor has to travel around the state so often—26,500 miles last year, mostly by car—that his time spent at home seems like a vacation. He is constantly bringing home last-minute guests for meals. "I try not to plan my housekeeping schedule too rigidly," Antoinette says. "I keep everything fluid, to fit in with his job."

This hasn't always worked out in practice since the children came. For instance, Antoinette almost stayed home from the long-planned trip to the Governors' Conference in Puerto Rico, "because I hated to leave Elizabeth when she was only four weeks old. But my mother gave me a talking to. She said, 'Now look here, you've got a job as a wife too.'"

There was no such hesitation about going to the Republican convention this past summer, four weeks after Mark Jr. was born. "I'm a veteran parent now." With four doting grandparents, the children never lack for volunteer sitters or a place to visit. And, as Antoinette says of her husband's place in the spotlight there, "I wouldn't have missed it for anything."

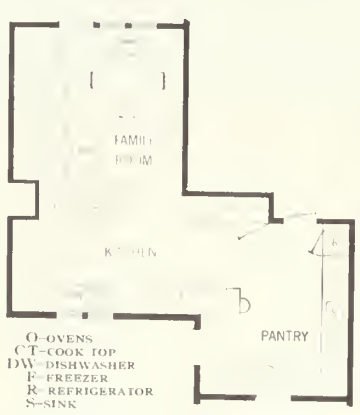
Of course life for the Hatfields is not one unbroken string of triumphs. An associate tells about one of the negative days, while the 1959 legislature was in session. Hatfield had planned to get away from the capitol early, in time to shave, change his clothes, and pick up his wife before some official function in Portland. But nothing went right; when the governor picked up his first lady, there was barely enough time to make their appointment. He looked exhausted, tense. Antoinette kept tactfully silent for the first few miles. Then she said, "You know what I think—I think you'll go down in history as Oregon's greatest governor."

Mark Hatfield burst out laughing and reached over to hug her. "With you around," he said, "how can I lose?"

A NEW KITCHEN FOR THE GOVERNOR

"Breakfast is our favorite meal," Antoinette said. "It's our chance to be together before the day's pressures pile up." The Hatfields enjoy the informal and cheerful dining area near the kitchen.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor



The Hatfields needed a kitchen that was rather special. The family comes first, but this kitchen has to cope with official entertaining, a relentless part of a governor's life—big teas, little parties, impromptu dinners. "In politics Mark plays hunches," Antoinette told us; "I cook the same way. I have to be ready to expand a dinner for two to serve four, or whip up a tea in a hurry." And she meets each change calmly. The kitchen has been planned that way—a wonderful room for hospitable Hatfields.

Most of the cooking is done at the special center in the divider wall between kitchen and breakfast room. There are fast-heating units for speed and one with a temperature control that minds the heat for the long slow cooking that makes stews and pot roasts so tender. A hood above is pulled out to draw off cooking odors; later it slides neatly into the cabinet. Another ventilator over the ovens handles the smoke and odors from broiled steaks or chops. At party time when the cooking load is heavy, an extra cooking section in the pantry space is available. It folds to the wall when it isn't needed, so there is counter space for serving.

The refrigerator in the main kitchen and the companion freezer near the desk are both the kind that never collect frost. Frozen packages never stick together, nor are labels coated with frost. In the freezer, Antoinette keeps a supply of ice cream, some she makes herself, for "Mark can make a meal of ice cream." The freezer "is the modern emergency shelf—and I need one in this household." The heart of the kitchen is Antoinette's desk—spacious and handy with shelves for cookbooks above and space for her typewriter and writing supplies below.

For all its efficiency, the kitchen has a mellow charm that blends with the rest of the house. The cabinets are wood in a warm fruitwood tone—with graceful moldings on doors and drawers, and accents of diamond-pane glass. These contrast with sunny yellow appliances and walls. The tile design on the floor is old-time, but the material is vinyl with marble-like sections divided off with turquoise strips.

The governor looked around the new room that reflected his warmth and interest and remembered the very first kitchen he knew: "On cold winter days the kitchen was the warmest room in the house, and we always managed to dress back of the range. We even took our baths there in a washtub with a good fire burning in the stove in the corner." Then he added, "This new room, too, has a fine family feeling—and it's much more workable."

The plan shows how the family kitchen—a workable U—opens into the breakfast area. For serving to the dining room, a modern pantry is lined up on one wall.

Left: Kitchen windows look out on park—have shades with butterfly design like breakfast-room curtains. Frostfree refrigerator here matches companion freezer across the room next the home office.

Above: Second sink and another refrigerator save bottlenecks. Long counter makes serving move smoothly. Large-size coffeemaker and shelves for dinner service for 18 guarantee all-is-on-hand for parties.

DALE HEALY

When Antoinette cooks, ventilators carry away odors here and from built-in double oven. At left is heated-top table that rolls to the dining room, makes serving easier.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor

Minuscule desk tucks in beside chimney. Wood stove connects to flue.

When Governor and Mrs. Mark Hatfield converted the old house they had bought in Oregon's capital, they did a major remodeling job—but mainly to the first floor. The upstairs still keeps its rather old-fashioned feeling, and here the Hatfields, who collect antiques, decorated their prize guest room to reflect a Victorian mood. Antoinette Hatfield's gracious philosophy sees to it that a guest is comfortable and at home. She believes there should be good lighting; a desk, be it ever so small; that the books and magazines must be up-to-date; and another must: a full-length mirror. Charm and thoughtfulness combine here to refresh the grateful visitor.

HAROLD FOWLER

Contemporary Comfort in c

Striped paper sets off charming old bed, some pet antiques. Modern lamps give excellent light, have Victorian feeling.

Victorian Bedroom

YOUR CHILD'S FUTURE DEPENDS ON EDUCATION

By H. G. RICKOVER, Vice Admiral, USN

In what we believe is the most important and concise summary ever written of the challenges facing the United States today, Admiral Rickover sketches in bold, dramatic terms the nature of the conflict in which every man, woman and child in this nation is now engaged, either by action or by default. The dilemma of our times has never been more forcefully put, nor the course of right action made so crystal clear. THE EDITORS

Today we must live with the possibility that Russia—and within a few years China—may launch an ultimate weapon from a blue sky which will wipe out all our capabilities for resistance. They have the means to build such a weapon; their rulers have the power to make an unprovoked attack. They are restrained by neither legal nor moral principles—only by their assessment of the risk of retaliation.

Mao has clearly said that China does not fear atomic war. If she won, it would be worth the price, whatever the loss of human life. If she lost, she would still emerge immeasurably stronger, since her overpopulation problem would have been solved at one stroke. To Mao, half of China's people—more than 300,000,000 human beings—are expendable.

Our adversaries are formidable. The contest is perilous for us. We surpass them in the moral strength of our civilization and—I firmly believe—in the inventiveness of our people. Yet they have on their side a ruthless technological efficiency which does not appear to be matched by ours.

Is the Western world to be lost simply through inefficiency? What is it that makes the totalitarian dictatorships technologically so efficient? We cannot explain everything by their power to channel manpower where they need it. Not all Russia's successes are totalitarian successes. Certainly nothing in our form of government condemns us to have scholastically inferior schools or less efficient management of weapons development or space programs. Democratic principles and institutions do not preclude us from outperforming Russia technologically. But neither do ideals fulfill themselves without human effort and sacrifice. Democracy is not self-executory; it depends wholly on how we as democratic citizens perform our public duties.

To my mind, we shall see more clearly what we must do if we think of efficiency as the central issue. The contest is essentially one between opposite systems of management for modern industrial societies—with totalitarianism frankly avowing it will destroy us should we prove the less efficient of the two systems. The advantage of taking this unemotional and unself-righteous view is that our attention is instantly focused on ways to improve our own efficiency within the framework of democratic principles and institutions. We are thus helped to realize that not democracy but the way we use it keeps us from remaining ahead of Russia.

A totalitarian government may be compared with a truncheon made of solid wood; democracy, with a fasces. This, as you doubtless know, is a bundle of reeds tied together by a strap, with an axhead protruding at one end. It was the emblem of the majesty of the Roman state and you will also find it embossed on our silver dime, where it symbolizes the strength and resilience inherent in the free union of many separate entities.

What makes a totalitarian state strong is its monolithic social structure, the ruthless competition that selects rulers, the speed with which action can be taken to enhance national power. Those who command action need not consider others or take time to justify their decisions; a servile people under strict discipline carries out orders without demur.

In contrast, that which makes democracy strong is the enhancement freedom gives to the quality of a people and the marvels free men achieve when the bond that unites them is of their own making. When free individuals are joined together by devotion to their country, when this devotion is stronger than their individual or group interest, when they are imbued with the enlightened self-interest we call patriotism—then, just as individual reeds tied firmly together in a fasces are stronger than a solid piece of wood, so are democracies stronger than authoritarian societies of comparable size and population.

If we set the two systems against each other in this fashion, it becomes at once clear that our system depends entirely on the quality of our people. It vests sovereignty in ordinary men and hence requires that they be well educated, well informed, and actively involved in public affairs. If we have not been as successful in the contest as we must be, we cannot blame democracy—we can blame only ourselves.

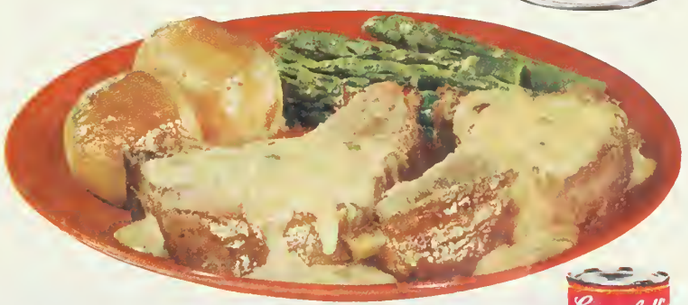
What has been missing has been clear understanding of the gravity of the present peril by all our people. Past experience has given us a sublime confidence that no foreign nation could seriously threaten our survival. But today we confront an adversary who controls a larger land area, more people and more natural resources than we—an adversary, moreover, who, though not yet equal to us in the whole field of science and technology, has outstripped us in a number of vitally important areas and is rapidly catching up with us in others. And the full impact of his military power is no longer lessened by CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

Quick, easy way to make a

PERFECT GRAVY

—add creamy Campbell's Soup to the rich, brown drippings!

No flour to add — no lumps — no fuss! Just the quickest, easiest, best-tasting gravy ever! That's because Campbell's Soups are so smooth, so creamy, so full of flavor they turn 'most any drippings into a perfect, hostess-be-proud gravy!



CHICKEN GRAVY FOR CHICKEN, turkey, ham, or lamb. Remove roast or fried meat from pan; pour off and save drippings. Pour can of Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup into pan; stir well to loosen browned bits. Add ¼ cup water and 2 to 4 tbsp. meat drippings, as desired. Heat; stir often. Makes about 1½ cups.

MUSHROOM GRAVY FOR BURGERS, roast beef, pork, ham, chicken, or lamb. Remove roast or fried meat from pan; pour off and save drippings. Pour can of Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup into pan; stir well to loosen browned bits. Add ¼ cup water and 2 to 4 tbsp. meat drippings, as desired. Heat; stir often. Makes about 1½ cups.

CELERY GRAVY FOR PORK, lamb, ham, or chicken. Remove roast or fried meat from pan; pour off and save drippings. Pour can of Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup into pan; stir well to loosen browned bits. Add ¼ cup water and 2 to 4 tbsp. meat drippings as desired. Heat; stir often. Makes about 1½ cups. Creamy-delicious and so very easy!

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soups

New recipe booklet — yours for just 10¢. Write today for your copy of Campbell's new 64-page recipe booklet, "Wonderful Ways with Soups." Over 200 menu and recipe ideas! Just send 10¢ with your name and address to Carolyn Campbell, Dept. LH-10, Campbell Soup Company, Camden 1, N. J.

STRESS: HOW DOES IT AFFECT YOUR BODY?

Stress—physical, mental or emotional—can be either good or bad for you.

In fact, a normal amount of stress is actually a good thing. For example, if you get "keyed-up" over an interesting or challenging job, you may do your work more effectively.

But prolonged or intense stress—caused by too much work or worry or anxiety—can threaten health.

That's because continued stress upsets some of the body's chemical processes. In particular, severe or persistent stress causes overactivity of certain glands that produce hormones, the body's "chemical messengers."

If this glandular overactivity is continually triggered by stress, it may upset almost every system of the body. And this may lead to illness, including heart trouble, high blood pressure and digestive disorders.

All of us should recognize the threat of undue stress. Its importance is made plain by the fact that so many people who seek medical attention today have ailments brought about or made worse by prolonged stress.

If you find that it's frequently difficult or nearly impossible to relax or "take things easy" or get a good night's sleep, chances are you're under too much stress.

Here are some ways to help you keep the mental and physical stresses of life in check:

When your work load seems overwhelming, remember that some things can almost always be set aside until later. Concentrate on one particular job. That way your work will go faster and you'll be under less strain.

When tense and upset, try physical activity. It helps relieve tenseness so that you can come back and tackle irritating problems more calmly.

Talk out your troubles—with your clergyman or family doctor or with an understanding friend or member of your family. Getting things "off your chest" prevents a lot of unnecessary emotional stewing.

Have regular medical check-ups. If you keep physically fit, you'll be able to handle your tensions more easily.

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTAL CARD

THE LIGHT [illegible] AILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY

A MUTUAL COMPANY

Metropolitan Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N.Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "Stress—and What it Means to You."

STRESS

Name _____
(PLEASE PRINT)

Street _____

City & Zone _____ State _____

10-60-J

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

geographic remoteness, for technology has wiped out distance as a factor in war. The oceans no longer protect us; we are as vulnerable to attack as are our European friends and allies.

Because we do not fully comprehend the changes brought about by the rise of totalitarianism and technological progress, we continue to think and act as if we were secure. We continue familiar and time-honored habits acquired during our long history of enviable independence. We engage in meaningless debates over alternative policies when in fact we no longer have a choice.

To take some obvious examples: We no longer have a real choice between policies of political isolation as against involvement in world affairs. We need allies and bases abroad and we must compete with Russia in winning friends for our side.

Neither do we have a real choice between policies of economic isolation as against involvement in world markets. Heavy inroads into our once apparently inexhaustible natural resources now make us dependent on many imports from abroad. These imports must be paid for by exporting American products, hence our prices must be competitive. It seems to me obvious that we shall not forever be able to offset with government subsidies and tariffs a wage-and-price level far above that of the nations whose products compete with ours.

Where once we could disregard the effect of tariff and trade policies on foreign countries, we must now take these effects into consideration. This change in our situation is not fully understood by some influential power groups; their insistent demand that we disregard the needs of foreign countries in order to protect domestic industries runs counter to the interests of the nation as a whole. It springs from inability to grasp the gravity of the challenge posed by totalitarianism; every blunder we make in foreign relations is instantly exploited by them to win a point in the contest.

There is always a time lag before men and societies are able to adjust their thinking to altered circumstances. Nowhere is this resistance to change more evident than in the decisions we make on how much of our income must be invested in public services essential to the strength of the nation—how much must therefore be withdrawn from private consumption for personal comfort and pleasure and for industrial prosperity. We no longer have the freedom of choice that used to be an important feature of our way of life. Yet many of us cling to the illusion that it is part of democracy to starve the public sector of the economy and coddle the private sector; that if we made the public sector stronger we would go counter to our political principles.

Arthur Schlesinger Jr. calls this a "weird and intolerable" notion. He warns we are doomed if we cling to the belief that production and consumption of consumer goods are the be-all and end-all of existence, that whatever does not pay its way is not worth doing and anyway we cannot afford to do it. The United States, he writes, "the richest country in the history of the world, can't 'afford' an educational system worthy of its children, can't 'afford' as many ICBM's as the less affluent Soviet Union, can't 'afford' a proper resources policy, can't even, heaven help us, 'afford' a decent postal system."

Is it not time we re-examine this odd notion that money spent, let us say, on measures designed to insure our nation's survival, or to give our children an education preparing them to live effectively in the complex world of tomorrow—that money spent for such purposes does not buy anything of value to us personally while money spent on comic books or cigarettes does? Surely this is a time when our private concerns are inextricably intertwined with the larger concerns of the nation.

Today our only choice may be quite simply between taxing ourselves to support essential public undertakings and losing the contest to the Russians.

Was it sensible in the midst of a cold war to engage in protracted arguments whether to build an H-bomb, a missile, a satellite? As if this were a matter we could freely decide—when in reality we had no choice whatsoe for Russia was certainly going to build th Are we not taking frightful chances whe allow our dislike of government expansio blind us to the necessity for governme nanced and directed development pro whenever such projects are too big or uneconomic to be undertaken by private dustry? Rather than judging each case b conformity to the existing pattern of already mixed economy, ought we no make our decisions solely on the basi whether a given project will so gre strengthen the nation it would be foll reject it?

Or take another example where our free of choice has been lessened—educat Whether we like it or not, education is our first line of defense, and we neglect our peril.

Russia's schools and universities out duce us in highly qualified members o professions and in masses of young pe below the professional-school level who a solid grounding in the humanities

FROM THE HILLS

By DIONIS COFFIN RIGGS

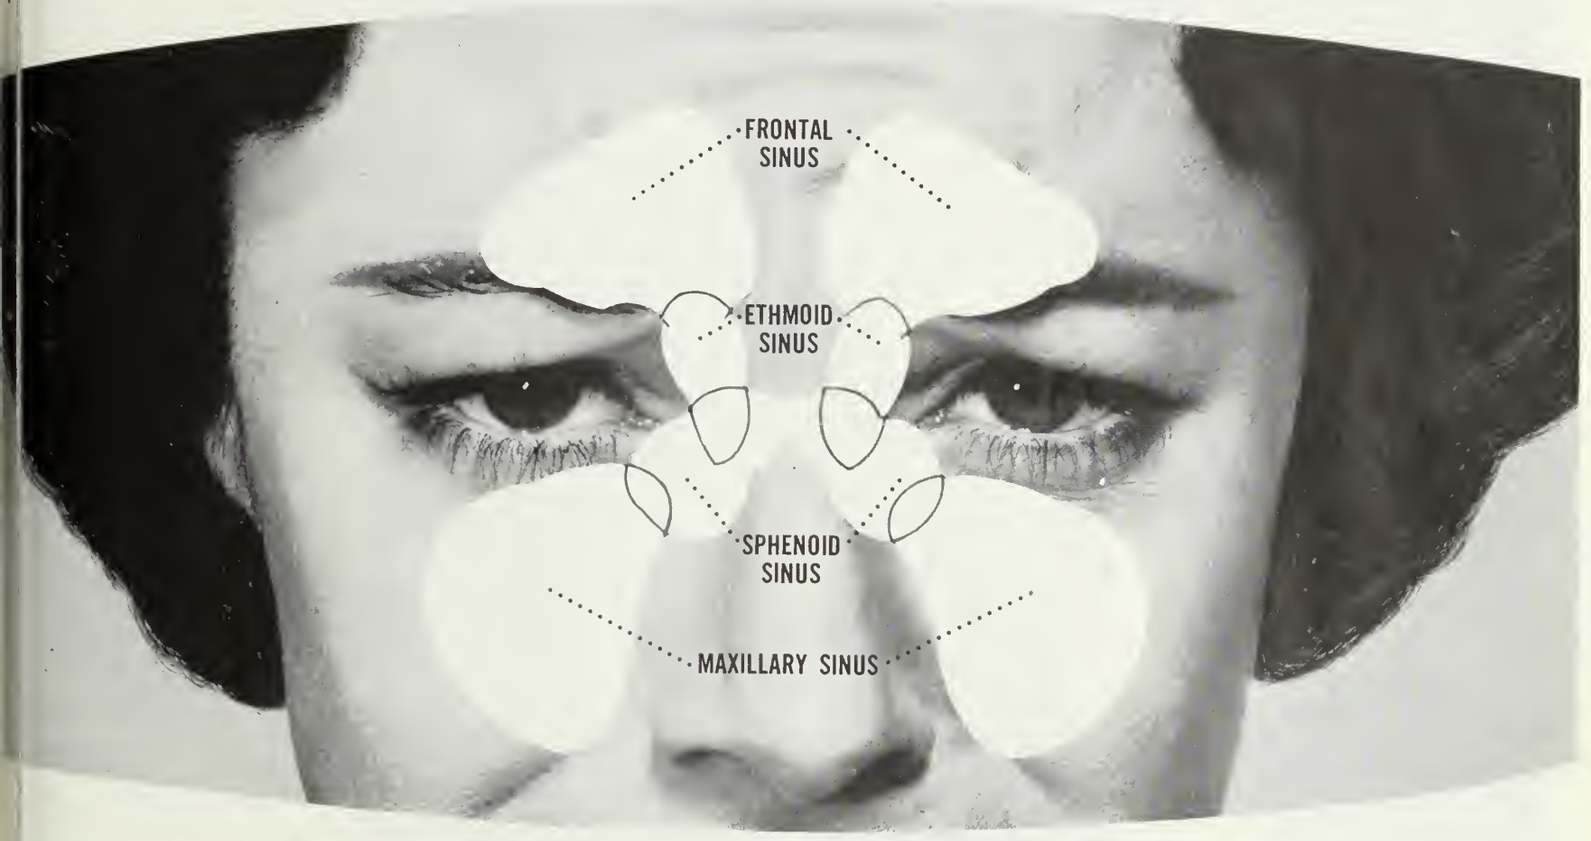
Fresh water
Came from the hills.
Through a copper pipe,
Into the old parsonage
In Vermont.

Like small, pale ferns
And tiny fragrant violets,
It curled into the kitchen
Warm with new-baked bread

It came.
Purling like a brook
Above the sound of cooking.
Over the notes of singing,
And went on.

But there was always more.
Coming clear and sparkling
From the hills.

sciences. Yet our professional educati sts dismiss critics who urge that at the lea ve catch up with these Russian achieven ts. They declare Russia's educational perform ce is irrelevant for us, since Russian childre re educated to serve the state while ours gr up in freedom. But knowledge in the libera rts constitutes genuine education—no matt or what purposes a child is given the cha to acquire it—while mere life-adjustment tra g, no matter how kindly administered, w al- ways be counterfeit education.



Critics of American education valu he genuine article as much for what it do to enrich the educated person's life as fo its contribution to our nation's strength. F tu- nately, the two aims do not conflict. Eas rill courses may be fun, but give no perm ent satisfaction to the individual. Real scho tic achievement satisfies on the personal le as much as it enriches the nation. But a re tic assessment of our present peril leads t he harsh conclusion that today the nation's ed of a school system that really educates ut- weighs the pleasure that being well ju- cated gives to the individual. Life-adjus ent schooling does not produce in our peop the kind of competence on which the futu of the nation now depends.

I am frightened by what appears to a tendency in some quarters to prefer lettin his country sink into second place if the alt na- tive means uncongenial effort, or goes co ter

CONTINUED ON PAG 02

Revolutionary 3-layer tablet to relieve

COLDS MISERIES, SINUS CONGESTION and its PAINFUL PRESSURE

HELPS DRAIN ALL SINUS CAVITIES

EVEN DEEP IN HEAD (critical areas of colds infection)

DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets, working through the bloodstream, bring dramatic relief from colds miseries, pollen allergies and from sinus congestion with its tenderness, pressure and pain.

DRISTAN, amazing medical achievement, contains (1) the scientific decongestant most prescribed by doctors. In minutes – it reaches all congested areas – even deep in the head... quickly shrinks swollen nasal-sinus membranes... promotes drainage... restores free breathing. (2) An exclusive anti-allergent to block allergic reactions often associated with colds plus a highly effective combination of pain relievers. DRISTAN reduces fever better than aspirin and promptly relieves body aches due to colds. (3) Vitamin C to help build up body resistance to colds infection. For quick relief, get DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets.

Note: DRISTAN is being widely imitated. But the fact is...the exclusive DRISTAN Tablet formula cannot be duplicated. Accept no substitutes!

WHEN COLDS STRIKE, nasal-sinus passages become clogged with germ-laden mucus... responsible for so much colds suffering and misery.

TAKE DRISTAN. Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN shrinks all swollen membranes, promotes drainage, restores free breathing.

This Exclusive DRISTAN Tablet Formula Cannot Be Duplicated!

DRISTAN is the exclusive 3-layer tablet discovery which for the first time makes it possible to unite certain medically-proven ingredients into one fast-acting uncoated tablet. Accept no substitutes.

There's Nothing Like DRISTAN® Decongestant Tablets

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

to deep-seated convictions as to the proper place of government in a democracy, or requires financial sacrifices that might slow somewhat the upward curve of private consumption. I am certain this attitude is the outgrowth of a sincere—though in my opinion tragically erroneous—belief that we can, without grave damage to our country, choose between making an all-out effort to keep ahead in the contest with Russia and allowing her to outdo us. Russia has only to outpace us in a single really vital area to put us decisively into second place. Those who think it costs too much to keep our nation at the top have never counted the cost of the alternative. Let us have no illusions on this score. Our choice is not between parity or superiority on the one hand and second place on the other; it is between parity, as a minimum, and certain loss of independence—not only our own but that of all nations this side of the iron and bamboo curtains. Most of us are aware of this, but only, so to speak, at the top of our heads. We need to know it in the marrow of our bones.

We are grievously in error if we equate national power with production and consumption of private goods—with the number of telephones, automobiles or ranch houses we possess. Victory cannot be won with more and better washing machines—not when the other side has more and better missiles.

To meet the Russian challenge we must take our responsibility as democratic citizens seriously, devote more of our energies to public service. Complete absorption in private and family affairs is becoming a luxury that will cost us dear. We cannot eat our cake and have it too. Democratic rights must be earned by conscientious performance of democratic duties.

Two tasks are particularly important: first, preservation of the bond that unites us into a nation; second, wise choice of men to govern us.

Though democracy gives enormous lee- to private initiative and private pursuit of private gain, there is a limit. The limit is se- the requirement at any given time to subju- this or that private interest to the public go-. We cannot expect powerful interest group- give up fighting for their special interests; s- would be against human nature. But we h- long believed that by letting them fight e- another the common good will ultimately e- served. This has now become a dangerous fallacy. We are more likely to see mutual- commodations at the expense of nation- needs. The nation's need for a depend- currency, for example, is defied when e- wage-price spiral creates permanent inflati-

When a democracy becomes in effect a pressure-group state, it will be as weak as a loosely tied bundle of reeds. Only we, as individual citizens, can prevent this from happening. The public good has no other protector but the people themselves. We must subject all organized groups to constant scrutiny and develop a highly skeptical attitude toward their attempts to create a pleasing "public image" of themselves. It is well to keep in mind that only rarely will it be true that what is good for one or another such group must necessarily be good for the country as a whole.

No less important is our responsibility to choose wisely among competing candidates for public office. The fate of our country depends in large part on having first-rate men in all important government positions—whether these be elective or appointive. In as large and populous a nation as the United States, absolute action will not be taken unless we have resolute and capable leaders. The people may realize what needs to be done, yet be unable to do it if our leaders do not lead.

Amateurs in government are not the best people to direct us when we are fighting for life in a bitter contest with Russia. Is a desire to serve, combined with experience gained in running a business concern, really sufficient to enable one to manage the public affairs of a nation of 180,000,000? Can an adequate job of running huge government agencies be done by men on brief tours of duty of no more than two years? We are the only major nation equating ability to manage a factory with ability to administer public affairs on the highest level. Could we not perhaps learn from other Western democracies with efficient systems of public administration? There, high government posts are usually entrusted to men who have worked their way up in their party or in public service, and who have on the way acquired special competence in the area of government where their new posts lie. Would it not be better if we put men who have for many years headed Congressional or Senate committees into top appointive posts where their special experience and knowledge are needed? This, of course, would demand that we give the man we elect President the support of a Congress controlled by his party.

The central fact about the contest with Russia is that every action we take or neglect to take—no matter in what area of private or public life—affects our position in this race. We have no choice but to accept this fact of international life and come to terms with the grim present. Other peoples have for centuries lived with constant peril. We, too, can accustom ourselves to living with danger. But not without great effort; not without giving up cliché thinking and illusions.

No one, of course, likes the critic who disturbs our complacency. We need not like him, but we must permit him to speak. Indeed we cannot afford not to listen to what he says. It may just be that he is right and what he proposes has validity. We have almost made criticism "undemocratic" when in fact it is the very mainstay of democracy. How can anything be changed for the better unless someone first calls attention to the need for change? Surely no one could maintain today that we are doing well in the contest with Russia. What then should a responsible citizen do? Give thought to the reasons why we are falling behind in the technological race and how we could reverse the situation? Speak out when he believes his country to be in danger? Or should he remain pleasant and agreeable and keep his mind and his mouth shut?

THE WHITE DRESS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 61

Janice and I can't really agree on anything, Margaret admitted. I know it's a normal part f growing up, youngsters always rebel. But eantime we have no meeting ground, no com- on viewpoint. It's as though she's drifting way, and I just can't reach her. . . . Surely ings will work out. And surely this Kenny ing is almost over. He hasn't seemed so pos- ssive the past few months.

She thought for a while about Kenny, the rst real boy friend Janice had ever had, the nly one. She and Clyde had seen a lot of enny the last year, and though he had his ults—he was sometimes selfish, often bossy—robably he was no worse than most his age. nd they owed him a certain debt for the gift belonging that he had given Janice. Until he met Kenny Hall, Janice had chafed in a ght cocoon of self-consciousness, brooding d lonely; now she had friends and a busy hedule, she went to all the games and all e parties, was one of The Crowd. Even her hool marks had noticeably improved. She d a "steady."

Margaret cringed at the word. She and lyde had argued the matter up and down; lyde was more easygoing about such things. ut even Margaret recognized the change Janice which they, as parents, had not en able to accomplish alone. The begin- ngs of social poise and self-confidence. For is, like it or not, they could thank Kenny all.

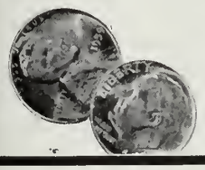
And Janice was right when she said, "Ev- ybody goes steady." In this particular town, in this particular school, to one degree or another everybody did.

Margaret made herself a cup of instant coffee, and drank it sitting at the kitchen table, and the clock on the wall marked every minute with a little thump. (Clyde had promised to fix that clock last weekend, until he got mixed up in baseball with the boys.) She could hear the rain. Well, rain is better than fog. But the roads would be slippery, and Kenny's tires were slick. He'd just finished paying a speeding ticket in March.

How could Clyde sleep so peacefully upstairs? How could he rest? If she wakened him now, he'd cover his fears with impatience: "What do you want me to do? Go out and hunt them? Call the police? Kenny's a pretty good driver, for his age. Come to bed."

When a car swooped into the driveway Margaret gave a tremendous sigh: Thank God! No head-on crash, no splintering glass, no screaming sirens tonight. And so she stood up quickly, rinsed out her coffee cup, slammed a few cupboard doors and started to hum a tune. Janice was home.

She came through the back door swinging her evening slippers in one hand, her dark hair frosted with rain, her lipstick a little blurred, and she gave her mother a tentative smile, glancing quickly at the clock.



"I'm sorry I'm late; I wish you wouldn't wait up." She frowned. "I always get home all right."

"We said twelve-thirty," Margaret reminded her firmly. "You know the rules; this means no dates next weekend."

"Yes, I know. It doesn't matter." Janice slumped into one of the captain's chairs at the oval table. "It was a fabulous party—really great. Do you feel like talking?"

"Of course," Margaret said, trying not to sound too eager. She noticed that Janice was

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

The woman who had opened the door listened patiently as the boys wearing disguises and holding small milk cartons labeled UNICEF told her what the coins they were seeking would do to help the world's needy children.

"I do wish I could contribute," she said when they were through. "But my husband has been ill and out of work for several months. I am sorry, there's really nothing I can do."

"Not even a penny?" one of the boys asked. "Just that would be enough to protect a kid against TB."

The woman looked at him intently as he said that last word. Then she went into the house and came back with a dime.

GIVE TO UNICEF ON TRICK OR TREAT NIGHT

SPECIAL OFFER!
NYLON HALF-SLIP FOR $1.00 AND 1 NuSOFT LABEL

2.98 value! Fine quality Nylon lingerie, lace trimmed and lovely. Gleaming white tricot with elastic waistband is trimly tailored to hang straight and fit smoothly over hips. Ruffle is permanently pleated, attached to delicate lace inset. Sizes are small, medium and large. Get several, get NuSoft today and send one label with $1 for each slip you want.

- NuSOFT ends "static-cling"!
- NuSOFT makes all washables softer!
- NuSOFT cuts ironing time!
- NuSOFT ends deep wrinkles!
- NuSOFT costs about 3¢ a washload!
- NuSOFT is concentrated!

GET NuSOFT® FABRIC SOFTENER:

SEND US LABEL AND $1.

WE'LL SEND YOU

YOUR NYLON HALF-SLIP!

Save $1.98 on regular retail price.

NuSoft Slip, P. O. Box 135
New York 46, New York

I have enclosed ( ) NuSoft front label(s) and $1 in check or money order for each Nylon Tricot Half-Slip (white only). My size is Small ☐, Medium ☐, Large ☐. Please send slip to:

NAME_____

STREET_____

CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

Offer good in continental U.S. only. Offer expires December 31, 1960, and is void in any state or locality where taxed or prohibited by law. Allow 3 weeks for delivery.

Look what you can do with hot cling peaches and chicken!

Look . . . and wonder, when you see how many wonderful ways hot cling peaches can make chicken even more exciting and delicious! These two so very versatile foods, when teamed together — broiled, barbecued, fried, baked — flatter the appetite . . . transform an 'ordinary' menu into An Occasion! (Remember, only clings hold their shape and sunny color during heating.)

BROILED CHICKEN AND CLING PEACHES: Broil chicken halves on Reynolds Wrap. While broiling, drizzle 1 tsp. lemon juice on each peach half. For 4 peach halves, blend 2 tsps. brown sugar, $\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. dry mustard. 10 minutes before chicken is done, place peaches on foil, sprinkle with sugar-mustard mixture, broil until tinged with brown.

FRIED CHICKEN AND CLING PEACHES: Use your favorite frying method. 5-10 minutes before done, drain excess fat from pan, add drained cling peach halves. Heat 5-10 minutes, sprinkle peaches with dill, thyme or rosemary.

PARTY CHICKEN WITH CLING PEACHES: Brown six chicken breasts and set aside. Combine 1 c. raw rice, 2 c. chicken broth, 4-oz. can sliced mushrooms, 2 tbsps. chopped parsley, $\frac{3}{4}$ tsp. salt and $\frac{1}{8}$ tsp. curry or thyme in chicken pan. Heat to boiling and turn into 2-qt. baking dish lined with Reynolds Wrap. Add chicken, fold and seal Wrap, bake 50 min. at 350° F. Combine 3 tbsps. orange marmalade, $1\frac{1}{2}$ tsps. lemon juice and dash of powdered cloves. Spread on cut side of 6 drained cling peach halves; arrange around chicken. Bake uncovered 10-15 min. more.

POLYNESIAN CHICKEN AND CLING PEACHES: Brown $3\frac{1}{2}$ lb. cut-up fryer, cover and cook till tender. Drain off excess fat. Quarter and separate into layers 1 large white onion. Cut 1 green pepper into strips. Cook with chicken till onion is transparent. Drain can cling peach slices (1 lb. 13 oz.), reserving syrup. Into 1 c. peach syrup, stir 1 tbsp. cornstarch, 1 tbsp. soy sauce and 3 tbsps. vinegar. Pour over chicken and cook till clear and slightly thickened. Add peach slices and 2 medium-sized tomatoes, cut into sixths. Heat 5 min. longer, serve with hot rice. Serves 6.

CLING PEACH ADVISORY BOARD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 103

nervous. Janice was terribly thin. She'd always had trouble putting on weight, and what a disgrace to wear a double-A-cup bra! Her hands were slender and narrow, the tendons showing like spokes of a fan from her wrists to the knuckles. She'd start to fill out once she got to college. "Want some ice cream, dear? There's butter pecan."

"No, thanks; we stopped at the diner."

Margaret waited. The wish for confidence was rare, a treasure to be handled delicately. She noticed the cleft of a frown between the clear blue eyes, a whiteness around the blur of pink lipstick. She noticed the shoulder blades that seemed to stand up sharply, pressing the ridge of collarbones forward, emphasizing the childish hollows above them.

"Mother," Janice said suddenly, squeaking a little, "I've decided I'm going to get married." Not "I'd like to," or "What do you think?" Just "I'm going to."

"Now—now wait a minute," Margaret said, bridling. "When do you mean?"

"Right away. Next weekend, maybe." Janice shrugged, but it turned out an awkward jerk of her bony white shoulders. "I think it's a good idea. After all, what's college?"

"Kenny?"

Janice gave her one of those baleful sixteen-year-old glances. "Oh, mother. Who else have I been out with in the last two years?"

Nobody, more's the pity, Margaret thought. Oh, this premature pairing off like little men and women! Parties in pairs, dances in pairs, two-seated cars—it's an indefensible system, firmly installed. Even the schools are resigned to it. "It gives them security," Janice's teacher had said. Angry color slowly suffused Margaret's face, and her heart began to pump in panic.

"You know you can't, dear," she said as calmly as she could. "You're only sixteen. You're going to college, you're on the honor roll. It seems like a long time to wait. But Kenny has three more years at State U.; a lot can happen. You'll both meet other people, make new friends. The time will fly, darling, honestly, wait and see!"

"I don't think you ever liked Kenny, really," Janice murmured. "You put up with him, you and daddy, but you think he's a mess ——"

"I don't! That isn't fair!" Margaret protested more heartily than she intended. It was her own daughter's dependence on him she didn't like. "I think he's sometimes a little overbearing. I never liked going steady, I'll guarantee you that! And I never liked his having his own car!"

"You have to go steady, whether you want to or not," Janice insisted. "You know that, mother. Lots of the kids don't really want to either. But who wants to get left out?"

"Well, still," Margaret said, "that's a far cry from marriage."

"Mother," Janice said, leaning forward, looking straight into Margaret's eyes, "mother, I have to."

The blow descended slowly, a cloud in the silence. The hard, incredible words that every mother of daughters imagines in the anguish of certain sleepless nights . . . that every mother forbids herself to believe could ever be real.

The words had no reality now, none at all. Here in the dim familiar kitchen, here at the table where they shared their meals—the salt and pepper shakers with their painted faces, the schoolbooks stacked on the counter, the African-violet pots on the window sills. The thing was so impossible, so absurd that a dreadful derisive laughter welled within her: of all ridiculous things! Janice? Oh, what a monstrous joke, what an evil sense of humor! This quiet child, this half-grown youngster, pregnant?

A shower of thoughts flashed through Margaret's mind, spinning in chaos. She's too young to know what she's saying, she must be wrong! How long has it been? It couldn't happen. She knows we love her, they say that's important, don't they? She knows we trust her! Ah, children driving cars, who makes the laws? What will I tell her little brothers? What if it's true? She'll never wear her graduation dress. Oh Clyde, oh Clyde!

Janice's chin was tipped defensively forward, and her eyelids were lowered, hiding her secrets. She looked quite frail in her flowerlike party dress, the starched petals edging the top of the narrow bodice, the wide bouffant skirt blossoming over the arms of the chair. Her hair was a dark elfin cap perched over her pink-and-white face. She weighed a hundred and three.

"It—it's too late to talk tonight," Margaret said at last, surprised that her voice formed sensible-sounding words. "Does Kenny know?"

"I told him today," Janice answered, lifting her chin still higher, and when she did so her eyelids closed, and a tear stood out in the corner of one of her eyes and slid down her cheek.

"People are marrying very young these days," Margaret said faintly, "very young."

She stood up heavily and turned off the kitchen lights, and followed her daughter slowly up the front stairs, watching the silver slippers swinging back and forth.

In the hallway Janice kissed her mother distantly, and closed her bedroom door. It was later, a great deal later, almost dawn, when Margaret tiptoed into her room to tuck in the rose-colored blanket, and gently, disbelieving, touched her outspread hand.

In the light of day the events of the previ night assumed the fantastic shape of rea Margaret got Clyde off to work witho word; she wanted to make absolutely s before she thrust this extra burden on h Oh, poor Clyde! So kind, so much concer with them all—so fond of Janice! Tommy Tad, the twins now nine, had never evo the tenderness he felt for his daughter. H would she ever tell him?

Next she got the two boys dressed and to the bus, a lively handful. She somet forgot to pack their lunches, and had to g them lunch money as they galloped out door. . . . The wedding would have to quick, before rumors got to the childre but not too quick, or rumors were even m certain. A week or two?

Then Janice came downstairs, and M garet stared in amazement, for she looked different at all. The same striped chamb dress with roll-up sleeves, the same thin g chain around her throat, the white socks loafers. Only her eyes were evasive in morning light, and she was unduly quiet. usual shyness had a different quality, a de erate withdrawal. The only sound she m while she ate was the clinkity-clink of

EMERSON SAYS

Make yourself necessary to somebody. Do not make life hard to any.

I have heard that whoever loves is in no condition old.

Adopt the pace of nature; her secret is patience.

I like the sayers of no better than the sayers of yes.

So of cheerfulness, or a good temper, the more it is spent, the more of it remains.

I have always thought that faith in immortality is proof of the sanity of a man's nature.

charm bracelets slipping up and down slender arms.

"We'd better see Doctor Hagen this m ing," Margaret suggested hopefully. "I out for sure."

"I've already seen him," Janice stated, l ing into her cereal bowl. "I made him pro to let me tell you first. He was pretty n

"Oh, Janice—Janice!" Margaret breat

So it was true. The shock was too bi absorb all at once. Margaret's mind rebe No, no! and when she picked up the car to drive Janice up to the high school, the of her fingers were numb.

Janice buttoned a pale blue sweater arc her shoulders, and cradled her books in arms. She started to go outside, but sto with one hand on the doorknob, her toward her mother. Her forehead presse against the screen of the door.

"Mother, I'm terribly sorry," she whisp in a rush. "I know that's a terribly little w but I am, I am! I didn't mean it, I thou loved him, I don't know how it happe I—I was used to him, I guess, and I d want to lose him."

"I could write an excuse for school," garet faltered.

Janice's chin went up, and she opene door. "No, it keeps me busy. I'd better

At the school Margaret held her a mo in the car, pretending to straighten the c of a neatly turned cuff. "When does K go back to college?" she asked.

"Sunday night. He only came home fo prom." Her voice was steady again.

"When will you see him?"

"He might pick me up after school. pretty mad about . . . things."

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Do you have trouble giving your child medicine?

When your child has fever of cold or flu, or a headache—do you have difficulty getting him to accept "aspirin"? You won't have this problem if you give the children's aspirin with the orange flavor children prefer!

Read why most thoughtful mothers give

the children's aspirin doctors recommend 4 to 1 OVER ANY OTHER BRAND

In a recent nation-wide survey more doctors—child specialists—recommended St. Joseph Aspirin For Children than any other . . . by far!

No need to have an emotional upset when you give your child aspirin . . . no need to worry whether he has actually swallowed the dose the doctor ordered!

Most mothers solve that problem by giving St. Joseph Aspirin For Children . . . the aspirin child specialists prefer 4 to 1 over any other brand.

You see, St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is the best aspirin, with the creamy texture and pure orange taste children prefer. It has the preferred child dosage, and the special safety cap doctors favor.

Is there any wonder more doctors specify St. Joseph Aspirin For Children? Any wonder more mothers trust it—more children accept it willingly . . . than all others combined?

Next time you're shopping . . . ask for St. Joseph Aspirin For Children. Your child may need it tonight!

FOR ADULTS (5-grain tablets)

READY TO GO TO WORK FASTER
than other leading pain relief tablets!

Why pay for costlier aspirin, expensive buffering, or "combination" pain relief drugs? Laboratory tests prove that St. Joseph Aspirin disintegrates faster, is ready to go to work faster than all three other leading pain relief tablets. Millions take it without stomach upset. Get the best for less—be sure that you get trusted St. Joseph Aspirin!

The look of sterling at a down-to-earth price

"SONG OF AUTUMN" in COMMUNITY*

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

Go ahead... live luxuriously. Enjoy the beautiful look of sterling at every meal. All yours so easily with new "Song of Autumn"* in Community, the finest silverplate. Enchantingly designed . . . this striking pattern has the look, the feel, the weight of treasured sterling . . . yet costs a quarter as much. See "Song of Autumn" today at your favorite silverware store. See how you can own a 40-piece service for 8 for only $49.95.

HEIRLOOM* STERLING COMMUNITY* STAINLESS ONEIDACRAFT* STAINLESS TUDOR* PLATE ONEIDA COMMUNITY ONEIDA* DINNERWARE *TRADEMARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

"Tell him to come to our house tonight after supper."

Janice stiffened. "I don't know whether he'll come!"

"Oh, yes, he'll come. I'll talk to his mother today."

"His mother's in Florida. Only his grandmother's there."

"Never mind, he'll come," Margaret assured her. "Tell him nine o'clock. I can get the boys to bed first."

"All right, I'll try," Janice promised.

Her mother watched her walk lightly up the long stone steps leading into the school.

Now what first? The doctor, the minister? Where shall I go?

Where have I failed? she tormented herself. How were we wrong? Too little freedom, too much? If Clyde and I differed on discipline it was only between ourselves, we always struck a balance before we faced Janice. We decided to let her be "Kenny's girl," and tried to control it. Midnight curfew, no drive-in movies, only two dates a week. But week after week, the gathering momentum of hours alone together—she was used to him. Should we have forced her to suffer isolation? The experts say, "Teach your children right from wrong, and trust them." We tried. Then how could this ——

This (the phrase kept ringing over and over) this only happens to other people. . . . Oh, it does? It's happened here. In this house on Cochran Street. To Janice. To me.

Margaret called on their minister first, a friend for fifteen years. Her muscles drew tense and painful as she talked, her face stained ruby. But he was neither shocked nor righteous, only sad.

"You know how sorry I am, Margaret," he said. "I'm sorry for all these youngsters today, the pressures of unrestraint. Of course I'll marry them whenever you say, the sooner the better."

Then she went to see Doctor Hagen. He was indignant, almost rude; he resented his helplessness in cases like this, and cases like this were coming to him much too frequently lately.

"It's time parents learned to say no!" he told her bluntly. "In spite of social customs and the law! Driving cars at sixteen, going steady! I'll tell you this, Margaret: just thank God she can marry the boy, and soon." He took off his glasses and scrubbed them with a cleansing tissue, and his eyes seemed softer when he put the glasses back. "Well, don't think you're alone. . . . Do you like the boy?"

"I might, ten years from now; it's hard to tell," Margaret answered thoughtfully. "I don't like his domineering ways, but Janice is rather meek and shy, it makes him feel big. He's an only child, his parents are divorced. Spoiled, I guess, but he's always been polite—sir this, sir that, you know. He's only eighteen."

"Yes." The doctor sighed. "Just be glad they can marry. Not all my patients are quite that lucky, believe me."

At noon she called Clyde home from the office, gave him coffee and a roast-beef sandwich for lunch, and haltingly told him what she had to tell.

She had never, in twenty years of marriage, seen her husband lose his temper so violently before. He gave his sandwich plate such a shove that it slid all the way across the table and crashed on the floor. He let out a kind of bellow, wrenched back his chair and paced the room. He stopped by the stove to pour a cup of coffee, and drank it standing up, his hand shaking. When he had drained the cup he went to the pantry and got out the dustpan and broom, and the methodical act of sweeping up the shattered china helped to calm him.

"Kenny's coming here tonight to settle things," Margaret told him. "You'll have to control yourself, Clyde. It's hard on him too."

"She's only sixteen!" Clyde shouted.

"Yes, I know, they're young," Margaret agreed, her strength returning. "It's the current trend. Remember Sally Barker got married last year, and the Gantry boy at Christmas. Twenty per cent of the youngsters at State U. are married. The parents help them out. Things have changed."

"You're right about that!" Clyde said. "The kids today!"

"The kids today have more opportunity," Margaret said. "Bess and I had a few close calls when we were young. And no cars, either."

"You know what people will say, our friends, our neighbors!"

Margaret swallowed once, her hand on her throat. "We'll tell people Janice and Kenny have known each other two years—and we decided to help them," she suggested. "It's early enough—Doctor Hagen says six weeks—so there won't be too much talk. It'll soon blow over."

Clyde sat heavily down in his chair and lighted his pipe very slowly, his shoulders sagging. "I wish I didn't have to go back to the office," he said.

At three o'clock Margaret watched for Tommy and Tad to turn the corner; when she saw them chasing along the pavement she felt a great relief. She now was possessed for the rest of the day with peanut butter, knotted string, muddy worms and minor bruises. She hastily set about paring potatoes for dinner, and scurried upstairs to make the forgotten beds. In less than twenty-four hours things had begun to adjust, the worst was over. The normal, necessary tasks save sanity.

Kenny arrived at the house that night as bidden, at quarter of nine. He was neatly dressed, although he had not reached an age of co-ordinated fashion, and wore suède desert boots with a striped bow tie.

Margaret examined him closely.

Kenny Hall, eighteen, a freshman at State—who can operate a car, use an electric razor and refuel a cigarette lighter. Who lifts weights to build up his muscles, and charges his clothes at Brinkley's. Who still has a trace of adolescent acne across his chin. A young man floundering in a cross tide of indecision, sure and unsure, weak and vain, and frightened. Far from our dreams for our only daughter, our jewel. Far from our dreams.

"Come in, Kenny," she said.

The living room was neater than usua sofa pillows plumped, the twins' toys sta by the wall. Clyde had put on his suit and folded his evening paper; Margaret changed to high heels and put on her diar ring. Janice slipped quietly into the room curled in a corner chair, trying to disap

No one could contrive a more awk meeting than that which must now take in the heart of a modest white frame hou Cochran Street. It was not the time to refreshments or light a fire, and Mar snapped off the radio as she passed it.

"Kenny, it wasn't my idea to make come here," Janice said quickly in the sil "Honest, it wasn't."

"Nobody made me," Kenny answ coldly, across the room.

"Nobody made him," Margaret to and they all tried to smile.

The boy offered cigarettes without stat up, and boldly lighted his own when were refused. His face was white, his pressed into a purple line.

Clyde walked over to the fireplace made a loud tapping noise with the bo his pipe against the slate, shaking the ch ash loose.

"Well, Kenny," he said at last, busy pipe and tobacco pouch and a silver ta "I understand you youngsters want t married. Is that the idea?"

"I guess that's it," Kenny answered wi "I guess that's one way to put it. It look way."

"We hoped it wouldn't be quite so s Clyde said. "I'm sure your family di But that's the ticket. Now. What are plans?"

"Plans?" Kenny asked, his eyes bli "We don't have any plans. How can we plans? I've got three more years of c and extra credit to make up in my sopho year. Maybe Janice can live at home a sir."

"Oh, no, no," Janice cried, sitting str "I can work, Kenny, three or four mon can get a job ——"

SPECIALTIE

MAKE THEM YOURS WIT

It's your way with a dish that brings that m sincere compliment: may I have your recipe? Ea one here (and above) can add luster to your goo cook's crown.

What do you do with a pound of ground beef? Fir keep it juicy and never-crumbly (without an e by mixing in PET Evaporated Milk, as our ba recipe tells. For Long Boy Cheeseburger heap it split French rolls, bake it brown and melty w cheese. Appetizer Meat Balls oven-bake for dunk in hot barbecue sauce. Recipes 2, 3, and more!

How do you fancy up vegetables? In a mushro sauce made with canned soup smoothed to j the right creaminess with PET. Top with Fren fried onion rings. Company Vegetables, Recipe No what?"

ir mother and I ——" Clyde began.
ought to take it easy," the boy said
"Janice ought to graduate, at least.
ght to wait till the end of the semester.
the rush?"
ink the sooner the better," Margaret gently.
Like when?"
e next Saturday?" Margaret asked oy shifted suddenly in his chair, bracshoulders against the back of it.

're the boss," he answered, in a voice ulent that all three turned their eyes im in astonishment. "I'm the goat."
?" Clyde gasped.
Kenny was no longer frightened. His listened. His mouth had turned sullen, s defiant, and he lighted one cigarette
e other, flicking the ashes wildly.
it; you want to make things right, ou, Kenny?" Clyde asked with forced
t. "We're not casting blame. All we're o do is set things straight!"
e, sure, sure! But what about me? It a lot of difference to what I planned for
! And after!"
nakes a lot of difference to Janice!"
etorted, his voice rising.
w, Clyde ——" dy, please ——" id I'd go through with it!" Kenny said
. "Sir!"
just bet your life you will!" Clyde p, trembling. "By law, if necessary.
law!"
y stood up, too, and threw his cign the fireplace.
let me know the time and I'll be he said coolly, and he crossed the with a walk which was very close to a r. e kept her eyes downcast, as though w that Kenny would stroll by without tion. He stopped in the hall, however, d without turning:
see you, Janice."

"O.K., Kenny," the girl whispered, pinched back tight in her chair. "I'm sorry, Kenny." And all at once she streaked from the room, raced up the stairs and slammed her door, and they all heard the thump of her bedsprings as she threw herself down.

I could kill him! Margaret thought suddenly, her chest aching. I really mean it. I could kill him!

She sat impaled with fury: this boy who had shared their meals and their summer cottage, this boy to whom they had trusted their daughter! What fools they had been! To be swayed by his moments of charm and gallantry, to overlook his selfishness and surliness as part of youth! To let Janice grow dependent on him, and not to call a halt!

Doctor Hagen was right. We should have said no, Margaret painfully admitted. We should have said, "Stay shy, if you must; you'll outgrow it. If steady dating's the system, it's not for us. We're different."

"I think I could use a drink," Clyde said when Kenny's car had gone. "Can I fix you something?"

"No, I'll go along upstairs," Margaret told him.

When Clyde came into the bedroom, glass in hand, he found Margaret seated on her dressing-table bench, her back to the mirror. She wore her old red bathrobe, and her hands were gripped together in her lap.

"Clyde, we just can't allow it," she said calmly.

"Can't allow ——"

"The marriage," Margaret stated. "We have to forbid it."

Clyde set his glass on the window sill and started unknotting his tie. "You don't really mean that, Marg. What else can we do? Maybe Kenny isn't as bad as he seemed tonight. He was trapped. Maybe he'll be all right."

"No, we've made excuses too long. It isn't only his faults; he doesn't love her," Margaret declared. "We can't let them marry."

"Marg, I'm tired. Please—you're not talking sense."

"Oh, yes, oh, yes, I am!" his wife answered steadily. "We can't allow it. Janice isn't ready for marriage. With anyone. She isn't ready to be a mother, either, by several years. We'll have to see her through this as decently as we can, and see that the baby finds a loving home. Clyde, think of the child! The right home isn't with two half-developed adolescents, married in bitterness, hating each other because of it." She held out her hand toward her husband, seeking his eyes, imploring his consent. "Darling, darling, we know what love is. They never heard of it!"

Clyde walked across the room and back, and stopped beside her. "What can we do?"

"We can get help," Margaret said slowly. "I—I'm sure we can. Bess is alone in Chicago; maybe she'll take Janice in. Or maybe she can find her a place, a kind of home. We'll tell people Janice has gone away to school; we'll tell the twins. And I'll go west at Christmas—when it's time." Her voice wavered. "Clyde, tell me I'm right! She's a minor and we have to sign the papers, and I'll never sign! It means the rest of her life!"

Clyde took off his necktie and dropped it around the bedpost. He finished his drink, staring out the window into the blackness, and then he turned and called sharply, "Janice, come in here! Now."

There was a stir in the next bedroom, a patter of feet, and Janice stood in the doorway, a very slim young girl wearing a flower-sprigged muslin nightgown, like an old-fashioned shift. Her mother had made it by hand.

"Come sit down," Margaret offered, moving so that there was room on the bench beside her. "Janice, you know how much we love you. Do you know what you've done? You have changed the rest of our lives."

"I've told you I'll marry him," Janice chattered, her shoulders hunching. "No matter what."

"Listen to your mother," Clyde commanded. "She thinks you don't want to marry this boy. Hear what she says."

"Is Kenny Hall the man you want to live with, always?" Margaret asked softly. "To cherish, comfort, love all the rest of your days? Marriage is forever, Janice. Is Kenny the one?"

Janice clutched at the yoke of her gown, and her eyes squeezed shut. "Oh, mommy, mommy!" she moaned, using the name she had long ago forgotten. "Mommy, I'm scared!" And she fell sidewise against her mother's shoulder, retching.

"You don't have to, baby," Clyde told her.

"No, you're not going to."

Janice straightened and stared at her mother, and then at her father, her eyes bewildered.

"But, mother—daddy—if I don't . . . what people will think, what people will say . . . will kill you."

"No, not quite," Margaret promised, drawing in her breath. "We're thinking of you. We're thinking of later, Janice, of marriage, and love and the home you'll have—someday. If we see this through."

"How can I?" Janice whispered. "I can't alone."

"You're not alone," Margaret said, and she reached out her arm and drew the old red bathrobe around the child's bare shoulders, and held her close. Her eyes met Clyde's across the room with a nod and a very small smile.

But that night, as Margaret lay in bed with her husband asleep beside her, her arms and legs prickled cold with terror at what they had done.

This is a terrible road we're taking, she realized. A terrible road. Everybody will say I'm wrong—the doctor, the church. But I know what's right for Janice. And this time we'll fight for the same thing, we're back together.

Janice would wear her graduation dress after all. The billowing whiteness, the sheer virginal organdy, all the stitches sewed with hope and love. And it was just as well.

For even though Janice would someday marry—freely, from choice, for love—she must understand, with many another fact of humiliation, that it was not very likely she'd ever wear white again. END

f the HOUSE

OUBLE-RICH PET®

HIN MILK JUST WON'T DO)

Vat makes a mix-cake Very Special? Layer it vn a thick, rich filling plumped all through vn cherries and nuts—a filling you couldn't ke with a milk less rich and double-creamy n PET. Party Jewel Cake, Recipe 13.

n you think of a sweet more sure-to-please n apple pie? Apple Nut Dessert is it . . . an escribable medley of apples, nuts and rich mb-cakey batter—luscious served warm with oop of ice cream. Recipe 8.

Vat's a make-ahead dessert that actually proves with mellowing? Date Nut Roll gets ster and richer as PET blends the flavors of nam cracker crumbs, dates and marshmallows something dark and delicious. Recipe 10.

SUCCESS TO YOUR SPECIALTIES WITH PET . . . IT'S A PROMISE!

1885 1960 PET 75th ANNIVERSARY

"PET"—Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. Copr., 1960, Pet Milk Co.

give hamburgers
a grand new taste

make Huntburgers tonight

Of course, you don't need special recipes for Hunt's Tomato Sauce—you can simply add it to your own favorites.

For example, when you fry just plain hamburgers, brown one side, turn, and pour on Hunt's Tomato Sauce. When they're done, the bubbling-hot sauce will be deliciously blended with the meat juices.

As for Huntburgers, they're really special! Men love them because Hunt's adds honest-to-goodness tomato flavor. All tomato—already kettle-simmered for you with delicious seasonings. The beautiful color and the rich flavor tell you why it's America's favorite. Try it!

1 lb. ground beef Salt and pepper
4 slices sharp cheese Oil for frying
1 8-oz. can Hunt's Tomato Sauce

Form beef into 8 thin hamburger patties. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Lay cheese on 4 patties. Cover with remaining patties. Pinch edges together to enclose the cheese completely. Brown on one side in hot oil in skillet. Turn and pour Hunt's Tomato Sauce over them. Simmer 8 to 10 minutes, basting occasionally. Serve piping hot with the delicious pan gravy.

Hunt...for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "21 NEW WAYS TO SERVE HAMBURGER." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-10, P.O. Box 5, Fullerton, Calif. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ontario.

RS. FAY
INES ON ZEBRA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 78

arketable "old pieces," small ones to be from among the massive bedsteads and res, but nothing on which to rear a nine- old boy. She was sitting at great-grand- r Marie-Claire's tambour desk; Roger eat it in two months. She had the pawn s for Marie-Claire's rose diamonds, and arie-Claire's daughter-in-law's epergne. he had $126.35 in the bank.

d in addition she had, of course, herself. been her only dowry, and until some six ns ago she had never seriously attempted w upon it. "What a pity," her golden- Uncle Victor had remarked of her she was eight: what a pity that Arietta ot male, for she seemed to have all the t talents, including a marked facial re- ance to the founder of the line.

room where she sat now was the petit that held the conglomeration of family es. Above the mantel was Yves, done on full length, too, which was unusual for edium. It was a triangular face in which e lines went up, a minstrel face whose long for its tilt, must have moved, as hers ith speech. The enamelist had even man- o indicate in couleur de rose those same pple bumps of cheek she had when she l. Next to him was his Dutch wife, in conventional oval to the waist (of there was much), a great blonde, serene but her stays. Beneath the two of them, ding on lengths of velvet ribbon in the f life, were their heirs direct and collat- laguerreotype to candid camera, spilling he mantel to the side walls. As a curious menon among them one could see one other of the two progenitors recurring, with such fidelity that there had long family slang for the two types—"the s" for the Dutch ones, and "les maigres" hose mince creatures who were true ts. Although there was no intermarrying, pe usually managed to marry the other, is children tended to be his opposites as s Minot, the first forebear, had come to ates in the entourage of Lafayette—some s a body servant, although this had never proved—and had managed to stay near eneral's person in some nonmilitary ity throughout all the general's cam- s but not at Valley Forge—Yves, like of his descendants, had been less cow- than clever.

tta, brooding on the three pictures be- Yves and the wedding portrait of her- nd Carolingus Fay, deceased, traced a y much more in Gibbon's line. Beneath came his son Claude, a beefy, of whom ht have been said (as Henry Adams had f himself) that "as far as he had a func- n life, it was as a stable companion to men, whether they liked it or not." In e's case they had. Next came Louis, her father, who had switched to railroad s—a light sprig of a man who had passed ll in years and benefices, while accom- ng home the equally aged body of his , on the Union Pacific somewhere be- Ogden and Omaha, in a private car. r him, in the sepia gloss of the eighties, his sons, beefies again: her father in his in the deerstalker's cap so prophetic of ter years, and Victor, his elder brother, ly a man with a beautiful Flemish jowl. r had already been with "munitions" at me. At the minimal age of eighty, he had her father used to joke, not of an over- of his patron's pheasant and Lafitte but pique, because his patron's son, se- by the increasingly corporate air of vare, had entered Victor's exquisitely in- le services on a tax sheet, had actually to incorporate him. With her father, the descent, gradual as the grime on her -brac, was clear. He had still had the itary talent, but he had been fifteen younger than Victor. Patrons herded in s now instead of carrying on singly, and red the distressingly plebeian admiration of the many to the fine, patrician allegiance of the one. Ergo, her father. For when a Minot was stripped of his devotion and of the truth-telling that was its honorable underside, when he was reduced to picking up crumbs of "contact" wherever he could, to making public show of his charms like anyone else, then he did so in the only way he knew. For no Minot had ever had a salary, or had gone, as the phrase is, "to work." Therefore her father had become a diner-out. It was some consolation that, under many chandeliers and between many long-stemmed rows of pink and tawny glasses, he had dined so well.

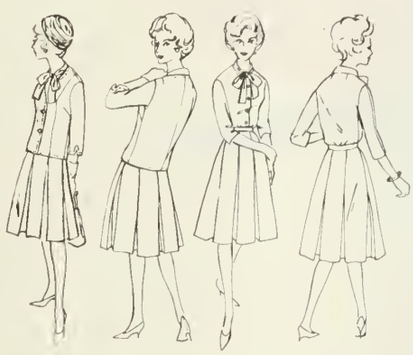
She glanced at her wrist, remembered that she no longer had a watch, and looked at the river, estimating the seasonal angle of light on the opposite shore. Still too early to walk the short distance to the Lampeys', who, much as they adored her company, still preferred their guests to arrive, sharply gala, at eight. And these days Arietta aimed to please, had in fact aimed so steadily these past months and so far from her usual haunts, the shabby Saturday-night parties of the real denizens of these hills, that it was no wonder if the latter were already remarking how unexpected it was of Arietta—slated, one would have said, for years yet to the memory of Carolingus—to be openly hunting a husband. How surprised they would be if they knew that all she was hunting was a job. A job, to be sure, for a Minot—a sinecure not for sloth but for the spirit. With, of course, perquisites enough to feed a healthy nine-year-old boy.

She rose and went to the mantel, staring up at Yves—one maigre looking at another. She was four velvet ribbons removed from him, and—except for Roger, who would be nothing for years yet—the last hope of the line. If from his vantage point he could have approved the resemblance, would he have expected her, a female, nevertheless to do something in his line? Being female, what she had done was, twelve years ago, to marry Carolingus Fay. After Vassar had come a year in Italy with one of her two most intimate school friends; the girl had married there, and Arietta, after attending her in a horsehair hat, had returned home. Next, the second girl, married to an Englishman who farmed in Nigeria, had invited her there. Against her father's wishes—it was not cautious for a woman to become too rootless—she had gone, and in her lightsome way had enjoyed it; but marooned there, she had missed much of the war and most of the eligible men. Returning home, with her laugh lines baked deeper than they should have been for her age, and with some knowledge of cacao and palm oil added to the magpie lore of her clan, she had vegetated in the Hudson Valley for a few restless months—her father's profession so seldom left him home to be cooked for—and then had gone to Baltimore to visit an old cousin.

And there she had met Carolingus. Eighteen years older than she, he had still seemed a man whom many might be glad to marry—a very fine beefy with proconsular manners and profile, and all his curls. Actually he had been a cliché, poor dear Carolingus—old Baltimore French, old poor, old hat—and he had been very glad to marry her. For by heredity, and unfortunately nothing else, he was a patron—an even sadder case than hers. They had recognized each other, or loved—in time it seemed the same thing—at once. The only way he could afford to retain her was to come live in her house, which he did, to her father's delight—their mutual recognition, too, was a touching affair. Carolingus had been too shy to dine out (he had only the dispensing talent), and in time, with her and her father's full acquiescence, the house and what it held might have been taken by any casual guest to be his. At eighty her father retired, and the two men could not have been happier, jogging along in a life of aristocratic pattern gone native, shooting over their two acres for rabbit instead of fox, and serving up the game with an excellent dandelion wine. And in their contentment Arietta had been happy too. Even when Carolingus had not long survived her father, she could not avoid thinking that he was better so, just as she could not help seeing, as the long, curlicued, taupe coffin went down the front steps, that it looked exactly like the éclairs of which he had always been so fond.

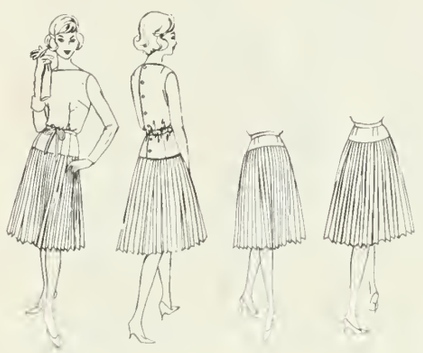
And then, of course, it had become her turn—to dine out. She had let no one know her real situation: she would have been plied with all that was usually offered an untrained widow—"rent your lovely rooms to teachers; become a nursery-school aide"—all the genteel solutions that would trap her forever. No, she was still child enough of her race to risk all on its chimera: that somewhere there was a post where one might exercise an airy, impalpable training that could never be put down on any résumé, somewhere even in this taxable world.

These last months she had been looking about her in the valley, among people like the Lampeys, whose kindness had the practicality that went with money still fresh in the till. Tonight, for instance, they were having her in to meet a Miss Bissle, from Delaware, who was devoting to a state-wide program of hedge roses and bird sanctuaries her one-twenty-fifth share in a great-grandfather's fortune in explosives, and whose secretary-companion had just died. The Lampeys, drawing Arietta out for Miss Bissle's benefit, would no doubt ask her to repeat the story they loved, about the time a zebra, a real zebra, had appeared in her garden, although she had other anecdotes she herself preferred. A humanist, she liked stories about people, and the zebra one was bad art besides, having no ending really, and an explanation that was sadly mundane. She would much rather tell about Claude and Henry Clay, about one of the Great Compromiser's compromises that had never reached the historians. Or about Louis' patron, a



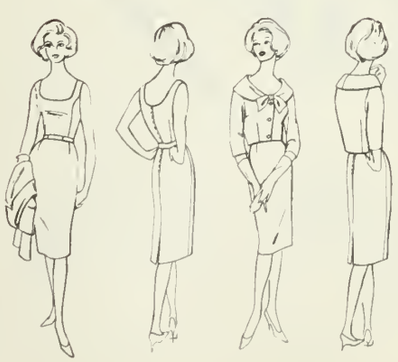
THE JOURNAL'S
GEM OF A WARDROBE

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 90 AND 91



VOGUE DESIGN NO. 4148.

Coat; 10–18 (31–38); $1.50. Version shown requires 1⅝ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.



VOGUE DESIGN NO. 4141.

Suit and blouse; 10–18 (31–38); $2.00. Version shown requires 3½ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for suit and 2 yards of 39″ fabric without nap for blouse, size 14.

VOGUE DESIGN NO. 5079.

Two-piece dress; 10–16 (31–36); $1.00. Version shown requires 3⅜ yards of 54″ fabric with or without nap, size 14.

VOGUE DESIGN NO. 4149.

One-piece dress and jacket; 10–18 (31–38); $1.50. Version shown requires 4 yards of 45″ fabric with nap, size 14.

philanthropist who gave in kind only, and who, on being approached at his door by a panhandler who wanted money for a glass eye, was able to invite him into a cabinet de travail where he had a box of them. But considering the roses and birds, possibly the zebra was more in line.

Meanwhile, a few minutes away, the Lampeys and their house guests, Miss Bissle and her second cousin Robert, were speaking of Arietta. Parker and Helen Lampey, a white-haired couple in their sixties, had started life together at Christian College, Missouri, but long since, owing to Parker's rise to the extreme altitudes of international law, had accustomed themselves to the ponderous social mixture to be found there—Swiss bankers, German industrialists, American judge advocates and solid rich like the Bissles. Thirty years of moving intercontinentally had not made them raffish—so far as was known, they had never felt an expatriate tingle. What it had done was to give them the eternally pink-cheeked, good-tempered look of summer people; they had, in fact, been summer people all over the world. By native standards they should have been suffering by now from all the ills of cosmopolitan riches and ease; actually money, comfort and change had kept them amiable, enabling them to be as kindly as they looked, though considerably more worldly.

Parker held several directorships adjacent to Robert, whose share in the family fortune was much larger than Miss Bissle's, and it was through him they had heard of her needs. And had at once thought of Arietta.

"I made Robert come with me," said Miss Bissle, "because Mary Thrace—the last one, you know—drank." She was a large, gray pachyderm of a woman whose eyes blinked slowly. "And I don't at all. You would think that would make it easier to notice in others, wouldn't you? But it doesn't. So I brought Robert."

"Well, I do," said her cousin, looking his drink through the lower half of his bif ls. "Steadily. So you did just right."

Parker smiled. He knew Robert, a et abstemious sort, widowed early and chil ss, devoted to rather sec philanthropies ce. One of those mild, almost expunged me for whom second- or third-generation fo ne was a conscience, not a release.

"Why do men always make themselve ou more colorful than they are?" said iss Bissle, to whom Robert, past fifty, was younger cousin.

Helen Lampey glanced at Miss Bi e's shoes, the flat, self-assured feet of a wo an who would never know why. Her c sin looked the way most people who wore g ses like that did—round and tame.

"Is this Mrs. Fay outdoorsy?" said Bissle. "Mary Thrace wasn't."

"I don't know that one thinks of h as 'out' or 'in,'" said Helen slowly. "What uld you say, Parker?"

"Delightful either place. In Arietta's m pany, where you are always seems just ere you want to be. The father was just the s e."

Helen could see Miss Bissle thinking hat this was not the way one got things done. She had a year in Africa," she said hastil "I should think one would have to be . . ut doorsy there. And of course she grew up ght here in the Hudson Valley—why, they c gho a copperhead on their place only last y r.

"Still has the old place. Old family re-abouts, the Minots," said Parker, risi to replenish the drinks.

"Minot!" Robert said softly. "Dic yo say . . . Minot?"

"Yes; ever know any of them? Unde nd they were quite a family at one time." usy with the drinks, he did not note Robert' ack of response, covered by Miss Bissle.

"Trigonocephalus contortrix," she ads. "They don't eat birds."

Robert sat back in his chair. Yes, I k w a Minot, he thought. I knew Victor. Pr bly isn't the same family; chances are it could be. Still, what Lampey had just said abo the woman they were expecting . . . that wa just the way Victor had been, turning life ros and immediate wherever he was, and for a lts, too, as could be seen in the aureole that ent round a room with him—not merel for Robert, the small boy on whom he had ca-sionally shone his great face, fair, ho and flame-colored as Falstaff's sun. Looking ack on Victor now from the modern distan , it seemed to Robert that he must have dr ned him—that day on the Brandywine for ins ce, 1912 it must have been, when Victor had ken him fishing, the same day he had insist on letting Robert join the men lunchi at Robert's grandfather's table before the ock-holders' meeting, and had fed the boy ine. Robert could see him now, jutting e a Rubens from even that portly grou the starched ears of the napkin he had tied a und his cravat shining blue in the water lig re-flected from walls that were white inst d of walnut because of his choice, the ri kin flecked, as lunch went on, with sauces ctor had conspired with the cook, the heavy om-pany tasting him with the same neglige ap-preciation they gave the food, as now an hea he sent a sally rolling down the table e a prism, or bent over Robert, saying, "A tle more claret with the water, Robert? . . And now, if you please—a little more wat with the claret."

After lunch, Robert had seen him gi his grandfather a sheaf of papers, saying, "Here they are, Bi—Robert and I are going ou fter turtle."

As they left, one of the men said, "Bi, here do you get your cigars?"—it was Victo who had started people calling Robert's and father "Bi."

"Victor gets them for me in Philadel ia," his grandfather said.

One could imagine two important me murmuring of a third, as in another conte they might mention that his chef was the eat-nephew of Brillat-Savarin, "Lucky ma has a Minot."

And that afternoon on the dock, ung over the lines that the caramel-colore Ne-groes in the shack behind them had lent em en a time he had remembered always, ecurrent dream—a day on which abso- nothing had happened except sun, and the lax blush of the wine in his And Victor, doing nothing all after- xcept what he did everywhere, making el that whatever you and he were doing moment was "it," that where you were ere." They had caught, Robert recalled, rtles; he remembered being warned of oite, and informed, lovingly, of their tor," he had asked suddenly, "what u in?" meaning chemicals, cotton, tin, ing the way men in those days, at that ad spoken of what they did.

, I'm not 'in,'" had been the laughing . "You might say I'm . . . with." ing hard, Victor had been peering in at nper that held the turtles.
ert had looked down at him. "So shall I : had said.
, no you won't. You're already stuck like these chaps. You're already in." had risen, puffing. "Best you'll be able s to have somebody around like me— does."
ert had considered. "I'll have you, then, y," he had said.
or's face had been in shadow, the sun

CONSTABLE PAINTING

By SARA KING CARLETON

wn through the early sunset bright Vagons with their abundant crop
y in the amber evening light, Dragging and turning, go and stop.

ading on coarse-mown meadow grass, he lovers linger hand in hand watch the lurching hayrick pass hrough an enchanted autumn land.

him, but after more than forty years could still sense in him the unnamable that had sent him fishing in his "M-m-m. If your father doesn't get to t," he said.
Robert's father had got to him first, ictor's old age, he had got to Victor. ard man but a dull one, of the powerful eed, that cherished its dullness for its and meant to impose that, along with of its worldly goods, on its sons.
e that brew we had at lunch?" Victor d, as they trotted the hamper along the "And well you might," he said, men- a name, a year. "Pity I've only daugh- e sighed. "Women've no palate. Per- ills it."
e them, atop the green dunes of lawn ept to the water's edge, a small figure at them, his grandfather, guests sped, ing the veranda alone.
I have one, d'ya think?" asked n-m, can't tell yet."

rt considered. His grandfather, color- quiet, seemed to him much like his who drank only Saratoga water. "Does ?" said with interest.
r smiled, waving back. "He's got me," dfather was like me really, not like thought Robert, returning to the ys', where conversation, as so often ed elsewhere, had rippled on without e was a dull man, too, as I am, but like the different and often painful dimen- not valuing it, of knowing that some- sometimes in the same room, conversa- nkled past him like a prism, a rosier life went by. Grandfather was like me. But grandfather had Victor.

And looking at the door through which Emily's possibility was to come, telling himself that it was midsummer madness—of Victor's daughters, one was dead and the other last heard of years ago in a nursing order in Louisiana—he still told himself that he would not be surprised if the woman who came through the door were to be huge and serenely fair, a great Flemish barmaid of a woman, with Victor's florid curls.

When Arietta walked through the door, he was surprised—at the depth of his disappointment. For what he saw was a slight woman, almost tiny, whose hair, sugared now like preserved ginger, might once, at youth's best, have been russet, a small creature whose oddly tweaked face—one of those pulled noses, cheeks that looked as if each held the secret cherry of some joke—was the farthest possible from the classic sun face he remembered. Even if she were some relation, she was nothing like. There was no point in asking, in opening a private memory to future rakings over whenever he paid a duty call on Emily. For what he was looking at, he reminded himself, all he was looking at was Emily's future companion.

As the evening progressed, he was not so sure. For the Lampeys' protégée remained dumb. From their baffled glances he judged that this was not usual; he himself would have guessed that Mrs. Fay's ordinary manner, if she had any, was more mobile. But for whatever reason, her eyes remained veiled, her hands folded in the lap of her pale, somewhat archaic skirt. A certain stubborn aura spread from her, but nothing else, certainly nothing of the subtle emanation they had been promised, and but rarely a word. Only Emily, impervious to this as she was to so much, noticed nothing, intent on numbering the occasional sips Mrs. Fay took of her wine.

Nor could Arietta have explained. She could have said only that almost at once she had felt Miss Bissle to be a person she could never admire. Or tell the truth to, the truth about Miss Bissle being what it was. Not because Miss Bissle was dull—the best patrons necessarily had almost as much dullness as money—but that she did not suffer from it, whereas the real patrons, all the great ones, had a sweetening tremor of self-doubt at the core. If dullness was what had made them keep Minots, then this human (and useful) sweetening was what had made Minots keep them. But I must, thought Arietta. Roger, she said to herself. $126.35. Nevertheless, when Parker deftly introduced Nigeria, on which he had often heard her entertain, she heard herself furnish him three sentences on the cultivation of the cocoa nib, and fall still. It must be stage fright, her first professional engagement. Her father should have told her that the artist's very piety and scruples were a considerable hindrance when the artist came down to dining out. In desperation she gulped the rest of her wine. Opposite her Miss Bissle blinked slowly at Robert, as if to say, I count on you.

"Arietta!" said Helen Lampey. It was half command, half plea. "Do tell us the story about your zebra."

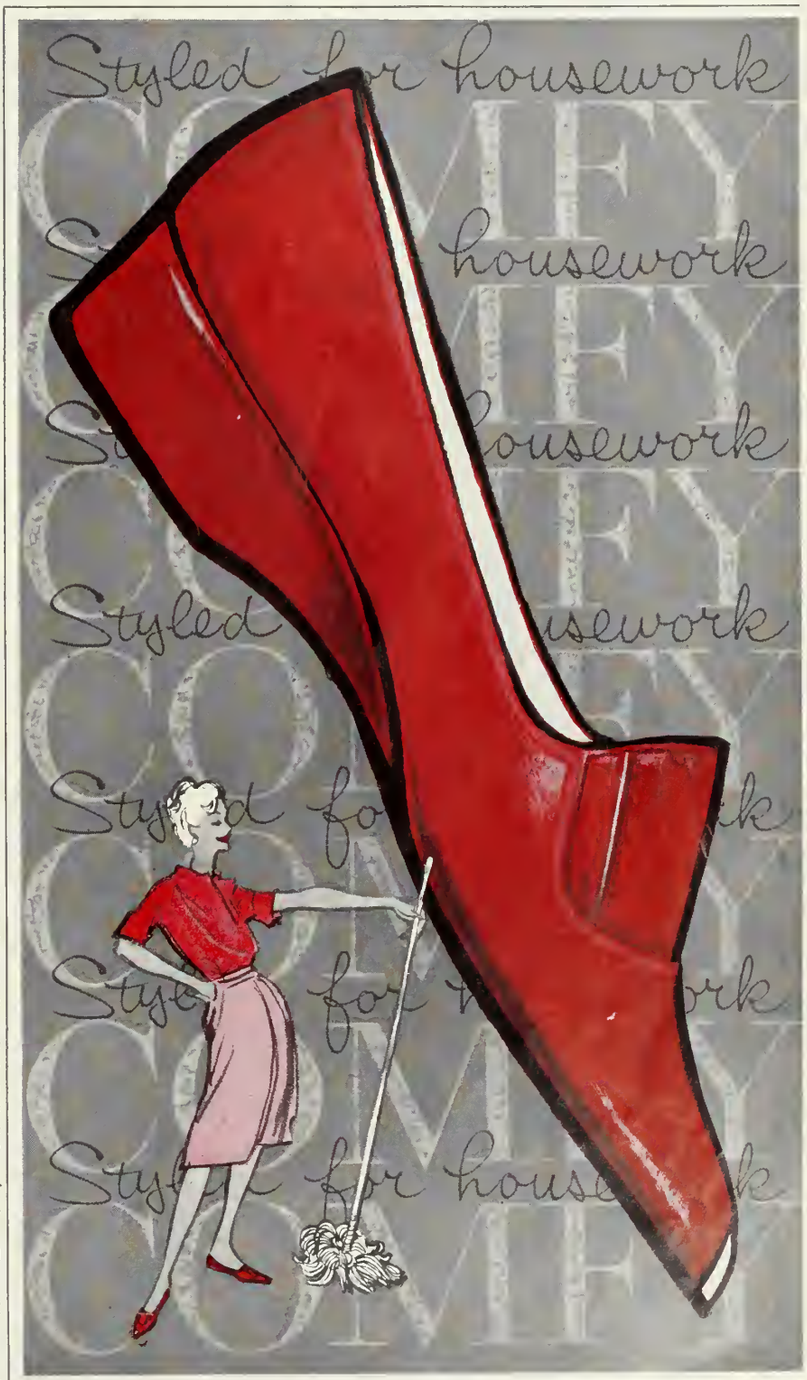
"Zebra?" said Robert. "Have you hunted them, Mrs. Fay?"

"No." Mrs. Fay addressed her small, clenched hands. "That's equatorial Africa." She heard Helen sigh. "Have you?"

Now, what none of them, what no one knew about Robert Bissle was that once in a while, under certain conditions, he lied. Not on the Exchange, of course, or in any real situation. It was his only valve, his sole vice, and it escaped him, with the wistful sound of steam from an air-locked radiator, only when, as tonight, he deemed himself in the safe company of those even duller than he. He leaned back—on these occasions he always did. "Zebras are very beautiful creatures. I never molested them save to procure specimens for the museums, or food for the porters, who like their rather rank flesh.

Mrs. Fay, for almost the first time, raised her eyes and looked closely at him. "Yes?" she said. Her nose, he observed, moved with speech. "Do go on."

"The hartebeest," he said slowly. "Coke's hartebeest—known locally by the Swahili name of kongoni—were at least as plentiful and almost as tame."



"Why, Robert!" said Miss Bissle. "I never knew you were in Africa."

"Oh, yes," he said, still looking at his neighbor, in whose odd face—he had not noticed until now—all the lines went up. "One year when your back was turned." He plunged on. "A few months before my arrival, a mixed herd of zebra and hartebeest rushed through the streets of Nairobi, several being killed by the inhabitants, and one of the victims falling just outside the Episcopal church."

"Handy," said Helen Lampey, in spite of having been informed the Episcopal was Miss Bissle's own. She was watching Arietta and Robert, Arietta smiling her pawkiest smile at him, and saying, "Yes, yes, do go on."

Robert took off his glasses. No, there was no resemblance, not even if he imagined a napkin tied round her neck, although for a moment there he had almost fancied an echo saying "and now, a little more claret." He shook his head. The company, whatever it was, was not so safe as he had thought. "Your turn," he said. "Your zebra."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

Patio . . . supports you in the comfort to which you want to become accustomed. Supple leather in red, dark blue, panama, black. AA, B and E widths. 8.00, slightly higher west of the Rockies.

DANIEL GREEN

IF YOU CANNOT FIND THIS COMFY® SLIPPER IN YOUR LOCAL STORE, WRITE: DANIEL GREEN COMPANY, DOLGEVILLE, NEW YORK

Another treat with . . .
America's top-selling pudding

BANANA CREAM PIE

Mix contents of one package vanilla pudding and pie filling with 2 cups milk. Stir over medium heat until mixture comes to a full boil. Remove from heat. Cool 5 min., stirring once or twice. Now combine 1 1/4 cups fine vanilla wafer crumbs, 1 tbs. sugar. Add 1/4 cup softened butter. Mix well. Press into 9-inch pie pan. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) 5 to 8 minutes. Alternately layer 2 sliced bananas with pudding in pie shell. Chill. Garnish with 1 cup whipped cream or 1 cup whipped topping (Dream Whip). Prepare yourself for heroine worship. (This package makes very impressive puddings, too.)

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Jell-O and Dream Whip are trade-marks of General Foods Corp.

You did it...

(so easy, too!)

INUED FROM PAGE 121

etta unfolded her hands. They trembled ly. Miss Bissle's cousin, and even richer, ad heard—and even more. One of the reed, she was sure of it—and she had t missed him. "My zebra?" she said.
e was ——" She had been about to say " But one let people see one knew the about them only after one had won —sometimes long after. And particularly people. "Mine was—here," she said.
t here in the Hudson Valley. In our n."
help me it was," said Parker. "I saw it.
, Arietta."
she did. It had been a Saturday morning, id, and she had been sitting in her bath, Roger, seven then, had knocked at her and said there were policemen in the n and she had called back, "Tell . . . . Just when Senator McCarthy was so busy, too, wasn't it confident of me?"
tes later, Roger had knocked again and "Mum, there's a zebra in the garden," e had replied, "Tell daddy. . . . Now," rietta, "Roger is not a fey child. I should known." She knew every periphrasis of tory, every calculated inflection and this was the point where everyone s began to smile expectantly, and paus-he saw that they had. "I've never been o afford to disbelieve him since." For Carolingus had come up the stairs. "He d," said Mrs. Fay, delaying softly, ex-, "well—like a man who has just seen a in his garden." As, according to him, he She went downstairs—and so had he.
ade them see the scene just as she had,

"The most exhausting thing in life is to be insincere."
ANNE MORROW LINDBERGH

o policemen, Mack Sennett characters of them, yelling "Stand back there!"
a point well behind Carolingus, and cornered in a cul-de-sac near the carhouse, flashing and snorting, the zebra, led in the rhododendrons like a beast out douanier Rousseau.
"The policemen," she said, "had had no fast, so there I found myself, carrying a ith sugar and cream and my best coffee-—luckily I had baked on Friday—to two men and a zebra, in a back yard twenty-miles from New York." She rose, circled oom, holding the scene with her hands d tightly together, and, as if absentdly, poured Parker some coffee out of Lampeys' silver pot. Outside, in the eys' garden, a barn owl hooted—it was mosphere, conspiring gently with her as She waited. At this point someone s asked "But how?"
t, how?" said Miss Bissle.
h, now," said Mrs. Fay, "I have to e back. I have to tell you that across us, in one of those very modern houses the kitchen set just under the crown of ad, the family gets up very early. They n, and the mother-in-law is a past presiof the Audubon Society of Atlanta, gia." Still circling the room, a diseuse fabricating her own spotlight, Mrs. Fay one hand, a brief wand, on Miss
's shoulder as she passed her. Robert ed, enthralled. There was nothing to it, e held them—they sat like marionettes she awakened slowly to a mild, quiz-sensation like the pleasure-pain in a ng foot. "And at about six o'clock that ing, the head of the county police picked phone and heard a cultivated Southern say, 'Ah should like to repo't that jus' as we wuh setten at breakfas', we saw a payss bah on the Rivuh Road.'" r laughed, and Mrs. Fay picked it up, him in quickly. "Ah, yes," she said, you hear her? And the chief thought nself that the River Road is rather the nian part of his parish, and that Satur-orning comes—well, after Friday night.
calls our policeman and says, 'George, people down your neck of the woods seeing zebras.' George decides to wait until, well, two or more people see it. Then Joe Zucca, the old caretaker at Fagan's, telephones, babbling that a striped horse is crashing around his conservatory. And the chase is on. And they bring it to bay in our garden."

Parker guffawed. "'There are zebras at the bottom of my garden.'"

Arietta, reaching her own chair, sat down in it. Someone always said that too. She looked round at their faces. Yes, she had them, particularly one. Quickly, quickly now, wind it up. And in a long, virtuoso breath she wound it all up—how the village had filled the yard, a gold mine if she'd just had the lollipop concession, how her smart-aleck neighbor had stopped by the front gate, offering a drive to town, and when she'd said, "Wait a bit, Tom, we've got a zebra in the back yard," had smirked and said, "Yeah, I heard that one at Armando's—and the horse said, 'I've been trying to get it to take its pajamas off all night.'" And how it had been one of the great satisfactions in life to be able to lead him round to the carriage house. And how the cops had finally got hold of the Hudson River Cowboys Association—yes, there was one, those kids in white-satin chaps and ten-gallon hats who always rode palominos in the Independence Day parade—and how they'd come, out of costume, alas, but with their horse trailer, and how Carolingus and the cops had finally jockeyed the beast in, using a three-man lasso. And how, at the height of it—children screaming, yokels gaping, three heated men hanging on ropes, the whole garden spiraling like a circus suddenly descended from the sky, and in the center, the striped, incredible—how Arietta's eighty-five-year-old Cousin Beck from Port Washington, a once-a-year and always unheralded visitor, had steamed up the driveway in her ancient limousine, into the center of it all. "Oh, Cousine Beck," she'd stammered—in French, she never knew why—"you find us a little en déshabillé, we have us un zèbre." And how Beck, taking one look, had eased her old limbs out of the car and grunted, "Arietta, you are dependable. Just bring me a chair."

Mrs. Fay folded her hands. Now someone would ask the other question. She gave a sigh. Next to her, her neighbor marveled. No, she was nothing like—no aureole. This one whisked herself in and out, like a conjurer's pocket handkerchief. But the effect was the same. Small sensations, usually ignored, made themselves known, were piped like a brigade of mice from their holes. There was a confused keenness in the ear . . . nose . . . air? One saw the draperies, peach-fleshed velours, and waited for their smell. The chandelier tinkled, an owl hooted, and a man could hear his own breath. The present, drawn from all its crevices, was here.

"But where did the beast come from?" said Miss Bissle.

Yes, it would be she, thought Arietta. The cousin, his glasses still off, was staring at her with eyes that were bright and vague. "A runaway," she said in a cross voice. It always made her sulky to have to end the fun this way, with no punch line but fact. "There's an animal importer up the mountain; we found out later. He buys them for zoos." She turned to the cousin. "Perhaps it was one of yours."

"I can't think when, Robert," said Miss Bissle. "I've always known exactly where you were."

Robert, before he replaced his glasses, had a vague impression that Mrs. Fay looked guilty, but she spoke so quickly that he must have been wrong.

"Parker," she said, "did you and Helen ever hear about Great-Grandfather Claude and Mr. Henry Clay?"

They hadn't. Nor had they heard about Louis' patron's glass eye. Robert, saved, sank deeper in his chair. He was his father's son, after all, trained to fear the sycophant, and he brooded now on whether Mrs. Fay wanted something of him. Look how she had got round the Lampeys. Was she honest? Victor's tonic honesty, he remembered, had spared no one; he never flattered individually but merely opened to dullards the gross, fine flattery of life alone. And what did he, Robert, one coffeemaker serves all your guests

...and brews top flavor automatically, too!

West Bend

12 to 30 cup
AUTOMATIC "PARTY PERK"

Now you can serve all your guests with one automatic coffeemaker without last-minute confusion. West Bend's party perk makes 12 to 30 cups of full-bodied coffee, automatically. You can even make coffee before the party . . . the party perk keeps it at perfect serving temperature and full flavor indefinitely. Sparkling aluminum. $24.95.

WEST BEND

AUTOMATIC SKILLET 11" x 11" $17.95
AUTOMATIC GRIDDLE 'N SERVER $20.95
AUTOMATIC "POP-UP" TOASTER $17.95 4-SLICE $24.95
Heat control serves Griddle and Skillet $6.00

At Housewares, Hardware, Gift and Appliance Stores; Prices Slightly Higher in Canada and Hawaii.

WEST BEND ALUMINUM CO., Dept. 67-A, West Bend, Wisconsin

FREE! ORGANIZATIONS: GET A WEST BEND COFFEE PERCOLATOR FREE for selling DeLuxe Christmas Cards . . . 36 boxes — for 30 cup size; 50 boxes — for 55 cup size; 60 boxes — for 75 cup size. It's easy! No money in advance. Send name, address and organization name today for full details and 2 boxes of cards on approval.
HOLIDAY COMPANY, DEPT. J-760 • BEDFORD, VIRGINIA

WHY NOT EARN MORE?

You can easily earn extra money by selling magazine subscriptions in your spare time. Thousands of our representatives made their start by asking for our generous commission offer. No obligation. Address a postal card today!

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
486 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH ANTISEPTIC

Campho-Phenique
(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON MINOR BURNS, CUTS SCRATCHES, ABRASIONS

Quick! Apply Campho-Phenique at once to minor burns from hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam . . . stops pain instantly, promotes rapid healing. The same thing happens when you use it on minor cuts, scratches and abrasions. Campho-Phenique is highly antiseptic. Wonderful for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils; to relieve itching and to guard against infecting insect bites. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

want of her? If he closed his eyes, prisms of laughter floated past him, flick-flack, down the long cloth of another table; he could feel, there and here, the lax blush of the present in his limbs. He relaxed in it, while Arietta told how, when Carolingus spoke for her, her father had said, "You know she has no dot." And how Carolingus had replied, "I've no dough either." And how in after years both always purported amiably to be unsure of who had said which.

And then Robert sat up in his chair. For Arietta was telling the story of the "beefies" and "les maigres."

So that's it, he thought. I knew it, I knew it all the time. And in the recesses of his mind he felt that same rare satisfaction that came to him whenever he was able to add to a small fund he had kept in a downtown savings bank almost since boyhood, money separate from inheritance made by his own acumen, on his own. I recognized her, he thought, and the feeling grew on him, as it had been growing all evening, that in the right company he was not such a dullard after all. He leaned back now and watched her—quiet now after her sally, unobtrusive whenever she chose. It was not wit she pretended to; her materials were as simple as a child's. What was the quality she shared with Victor, born to it as the Bissles were born to money, and that others here felt too? For there was Lampey, murmuring ingenuously into his brandy glass, "Wonderful stuff, this, isn't it?" quite oblivious of the fact that it was his own; and there even was Emily, her broad feet lifted from the floor. Whatever Mrs. Fay did, its effect was as Victor's had been: to peel some secondary skin from the ordinary, making wherever one was—if one was with her—loom like an object under a magnifying glass—large, majestic and there. She made one live in the now as, time out of mind, it seemed, he had once done for himself. But he did not know how she did it. Or whether she did. Watching her rise from her chair, begin to make her adieu, the thought came to him that he would not mind spending a lifetime finding out.

"Let me go with you," he said, standing up. "Let me drive you home."

But Emily had arisen too. "Mrs. Fay," she said, her blinking fluttered, "have you had any experience with birds?"

Arietta smiled between them. How lucky she had recognized him, the real thing, poor dear, even if his sad little blague—out of African Game Trails, of course, old Teddy Roosevelt, on half the bookshelves in Nigeria—was not.

"Do," she said to him, "but let's walk." She turned to Miss Bissle, and let the truth escape from her with gusto. After all, it was her own. "No, not really. Of course—I've shot them."

On the short way home, the river, lapping blandly, made conversation. Robert spoke once. "I don't really think Emily would have suited you," he said, and Mrs. Fay replied that it was nice of him to put it that way.

At Arietta's doorway, they paused. But it was imperative that she find out what was on his mind. Or put something there.

"I'd ask you in," she said, "but I've nothing but dandelion wine."

"I've never had any," said Robert. "I'd like to try it."

She led him through the hall, past the rack where Carolingus' leather jacket hung, and her father's, and the squirrel-skin weskit they had cured for Roger, through the softly ruined downstairs rooms, up the stairs and into the little salon. It was an educative tour; it told him a great deal. And this was the family room; he sensed the intimate patchouli that always clung to the center of a house even before he looked up and saw them above the mantel, hanging on their velvet tree. While Arietta went for the wine, he moved forward to examine them. What a higgler's collection they were, in their grim descent from ivory to pasteboard to box camera, yet there was a firm insouciance from face to face, as if each knew that its small idiom was an indispensable footnote to history, to the Sargents, Laverys, De Lazlos that people like him had at home. And there, in that small brown-tone. Yes, there.

"Take me round the portraits," he said when she returned, and here, too, since she also was on the wall, he learned. He saw that Carolingus must have been of an age near his own.

"And who are they?" he said. "You missed that one." They were sitting at a small escritoire on which she had placed the wine, and if he stretched a hand he could touch the faded brown-tone.

"That's my father as a boy, and his older brother, Victor."

What an absurd feeling happiness was. That must be its name. To feel as if such a sum, such a round sum had been deposited in that bank that he need never go there again. Not if he stayed here. As, in time, he thought, he could arrange.

> We are our own devils; we drive ourselves out of our Edens.
>
> GOETHE

Opposite him, Arietta fingered a drawer inside which the name of the desk's first owner was inscribed—Marie-Claire, who had married for inclination but had got the rose diamonds too. She stole a glance at her vis-à-vis. After all, she had recognized him, and in time, as she did remember this and inclination could come to be almost the same. It was strange that he was no beefy, but she had already had one—and no doubt her tribe, along with the rest of the world, must move on. And he was very responsive. In time, she thought, the house would come to seem to him like his own.

"Wonderful stuff," he was saying, holding up to the light one of the old green bottles into which Carolingus and her father had put the wine.

"Is it really?" said Arietta. "I was never any help to them on it."

"What it wants," he said, "is to be decanted, for the sediment. One does it against a candle flame. I was thinking—I might come by tomorrow. And show you."

"Do—for company," said Mrs. Fay. "...ally, one wine seems to me much lik... other. I've no palate for it. Women don... father always used to say."

"No, they don't." He was looking at ... deeply that she was startled. "Perfume ... it," he said, and so intensely that, odd a... as it was, it hung over them both li... averral of love.

Downstairs, she let him out the front ... and watched him to the end of the ... Roger's spaniel yipped, and over the hi... other dog set up an answering cry. I... darkness, as she closed the door, she s... one of old Teddy's sentences lumb... through her mind: The hunter who w... these lands sees the monstrous river horse ... ing, the snarling leopard and the coiled p... the zebras barking in the moonlight. A... went back up the stairs, she wondered wh... she would ever tell him. Some truths, ... honest companion, one spoke in jest; o... as a woman, one kept to oneself. At the... ment it didn't matter. Standing in the do... of the little salon, she stretched her arms ... dined out! she said to the pictures, to he... I've dined on zebra, and on hartebeest, an... I think on . . . husband. I've dined well.

Outside the hedge at the end of the ... Robert watched the door close. He knew ... how it would begin tomorrow; he would ... by asking her as he had never asked an... to call him "Bi." There would always ... temptation to say more—who, for inst... would understand about that day on ... Brandywine better than she? But he mu... member; with all she was—she was a ... woman. They liked to be chosen for t... selves. He must always be as mindful o... as of his incredible luck. And what utter ... it was! He swelled with the urge to tell s... one about it. But there were not many i... world today who could appreciate pro... its nature. It was even possible that he hi... was the last one extant of all those who ... had. Standing in the shadow of the h... he whispered it to himself, as once a man ... whispered it to his grandfather, over the ... Lucky man, he said, you have a Minot!

OPERATION TERROR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 58

her again and this time his hand slipped up along her leg. Removing his hand, she said tightly, "I thought this was a business deal."

He stared at her, then shrugged. "O.K.—I can wait."

"Wait for what?"

"What do you think?"

A doubt slipped a foot in the door. "You did call me? Asked me to meet you tonight?"

"Say, what're you pulling? It was a pickup and you know it."

She pressed her feet hard against the floor to steady herself. "Please, there's been a mistake. Let me out."

"What goes with you? You give me a come-on and now ——"

"Please—I thought you were someone else."

The enormity of the error overwhelmed her. If the killer had watched her, if he thought this was some kind of clever ruse ——

"Someone you'd never seen? O.K.—so you never saw him. You're lucky. You got me instead of a crumbum. Come on, loosen up, honey, we can have ourselves a time."

She edged toward the door as the traffic signal turned red. He was quicker, swinging an arm about her neck and crushing her to him. She struggled, but his grip was too tight. His hand slipped down inside her dress, and something exploded inside her, blasting every bit of reason and judgment.

Her fist struck him low in the stomach and she heard the sharp gush of wind as she wrenched free. She was opening the door and half falling, half leaping out. She heard him shouting, and people were gathering, and then as she slumped to the ground another car ground its brakes within a few feet of her.

Someone was helping her, a teen-age boy and a man, and she rose unsteadily. She heard questions and she was shaking her head assuring everyone she was all right. Then she remembered and shoved her way through the crowd, not caring whom she pushed or how, but anything to get away, and once she reached the sidewalk, she was running.

Scarcely had the man driven across La Cienega than a Bureau car opened its siren behind him in a low warning wail. He looked about wildly, then started to pull to the curb, but a police car coming up fast on his right blocked him. Lights flashed and sirens shrieked.

"Get out," a voice said, and he stepped numbly into a .38. A Tommy gun came up from one side. He fell back against the car.

"I didn't do nothing. I just picked up this girl I mean—she picked me up. I was walking along and she was standing there, and she gave me the old one-two, you know, and I asked her out to dinner ——"

More cars roared up until Wilshire was blocked. He looked around, eyes widening. "Great Scott, you'd think I was Dillinger. I tell you, I was just taking the girl to dinner."

As Kelly approached the house, she heard the phone. She hurried, her fingers thumbs as she fumbled with the key in the lock. She burst into a house fully lighted. Before going to the Hendrickses, Toby had turned on every light.

"Hello," she said, out of breath.

She had never heard a man so angry. "You little double-crossing ——"

She dropped into the chair by the phone. She had taken all she could tonight. "Shut up and listen to me," she said, surprised by her hardness. "I didn't know the man. I never saw him before in my life. How did I know it wasn't you? I've never seen you either, remember? He picked me up because I was standing around looking as if I wanted to be picked up."

He shouted something, but she talked him down. "If you saw me, why didn't you come out of your hole and get me? You could have done that much. But no, I go to meet you and you let me get picked up like a prostitute."

She ran down at last and heard nothing from his end for a long beat. Then he said, but he was much quieter, "I still think he was a cop."

"That makes a lot of sense, doesn't it?" She hurried on: "I told you I'd work with you. I want my cut."

He waited, thinking it through. "O.K. I'll take your word for it until I find out different. It took me a lot of time to make that setup and now I've got to figure out another one because of some stupid jerk." He continued, "But don't forget—I can sit up on that hill and pick you off with a high-powered rifle any morning you come out. You remember that."

There was a click and the line went dead.

Captain Moreno rode with Rip on the way back. The thin, pale man who had picked up Kelly Sherwood had been released shortly after his identity was established.

As the lights of the Civic Center rose across a black sky Rip said, "Did you know women zip up their skirts on the left side?"

Moreno looked wary. This Rip, he was to be watched.

Rip continued, "No, I mean it. But when Homicide found Nancy Ashton, her skirt was zipped up the right side—and she wore nothing underneath."

"I follow."

"She came out of the bath, did her toenails, and someone bludgeoned her ——"

Moreno picked it up: "—— but he didn't think we'd believe a woman would commit suicide in the nude, and he put a skirt and blouse on her."

Rip nodded. "That might be the reason, or it might be he was someone close to her—father, brother, her husband—and he didn't want her to be found naked. We had a case once where a husband drowned his wife in the bathtub, but before he fled he threw a blanket over her."

At the police building Moreno said on ... ing the car, "I'll look up Popcorn. Migh... something there. 'Night, Rip."

"See you tomorrow, Pancho."

He then took Broadway, the main bus... street, to Sixth and turned west for the ... office.

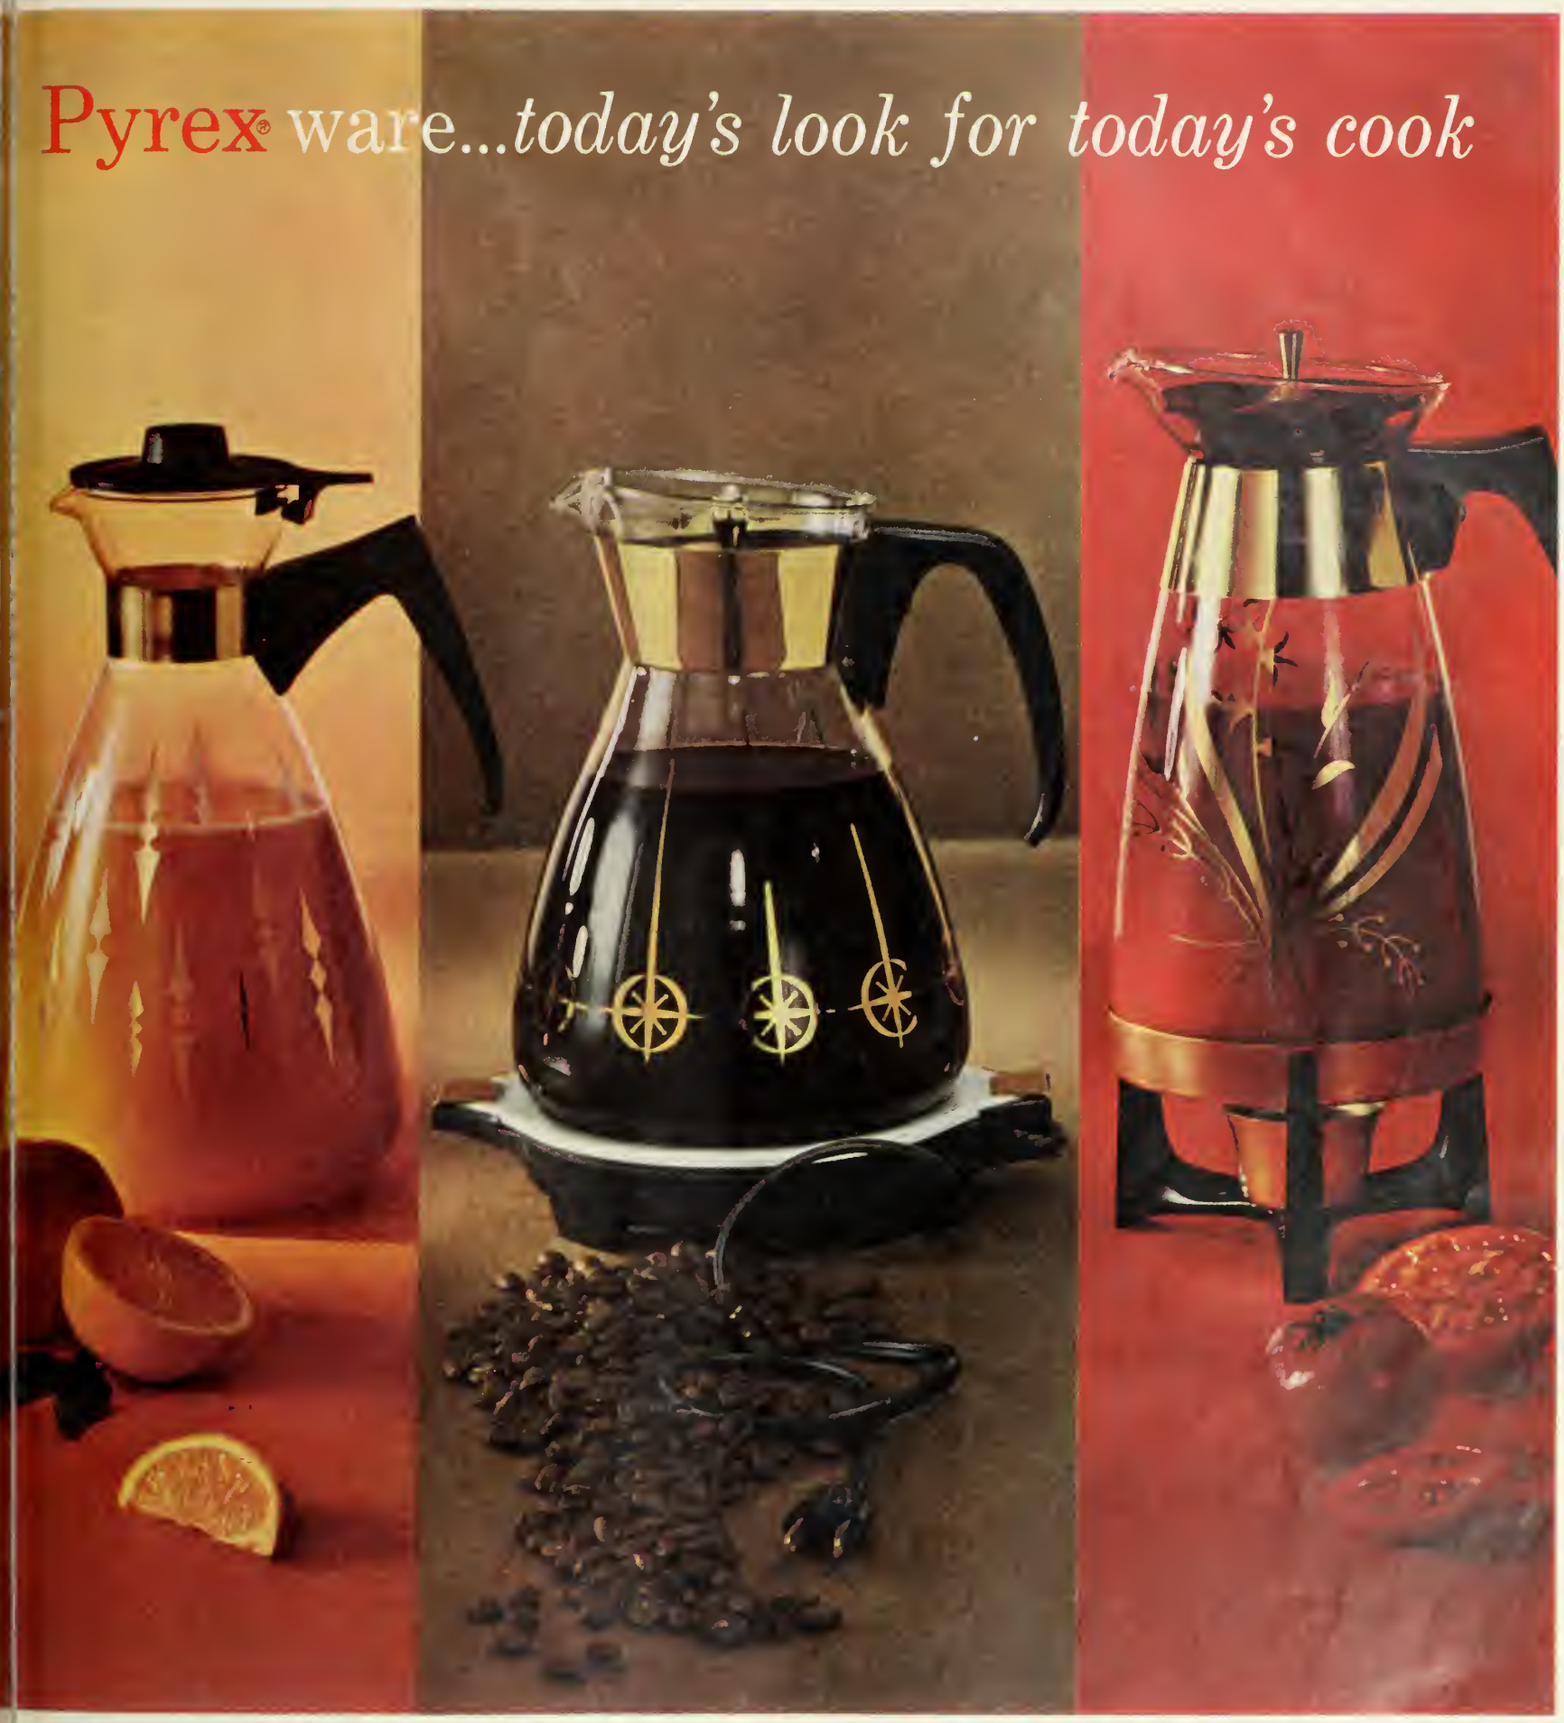
As he walked into the office, Peg was ... ing. Her eyes lighted up.

"What're you doing around so late?" ... asked.

"I'm not going to tell you, if you d... know." She hastened on: "You wouldn't ... derstand, but when a girl invests time in a ... she likes to stick around and make sure o... investment." She backed toward the ... "You're my A.T. and T., Mr. Ripley."

"Wait—I'll run you home."

"Not tonight you won't. On account o... Bureau made an ident on the subject i... Sherwood case. I put the Teletype in ... workbox."



Picking up the Teletype from Washin... Rip felt the old pounding. No matter ... many cases a man worked nor how m... years the excitement of the hunt was n... swallowed by routine. The Teletype read:

SAC LA. RE UNKNOWN SUBJECT BANK ... BERY, VICTIMS: FIRST NATIONAL BANK HO... WOOD, KELLY SHERWOOD, ELOISE SHERW... D. SUBJECT BELIEVED GARLAND HUMPHREY DIL... N ALIAS GAR DILLON, RED DILLON, DILL DIL... N, JAMES MONTEBELLO, JIM CATO AND MURPH... O-WELL. WANTED UNLAWFUL FLIGHT TO A... D PROSECUTION FOR MURDER. COMPLAINT F... D BEFORE U. S. COMMISSIONER, OKLAHOMA CY, 7-16-59, OKLAHOMA CITY OFFICE OF ORI... I.O. 24081 ISSUED 7-20-59.

Washington, Rip learned later, had b... with one lead, the subject's asthma. It had ... thousands of cards on wanted men throu... a classification machine. The cards bore h...

CONTINUED ON PAGE 2...

Pyrex® ware...today's look for today's cook

d or cold, beverages taste best poured from sparkling Pyrex servers because they borrow no flavor, lend no taste! You'll use yours for ving, serving and storing just about everything—orange juice to tomato bouillon, with coffee in between. Above, server with or without a lle warmer, 8 and 12 cup, $2.95 to $4.95; deluxe server, electric warming tray, $9.95; Cinderella carafe, 8 cup, $5.95, 12 cup, $6.95.

'REX® WARE a symbol of modern living, is a product of CORNING research

Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.

Festival Values Housewares Festival

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 124

and slots indicating habit traits, appearance peculiarities, and the like. The machine was set to kick out all the cards "holed" for asthma and tossed out some fifty.

Bureau experts then had set about to study the records on these fifty. Previously the lab had established from the recording tape forwarded by the Los Angeles field office that the subject pronounced an l almost as if it were a w. Hence, the word "life" sounded like "wife."

Eventually, the experts learned from the records that one of these wanted men, Garland Humphrey Dillon, more commonly known as Red Dillon, possessed this speech oddity. The fact had been set forth at the time of an arrest.

Rip continued to read:

SUBJECT FOND OF GOLF, MOVIES, NIGHT CLUBS, AMUSEMENT PARKS, MEXICAN FOOD, RACE TRACKS. HE IS WELL READ AND HAS BEEN REPORTED TO FREQUENT LIBRARIES DAYTIME. HE IS EXPERT MAKEUP ARTIST AND FREQUENTLY CHANGES APPEARANCES. REPORTS INDICATE HE ESTABLISHES LIAISONS WITH WOMEN OF ORIENTAL DESCENT. HE IS EXTREMELY DANGEROUS AND BELIEVED HEAVILY ARMED. EXTREME CARE SHOULD BE EXERCISED IN EFFECTING HIS APPREHENSION.

Rip looked up the I.O., the identification order that was sent out by Washington to the FBI's 53 field divisions on each wanted subject. The I.O. showed a rather handsome man, though without distinguishing features, who wore glasses.

Under "Description," Rip read: Age 38, born November 5, 1921, Nashville, Tennessee (unverified); Height, 5'9"; Weight, 160 to 170; Build, medium, muscular; Hair, brown, receding, thinning; Eyes, gray-blue; Complexion, ruddy; Occupation, salesman, clerk, accountant; Scars and marks: one inch over left eyebrow, crooked little finger on left hand.

Under "Record" were listed convictions for statutory rape, forgery, criminal assault, armed robbery, grand larceny and murder.

The conference began in the SAC's office at 9 A.M. By now the detail working Operation Terror numbered twenty-two agents. Most had worked the night through as the man hunt for the rapist and killer spread swiftly through this city of 2,000,000.

Earlier the SAC had talked with Washington, and now he sketched in briefly the subject's known crimes. At sixteen, in Nashville, he had committed statutory rape on a thirteen-year-old girl, and been placed on probation. The next year, in the same city, he was committed to a juvenile home for check forgery. He was released a year later, and reentered high school, subsequently graduating with honors. He was twenty, and beginning his second year in university, when he held up a bank in Memphis and killed a teller. Caught and convicted of murder, he escaped prison seven years later after slaying a guard. He was thirty when he was arrested under another name for a criminal assault on a seventeen-year-old girl who subsequently lost her mind as a result of the act. He escaped jail before his trial. In July, 1959, he shot down one Bertha Meyers, twenty-four, a bank teller, in her Oklahoma City apartment.

The SAC said, "Investigation failed to reflect that he had had any association with the slain woman. Her friends had never heard of him, and none remembered having seen him when shown his picture. Since the slain woman was a bank teller, it might be reasonable to assume that the subject was trying to force her to work with him in a crime similar to the one he is attempting to perpetrate here, and when she refused he murdered her."

After the conference broke up, Rip assigned leads. Agents would cover golf courses, amusement parks, night clubs, libraries and bookstores, Mexican restaurants, the principal movie houses and race tracks.

In addition, the field office would send out wanted notices to all physicians, on the possibility the subject might call on one for treatment for asthma, and to opticians and optometrists on the possibility that he might need new glasses.

Rip kept for himself and for Bradley the lead suggested by the Bureau Teletype to determine if the subject were dating any girls of Oriental descent.

Before they left for the Chinese and Japanese areas, Rip placed two phone calls. One was to Kelly Sherwood at the bank. He had sent over the subject's picture with one of the agents on the bank surveillance.

She said now, "I see so many people. I may have seen him somewhere, but I don't remember him."

He arranged to meet her at four. He thought to ask, "How's Toby?"

The lilt came back in her voice. "She's in love with you; did you know that?"

He laughed. "I am with her too."

He let her chat a little as her old self revived. It was miraculous what a laugh could do.

His second call was to Captain Moreno, who reported no developments in the death of Nancy Ashton. Moreno said, "I'm going to get my face slapped because of you. I've been looking at women's skirts, and they do zip up the left side, like you said."

By noon, Rip and Bradley had covered Chinatown, and after lunch they moved into Little Tokyo on East First Street.

They stopped at a judo school, the Nisei Trading Company, the Bank of Tokyo, at the Fuji Drugstore and the Kinema Theater, where Japanese movies were shown with English subtitles. They went into fish markets, and bath and massage places. They talked with a venerable old man who instructed matrons in the ancient art of the tea ceremony.

It was grueling and monotonous work. They were looking for a needle in a haystack. Eventually they found the needle. They turned into a side street that led to an American-Japanese Christian church which in its architecture looked more like a Buddhist shrine. The pastor was effusively polite. "So nice to meet you," he said. "So nice."

He took one quick look at the photo. "You want this man? Yes, sir, I see him. Twice. I came out of church, and he was standing across the street, waiting for one of my members. She got in the car with him. You want her name, of course, and her address. The name, it is Sheri Kimura, and the address, I will find it for you."

As he looked it up, he continued, "I thought nothing of it except that she didn't want her friends to know she was keeping company with a Caucasian."

He copied the address on a scratch pad. "Here it is: 4517 Harker Street. She lives alone in an apartment there."

He had last seen the subject about a month ago. "I'm certain she wouldn't have been with him if she had known who he was. She's a very fine person."

She worked as a cashier at a chain drugstore in downtown Los Angeles. He added, "She is a Eurasian. Her father was Japanese, and her mother, she told me, was Spanish. They're both dead."

At the drugstore, they learned from the manager that she had been employed five years, starting as a salesgirl, and had an excellent record. She had left the store an hour before.

At 4517 Harker Street, they drove slowly past a boxlike two-story apartment building. They located the postal substation, and talked with Sheri Kimura's mailman. He knew her slightly, and nothing against her. "If I've a registered letter for her and the weather's cold, she always asks if I'd like a cup of tea."

He suggested they talk with a neighborhood bank where she had an account. One of the officers knew her quite well, but he had never seen her with the subject. "She's a swell kid," he said. "Oh, she drinks some, if you call that a sin, but she's had a rough time of it. She was married for two, three years but it didn't work out."

Next they stopped in a neighborhood drugstore. From a booth, Rip called his office and a contact at the police department for a run of the indices on her name. Both checks proved negative.

Bradley asked, "What about it?"

They had two alternatives. They could stake out the apartment building on the possibility that eventually Red Dillon would show. They ran two risks with such a stake-out. He might never appear; and if he did, they would have to move in fast to apprehend him without having time to work out a plan. Trapped, he might kill any innocent person who got in his way.

The other alternative was to take Sheri Kimura into their confidence in the hope she could and would inform them of Red Dillon's whereabouts.

"What d'you think?" Bradley asked.

Rip reviewed the situation. "We've checked her out thoroughly—and not one negative report. What d'you say we give it a try?"

Rip parked the car a block away and they walked down a sidewalk where children were riding tricycles and pulling red wagons. Sheri Kimura's mailbox indicated she lived in Apartment 4-B, which was on the second floor.

One moment Rip was knocking, and the next Sheri Kimura stood at the door, breathtaking and exquisite. Her black hair was stacked in the latest fashion, her kimono was banded tightly in the midriff.

Rip identified himself and Bradley, and instantly the curtain was pulled. She asked them in politely, but they felt hostility.

"Please sit down," she said. The furniture was mostly American and the room smart. The prints on the walls were Japanese. Suspended by a thread from the ceiling, a delicate paper dragon with fierce teeth moved with every breath of wind.

"We must ask you to hold this in confidence," Rip began.

"All right." She curled her feet under her in a massive armchair.

"We're told that you know a man named Red Dillon."

She stared at her red toenails, jutting out from sandals.

Rip insisted, "Do you?"

"No," she whispered.

"Maybe you know him as Gar Dillon—James Montebello—Jim Cato?" He handed her the photo.

"No."

Rip continued, "We're looking for him on a murder charge. He killed a woman about your age, who had a year-old baby."

She smoothed out the kimono, not looking up. "I want to talk to my lawyer."

Rip felt the wind knocked out of him. "Of course," he answered quietly.

"I'll phone him."

"We'll wait, if you don't mind."

"Please do."

She passed them, gliding softly to a phone on a nest of carved teakwood tables in one corner. She sat on a matching chair scarcely big enough for a kitten. "Sam," she said, "this is Sheri."

Rip and Bradley exchanged glances. They listened intently, but the voice was too soft and low to carry distinctly.

She watched them as she talked. "I'm fine, thank you. . . . Sam, two men from the FBI are here asking me questions and I think I'd better see you. . . . Could you? . . . All right. . . . All right."

She hung up and turned. "He'll be here in about ten minutes."

She started for the door to the kitchen. "I'll prepare tea—if I may leave the room."

Rip suppressed his mounting irrita[tion]. "This is your home, Miss Kimura. We'[re] guests."

Once she was gone, they both moved a[t the] same moment, seating themselves so the[y had] a view of both the kitchen and the front d[oors.] They sat so they could rise in a simple, [swift] upright movement, as if all they would ha[ve to] do was press a button.

If they had erred, they could not expla[in the] reasons for their course of action to Was[hing]ton. The Bureau tolerated no errors.

She served the tea in silence. "Thank [you,"] Rip said and Bradley echoed him. "What [is the] attorney's name?" Rip asked.

"Sam Sumoto."

They heard then a man's steps on the [hall]way outside. They were slow, contemp[lative] steps, and as soft as a man's weight wou[ld al]low. His knock was the same.

"Hello, Sheri," he said. As she opene[d the] door, a shrewd-looking, smiling Jap[anese-] American of about thirty entered.

As she introduced them, he droppe[d the] smile and assumed a professional mien. "[Mr.] Ripley, Mr. Bradley. You're the first FB[I men] I've met."

Rip and Bradley stepped into the hal[l out]side while he talked with his client.

"I think we just got our tail caught [in a] wringer," Bradley said. "What do you [sup]pose that's all about?"

Rip shook his head, worried. "Sh[e's a] mighty smart number."

A few minutes later Sam Sumoto j[oined] them. "O.K. She knows the guy you're a[sking] about. She swears she's never been inv[olved] with him in any crime and I believe her. [I told] her to co-operate with you."

The way he said it prompted Rip to [ask,] "Will she?"

Sam Sumoto rubbed his neck. "Her r[eason] tells her to, but I don't know about her [mo]tions. She's got a strong attachment fo[r this] guy, I can tell. But she says it isn't anyt[hing] romantic. It's something else with her."

He repeated thoughtfully, "Something e[lse.]" He continued, "But you ask her yourse[lf. I'd] like to sit in if you don't mind."

They went back in. She turned from the [win]dow, and said humbly, "I'm sorry. I was [ter]ribly frightened."

Rip nodded in understanding. "If you'[ll tell] us where we can find Mr. Dillon ——"

She answered tightly, "I don't know [where] he is. I know you don't believe me."

"Would you tell us if you did?" Bradley asked.

"I can't believe he did what you say."

"That isn't what I asked," Bradley [came] back.

"I said I didn't know where he is."

Rip asked, "When did you last see [him,] Miss Kimura?"

"A week ago Saturday. He picked [me] up when I got off work. We had dinner and [went] to a movie and then dancing, and he brought me home about two in the morning."

"You haven't heard from him since?"

"No."

"Are you expecting to hear from him?"

She nodded. "Sometimes he doesn't c[all] for a month or two. He's out of town a great deal."

"Tell us when you met him, where, [and] how long you've known him, all that."

She waited a moment before answering, [her] face a placid mask. "He came into the [drug]store often, and we would talk some. [I] know how it is. He seemed all right, and [I] went out to dinner with him one night about [two] years ago."

"What'd you think he did?"

"He said he was in finance, but I didn't [ask] him any questions. You ask what a man [does] and he bores you the rest of the evening [talk]ing you."

Rip smiled, and she relaxed a little. [He] talked along quietly, asking myriad questions, seeking to draw out details. She continued courteous but skillfully evasive.

At last Rip said, "I'll be frank, Miss [Ki]mura. I've a feeling you're hostile to us, [and] I don't know why. You say your relationship with this man was very casual, that you saw

CONTINUED ON PAGE 12

THE POTENTIAL

By DILYS LAING

If it has a human face and is in human form confined it well may have a human heart, it well may have a human mind.
Love and help it if you can:
it yet may learn to be a man.

HOUSEWARES Festival Values

Housewares Festival

How to win at housekeeping (without cheating)

keep your home BISSELL clean!

start now...during BISSELL "clean n' save" time

YOU GET CLEAN SAVINGS OF $3.00 ON THESE BISSELL CARPET SWEEPERS...Cut Heavy Vacuuming Time In Half!

THE GRAND RAPIDS
Large, twin dustpans. Black, turquoise or green with chrome trim. NOW...$13.95 (formerly $16.95)

THE CAPRI
Top opening dust door. In coral, black, ivory, powder blue with satin aluminum. NOW...$11.95 (formerly $14.95)

THE FLIGHT
Oversize vinyl bumper and twin dustpans. Red or green with matching handle. NOW...$9.95 (formerly $12.95)

YOU GET $2.00 OFF ON THESE OTHER CARPET SWEEPERS!

The Mercury...NOW $8.95 (formerly $10.95)

The Reliance...NOW $7.95 (formerly $9.95)

SPECIAL PRICES ON CARPET SWEEPERS GOOD ONLY UNTIL NOVEMBER 1, 1960

Save now to keep your home BISSELL® clean

NOW...BISSELL AUTOMATIC SHAMPOO MASTER NO. 231 ONLY $9.95

Automatic Shampoo Master Kit No. 230
Carry home carton with Automatic Shampoo Master and 22 oz. Bissell Rug Shampoo. NOW only $11.95

YOU GET CLEAN SAVINGS OF $14.95 ON THE NEW BISSELLECTRIC 2-IN-1 COMBINATION

World's first appliance for all floor cleaning! It's a vacuum...It's a floor washer too! Converts to Scrub Master or Sweep Master with snap-on power unit.
NOW...$59.95 —you save $14.95

SCRUB MASTER
Wets, scrubs and dries bare floors! Complete with 22 oz. Bissell Scuff N' Wax Remover. $39.95

SWEEP MASTER
Vacuum cleans rugs andcarpets—sweeps bare floors! complete with bare floor attachment. $34.95

Rug and Upholstery Cleaning Kit No. 239
Automatic Shampoo Master, 22 oz. rug shampoo, 12 oz. upholstery shampoo, Upholstery Master applicator. NOW only $13.95 (Not Shown)

BISSELL® Inc.
Grand Rapids, Michigan

USE-TESTED by McCall's
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
COMMENDED by PARENTS' MAGAZINE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

only once or twice a month, and surely you wouldn't hold any brief for him. Your pastor says ——"

"I've told you everything I know."

Rip changed tack. "How many bedrooms do you have here, Miss Kimura?"

She was puzzled. "Two."

He continued, "We'd like your permission for two agents to stay in one—day and night—and we'll put a woman in with you."

"For my protection—or the agents'?"

Sam Sumoto broke in. "Sheri, please ——"

"I'm sorry. I'm—I'm terribly upset."

"You can refuse, of course," Rip said. "As a law-enforcement agency, we ask the co-operation of citizens in helping us apprehend parties charged with crimes, but we never insist. I want you to know that you have every legal right to refuse my request. I'm hoping you won't, though. This man assaulted a girl who's in a mental hospital. He has killed three people—a prison guard and a bank teller besides the woman I mentioned. He'll go on raping and killing, Miss Kimura, until we find him."

She nodded. "It's all right, of course. I wasn't thinking."

They left with Sam Sumoto, parting with him at the corner. "If there's anything I can do, give me a ring," he said.

From a drugstore phone booth, Rip called the General-desk supervisor, filled him in with the skeleton facts, and asked for two agents to take up the vigil. He obtained the supervisor's approval, too, to request the police department to assign a policewoman to Miss Kimura's apartment.

An hour later, Policewoman Lily Taguchi arrived. She was a Japanese-American herself, twenty-four, slender and attractive. They held their conference in a Bureau car a block away.

"Thanks for coming," Rip said.

"I wouldn't have missed it for anything," she answered, smiling. "I've never worked with the FBI before."

"You may get pretty bored. We just want you to stay in the apartment when Miss Kimura is there. We don't want you to ask her any questions or try to learn anything. We thought if you'd act like you actually were a girl friend who had come to spend a few nights ——"

"That should be easy."

Rip continued, "We've worked it out so I don't believe you'll be in any danger. But you never know in these situations."

"Don't worry about me. I understand. My father was a night watchman. He died walking down an alley one night. Just walking down an alley."

At 3:40 Mr. Welk stepped up to her window. "Miss Sherwood, you have another phone call." He said it in a tone designed to remind her that he would have to speak to her if she continued receiving repeated calls. Only a few minutes before, Mr. Ripley had telephoned, canceling his appointment.

As she walked to the phone, the old pressure mounted step by step, pounding until her head seemed about to burst. All day she had waited for the killer's message which would set up another rendezvous. Every time a strange face moved up before her, she would edge her hand toward the alarm button.

Now Toby's voice came over the phone. "Hi, sis. I just had to call you. You all right?"

"Fine. How about you?"

"You don't sound fine. Has anything ——"

"No, nothing, Toby."

"Louella's asked me over for dinner. Give me a call when you get home, huh?"

"Sure, hon."

"Don't forget. Hang loose and swing easy."

Hang loose and swing easy.

After that, until five, events picked up tempo. She balanced to the penny on the first run, placed an order for $50 in ones, $200 in fives and tens, and $500 in twenties with Mr. Welk, and locked the cash drawer in the vault. One of the bookkeepers asked her about an nsf check (not sufficient funds) that a good customer had presented, and she referred the check to Mr. Burkhardt, who would call the customer as a courtesy.

The atmosphere became surcharged a few minutes before five as purses were collected, faces repaired, covers placed over machines. She was conscious of curious eyes as she and Pete left together.

He took her to Frascati's on the Strip, where the movie people went. They had cheese blintzes. He was his usual ebullient self. He could even laugh when he told her about an attorney who had berated him that afternoon in an escrow matter.

"Expecting someone?" he asked.

She shook her head.

"What's wrong, Kel?"

"You mean I'm not bright-eyed and bushy-tailed?"

"Toby's all right, isn't she?"

"She's fine, thank you."

"You're not sick?" When he got on a point, he rode it.

"Please, Pete, I'm fine. I haven't been sleeping well, that's all."

"Nothing's happened at the bank?" He was inviting confidences, and that was the one thing she couldn't tolerate in others, not even in Toby.

Before she knew what she was saying, she blurted, "For heaven's sake, Pete, stop cross-examining me."

He put his fork down slowly. After a long beat she said, near tears, "I'm sorry, Pete. I'm terribly sorry. But let's talk about something else besides me."

She had to get control of herself. She couldn't go around blowing up.

They had planned to see Ben-Hur, but she pleaded a headache. It sounded spurious. For how many centuries, she wondered, had women used headaches to escape realities?

> Most of us live too near the surface of our abilities, dreading to call upon our deeper resources. It is as if a strong man were to do his work with only one finger.
>
> JOHN CHARLES WYNN

He drove out Sunset, and took the Beverly Glen pass through the Santa Monica Mountains to Sherman Oaks. He was disturbingly quiet. She realized she had ruined the night for both of them

Before her house, he turned off the motor and took her hand. She was conscious the agents would be watching perhaps the neighbors, perhaps even the killer.

He said, "I'm not good at talking, but I'm crazy about you."

His arms slipped about her, and he was holding her tightly, and his warm lips were on her cold ones. She went spinning into space, but the moment spent itself quickly. It was not only her consciousness that they were being watched. It was the other woman, the ghost, who sat in the back seat. He had never kissed her that Kelly hadn't wondered what kind of woman his wife had been; had he loved her as much and in the same way, saying the same things, and what had come between them? He had never discussed his wife or the divorce. It was a closed path, never to be walked again.

She pleaded she must take a headache tablet and he let her go. He was confused. He had felt the first response of a woman in love with a man, and then the limpness.

Inside the front door, she looked for a note or a telegram. As she telephoned Toby, she experienced a flutter of hope. He had given up the plan. Something had happened to him. Surely he would have contacted her before this.

When Rip came through the door that evening, Peg bobbed her green earrings in the direction of the SAC's office. "They're waiting for you."

He passed quickly by her. Before the SAC's door he took a deep breath, like someone wanting to pretend it was the start of a day. He walked into a room of low murmur. The SAC glanced up from dictating to a secretary, nodded, and quickly wound up.

"Everybody here?" he asked, looking about at the agents seated informally around the desk. "All right, Rip."

Rip led off the discussion. Most of the leads set forth that morning—to cover golf courses, race tracks, libraries and the like—had proved negative. "I think he's changed his habits and interests," Rip said. "He's given up golf and libraries because he knows we'll be checking those places."

"You think he knows we're on his trail?" Bradley asked.

"Not necessarily. But he's playing it safe."

The SAC commented, "He may have given up golf, but I doubt if such an active man would become a hermit."

Rip agreed. "No—he'd probably turn to some other sport."

They decided they would cover bowling alleys and other sport centers the next day.

Soon after the conference broke up, Moreno came by. "I had a talk with Popcorn and I've got a feeling—just a feeling, mind you—that he's holding out on us. I think he knows where we could look for Red Dillon, but Popcorn figures it's a big story and maybe he'll peddle it for good money to a newspaper."

"We can put a tail on him."

Moreno shook his head. "He'll spot it, Rip. He's expecting one and he'll lead us on a walking marathon all over this blasted city."

"Let's think about it. Must be some way."

Moreno rose. "That's not why I dropped by. We've located a woman we believe was Nancy Ashton's closest friend. I'm on my way now to talk with her. Thought you might like to come along."

Her name was Deborah Samuelson, a known call girl. She was thirty-three, blond, tall and poised, and wore a simple black sheath dress that gave her an illusion of glamour. She lived alone in the Hollywood hills in a $200-a-month apartment.

As he studied her, Rip wondered what had possessed her to enter prostitution. She had a good, intelligent face. She would have looked right as an airline stewardess or a buyer for a department store. She talked slowly, feeling her way. When she was convinced they actually were investigating Nancy Ashton's death, she relaxed her long taut body until it no longer pressed against the dress.

"You knew her well?" Moreno asked.

She nodded. They had met at the University of California at Los Angeles. Since their graduation they had got together at least once a week for a movie or dinner. "She was the only friend I had, and since my parents died, I'd looked to her when I needed to talk something through."

"What about other friends?" Rip asked.

"None close." She added carefully, "She was in a type of work where it was difficult to make close friends."

Rip said, "A few days before her death she came to our office, presumably on behalf of a close friend who had taken part in a crime involuntarily."

She almost stopped breathing. He continued, "Miss Ashton wanted to know if this friend would be subject to prosecution if she came forward."

The girl looked from one to the other. Her face was very white. "I think you're making this up."

Moreno said, "We're not accusing you."

"But you're thinking it."

"No," Rip said.

"What about it—was she talking about herself?" Moreno asked.

"No. No, she couldn't have been. I knew nothing about her affairs really, because we had an unspoken agreement that we would never pry into each other's life. I don't think you can be close friends unless you do respect the rights of the other one to privacy, don't you?"

Rip drew the photograph of Red Dillon from his inner pocket. "Do you know this man?"

She scarcely glanced at the picture. "Yes, of course."

"Where did you know him?"

"He was her brother. I met him only once, about a month ago. He was leaving her apartment—it was about eleven—when I was coming in. I said to Nancy later, 'I didn't know you had a brother,' and she remarked she hadn't seen him in a good many years. She said it as if she didn't care for him."

She hesitated. "May I ask what you want him for?"

Moreno nodded. "He murdered a woman back in Oklahoma."

Rip went on, "What name did she give you when she introduced you?"

"Dill. She just said, 'I want you to meet my brother Dill.' She didn't give me a last name."

She hurried on, "Look, I've leveled with you, and I think you should with me. I'm not the close friend she talked about, and I don't know who it could be. If you suspect me ——"

Moreno repeated, "We're not accusing you of anything."

Rip turned toward the door. "Thanks, Miss Samuelson. You've been very helpful."

In the lobby, they sat and talked. They agreed the facts seemed to support this hypothetical reconstruction: Red Dillon had persuaded Nancy Ashton, or forced her under threat of death, to work with him in his scheme to obtain money from the First National Bank through Kelly Sherwood. Thoroughly frightened, Nancy Ashton had gone to the field office with the story about a "close friend." Apparently she had committed a criminal act with her brother at some time in the past, since she feared prosecution.

Then he had become aware that she was about to expose him. Perhaps he had accosted her, and when Rip and Bradley called she had remained silent in the apartment, either because he was there or because she had changed her mind.

Dillon had brooded, though, and perhaps entered her apartment while she was showering. When she emerged, he had slugged her with a heavy instrument, then put a skirt and blouse on her and pushed her out the window.

It was only a theory. The police would continue to work the case until all leads were exhausted. They might uncover a fact that would shatter the reconstruction.

Rip remained at the office until midnight, receiving reports and plotting leads. A few minutes before he left, the switchboard light rang him. "I've a man on the line. Says he has info about the Sherwood case."

Rip straightened in the swivel chair. Only the Sherwoods and Popcorn, besides the FBI and the police, knew about the case. "Put him through," he said.

When the man came on, he began in a low, almost indistinct voice, "I've got some information to give you about one of your cases."

"May I have your name, please?"

The voice was curt. "It doesn't concern me."

"What was it about?"

"It's the Sherwood matter."

Rip pretended he wasn't acquainted with the name. "Sherwood. Sherwood. What kind of case is it?"

"She's being threatened. . . . You do have a case on her, don't you?"

"I don't know. I'd have to look it up. Why don't you come in and talk to us about the matter?"

"Maybe you don't have a case?"

"I'd have to check. But if you want to give me something over the phone ——"

The man considered, breathing heavily. "Guess I'd better come in. What'd you say your name was?"

"Ripley. John Ripley. What time'll you be in?"

The voice squirmed. "Nine in the morning be O.K.?"

"That's fine."

Rip tried to prolong the conversation, but the other party hung up abruptly. The call had been too short to trace through the city's complex telephone dialing system.

At the same hour the two agents posted in Sheri Kimura's apartment sat in the dark in the back bedroom, facing a door opening into a long, narrow corridor. Down this corridor they could see through the living room to the front door, barely discernible in a shaft of moonlight.

They had agreed to sleep in four-hour shifts, but neither was sleeping, both being too keyed up by the possibility Red Dillon would slip through that door.

The evening had gone with a minimum of irritation. Miss Kimura had been col-

ite. She had placed towels for them in the hroom, and offered to make space in the wded bedroom closet for their clothes, if y wished to send for additional clothing the t day.

She had an immediate liking for the police- man, Lily Taguchi. They had exchanged t about their backgrounds. Both had gone Uni High in Los Angeles, although not at same time, since Sheri was considerably er.

When it came time for dinner, Lily sug- ted that Sheri go ahead as though she were ne. "I'll get my dinner later," Lily said, d dinner for the men." She nodded toward back room.

Sheri insisted they work together. "This'll fun, having someone else around."

n the midst of cooking the phone rang, and eri hurried to answer it. Lily Taguchi over- rd her saying, "No, operator, there's no . John at this number. . . . No, the party has old number. I'm told that Mr. John had s number before I did."

She returned to the kitchen, saying, "Long tance from Chicago for a man who had this nber before me. I get a call for him about e a month."

Shortly after seven, Sheri slipped into a rt and blouse, and left, saying, "Don't wait for me. I don't know when I'll be back." At the door she turned and asked, "Will y be all right?" She indicated the back bed- m.

Lily smiled. "They're nice guys."

The remark was a firebrand. "I hate their s—the whole lot of them. The whole damn l." She was gone the same instant, leaving y taken aback. She watched below as Sheri ned to the right on leaving the apartment se, and walked with quick, short steps to corner where she disappeared.

ily Taguchi talked with the agents in the k bedroom for an hour, in whispers. They d a problem, that of silence. A man's voice a man's movements might attract the at- tion of the people in the apartment below, hey had seen Sheri Kimura leave. The nts removed their shoes, and began cata- uing in their memories boards that creaked groaned, and furniture which might prove ap in the dark.

Sheri returned shortly after nine. Lily said, thought you were going to be up to all rs."

Sheri shrugged, and said little as she un- ssed. She bathed, laid out her clothes for next day, and was asleep a little after ten.

At midnight, Lily Taguchi was still awake. e slipped noiselessly from bed and into a e. She crossed the corridor to the bath- m, took an aspirin, then returned to bed. eri Kimura never stirred.

The agents in the back bedroom listened n to the night noises. They listened to iso- e an alien one. A dozen times they tensed at e groan of the steps outside. A dozen times y were mistaken. At a time like this, imag- tion was a sneak in the night.

Pete asked about Kelly's headache as she ssed Escrow, and her hesitancy was telltale. e never could remember a lie. "It's gone," e said, and added, "Thanks, Pete, for last ht. You're the greatest, honestly."

She could still feel where he had held her, lips on hers. She pictured him about the use fixing things, in shorts mowing the lawn, oss from her at dinner eating by candlelight d listening to hi-fi. There had been many her fellows, but none she could ever fit into her , which she knew was growing more cir- nscribed with the years. None she could ure with the children she must have.

She was late to the vault by a minute. When e took her cash drawer, Mr. Welk put a seal out it. Once a month the bank ran its own ck, always without notice. At Window 5, e waited for Mr. Welk, who passed from e window to the next, breaking the seals, unting the money and checking to see that e amount tallied with the sum reported on e batch run the night before.

The routine began. The checks from the aringhouse were processed, the armored arrived and the guards with the money, e coffee break was taken, and the doors opened. Her first customer submitted a per- sonal check for $650. She took it to Mr. Burkhardt for approval. All checks for $500 and over required his initials.

He whispered, "Anything new, Miss Sher wood?"

"Nothing. I haven't heard a thing."

"Be sure to let me know if you do."

At 11:45, she left with Penny for lunch. The restaurant was crowded with pushing elbows and hips. In the far back they found a seat. After ordering, Kelly excused herself.

The rest room was almost deserted. She went to the long wall mirror above the wash- basin and dabbed at her make-up. She was vaguely conscious of someone leaving a cubi- cle, the door opening, closing, opening.

In the mirror, she saw a woman enter, a large person wearing dark glasses. The woman stopped quite still, looking about, and Kelly later remembered wondering why some peo- ple insisted on wearing dark glasses indoors. Kelly, her back to the woman, continued combing her hair. Then suddenly the comb clattered to the floor.

"Hello, Kelly." It was the voice in the ga- rage. Except for his lips, which were thick and set tightly, he made an attractive woman.

He continued: "Stand where you are, and don't try anything. I've got a gun on you, and I'll use it if you make me." He held a purse in an odd manner.

She dropped her hands to her sides, and turned slowly around.

"I haven't much time," he was saying, "so I'll give it to you right off. You take in a wad of money Friday afternoons. You must take in a quarter of a million sometimes. But I'm not hoggish."

She was certain he was studying her intently from behind the dark glasses. He was watch- ing for a swallow, an expression in her eyes, any evidence that she intended to betray him.

"You shove the take into your purse—and it'd better be a hundred thousand. And don't

You're so smart to choose even heating Wear-Ever Aluminum Gleaming Wear-Ever Aluminum graces many of today's smartest kitchens. Only aluminum spreads heat so quickly and evenly, to bring out the finest in food flavors . . . to make you a better cook.

Now on these smart, new Wear-Ever utensils are cool, smooth, ebony-black heat-resistant handles. They feature Wear-Ever's protective flame guard. And there's the promise of easy cleaning in the sparkle of their highly polished, mirror-like finish and glistening, satin-smooth and rivet-free interiors.

See the complete line of better looking, better cookingWear-Ever for your kitchen at leading stores. Every piece bears the famous Wear-Ever trademark, guide to the finest in alumi- num cookware for 58 years.

Wear-Ever Aluminum, Inc.
New Kensington, Pa.

wear-ever ALUMINUM

HOUSEWARES Festival Values

Housewares Festival

tell me you park your purse someplace else, because I happen to know you keep it on a shelf under the cash drawer. You walk out with it like any other time. Go straight home and then I'll get in touch with you—tell you where we'll meet for the split."

She heard steps approaching, the knob rattling, the lock holding.

She answered quietly, "But what happens when the customers start writing checks next week and they bounce?"

"I've got it all worked out. You got nothing to worry about."

Nothing to worry about? Because I'll be dead by then?

"One more thing," he continued. "I had a cellmate up at San Quentin. He went up for attacking women before he killed them. He said there was no thrill in this world like getting a woman and stripping her, and then afterward feeling her soft throat in his hands as he squeezed the breath out of her."

He added, "I wouldn't know because I've never done it. But sometime I'm going to—when I got a reason. He never had a reason, but I don't like it that way. I've got to have a reason."

He stepped close to her, his hand going to her cheek, stroking it. By reflex, she jerked her head away. Then caution reminded her and she stood perfectly still. She noted that his lips scarcely moved when he talked.

"I've got to frisk you. I've got to be sure."

He ran his hands slowly and carefully over her, every place where a gun or a transmitter might be concealed. Her whole body hardened to hold her unflinchingly in place. But eventually she could not keep the tremble from her legs, and she knew he felt the fear in them.

He rose slowly, bringing his eyes a foot from hers. The strong odor of tobacco and his heavy, difficult breathing took her back to the garage that night.

He kissed her lips hard and long. When he let her go, she found that revulsion had momentarily supplanted fear, and she was surprised at the strength of her own voice. "If you ever do that again, the deal's off. I'm in this for my percentage—my twenty thousand. That's all."

She added, her voice tight, "And you're not going to kiss it out of me."

He studied her, a faint smile on his lips, his face a blank behind the dark glasses.

"You're a beautiful dish—but I don't trust you as far as I could throw you. You just get the money and when I get ready to take delivery, you bring it. Remember that. Because I'll know if you get any fancy ideas about sending a decoy—and you'll regret it. You'll sure regret it, Kelly."

He backed to the window, checked the alley and climbed out. She walked unsteadily to the door, which was locked with a press button in the center of the knob.

Once again Rip and Kelly sat in the lonely, pretentious conference room, at the long, glistening mahogany table. He listened intently, but asked few questions.

She said, "If anyone had told me a week ago that I could have stood there and let a man like him search me ——" She shook her head, trembling.

"And after you warned me never to go to a rest room alone. I forgot. I don't know how I could have."

"I'm only sorry you had to go through it."

"I'd thought he'd phone."

"Sometimes they do and sometimes not in these threat-of-bodily-harm cases. He wanted you to feel his hands actually on you—because that's a physical threat a hundred times more racking than a telephone call. When he put his hands on you, and kissed you, he figured that was the kind of a final shock that would break you."

Rip did not tell her that Dillon, egomaniac that he was, also had wanted to show the police or the FBI, if they were following her, that he could operate in their midst. This, the women's rest room, was a weak spot in any surveillance. And yet, though it was a daring act, it was a foolish one, too, and he had taken a chance far beyond what he might gain. The act indicated that though he could give up golf and change his other habits, he could not forgo his compulsive flair for the theatrical.

"He had on a long, loose coat," she said. "It was brown. And a brown cloche—hat. A coat like that can disguise practically any figure. I didn't notice what was under it—maybe it was buttoned all the way up."

"It doesn't really matter," Rip said. "He probably ditched it at the first service station. Tell me about Friday afternoons, the big deposits, everything."

"Well, you know we stay open until six on Fridays, and about four o'clock our large commercial customers start coming in with their cash and checks for deposit, so they won't have to hold large amounts over the weekend."

She named several who deposited from $5000 to $40,000 late each Friday.

"Could you get a hundred thousand into your purse?"

She smiled. "With the kind of a purse I carry, yes."

"The bank never examines purses?"

"There'd be no point. If anyone wanted to embezzle, he could carry it out on his person."

Burkhardt joined them then, apologetic that he was late. "The bank wants to protect Miss Sherwood in every way," he said. "She mustn't take any chances for us."

Burkhardt turned to her. "I talked with the home office, and they instructed me to inform you that they appreciate to the fullest your co-operation, and when it's concluded they will entertain an application from you for a promotion."

"Thank you."

Burkhardt turned to Rip. "Now what do we do?"

"It's possible we may apprehend him before the bank closes tomorrow." He glanced at his watch. "We've got twenty-eight hours."

"What about the money?" Burkhardt asked. "I'd let her have it if I were handling the matter. But I'm not, and I don't think the home office —— A hundred thousand is a considerable sum if it got away from us."

"I wouldn't want the responsibility," she put in quickly.

Burkhardt said, "Could you make up a dummy package ——"

He trailed off, thinking, as they all were, that if Dillon made contact with her, and found the package of money a fake, she wouldn't have a chance. But then, because he was a wanton killer, he would in all probability kill her even if the money was all there. And if she didn't go through with it, he would hunt her down and kill her—and Toby—and go on to another victim. Any way you looked at it, Kelly Sherwood didn't have a chance.

Rip said, "Let's meet that situation when we come to it."

Burkhardt rose. "I must be going, if that's all. Let me know if there's anything the bank can do."

After he was gone, she said, "You know, I think I'm going to pieces. Now that he's set the time—I don't think I'm going to make it."

"Sure you are. There's always a letdown after a shock like the one you've just had."

She shook her head. "I just don't think I can go through with it—meeting him again, I mean."

"You did on Angel's Flight."

But that was an eternity ago. Two nights.

RHYMES FROM YOUNG MOTHER GOOSE

By C. S. JENNISON

My little old man and I fell out.
And what do you think it was all about?
He said, when the baby woke at four,
It wasn't his turn to walk the floor.

He said gently, "Let's take one thing at a time. I want you to do something for me. It sounds crazy, and I can't explain."

"You don't have to."

"I want you and your sister to go swimming when you get off work tonight at that park in Sherman Oaks. If Jack wants to come along, it's O.K."

She looked up in surprise. He went on, "I know the water will be cold at five-thirty, but you needn't go in. Just sit around. You don't have to stay long. Say a half hour."

A few minutes before five, Rip walked slowly down Main Street. The faces and bodies he passed were a blurred background. Sometimes all a man needed was an idea, a faint idea. Sometimes the idea had been inside him for days, but he had neglected to ferret it out.

He approached Popcorn, leaning back in his beach chair against a lamppost. He was holding court, as was his usual custom at this hour. A stripper in her teens was talking with him. A Negro man waited. He was pushing a large, old-fashioned baby carriage containing a sack of groceries. An old sot steadied himself against a waste receptacle. Popcorn himself looked freshly bathed and dressed, his soft blue eyes sparkling.

Rip passed him, overhearing the stripper asking about a business matter. Popcorn never glanced his way.

Rip rounded the next corner, got into his car and sat five minutes, timing it to the second. Then he drove a few blocks, and at a crowded Broadway corner eased up to the curb. Popcorn slid in beside him.

As they pulled away, Popcorn settled himself comfortably and looked curiously about the car. He said, "I recollect when these rigs first came out. I told the wife they never would catch on."

"Never can tell," Rip put in. He took the Civic Center approach to the Hollywood freeway, and soon was lost in a pack of cars, running three lanes solid. Overhead KMPC's helicopter hovered, broadcasting news of the freeway's traffic condition, alerting drivers to jam-ups.

Popcorn cleared his throat. "I may have a big story tonight, sir. Page one maybe."

"That's what Pancho tells me." Pancho had set up the date with Popcorn, informing Popcorn only that Rip wanted to talk with him. Rip continued, "He tells me you may not sell it to us."

Popcorn slid Rip a devious glance. His old eyes crinkled with the zest of haggling. "You do have a little competition. I've got a standing offer from one newspaper. Twenty-five dollars for a top story like this, sir."

"Anybody else bidding?"

"I'd rather not say."

They crawled past Hollywood, which from the freeway's elevation spread out before them on the left.

Popcorn continued, "May I ask where we're going, sir?"

"Sherman Oaks."

Popcorn rolled the name around, trying to fit it in with the story. They took the Van Nuys Boulevard off-ramp, turned right on Huston, and pulled into the curb near the Sherman Oaks park.

Rip said, "I've got something to show you."

Popcorn left the car slowly, puzzled. They followed a sidewalk, then crossed over the grass, coming to the pool.

Rip talked along easily. "You're in the newspaper business, and I know reporters. They're so busy getting the facts together and writing the stories that they don't get time to think what the stories mean to the people in them."

They walked along the other side of the pool from Kelly, Toby and Jack. Toby and Jack were in swimming, splashing around and chasing each other like a couple of porpoises. Kelly sat at the pool's edge, dangling her feet in the water, facing into the slanting sun. She had unusual maturity and depth, Rip thought as he watched her. And she stood up to life. He doubted whether any easier alternative had ever occurred to her. Peg measured up, too, he thought, give her Kelly's added years. Circumstances hadn't exacted an early maturity as they had in Kelly's case, but Peg had her head screwed on, as his mother so often pointed out.

He said, "Those are the Sherwoods o there. That's Kelly, the older one. And th Toby's boy friend, Jack. I thought you'd l to see the principals in the story. The older there will be dead by this time Saturday if D Dillon pulls off what he's got in mind. Ma she'll be dead sooner if the story hits the pers and he thinks she double-crossed him."

He paused. "As for the younger one, D Dillon got to one like her—she's in a mer hospital."

He turned back toward the car. "I j wanted you to know what they looked lik"

As they retraced their steps, Popcorn offe no comment. The man possessed a basic go ness, Rip thought. Yet the goodness mi have been strangled long ago by the hun and desperation that dogged each man Skid Row.

As they got into the car, Popcorn sa "You're asking me to suppress a news sto and I couldn't do that, Mr. Ripley. No go editor could."

Rip felt the crash in his temples.

Peg was leaving when Rip returned to office. "How's it going?" she asked with d concern. Suddenly he wanted to take home, to sit and talk on the doorstep with h

"Not so good. We can't seem to get break."

"You will. What was it you told me on That every big case has a point of discoura ment when it seems nothing will crack it, a then it happens."

She sent him a smile from the door, her e dancing. It was a smile to carry with him. A boy his mother had taught him to remem and cherish smiles and the happy words t people said, as he would a toy given him.

He sat at the old familiar desk, which was much a part of his life as his clothes. scanned the log turned in by the men who h run the surveillance the evening before Sheri Kimura:

7:32. Subject leaves apartment buildi proceeds north to Viking. Stops to talk w unidentified Japanese woman, about fif weight one twenty, height five-seven, d brown hair, wearing dark print dress.

7:42. Subject proceeds to Little Tokyo t ern, joins man later identified as Sam Sumo attorney, drinks one Manhattan.

8:03. Subject leaves tavern, takes O b west, sits by herself, third seat back of driv

8:18. Subject leaves bus at Cheyenne Stre proceeds south one block, enters Dayton H pital. Inquiries made of receptionist who fuses to advise whereabouts of subject hospital.

9:05. Subject leaves hospital, proceeds no one block, boards O bus east.

9:18. Subject leaves bus at Harker, proce to her apartment.

Rip rose wearily. He thought he would go the hospital. Sheri Kimura might have be visiting a sick friend. Again, she might n have.

At the hospital he inquired for the ni superintendent. The receptionist asked cur what he wanted. He said he would tell that the night superintendent.

"She can't be disturbed," said the girl.

"Thank you," Rip answered. He strode p her down the hall, and stopped a nurse.

The receptionist came hurrying after hi "I told you ——" she said.

"And I heard you."

The nurse showed him to the office of t night superintendent, who proved a busine like woman in her forties with a drama white streak across her dark hair.

He identified himself, showing her the fl black, walletlike credential. "I must ask you hold this call in confidence. A young wom by the name of Sheri Kimura came here l night. I hasten to add that Miss Kimura is n the subject of any investigation by our offi and I don't want my call to cast suspicion her."

"You want to know why she was here?"

"You know her, then?"

"Just stay here a minute, please."

The superintendent disappeared, closing t door behind her. Rip rose and stood in a l

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Drainer Trays, $2.69-$2.98

Dustpan, $1.69; Soap Dish, 25¢; Sink Strainer, 69¢; Plate-Bowl and Bottle-Jar Scrapers, 29¢, 39¢

Dish Drainer, $2.29; Sink Divider Mat, $1.69; Sink Mats, $1.29 to $2.29

Rubbermaid® means better made

Wastebaskets $1.49 to $4.98

Ar n't Rubbermaid's New Colors Delicious? And they don't just sit back and look lovely, either. Rubber- md's bright work-savers help you everywhere! 1. You can transform your counter into a beautiful, dutiful place vi a protective Drainer Tray. Built-in slope means quick, thorough drainage. 2. Rubbermaid's little Gadgets help a l ; add more cheery color to your kitchen. 3. Count on Rubbermaid Twin Sink Dishwashing Helpers to give you a h nd with the dishes, guard them against chipping and breaking. 4. Rubbermaid Wastebaskets sparkle in any set ng. And they're such gay ways to keep clutter under control. Have fun finding dozens of Rubbermaid ways to orect, pamper, hush and help all through the house. Rubbermaid Inc., Wooster, Ohio · Cooksville, Ontario.

Rubbermaid values featured during...

HOUSEWARES Festival Values

Housewares Festival

Model shown: $14.95 *

Brand-new beauty...this hour glass stool with swingaway steps!

● An all time high in style and convenience, a new Cosco step stool with sleek, modern design. Its roomy, swingaway steps are rubber-treaded, safer. Its saddle-shaped seat is restful, for "sit-down" kitchen chores. Sturdy, all-steel frames come in chrome or tan finishes. Washable, stain-resistant upholstery in wide color choice. At leading department, furniture and hardware stores . . . get yours and find when this step stool is handy everything else is!

HAMILTON COSCO, INC. • COLUMBUS, INDIANA

COSCO
for every purpose . . . every purse!

Utility Tables and Serving Carts, from $8.95.* Stools from $5.45.* Card Tables from $11.95.* Folding Chairs from $8.95.* Juvenile Furniture from $8.45.*

*Slightly higher in the South and West corner, out of range of the door. He took a book from the shelf, discovered it was titled Obstetrics, replaced it, and found another. He pretended to read, but picked up every sound in the corridor outside. As the minutes droned on, he was mystified and uneasy.

Festival Values Housewares Festival

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 130

The door opened slowly and a six-year-old's face peered in, taking stock, as if he were on enemy ground.

The superintendent's voice came over. "Go on in. He won't bite you."

He had large, bright almond eyes and dark hair neatly combed. He walked with excruciating effort, one step at a time. He seemed about to fall, and Rip started toward him.

The superintendent said sharply, "He can manage." She continued, "He was born without a hip cup on his left side. But we gave you one, didn't we, Joey? A nice plastic one. Other boys have to get along with old-fashioned hip sockets, but not Joey. Sit over there, boy."

Joey smiled up at her as he eased himself into her swivel chair. He looked at the wonders on her desk.

She said, "This is Miss Kimura's son."

Rip took a chair across the desk from him. "Hello, Joey." This was a business of surprise, but he was careful to suppress his reaction.

"And this is Mr. Ripley, Joey." She turned at the door. "I'll leave you two men alone."

Joey asked, "Are you a doctor?"

Rip shook his head. "I'm from the FBI." He took a gold-plated badge from his trouser pocket. He never showed it except to people who might not understand the meaning of the credential.

Joey examined it with widening eyes. "You don't look like Jimmy Stewart. Are you here to kill a bad man?"

"I hope not. Maybe just arrest one."

Rip hesitated. He disliked questioning children. "How long have you been here, Joey?"

"Years and years. I guess ten years." He brightened. "The doctor said I could go home Christmas." He added quickly, "But I like it here. My mother comes every night."

"How about your father?"

"Didn't you know? He's dead. He died when I was born."

"I'm sorry."

"That's all right. You can't know everything."

"What about relatives?"

He saddened. "I don't have any relatives. Except Uncle Dill. Only he's not my real uncle. Do you know Uncle Dill?"

"In a way. Does he come to visit you?"

"Sometimes."

Rip turned then as the door catch clicked. Sheri Kimura stood there, trembling.

"Mamma," Joey yelled in delight, sliding out of the swivel chair.

She could scarcely control her voice. "Go back to your room, Joey."

"Mamma, this man ——"

"I know who he is. Go on, Joey. Do as I tell you. I'll be with you in a few minutes."

Painfully, he made his way to her. She bent low to kiss him, hugging him tightly. Closing the door behind him, she leaned against it, her face ashen.

She said through tight lips, her voice strident, "You cheap, two-bit copper, sneaking around hounding my boy. Don't you have any decency in you at all?"

He waited, letting her fury run its course. He said evenly, "I've got a job to do, and the job's to keep alive someone who's going to get shot if I don't do it. I'll interview a three-year-old, or a ninety-year-old, or somebody on his deathbed if I think it will lead to a rapist and killer."

"If you ever again talk with Joey ——"

"I'll talk with the boy whenever I need to, Miss Kimura."

She didn't hear him. "He paid the bills for him, do you know that, copper? Yes, Red Dillon, the guy you're trying to tell me is a rapist and killer. If it weren't for him, Joey wouldn't be walking. It's cost thousands. And he paid, because he loves the boy, and sends him toys and clothes. And you're trying to tell me Red's a killer. Well, you go to hell, mister, you go straight to hell and tell them that."

She bit her lip to steady herself. Rip said softly, "Look, Miss Kimura, I understand how you feel. He's one man to you, an an other to us. But what he is to you doesn't een him from killing anyone who crosses im. Everybody's got some kindness in him, pe cially when it comes to kids or a mothe r a woman. But we can't let a murderer go a ind killing people just because he's kind at ti s."

"You're lying."

Rip said, "I don't get it. You were hos t us even before we told you what we wai d."

"You bet I was."

"Why, Miss Kimura?"

"Does Christmas, 1941, mean anyth to you?"

He thought the date over. "Offha it doesn't. What does it mean to you?"

"I'll tell you what it means to me. vas twelve years old and I had the world. I ha the greatest dad any girl ever had. My m died when I was four, and he'd brought me up ith all the love in his heart. We were close- ery close."

She swallowed, fighting emotion, and ip waited.

After a second she continued, "That d my world crashed. We were given a few da to get ready. The Government was packing off to a concentration camp. My Governmen the flag I'd loved. Packing us off because the color of our skin. My dad lost most ery- thing. They put us under guard in a pla in Arizona, behind barbed wire and with les ready to shoot us down if we tried to ge ut. They didn't have any gas chambers when ey could put us to death, but he died an ay, brokenhearted. I swore when they put h in the ground—I swore ——"

Reliving the scene, she broke.

Rip said, "That was eighteen years go, Miss Kimura, and Red Dillon's today nd there's absolutely no connection. What's re, if I remember rightly, it was a military er, and an action which the Department of Jstice opposed from the time it was suggested he FBI never made any request for such ac- tion."

He paused a moment. "Believe me, I un- erstand how you feel, but your thinking all wrong. Please give this some study—and lk with your attorney about it."

"I told you before that I don't know re Mr. Dillon is."

Rip said quietly, "At seven-twelve last ght you took a telephone call. Afterward you ld Miss Taguchi that some party in Chicago as calling for a Mr. John—that you had Mr. John's old telephone number."

He waited, seeing her color. "There no record that any Chicago operator put a all through to you—and the party who had our number before you never heard of Mr. Jo."

She flared. "You're calling me a liar."

He continued, "I think Red Dillon ed you and you two had a prearranged sign If you said there was no party by the nam of Mr. John at your number, that meant re was trouble, and he was to stay away."

She dropped into a chair, head saggin.

Rip said, "Don't get up some morning nd read in the newspaper that this man's led again, and have to live with it the rest of ur life. Because, Miss Kimura, somewhere, s me time, a woman like you is going to die be use of you, if you know where this man is nd don't tell us."

At the door, he turned. "You've got a ell boy in Joey. You've got a future to live f, if you can forget the past."

He was sweating as he walked down the ll. The receptionist's hateful stare followed m.

As he passed the switchboard, the girl id, "Mr. Ripley, you're to call Popcorn—ho st, that's the name—at KA 6-4257."

He asked her to request the phone com ny for the location of the number. "I'll l at my desk," he said, noting that the time as 9:42 P.M.

He shed his coat and loosened his tie. He thought of Sheri Kimura, wondered if he d shaken her as much as he intended. He tho ht of Peg, saw her smile again.

The phone rang, and the switchboard r said, "It's a pay station at Main and Clau ."

"Put me through, please."

Popcorn came on immediately. "I've en doing some thinking, Mr. Ripley."

s, Popcorn."
n afraid I'm not a very good newspaper
. I'd be fired from any good sheet."
experienced a quickening inside him.
corn continued, "This one's on the
."
I get Miss Sherwood to bake you a pie."
k her to make it cherry, will you? The ised to bake me a cherry pie on my ay." He asked, "Can you come at , the usual place, by yourself? We'll be a short walk."
thought fast. "O.K.—Moreno and I'll re." ly you, Mr. Ripley. That's the way it's be." He hurried to add, "There won't trouble. I'll be taking you to a listening
You can hear the news for yourself."
K. The usual place. Eleven o'clock."
sat rolling a pencil, then broke up his hts by dialing Captain Moreno at home.
peated his conversation with Popcorn.
your informant, Pancho. What do you
?"
listened to a long silence before Pancho
I don't know, Rip. Like I told you, he's s played it square with us." He added, don't I give you a cover?"
anks. I'll get Bradley on it too."
w minutes after ten he left the office, and the Hollywood freeway for his apart-where he changed into the old clothes he weekends. He left the shirt collar open, re off the second button from the top.
cated a threadbare corduroy jacket, and air oil to add a grease spot to the patch t.

he mind of the bigot is like the upil of the eye; the more light ou pour upon it, the more it will ontract. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES remembered to remove the loose change his trouser pocket so there would be no e clinking if he had to move noiselessly, e tossed his wallet on the chest to remove nce of anyone's identifying him if it were to.

dropped into the inside jacket pocket a transmitter by which he would keep in with Bradley and Captain Moreno, who l maintain a loose tail job.
ore leaving, he checked his .38, making he cylinder was filled. He pulled the hol- little forward on his hip, then looked nirror to assure himself the loose jacket led no bulge.
turning to the office, he parked the car oarded a Sixth Street bus. He stepped t Main Street, passed the Follies Theater crossing the street, came to the all-night e house, paid his 35 cents and entered. He ocked again by the stench of dirty bodies heap whisky.
pcorn waited in the cubicle office. "Good ng, Mr. Ripley."
he name's Rip."
es, Mr. Ripley." He fished a note from a pocket, and read from it. "Mr. Dillon eservations aboard Pan-American Flight e-eight-three-one to Tokyo at eleven-fifty- P.M. tomorrow—Friday."
low do you know that?" Rip shifted un- . He disliked his doubts and suspicions, hey were a part of his business. An agent t live because of a doubt, die because of ack of one.
pcorn said, "He will carry a passport r the name of Dr. Franklin Immer, a tist."
m curious."
thought you would be. But it's no great ery. On the third floor of the Union Hotel 's a pay telephone that many characters I merely listen."
he Union?"
t's at Main and Sanders, three flights up. e's a clothing store on the first floor, s on the second, and the hotel begins at hird. If the guests don't fall down before ing the third, they can stay for a dollar a quarter a night."
nd Dillon uses this phone?"

Popcorn shook his head. "A friend does. I don't know his name, and I've never seen him. As I told you, I merely listen. The friend is making all arrangements: the airline tickets, the forged passport, the health certificate, all that."

"What's the number of the phone?"

"I don't know, Mr. Ripley. I've never used it." He chuckled. "I've never even seen it, and I don't think you will. The hotel manager—he is an ex-convict. He has no love for me, and would gladly cut my throat—and yours if he found you about the place. He operates a first-class place. No detectives."

Popcorn took his time, reveling in the intrigue. "I've got a listening post, and I'll show it to you if you'll promise ——"

Rip was instantly wary. "Promise what?"

"That you won't ask the phone company to take it out. It would hurt my business ——"

"We never interfere with the phone company."

"Thank you. Mr. Dillon's friend is usually punctual. He makes his call at midnight."

Rip's hesitation was short-lived. "Let's go."

"Thank you for your confidence, Mr. Ripley."

"It's Rip."

"I could never call you that. I was taught as a boy always to call my superiors 'mister.' It was a way we had in the back country of Indiana. My father was a Methodist parson and he always told me ——"

They walked slowly and carefully down a narrow, dark alley. Here in this deep canyon between ancient brick buildings, it was utterly still.

Popcorn stepped lightly in old, beaten-up tennis shoes, his footfall noiseless. Rip followed, ready to fall flat at the slightest brush of a noise. He searched out the shadows ahead, the darkness of the doorways, the black hunchbacks that were refuse cans, the telephone poles where a man might hide in ambush.

He listened for Bradley and Moreno behind them, and heard nothing. He was not disturbed. The transmitter broadcast every sound he made, every whisper.

They reached a dead end, a brick building rising into the dark night. Popcorn turned right toward a timbered wall higher than his head. His hand went out by habit to push through a door. He closed it carefully behind them, bolting it, and in the scrape of metal on metal Rip heard the warning that Bradley and Moreno might find their way blocked.

A dog rushed them savagely, growling. Popcorn called low, "Here boy, here boy." The growl faded, as if it had been wound up and had run down. A German-police dog, happily wagging his tail, took the meat Popcorn offered. Popcorn rubbed him behind the ears.

They made their way then through a junk yard, the dog following. Eventually Popcorn stopped beneath a fire escape. It was that type in which the first segment hangs high off the ground. He reached up and pulled it down, and stood a moment on the first step. His seventy years told in his breathing. His hand, though, was steady as he touched Rip, indicating upward to the third-floor landing. This, he whispered, was the listening post. The phone was three feet inside the door, on the right.

They took the fire escape slowly, flattening themselves against the brick wall. On the ascent to the second-floor landing, they stopped before reaching a lighted window. They heard voices inside, an older man and a young woman. They thought the window opened into an office. Popcorn leaped three steps across the light and Rip did likewise.

They paused, fastened to the building. As the girl reached the window, the man said in ugly humor, "What's the matter with you?" The girl answered, "I thought I heard something." The man said, "Forget it and pull the shade."

They waited until the shade was drawn and the tap of her spiked heels had faded. They continued then, one step at a time, freezing whenever the metal whined beneath their weight.

When they were two steps from the third-floor landing, Popcorn sat down and signaled Rip to do likewise. They could see the hall

Beauty IN FIGURE OR SCALE means Borg

Weight-watching's simpler, figure-control easy, with a Borg.

For ounces show on this scale before they show on you!
Exact weight, even on carpet.
Gaining or losing, you know!
58 beautiful models, $7.95 up.
Lifetime Service Warranty.
Like no other scale.

Go modern. Get a Borg!

Housewares Festival

Slightly higher West and Canada. Ensemble by Geist & Geist.

BORG SCALE
a BORG-ERICKSON product

door open, to provide ventilation since the night was close.

Almost the same instant the telephone rang, and its clamor bounced back and forth in the narrow hall. It continued ringing as no one answered it.

The shots came unexpectedly as a dark, indistinct figure emerged from the hallway. One instant there was nothing but the darkness and stillness, and the next a powerful, blinding light flooded them. Rip felt the first shot tap the brick behind him. In the same second he crouched low, firing to the right and left of the spearing light. He heard the gunman cursing Popcorn.

The gunman's lead cut the air about Rip, and then Rip, firing, saw the blinding light waver, and slide away from them and up the building. The flashlight struck with a metallic clunk on the landing, rolled a few steps and plummeted off into space.

Holding his own flashlight far out from his body, he threw it on the crumpled figure on the third-floor landing, and saw he was seemingly lifeless. He was not Dillon, nor anyone he had ever seen. He had been in his thirties, medium height and weight, and bore that kind of anonymous face so valuable to a criminal. Swiftly Rip took the .45 from his right hand, and searched him for a shoulder weapon, or one strapped to a leg, or stuck in a belt.

Finding none, he turned. Popcorn slumped where he sat, his head napping on his chest, and blood darkening his shirt.

Rip felt his pulse. There was none. Bradley came up then, followed by Moreno. Rip didn't hear what they said.

No crowd swarmed about to disturb them, and only two or three heads emerged from windows. Gunfire indicated trouble, and no one in the area wanted to answer police questions. They would learn in time, by the telegraph of the bars and flophouses, what had happened.

After Popcorn's body had been removed, the usual crime-scene examination proceeded on its dull, routine course. The only difference was that it proceeded quieter and swifter than usual. Rip wanted the killer's body taken away as soon as possible. If Dillon had sent the gunman, then if they moved swiftly Dillon might not learn for several hours what had happened. He might even come to find out, or telephone; and if he did either, an agent would be waiting.

"Just what's necessary," Moreno told the officers.

He turned to Rip. "We'll give out a news story the police were called after somebody heard shots, and we found two bodies, and we're now attempting to reconstruct what happened."

Looking down at the gunman, Rip felt shock. He had never become hardened to death. His eyes went to the belt, which had been inched up an extra notch recently, judging by the wear of the eyelets. The man had lost weight. Perhaps from hunger? His clothes in general indicated he lacked money: the wrinkled, dark trousers, the gray shirt open at the collar and fraying, the scuffed black shoes.

Moreno searched his pockets, finding six one-dollar bills and twenty-three cents in change, a loose key. A Social Security card identified him—unless the card had been stolen—as Daniel Shoemaker who had lived on Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois, at the time the card was issued, January 19, 1939.

Moreno checked Records by phone, and reported, "He's got a record going back eighteen years. Been arrested twenty-two times for everything from petty theft and knifings and plain drunks to one attempt to commit murder. He was convicted only once, for petty theft."

He added, "He's known as a runner. At one time or another, he's run errands for every hood in the city."

Rip said, "I don't think he knew anybody would be with Popcorn. Probably Popcorn did a little too much talking, and it got to Dillon."

Moreno nodded. "Sooner or later, Popcorn was bound to go out like this. I think he knew it. He said to me once, 'If someone puts one through me, captain, will you see I get some words said over me down at the rescue mission?'"

Moreno rubbed the sweat from his forehead with his shirt sleeve. "I'll stop in the mission tonight and see what I can do. The newspaper boys'll probably chip in something, and some of us at headquarters."

"Put me down for a couple," Rip said, and asked, "What about his people? Anyone to notify?"

Moreno shrugged. He said Popcorn had lived at the Springs Hotel on Spring Street, Room 29. Rip said he would go by.

He said, "Push it for all you can. If we can apprehend the subject before six o'clock tomorrow evening ——"

He noted it was 12:46 A.M. It was not tomorrow evening. It would be this evening. Less than eighteen hours away.

He stopped by the Springs Hotel, where he awakened a paunchy, unshaven fellow in his forties who was sleeping in a rocker near the door. When Rip told him Popcorn was dead, the man merely shrugged.

"Did he get any mail?" Rip asked. "We're trying to locate relatives."

"No, no mail."

"Can I take a look around his room?"

The man thought that over, nodded finally. "Don't take anything. He owes me a week's rent. They always wait to die until they owe me money."

Room 29 was seven feet wide and eight long. It contained an Army cot neatly made up and a rickety, hacked-up chest. Clothes hung on hangers on nails driven into the wall.

In the bottom chest drawer, Rip found several crumbling Christmas and birthday cards, a showbill of the Ziegfeld Follies dated 1920, a love letter dated 1914 and signed Effie, and the yellow, faded photograph of a lovely girl.

A man's lifetime—in a bottom chest drawer.

"How much did he owe you?" Rip asked.

The man scratched his ribs. "Ten bucks," he said craftily.

"He didn't pay you any ten a week."

"Make it five—since he's dead."

Rip handed him a five-dollar bill. "Give me a receipt made out to him. Paid up in full."

When he returned to the office, he found a message. He was to make immediate contact with the surveillance team posted on the street outside of Sheri Kimura's apartment.

In the quiet dark of Sheri Kimura's back bedroom, the agent sat very straight in the floral-print easy chair. He sat straight to keep himself awake. He noted the time on his watch's luminous dial. It was six minutes before one o'clock, not yet an hour since he had taken over the four-hour shift. On the nearby bed his partner breathed heavily in a sleep of exhaustion.

The agent reached for the vacuum bottle, and filled the cap with hot, black coffee which he sipped slowly. He smelled the good coffee aroma, and wondered how far it might carry—if someone restless and awake in the apartment below might smell it, and wonder. He longed for a cigarette, but the pungent odor would carry even farther.

Slowly he grew aware of something not quite right in the night's sounds. He concentrated but couldn't isolate the alien noise. It was something a little furtive. He extended the periphery of his hearing to a dog barking far away, and the roar of a plane miles distant. He pulled his attention closer, and was conscious of gentle, cautious movement in the yard outside.

He stepped to the window. Below him, almost hidden in the darkness gathered about a tree, stood a bulky man with a cap pulled well down on his forehead. He stood almost motionless, yet he had a nervous habit of moving one foot about.

The agent touched his partner, who came awake instantly and joined him at the window. A minute later the man emerged from the darkness, and advanced with deliberate pace into the apartment building. A half block up the street, two agents slid out of their surveillance car and, walking briskly, reached the yard and followed him inside.

The man's steps were heavy on the stairway, and they were slow. The agents in the bedroom felt their holsters and took up positions on each side of the open bedroom door. They waited anxiously as the man's steps stopped before the front door.

Even though they anticipated it, the sound of the doorbell, which was explosively loud in the stillness, startled them. They heard Sheri Kimura say something, and Lily Taguchi answer, then their bedroom door opened, and Miss Kimura emerged, pulling a gossamer negligee about her. She hesitated as she flounced her hair out, and audibly took a long breath.

The doorbell rang again, longer this time.

She took quick steps to the door, and called out nervously, "Who is it, please?"

As if the man hadn't heard, he rang again. She called louder, "Who is it?"

He answered this time, though they couldn't make out what he said.

She turned on the outside light and opened the door. She stood a little to one side and they saw a big, bulky, powerful-looking man in a dark suit and white shirt.

He said, "Pardon me, I must have the wrong place. I was looking for the Itos."

He stepped back to look at the apartment number. "Apartment four—1610 Senter Street."

She said, "You've got the wrong street. Senter's one block to the right."

They were certain she whispered something, but he was talking and blotting out for all except his own ears whatever she was murmuring.

He said, "I'm sorry I awakened you. Please forgive me."

She closed the door behind him, and sagged against it for an instant. Then she glided silently back to her bedroom.

The man turned right when he reached the sidewalk. He walked with that lumbering effect of those grossly overweight.

The agents working the street followed him. One stayed a half block behind while the other crossed the street and kept him under surveillance from that angle.

He never once looked back. He continued his deliberate, elephantlike gait to a corner, and there he waited for a bus. While one agent continued the surveillance, the other hurried back for the automobile. When the bus pulled up, and the man boarded it, the two agents followed in an inconspicuous dark sedan.

A half hour later, near the Union Station, he left the bus, stood on a corner in seeming uncertainty for a few minutes, then headed toward the station. He stepped into the nearest phone booth and had a little difficulty squeezing himself in so he could close the door.

One agent stepped quickly into an adjoining booth in time to hear the man say, "Is that you, Red? . . . The girl says the cops are all over the place. . . . Yeah, she says she'll let you know when it's O.K. . . . Yeah, Red, I got you. . . . Yeah, I got you."

He left the booth. Lighting a cigarette he looked about, and his casual perusal included the agent in the booth, who was talking into a dead mouthpiece.

Outside, the man stepped into a waiting taxi, and the agents ran for their car. They followed the taxi at a distance of a half block careful not to let a stop-and-go signal trap them. Eventually, after several miles, the taxi pulled up before an old, rabbit-hutch apartment building on Standar, off Pico. The man handed over a bill, waited for his change and, without tipping, disappeared inside the building.

The agents notified the field division and requested instructions. When Rip talked with them an hour later, they asked about interrogating the man. Rip thought not. The man would admit to nothing, even to knowing Dillon. But free, he might lead them to Dillon.

Shortly after three o'clock Kelly rose quietly from her bed, where she had fought wakefulness for four hours. At the door she glanced backward at Toby, who was sprawled on her stomach, her head buried in the pillow.

She groped her way through the hall into the living room, sank wearily into the big, old chintz-covered chair by the television and was alone in the dark with her thoughts. She speculated that Dillon would choose a lonely spot for their meeting that night. For that matter, he might not meet her, but instruct her to toss the purse out in some unfrequented spot, such as up on Mulholland.

She wished he had set up a time and a meeting place. It was the not knowing that harassed her.

At the creaking in the hallway, she tensed. Toby took shape in the faint light.

"Hi," she said. "This your night for sentry duty?" She dropped to the floor and leaned back, her arms hugging her long, gangly legs.

"The natives are restless tonight," Kelly said.

Toby looked up at her. "You'd better take a sleeping tablet, sis. You've got to get some sleep or you're going to fold up on me."

"I'll be all right. Don't worry."

"I've got to look after you. You're my allowance."

"I'm touched. Really, honestly touched."

Toby yawned. "What's going to become of me when you marry Pete?"

"He hasn't asked me."

"He will. How can he help himself?"

"You'll live with us, of course."

"I don't think so, sis. I'll marry Jack."

"Has he asked you?"

"Practically. Boys don't ask girls in so many words any more. It's dinosaur." She added, "Do you think Pete will ask you to marry him in so many words?"

"I don't know if I'd marry him if he did."

"Because he's been married before?"

"Maybe. I don't know."

Toby mulled it over. "I'd marry Jack, even if he'd been married before. I don't think you should hold a mistake against a man, if he really, honestly, truly, definitely loves you."

She added with conviction, "I like Pete. I'd marry him."

"He bribes you with candy."

Toby laughed. "The old payola to the little sister. It always works."

Toby turned serious, looked up at her. "You're hiding something. I can tell. You heard from the man, didn't you?"

Kelly hesitated, and Toby said, "You're just no good at hiding something."

"Yes, he phoned me," Kelly told her. "He's to deliver the money tonight. Bring it here with me from the bank, and he's going to call me, and tell me where. But don't go worrying because they'll arrest him the minute he shows up."

She added, "Mr. Ripley will want to know where you're going to be tonight."

BARBARA JOURNAL

OTHER VIEWS,
SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE
PATTERNS ON PAGES 88 and 89.

VOGUE DESIGN NO. 9989.

One-piece dress and cummerbund; 10–16 (31–36); 75c. Version shown requires 3⅞ yards of 39″ fabric without nap for dress and ⅞ yard of 35″ or 39″ fabric with or without nap, size 14.

Housewares Festival

11 reasons why this is the best pot in the world.

1. Lid locks in juices, nutrition, flavor! Special "lip" design forms a vapor-seal to cook goodness into food—not out!

2. Lid stores right in the pot. Just flip it, it nests; ready to stack, always on hand, on shelf—or up on the wall.

3. No need to stir—lid bastes by itself. Unique dome inside collects the good juices, drops them right back; keeps food moist naturally—automatically!

4. Lid lifts without pot-holder. Special finger-guard design makes sculptured handle easy to grasp. Made of ebony-look Bakelite, it stays cooler, too.

5. What's inside? Pure stainless steel, satin-finished to stay! No tough scouring, or polishing; no dirt-catching rivets punched through. Just wash it, it shines; as easy as dishes.

6. Remarkable "Radiant Heat Core" sandwiched in stainless spreads heat evenly—not just over bottom, but all the way up sides! No hot spots; heat wraps around food, cooks it evenly—bottom on up!

7. Locked-in Bakelite handles stay in place, stay cooler. Shaped to fit either hand.

8. You can cook waterless style, hold all the nutrition, taste and texture in meats, vegetables. (Directions with pot.)

9. Cooks like a dream—on low heat! Hoards heat so efficiently, cooking goes on even when burner's turned off!

10. So strong, your husband could stand on it. Shining, luxury-weight stainless steel stays brilliant without polishing.

11. Simple, sleek, functional design makes you feel wonderful just using it. Saucepans to skillets, Ekco/Flint has a beautiful range of the best cooking ware in the world. Why settle for anything less?

EKCO/FLINT

"It's Friday night. Jack said something about going to a dance, but I'll give him some excuse and stay home."

"You'd better go over to the Hendrickses," Kelly told her.

"I couldn't. Louella would be talking all the time, and I'd be waiting for you to call. I'd rather sit it out."

"Why don't you ask Jack over and watch television? Tell him you don't feel like going out—or something."

"I'll ask Jack over. Thanks for trusting me, sis. I don't know of any other girl's folks who'd let a boy friend come over when nobody's home."

"Hah. Maybe it's Jack I trust."

Kelly squeezed her tightly. If anything did happen, she needn't worry. Toby would manage, and very well. It was amazing how self-sufficient she had become. She had what their mother often said was better than an education, good common sense.

Six A.M. Twelve more hours. Rip rubbed the stubble and borrowed a razor. In the washroom mirror, his dull, weary eyes stared back at him. He splashed his face with cold water, rubbing it vigorously. Then he walked down the street to an all-night stand where he drank two cups of black, bitter coffee. As he drank, he read the story, SKID ROW "EDITOR" SLAIN. It was factual, but the words in cold type had been written by someone who had liked the man, and the liking warmed the story.

At eight o'clock Rip telephoned Sheri Kimura. Her soft, lilting voice answered sleepily.

He said matter-of-factly, "This is Ripley, Miss Kimura."

Her voice turned hard. "Yes?"

"I'm going to the hospital to talk with your son. If you want to be there ——"

For a moment she said nothing. He imagined she was curbing a strong desire to tell him where he should go. "I'm due at work soon."

"I'll arrange it with the drugstore."

"I don't suppose I have anything to say about it?"

"On the contrary, Miss Kimura. If you will help us—I'd rather talk with you than Joey."

"I told you I don't know where Mr. Dillon is," she said.

"I'll be at the hospital in twenty minutes," he said, and hung up. He was angry and anger had no place in his work.

At the hospital, Joey was swimming in the pool with three other youngsters. "Hi," Rip said, calling to him.

Joey looked up out of eyes big with surprise but said nothing. The supervising nurse let him get out of the water the best he could. It was a long, painful process as he dragged himself up over the edge of the pool by his arms, and then managed to get a foot under him. The nurse found chairs for them.

Rip asked, "How's the water this morning?"

Joey said, "My mamma doesn't like you."

"I'm sorry, because I like her."

"You do?"

Rip nodded. "I don't think she understands me. You know how it is sometimes with grownups."

Sheri Kimura appeared then, fresh and delicate as a cherry blossom. She wore a billowing summer print skirt that hugged her narrow waist tightly, and a white sleeveless blouse that exposed long, graceful arms.

She said tartly, "I see you couldn't wait." Rip rose, and brought up another chair.

Joey said, "He likes you, mamma."

She was sharp. "What have you been telling the child?"

"Just that. I think you're a lovely person, Miss Kimura, and so does everyone. But I think, too, you're a very confused person."

She stared at him. "You had no right to call on my minister. You're hounding me, trying to ruin me, just like they did my father."

"Listen, Miss Kimura, I didn't come to talk to you. I called you merely as a courtesy, and I don't expect you to interfere."

He turned to Joey. "I want to talk to your Uncle Dill."

"You want to see him?"

"Yes, Joey. Where can I find him?"

Joey looked to his mother. "Where does he live, mamma?"

"I've told this man I don't know."

Rip said, "He sends you toys, Joey?"

The boy nodded. "He sent me a big tiger. I got it in my room. You want to see my big tiger?"

"Sure, Joey, sometime. When did you get the tiger?"

"I got him on my birthday. He's a good tiger. He does everything I tell him ——"

"When was your birthday, Joey?"

"Don't you know when my birthday was?"

"No, I don't."

"Oh, well, you can't know everything."

"What else has he sent you?"

"A picture book. It has camels and elephants. Have you ever seen an elephant?"

Rip nodded, and Joey was impressed. "A real, live, honest-to-goodness elephant?"

Rip said, "I'll show you one next time the circus comes."

Sheri Kimura broke in. "Don't go promising a little boy something you don't intend to do," she said.

Ignoring her, Rip said to Joey, "We've got a date, remember, to go to the circus."

"You promise, hope to die?"

"Hope to die."

Rip continued, "When was Uncle Dill here last?"

Joey thought about it. "Years ago maybe," he said.

"Was he here on your birthday?"

"No."

"Did he say when he'd be back?"

"No."

"Does he write you?"

Joey turned to his mother. "Why doesn't he write me, mamma? I asked him special last time to write me."

"He's busy," Sheri said.

As Rip rose, the nurse came up. "Have a good swim," Rip said to Joey.

"Will you come back to see me?"

"Sure, I'll be back."

Sheri hugged Joey. "See you tonight, punkins. I've got a surprise for you."

Rip waited and walked out with her, the silence cold between them. Outside on the steps Rip said, "Will he be all right?"

"The doctors think so—in time."

She added with bitterness, "I don't know how you could do that to a child—cross-examine him like he's done something."

Rip said quietly, "Red Dillon sent a dog to your apartment last night, and you talked with him."

She retorted, "I'd never seen him before in my life. He got the wrong address."

"You told him the police were all over the place."

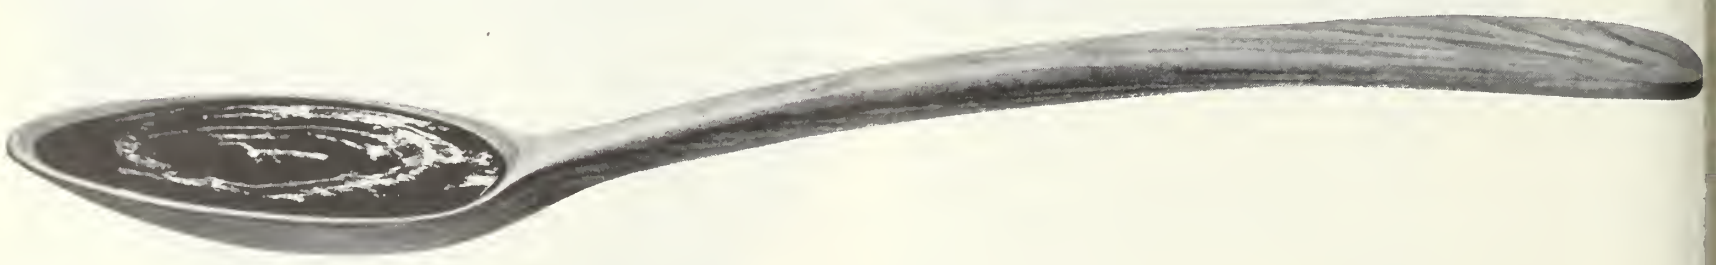
Her eyes flashed angrily. "You think it's because I'm a woman living alone you treat me like a criminal."

Rip shook his head. "Not as a criminal, couldn't, because you're not one—yet. You're a fine and decent individual, except for one fanatical attachment for a man who would kill you as quickly as anyone else if you crossed him. But I don't have to tell you that. You know it deep down."

He handed her the wanted notice on Dillon. "Here, read this."

She crumpled it up and threw the wad into the shrubbery. Then she went down the steps and turned toward the parking lot, walking determinedly, eyes set dead ahead. Rip felt the quick, sharp hurt of failure.

He turned back into the hospital and, leaving the nurse, asked to look at Joey's room. She led the way down a long corridor to the room Joey shared with three other boys. "They're in there," she said, indicating a row of wooden cabinet by his bed.



Rip asked, "Do you happen to know when his birthday was?"

"Sure and I know. We had a party for him. It was Tuesday."

Rip showed her a photograph of Red Dillon, and she exclaimed, "Why, that's the boy's uncle. He was here visiting him only a couple weeks ago. Seemed very pleasant."

"If he comes back, will you phone me at once?"

A.1. STEAK SAUCE...in 15-minute Meat Loaf

the spoonful that enriches every mouthful

Zesty, hearty A.1. Steak Sauce in the mix brings out more steak taste in any cut of ground beef

RECIPE: (Serves 6)
2 beaten eggs
1 lb. ground beef
1 c. rolled bread crumbs
2 Tbsps. A.1. Steak Sauce
1 tsp. salt • ¾ c. milk

Pre-heat oven to 450°. Mix ingredients in order given, pack meat mixture into greased muffin pans, rounding tops slightly. Bake 15 minutes. Garnish individual meat loaves with parsley, watercress or pickle slices. And put the bottle of A.1. Steak Sauce right on the table for generous pour-ons. Men love it!

SEND FOR FREE RECIPE BOOKLET
"Cooking With Your Hat On"

THE A.1. SAUCE COMPANY (DIVISION OF HEUBLEIN), HARTFORD, CONN.

re and I will, Mr. Ripley. I can't imag-
—"
aven't told the boy."
, of course not, and neither will I."
efully he took the toys out, examining one at a time: a tank that revolved and ooden pellets, a wind-up racer, a fire a cat that blinked his eyes, and the big which was soft, furry yellow with black and green glass eyes.
ut the tiger on the bed, patted him, and to leave. At the door, he glanced back.
oks like he'd just swallowed a man," he countdown began at noon. Six hours.

was penciling notes when Kelly entered nk's conference room. "Hello, Miss ood," he said, rising. He noted the yel-otton print dress, and the small silver at her throat, the only ornament she d you get any sleep?" he asked.

didn't hear him. "I saw a picture in the ng paper of the man who was with you pool last evening."
hoped you wouldn't."
fly, he told her about Popcorn. "He at this one was on the house because of o."
ish I could've baked him that pie."
nodded and began the briefing. "The t has certain limited possibilities. He instruct you to leave the money some-and then pick it up after scouting the orhood and making certain no one was But we doubt if he'll do this. He'll want rtue consists not in abstaining om vice but in not desiring it.

BERNARD SHAW

mine the package and see for himself e money is there, and he'll detain you e's doing it."
hen he finds the money's fake ——" won't."
on't understand."
. Burkhardt talked with the home and they're putting up the money."
can't take that responsibility—I just u won't be held accountable for it."

t I'd feel as if ——" ey're taking very little chance of losing ney. They feel you're the one taking the
, and if you're willing to go along on rubbed his neck as the hours told. "We give you a package with $100,000 en-
—"
, but it would be better, if you don't if you would pretend to embezzle the . Pocket the deposit tickets on the large nts as they come in, until you have d $100,000."
listened intently as he spoke. "We want b to look real, just in case Dillon has a t in the bank who may be watching you y check your work sheet after you're o see if you did withhold deposits. It's precaution."
continued, "Now he said he'd telephone night and give you instructions. He may le may meet you at any point after you he bank. If he does telephone you either bank or at home, we'll know about it.
on't get in touch with you unless we feel cessary. We won't move in until after ves you unless, of course, you're in e."
said, "I thought I'd carry a gun ——" ught the quick tilt of his chin. "Shouldn't u told me you weren't too well acted with guns."

smiled. "And you think I might shoot f you."
was glad she could still joke. She was a woman, this Kelly Sherwood. Their et in one quick communion. He wished ld take her place.
continued, "One or two minor points.
re you've got gas in your car. . . . Carry small change in case he asks you to make a phone call from a pay station. . . . Wear comfortable shoes and a full skirt so you can move fast if you have to. . . . And eat something."

He rose, asking, "Where will your sister be tonight?"

"At home—with Jack, if that's all right."

He nodded, and shortly afterward said good-by, and was gone.

When she reached the lobby, Pete came up. "Say," he asked, "how about a movie tonight—that one we missed?"

"Sorry, Pete, but I promised Toby ——"

"I'm going to drown that kid." He laughed. "Tomorrow night?"

"O.K."

"What time?" She walked away in a daze, not realizing she hadn't answered. Tomorrow night? Tomorrow night if she were still on this earth.

Mr. Welk bustled up. "You're late, Miss Sherwood. Six minutes."

As she opened Window 5, people flocked from other lines. The first customer was a young mother dragging along a four-year-old with a deflated balloon and saying to him, "I couldn't blow that balloon up again if my life depended on it."

The hours passed, and the line seldom dwindled. Mostly they were individuals depositing pay checks or withdrawing money for weekend trips. Shortly after four o'clock, the big deposits started coming in: $17,000 plus from an airlines office, $24,000 from a fight arena, $32,000 from a department store, $7000 from a night club, $9000 from another airlines.

Deftly she pocketed the deposit tickets until she had held out some $96,000. She took a deep breath of relief, and after that filed all deposit tickets in their proper slot. She slowly became conscious that someone was trying to signal her from the mezzanine. It was the switchboard girl, who indicated she had a call for her and would place it at the desk of a loan officer who was out.

Back in the office Rip found a memo from Agent Cronin:

Miss Bonnie Merkinson, children's buyer, Bullock's department store, advised that stuffed toy animals may be traced to their manufacturer through design, stitching, type of fabric, etc.

At the request of agents, she accompanied them to Dayton Hospital to inspect a stuffed tiger belonging to Joey Kimura.

After examining the tiger, Miss Merkinson advised that the hand detail and design of the face indicated the tiger was the product of Toy Animals, Inc., Culver City, California.

John S. Norton, sales manager, Toy Animals, Inc., advised the company had 14 outlets in the Los Angeles area. He supplied the names of the 14 outlets. He said the tiger in question was priced retail at $24.95.

That afternoon when classes ended, Toby and Jack headed for the Hangout. They took the last checker-clothed table. They ordered a malted milk each.

Soon the place was jam-packed, with everyone talking at once, and Pat Boone singing.

Toby asked, "You coming over?"

"You call mom," Jack said. "She'll say yes to you."

She was sliding out when the waitress beckoned from the phone booth. "Hey, Toby, somebody wants you."

"Me?"

The waitress nodded.

Mystified, Toby closed the door to shut out the uproar. A man's voice answered her hello. "I'm a friend of your sister's," he said hurriedly. "We got a business deal together. Did she tell you?"

Her heart kicked against her chest, and she put a hand over the receiver to shut out her breathing.

He continued, "Doesn't matter. Your sister's been shot. It was an accident. We were setting up the deal ——" He was talking so fast that his words ran together. "She's bleeding badly and somebody's got to get her to a hospital, or she's going to die. I can't take her because the cops want me. If you hurry—but there isn't much time. She's bleeding bad. I'm in a car at the corner of Cedros and Van Owen. You got that?"

(To Be Concluded)

THE ONE SHAMPOO UNIQUE TANDEM SHAMPOO
THAT'S REALLY TWO

Now...the one shampoo that's really two

NEW TANDEM™

You suds twice—same as always—but what a difference!

For the first sudsing twist the cap
to TANDEM GOLD

cleans hair completely the way no other leading shampoo can TANDEM GOLD is the shampoo that's a cleaning shampoo all the way through. Unlike other shampoos, TANDEM GOLD contains no conditioning agents to dilute its deep-down cleaning power. Nothing gets in the way of its richer, thicker, fluffier suds. Nothing stops it from getting hair clean, clean, clean—perfectly clean—because TANDEM GOLD is made to clean—and nothing else!

For the second sudsing twist the cap
to TANDEM GREEN

controls hair so completely there's no need for cream rinses

Now comes TANDEM GREEN shampoo to suds your hair into beautiful behavior—immediately! TANDEM GREEN's light, light lather cleanses gently. Adds the perfect finish to TANDEM's cleaning shampoo. Calms and quiets your hair. Puts it under real control. Brings the body and moisture that make hair alive and obedient. Encourages it to set without special rinses. Heightens every highlight! Lends the luster of healthier hair to every head it shampoos.

See what TANDEM's two let you do right after you shampoo

Style your hair any way right away. No waiting for hair to calm down. TANDEM makes it manageable instantly. Easy to comb, set and style any way.

Hair sets easily—stays easy to set. You can even pass up a pin-up or so. TANDEM makes hair easy to manage even after a toss-and-turn sleep.

Any hair is lovelier with TANDEM. Even baby-fine hair sets beautifully. Damaged hair and bleached hair take on happier, healthier, younger highlights.

NEWEST BRISTOL-MYERS DISCOVERY!

America has fallen in love with the new Princess phone

In white, beige, pink, blue and turquoise—attractive pl

it's little!... it's lovely!... it lights!

Small size is one of many reasons why the Princess is so popular. It fits in where you didn't have room for a telephone before—as an extension on a kitchen counter, on a writing desk or a bedside table.

Graceful styling is another reason why everyone is so charmed by this phone. You can put the Princess anywhere and be sure that its lines and the color you choose will blend in beautifully.

Lighted dial. It glows in the dark, so it's e find, and lights brightly when you lift the r so it's easy to dial. To order the Prince call our Business Office or ask your telephon

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

HOPE FOR VICTIMS OF STROKE

Prevent strokes before they occur? . . . Doctors hope to do so soon. Meanwhile, they have developed techniques which can often save the dying and restore some disabled victims to normal good health.

By ROBERT A. KUHN, M.D.

POSSIBLE NOW—

Desperately ill patients restored to normaley through brain operation.

Anticoagulant drugs pull patients through the critical period of acute attacks.

Surgeons achieving vast improvements (sometimes cures) by operating on blocked arteries in the neck.

LATER—

500,000 Americans yearly are felled by some sort of stroke, and the number of victims is increasing. This trend will be reversed if modern medical techniques are used to prevent strokes beforehand.

© 1960 BY ROBERT A. KUHN
THIS IS AN EXCERPT FROM THE BOOK
NEW HOPE FOR STROKE VICTIMS
RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS, INC.

In the foyer, the librarian bends busily over her glass-topped desk. She is humming softly, an almost inaudible sign of contentment, and occasionally she lifts her head to look affectionately at the scattered groups of peaceful, semisomnolent readers. Then, satisfied that her domain is functioning well, she returns to sorting check-out cards.

This plain, kindly soul is about to experience a terrifying ordeal. Sudden disruption of her brain function is several hundred seconds away. What could an expert medical detective offer on shrewd appraisal now, before this catastrophe? Surely there must be telltale signs of impending disaster, perhaps even some method of prevention?

Physically, the librarian gives the impression of exceptional good health. Fiftyish, spare and neat, she wears her smooth gray hair in an efficient knot. Her movements are quick and sure. Only in recent years has she needed her rimless glasses. One would suspect, and rightly, that here is a woman who seldom wastes a jot of patience on those who pamper colds and coughs by staying home when they could just as well be working. We decide with reasonable certainty that Miss Helen is medically well-nigh indestructible. But this brief survey has already eaten up all but a few precious remaining moments, and still we have found no helpful clues—no way to guess what is about to happen.

But wait: perhaps there is some hidden flaw of constitution? some illness passed on from forebears, a silent diabetes or unsuspected essential hypertension? Later we shall find out that, to the contrary, the librarian comes of long-lived, sturdy stock, untroubled by chronic disease. Now the seconds move inexorably by. Miss Helen flips another card, her face serene. One must watch closely now, for there will be little warning.

We are six seconds removed from terror. She swivels her chair to the typewriter, turns a card in with a practiced twist, and begins to type. Some vague premonition of disaster wrinkles her brow slightly; the rapid chatter of the machine slows, stops. One hand comes up tentatively to touch the scalp. She seems to be sensing an indefinable inner discomfort at the back part of her head.

One second now. A sudden savage pain tears at the nape of her neck, totally unlike anything this mild lady has ever experienced. Defenseless, she stiffens in rigid surprise before her typewriter. In the next few interminable seconds, bursting agony floods to a peak. The hushed quiet of the library is profaned by her scream. Her vision blurs and fades into the nothingness of merciful oblivion. The slight figure pitches forward on the desk.

For an instant there is frozen silence. Then pandemonium swirls about her. No one knows what has happened. She is gently lifted and laid carefully on a couch by a fat man, terrified and now perspiring freely, who had only just been about to take out a book. It is apparent that though Miss Helen is deeply unconscious, she is still alive. The words "heart attack" and "stroke" ricochet through the little knot of bystanders. Someone thinks finally to call an ambulance. By the time the white-garbed crew arrive, the patient is partly awake. She is very nauseated and begins to vomit repeatedly. She mumbles over and over of her bursting, unremitting headache—the while holding her temples desperately with both hands. Although half conscious, she seems to be using all four limbs with normal strength and co-ordination. She even helps to move herself to the stretcher as she is being lifted.

Those who were very close beside her, and were especially observant, might have been struck by the fact that her eyes no longer seemed exactly parallel, and one pupil was much larger than the other. But most would remember for a long while just a wretchedly sick little lady who had had some kind of terrible and painful seizure. One hour after arrival at the hospital, examination of her spinal fluid showed the presence of fresh blood. Our indestructible librarian has been the victim of a hemorrhagic stroke.

In a moment we shall follow our patient to the hospital and trace the steps which will be taken to investigate and treat her illness. Let us digress for a moment to consider the crippled ranks this woman has joined.

It is estimated that 500,000 Americans yearly are felled by some sort of stroke. Moreover, the huge number of victims seems to be steadily growing a little larger. The increase is probably a normal accompaniment of the rising average age of the population—strokes are more frequent in the elderly. And there is every indication that incidence of strokes will continue to mount, unless we find some way to reverse the trend.

What are the social implications of this problem? We can gain an idea from the fact that 1,250,000 individuals who have had one or more strokes live on in hospitals, nursing homes and other institutions. This figure represents about one in every 150 persons—of all ages—in our populace. Typically, these unfortunates are at least partially paralyzed, many without speech or power to recognize those about them, living out their years in hopeless invalidism. A few lucky persons recover "spontaneously" from stroke. Many have long since ceased to live in any real sense. Those permanently crippled constitute an incalculable drain on the mental and financial resources of their families. Sadly, many of the victims are experienced, highly trained men and women at the height of their productive power, stricken at the moment when their contributions to society are at a maximum. We can ill afford to squander such talent. Happily, we are now in a position to help many of these victims.

It is not generally realized that today, for the first time, we have the means to deal effectively with strokes. Depending very much on the type of stroke, appropriate measures can cure or greatly help many of the victims. It remains now to begin to apply these methods with concerted skill and diligence.

First of all, there must be some common understanding in regard to usage of the word "stroke." It is true that certain easily observed features of a stroke—such as paralysis—are generally recognized by everyone as characteristic or typical. But what, precisely, does the term mean?

"Stroke" has no precise meaning. It represents a medical way of saying paralysis, or coma, or loss of consciousness, or any other of a series of symptoms which have usually been found in the past to accompany this condition. It does not really matter which of the synonyms is used, for they can be—and are—interchanged freely and still connote a stroke. But all these words suffer from the serious flaw of being purely descriptive. None of them gives us any information about the possible cause of the catastrophe.

There have been unfortunate consequences in the past of using this word as a diagnosis: in other words, of using the designation "stroke" as a label applied to all who develop paralysis. Not long ago, comparable terms such as "rheumatism" and "growing pains" were respected medical diagnoses. With the advent of modern investigative techniques, these vague terms have all but vanished, to be replaced by exact designations of the illness of which they are the symptoms. In modern medical parlance, blanket terms such as arthritis, rheumatism and heart disease are frequently called "wastebasket diagnoses." They do actual damage by strongly implying the same causal agent, same clinical course, same treatment for all the patients lumped under each general heading.

Such a word is "stroke."

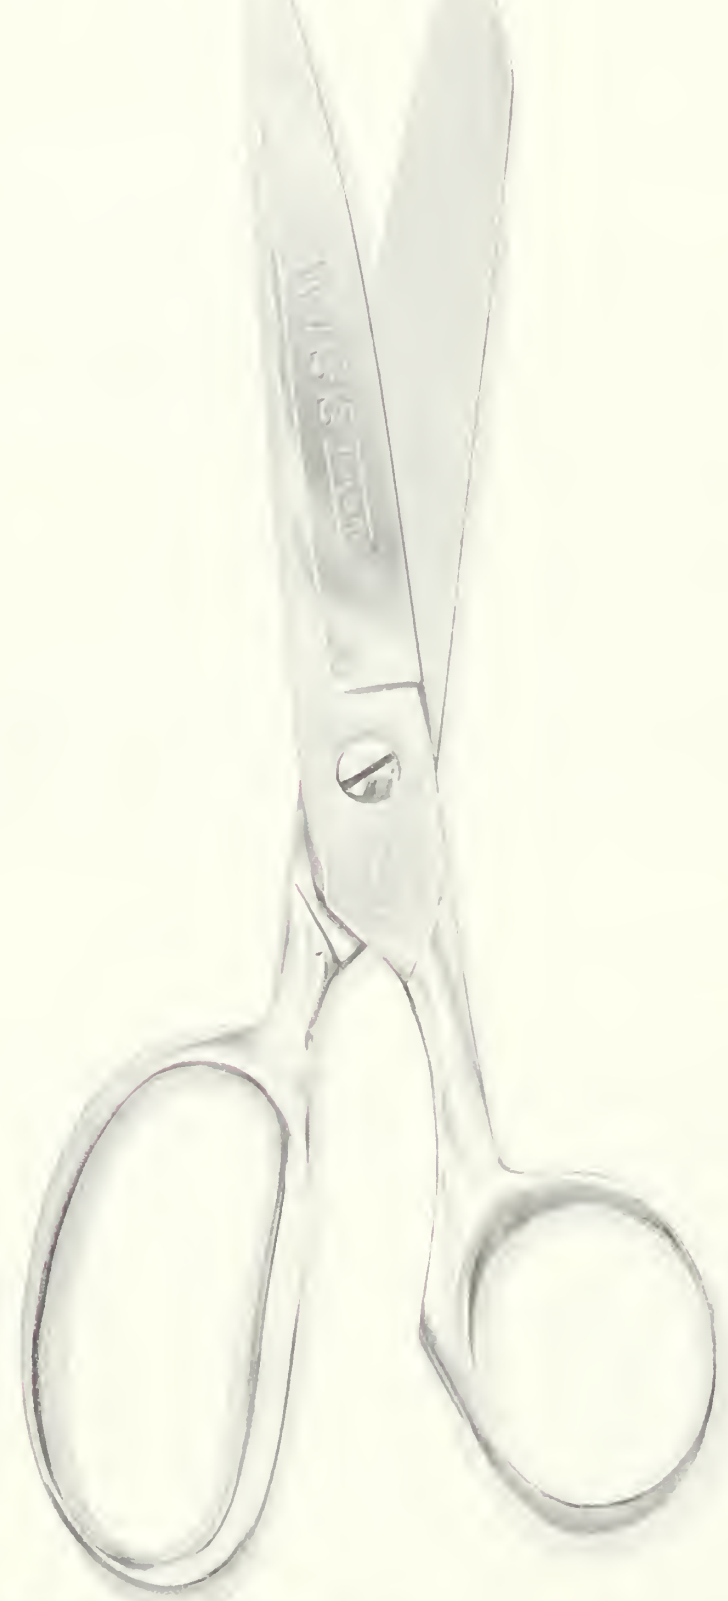
A medically accurate description of a stroke is a disruption of brain function due to some cause—we know not precisely what. The all-important answer as to where, and what, and how will come only after the systematic and patient application of special tests. Treatment must rest upon the solid bedrock of precise diagnosis.

For many years, once it had been established that a stroke had indeed occurred, little attempt was made to pursue the matter. The damage was done, the outlook was grave, and main efforts were directed toward making the patient as comfortable as possible. But during the past several years we have witnessed the development of a new and startling change in attitude toward the medical tragedy of the stroke victim. Universal hopelessness has been replaced by cautious optimism. What has happened to produce this revolutionary change in a period of only a few years?

It is not surprising that the brain—the monarch of all organs—has been more reluctant than the heart, the stomach, the lungs to yield its secrets to the scientific prob unusual sensitivity of even a normal b slight disturbances of its stable state h fronted investigators with hazards not dismissed nor easily surmounted. A sic is even more susceptible. Yet as resea vanced, technical difficulties crumble dramatic suddenness.

Today we have three effective m of studying brain structure—and, t it, the why and wherefore of st cerebral angiography, pneumoenc lography and electroencephalogra words more difficult to pronounce t understand, as you will soon see. E fore describing these tests, it might be pe to consider the external appearance stroke. What exactly do we mean by tion of the brain function"—what, ac happens to the patient?

There are many different causes of s and one patient who has the same k paralysis as another might well have de his stroke for an entirely different rea



Most frequently, during the cours stroke, paralysis of part of the body The most usual combination of paral volves the upper and lower limb and one half of the face, all on one side. T paralysis is present in all three sites, the of paralysis may be greater in the arm leg, depending on the exact spot in the of the damage. If paralysis is total i limbs it is termed hemiplegia; if (meaning that some movement in the a limbs is still possible) it is called hemip Variations in the severity of paralysis the limb hit hardest are due to slight ences in location and varying severity o damage.

Hemiplegia and hemiparesis are the kinds of paralysis shown by those lab having had a "stroke." (Note, though our librarian had no limb paralysis at a would have been ordinarily consider stroke victim by the layman.) Since paral half the body is the most familiar mar stroke, it has been assumed to be an inv sign of such an attack, yet this easily de symptom of stroke may often be absen

Onset of a stroke may be abrupt an lent—the "vascular accident" of the Even small hemorrhage into brain sub usually causes symptoms within secon the patient is deeply unconscious wi

CONTINUED ON PAG

SHEAR MAGIC

WISS

INLAID BLADES

LEND A HAND TO THEM

The 28,000 welfare and hea agencies supported by the Uni Fund are always ready to lend a ha wherever it is needed, with trai personnel, technical knowledge, dru food and clothing. They include h pitals, community centers, the B Scouts and Girl Scouts, homes for aged, the Salvation Army, ment health clinics, visiting-nurse servic Traveler's Aid, the Y.M.C.A. a Y.W.C.A., day nurseries, counseli centers and the American Red Cro The list is long. Even the m proudly self-sufficient of us have tak advantage of some United Fund se ice, and United-sponsored medi research benefits us all.

When the United Communi Campaign volunteer comes to y door this fall, lend her a hand. Gi generously to your local drive.

A public statement concerning Metrecal, a new concept of weight control

Several months ago, Metrecal® was introduced to the medical profession by Mead Johnson & Company, manufacturers of nutritional and pharmaceutical products. Many people have since learned of this product by word-of-mouth. To emphasize the role of the physician in problems of weight control and to provide accurate information on Metrecal, Mead Johnson & Company is publishing this factual report.

September of 1959, a new product—Metrecal was introduced to the medical profession by d Johnson & Company. It was developed to ide physicians with a new technique for use udicious weight reduction of overweight ents.

e wish to stress the importance of the physi- in problems of weight loss and control. This articularly the case for individuals who are endously overweight, patients with disease e kidneys, and patients with various forms of rt and blood vessel disease.

view of the broad public and medical inter- n weight control, many persons have learned letrecal by word-of-mouth; hence, this factual ement.

What is Metrecal?

trecal, when properly used, is an effective ght control agent. It is not a panacea.

letrecal is a complete food in powder form ch is mixed with water to make beverage ls. It is designed to provide a low calorie diet ch contains all basic nutrients required by a son on a reducing program. Metrecal contains drugs.

letrecal can be used as the total diet for the iod required to achieve the weight loss which est for the individual. Thereafter, it can be used indefinitely for one or two meals a day, or as the total diet on selected days to maintain desired weight.

In other words, the concept is measured calories according to the needs of the individual.

What does Metrecal do?

Overweight persons are able to lose weight on a properly devised Metrecal program simply because they take in fewer calories than are required to maintain weight. In this manner they lose weight naturally, without resorting to fad diets, complex schedules, or artificial appetite depressants. And Metrecal users are remarkably free from hunger—the appetite is satisfied normally.

What Metrecal cannot do

Metrecal is not a miracle cure for overweight. It cannot provide the will power required for weight reduction. It has to be used properly. It is imperative that the person who desires to lose weight stay on the Metrecal diet. This is not difficult since little, if any, hunger occurs after a day or two.

Medical evidence of effectiveness

Extensive clinical studies, conducted under medical supervision, have shown an average weight loss by Metrecal users of approximately one-half pound per day for periods up to six weeks. Some lose even more.

Most patients in the studies report little, if any, hunger. Many report that they feel better than before. Almost all find it relatively easy to continue on Metrecal.

What is in Metrecal?

One-half pound of Metrecal powder in frequently specified day's supply provides 900 calories or energy units, 74 grams protein, 110 grams carbohydrate, 30 grams fat and all essential vitamins and minerals in quantities that meet or exceed minimum daily requirements established by the Food and Drug Administration. Metrecal is available in all drugstores.

How to undertake a reducing program

Your physician is the best source of counsel and guidance in problems of weight loss and control.

Mead Johnson
Symbol of service in medicine

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

All the ease and gentleness of a fine color rinse...but look, it lasts up to 8 weeks! Blends naturally...no drastic change, no artificial look!

NEVER BEFORE, a hair color with rinse mildness plus long-lasting convenience; it conditions, too! Tecnique softly touches your hair with highlights, and accents its natural color . . . no drastic change, only new beauty. Always your own color is there. But unlike a rinse, Tecnique gently penetrates hair to last up to 8 weeks, often longer.

NO TOUCH-UP PROBLEM, won't shampoo out, streak or rub off. Tecnique, unlike ordinary rinses, tints and dyes, never looks less than beautifully natural. Exclusive ACTOGEN, a mild creaming agent, works color into individual hair strands instead of just coating the surface. Tecnique also blends in with new hair growth —never a tell-tale "dye line."

TECNIQUE WILL:	TECNIQUE WON'T:
• Highlight, accent natural hair color.	• Need touch-ups (never a "dye line").
• Last up to 8 weeks, often longer.	• Harm hair or add unnatural color.
• Condition hair with fine oils.	• Wash out, streak or rub off.

CONDITIONS, TOO . . . fine oils add luster, make your hair soft to the touch and easy to manage. Apply Tecnique any time . . . even right after a permanent . . . use it for years and never see hair go harsh.

ADDS THE ACCENT your hair needs for true natural beauty—the just-right dash of auburn, spicy brown or glowing gold. Shampoo-simple, you can't make a mistake, color action stops automatically. 12 shades to choose from . . . at all leading drug and department stores (also available as a moderately-priced sale service). Satisfaction guaranteed SHULTON, 630 5th Ave., NYC. Price 2.00 plus tax.

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

. . . a glimmer . . . a gleam . . .
soft color glows in your hair

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

ute or so, we may be fairly certain some l of bleeding has occurred. Sudden block large brain artery by a clot propelled by heart may be almost as dramatic in onset, coma is usually absent. At the other end he scale are "little strokes"—brief periods paralysis or numbness in the same limb ern as seen in severe strokes, but which r up spontaneously after each episode. h attacks may be repeated many times be- the first "real stroke" happens, and are luable warning signs that serious trouble rewing and that investigation is sorely led.

ymptoms as innocent as dizziness or igo continued over a period of many days be the initial manifestation of a stroke. very first sign of some strokes is an eptic attack, and in other strokes such ures never occur. Sometimes insidious menchanges diagnosed as early senility are the indications—in fact, personality changes stitute a most important clue in developit of some types of strokes. Despite popubelief, a stroke is no respecter of youth: ain kinds of strokes are found to occur cally in adolescents. There are no age rections in those affected by this illness.

hodgepodge of signs and symptoms might icate warning of a stroke. Such an attack ld be manifested in a number of ways. A tly simplified analogy will point up the culties in study of such an illness: If a den cutoff of electric power plunges half our home into darkness, hurried inspection disclose only uniform absence of light in blackened rooms—the dark rooms representing the external evidence of electrical-ver failure. Within itself, the darkness carno distinguishing features indicating its se. We must search for the cause, excludone by one a spate of possibilities, from a rted circuit to a prank-playing youngster. o, also, with the outward manifestations stroke. Cursory external examination of atient paralyzed in an arm or leg, or both, be totally unrevealing as to whether that alysis was caused by bleeding from an ry deep in the brain substance, or by any he different kinds of brain tumor, or by a sed-off artery in the brain, or one in the k, or by infection. It is the rule, rather than exception, that strokes produced by these ely different causes are externally the e. No singular marks of identification—magic clues—set apart paralysis due to one se from that due to another.

t is not possible, therefore, for even a hly trained specialist to determine, by ical or neurological examination alone, precise reason for any stroke. His years of erience may enable him to narrow the d down to a remarkably small area of the in. He may occasionally be able to pinpoint, hin a fraction of an inch, the exact path- ys that have been injured in the brain. Yet, n then, the all-important cause of the dam- remains incompletely known. It might be otal block of the tiny brain artery irrigating t site. The site might just as easily have n "starved" by impaired blood flow ough the parent vessel which is its main rce of supply and is located in the neck. Precise knowledge of why that particular area is affected might mean life or death to the patient.

Today the "why" of a stroke can be discovered with precision and accuracy by systematic application of special tests.

Until recently, one of the important tests for those with suspected brain disease involved taking X rays of the head. X-ray pictures are contrast photographs, depending entirely on the different densities (or compactness) of body tissue. X rays penetrate dense tissues poorly and porous tissue strongly—hence the contrast on the resulting picture. Skull bone, being very dense, shows clearly. The brain and its coverings and fluid jacket, however, are much the same density; therefore, in X rays taken of the head there is no contrast—only bony structures show.

Because of this limitation of X rays, investigative techniques have been developed which rely on "contrast substances" to outline structures within the head. Gas and dye are two such substances.

For many years, medical investigators searched for a contrast liquid which, when injected into an artery headed for the brain, would outline the blood-vessel "tree" clearly on an X ray simultaneously taken. The technique finally developed, called cerebral angiography, has truly revolutionized medical approach to vascular diseases of the brain.

Using special X-ray equipment, it is possible to follow the column of dye as it surges up the large arteries at the base of the neck, up through the neck itself, and finally into the brain. If we scrutinize these films with knowledge of what the normal blood-vessel pattern should be, any deviations from normal become apparent. For example, if a stroke is due to a slowly enlarging tumor, that tumor will produce a characteristic distortion of the blood-vessel pattern. If, on the contrary, the paralysis has resulted from chronic obstruction of a large artery in the neck, quite another pattern will show on the X ray. A third possibility is bleeding into the brain, which frequently results from rupture of a "ballooning" or weak spot in an artery wall. In such an instance, dye studies are the only method of making an accurate diagnosis.

During the early days of cerebral angiography, as is often the case with a new procedure, it had a somewhat dubious reputation. Dye injection was accompanied by an appreciable number of complications and an occasional death. Two factors were mainly responsible: first, the adverse response of the brain to the dye then used; second, the frequently desperate condition of the patient, which made the attempt to help a necessity, but which also increased the risk. This second factor has not changed, but the manufacture of new contrast liquids has, for all practical purposes, eliminated risks previously due to the dye itself.

The pneumoencephalogram, though originated many years ago, continues to be one of the most useful tools for the investigation of brain disease. In this test, gas is injected into the spinal canal and, as it rises into the brain, is seen in X-ray pictures as a delicate tracery of shadows within the skull. These pictures, taken at various angles, show the internal and external surface of the brain in silhouette, and yield extremely valuable information. Pneumoencephalography has certain drawbacks—none of the blood vessels, nor finer details of brain anatomy, can be visualized using this method. However, combined with cerebral angiography, it is of enormous value, and is one of the principal techniques used for the investigation of suspected brain tumors. When used with certain normal precautions, this method cannot be matched in terms of information gained and safety to the patient.

A third testing procedure of major importance in evaluating brain function, particularly in locating an accumulation of blood within the brain, is the "brain-wave recording" or electroencephalogram. Electrodes pick up incredibly small currents in the brain, and an amplifying apparatus converts this electrical energy into movements of a pen which "writes" on a moving sheet of paper. Each wavering line represents moment-to-moment changes in electrical potential between two electrodes.

What, exactly, has happened to our stricken librarian? Is it possible that she can be helped—perhaps completely cured? By using one or more of the tests described above, can we determine precisely what felled her in such

PLEASE USE YOUR POSTAL ZONE NUMBER!

To improve service and speed delivery of mail, the Post Office asks that you always include your postal zone number in your address.

We want to co-operate in every way we can—but we need your help. By giving us your zone number, you'll be assuring speedy delivery of your magazines.

Help yourself to better service. Use your Postal Zone Number—always!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

news... the shape-retentive Double Knit Jersey Suits by Handmacher will look wonderful all the time when you have them Sanitone dry cleaned for that feel of newness and good fit. Handmacher recommends SANITONE to preserve the fresh look and textural beauty of your garments—cleaning, after cleaning, after cleaning.

Double Knit Jersey Suit by Handmacher about $60

Ask your dry cleaner if he uses Sanitone.

Sanitone
DRY CLEANING SERVICE
A Division of Emery Industries, Inc.
Carew Tower, Cincinnati 2, Ohio

In Canada
EMERY INDUSTRIES (CANADA) LTD
675 Nelson St.
London, Ontario

a brutal fashion? It will be recalled that the onset of her stroke was explosive, with terrific head pain and almost immediate loss of consciousness. In addition—and in this she is not typical of others with stroke—she does not seem to be paralyzed. The reason for this becomes apparent only after we have conducted an examination in the emergency room at the hospital. Violent onset, unbearable headache, boardlike neck and incessant vomiting—all are explained by the bloody fluid found when her spinal column is tapped.

This patient has experienced a classic sequence of events for brain bleeding. She has had a hemorrhage somewhere within her head—we can even make an educated guess as to the location. We know, for example, that a massive hemorrhage within the substance of the brain itself almost always causes paralysis of one or more limbs. She has had no such paralysis, so we speculate that this hemorrhage has occurred from an artery within the skull, but before it enters the substance of the brain.

It is now vital to determine the exact point of artery leakage. For this we schedule the patient for arteriography.

In the X-ray special-study room, dye-injection studies of the librarian are performed. On the film series there can be seen quite clearly a small weak spot, or blister, like the bulge of a weak spot in an automobile inner tube, located at the junction of two medium-sized arteries beneath the brain. This blister, undoubtedly present since a very early age, has for some unknown reason chosen this particular moment to rupture. It let loose a raging arterial stream into the skull which then subsided momentarily for reasons as obscure as those surrounding the rupture. Sealing of the hole took place—or she certainly would have expired within a minute or two.

It is well known that after one such bleeding, future rupture at the same weak point is very likely to recur, and that chances of surviving subsequent attacks are exceedin slim. So now Miss Helen faces brain surg to clip off the malformed blood vessel. Thou there is considerable risk, her outlook survival and cure is far better than it wo have been ten years ago—when she might w have been released from the hospital only suffer a second and fatal hemorrhage.

It is probable that about one third of strokes are due to hemorrhage within head. A large number of those affected, p ticularly those in the older age groups, ha in the past been said to have "spontaneou bleeding, in that the exact reason for hem rhage was at the moment not complet clear. There are fairly accurate data conce ing those who die as a result of intracran bleeding, for in many of these instan autopsy is requested and performed. But our only information about brain hemorrha is derived from examining those who ha died from it, our attitude toward brain blee ing will surely be pessimistic.

This pessimism is unwarranted. After a one does not make generalizations about extremely poor outlook for all patients w peptic ulcer by considering only those dyi in the throes of an acute hemorrhage! It possible to offer real help to some bra hemorrhage victims through surgical remov of the clot if it is done shortly after the init bleeding. There seems little doubt that ma people have brain hemorrhages which go u detected and from which they recover. Ma of these could be protected against furth bleedings by alert and vigorous surgical ma agement. These surgical triumphs occur mo and more often with early accurate diagnos for which cerebral angiography is indispe sable.

It was assumed in the past that strokes a due to three main causes: cerebral thrombo (thickening and closing off of a blood ves in the brain), cerebral embolism (block of brain artery by a particle being carried by t blood stream), and cerebral hemorrhage (ru ture of a vessel in the brain). Hemorrhage indeed responsible for about 30 per cent strokes, embolism for about 10 per cent. B the remaining 60 per cent of strokes ha been erroneously lumped together as due cerebral thrombosis.

Recently there have been a number thorough studies of several groups of patien with hemiplegia or hemiparesis due to initial unknown causes. The strokes, which we alike in that each patient showed partial complete paralysis of one side of the bod were fully investigated, using modern metho Causes of these apparently similar strok were discovered to be as follows:

One third of the patients had complete partial occlusion in the neck of one or both the main (carotid) arteries carrying blood f the brain.

The importance of this unexpected findi can hardly be overestimated. In the pa disease of the main artery to the brain ha been considered so rare as to be a medic oddity. The extraordinary frequency carotid blockage is only now becoming a parent—more and more of such cases a turning up each day. Yet stroke due to th cause cannot be differentiated from strok due to another cause unless special studies a made. Symptoms as innocent as vertig dizziness and brief periods of numbness of a arm or leg are warning signs of such troubl These warnings are usually ignored—wi development of a real stroke within weeks months. Most of these cases slip by unreco nized even today, at least until severe paralys has occurred.

Victims of carotid occlusion are, in on way, extremely fortunate. The artery is readi accessible to direct operative exposure and remedial surgery—much more so than if th clogged vessel were within the brain. Certa patients with stroke due to carotid occlusio in the neck can therefore be cured or vast improved by prompt surgery to remove or by pass the obstruction. Naturally the soon warning signals bring the patient to the do tor, the better his chances are.

One third of the patients had develope blocked arteries within the brain itself. The ividuals who have stroke due to nce considered the most typical -closing off of a major artery in or of one of the important mounting evidence that patients ed arteries in the brain can be pecial anticoagulant drugs. There e indication that if the patient can ver the critical period of the acute rtain amount of reconstruction of in the narrowed vessel may be rough intensive treatment. So f cerebral-vessel disease scarcely espair—vigorous early treatment store much function.

ter of the patients had tumors or ccumulations of blood within the ding certain types of malignant ths, these conditions represented peful aspect. Such patients are eurosurgical problems. Early diag- icularly important to effect a cure, ideal circumstances and with early ome of the happiest results occur ases. If the mass of blood or tumor arply circumscribed, and has not damaged adjacent brain sub- pressure or by squeezing off its ly, brain operation can often con- sperately ill patient to complete aining small percentage of strokes to be due to relatively rare causes, ction of the brain, injury to it from involvement by disease spread n the body. The correct diagnosis ed by exclusion—after the usual failed to uncover the commoner ere are only a few known possibili- onsidered. Some small hint eventu- nedical attention from the external of the "stroke" to focus on the culprit.

Looking over the groups of stroke victims described above, we see that most of them needed specific treatment of one type or another. The application of a battery of investigative techniques was the only possible way to sort them into groups according to cause. Appropriate and specific therapy was the next step. The number of individuals in these groups who might "get well by themselves" is microscopically small or nonexistent.

Due to the relative newness of these concepts, it is not surprising that testing procedures are not yet routine. As with any other scientific advance, there is some lag between development of a new method and its mass application. There are factors which hinder present-day routine use of such tests, especially in smaller hospitals. Radiographic equipment is bulky, elaborate and expensive. A special room for the techniques must usually be set aside. Each of the tests is time-consuming, and requires collaboration of a number of specialists in allied medical fields. But these are relatively minor difficulties and there is no doubt that they will soon be overcome.

Several years from now it may be that routine cerebral angiography will form an integral part of annual medical examinations for all those reaching fifty. Today, utilizing certain warning signals of impending stroke, medical or surgical treatment can effectively prevent a stroke from developing. Modern medical techniques have established a major breach in the wall surrounding vascular diseases of the brain. The next decade should witness consolidation of the ground we have gained, and a steadily brightening future for victims of stroke.

DR. ROBERT A. KUHN is a neurologist and neurosurgeon. He has been in private practice for the last five years, was previously a teacher in his special field, and engaged in research in brain and spinal-cord physiology.

INQUIRY

By LIZABETH MCFARLAND

ne, where does Fancy dwell?
hes gone by I knew her ell —— ke a bud in spring's lapel, joy.
t fruit the midnight schooloys steal.
was the face all poems onceal.
hen she wore them, pearls ere real y!"

know the party: lived pstairs.
at one that gave herself uch airs."

e tell Miss Fancy I inquired.
nd her of the May we hired wer cart, its axles fired
spring.
roamed all day through the gray city
g 'FLOWERS deserve the retty!'
gave, as well, to the kind or witty
spring."

Mister, she used to lodge top floor.
ur friend don't live here any more."

more? Lost, then?
Discredited? ell me, where has Fancy fled?"

Arrive looking fresh! In a Boeing jetliner, you ride so smoothly, and get there so soon, you actually step off as fresh as you stepped on. For the most thrilling travel experience of your life, fly Boeing—world's most popular, most proved jetliners. More than 3,000,000 women passengers already have!

BOEING 707 and 720

These airlines now offer Boeing jetliner service: AIR FRANCE • AIR-INDIA • AMERICAN • B.O.A.C. • BRANIFF • CONTINENTAL • LUFTHANSA • PAN AMERICAN • QANTAS SABENA • SOUTH AFRICAN • TWA • UNITED • VARIG • WESTERN. AVIANCA, IRISH start service soon, EL AL in 1961. NORTHEAST & PAKISTAN operate Boeing jetliners under lease.

Advertisement

Virginia Bruce tells

Hollywood's Secret of Staying Slim After 30

"Every woman over 30 might do well to take my advice on keeping a trim figure," said lovely motion picture star Virginia Bruce in an interview. "That's the age, you know, when so many women get careless about the way they look."

And how right she is. Just glance around you. Even look at yourself. Are you guilty of appearing older than you should because of extra weight? Then listen to Virginia.

"The real answer to weight control is appetite control at all times. And what's my secret of appetite control? A low-calorie, vitamin and mineral candy, specially made for reducing. It's called Ayds." Then Virginia gave this explanation of how simply it works.

"Taken before meals as directed, Ayds curbs your appetite so you automatically eat less and lose pounds naturally.

"Like many of my Hollywood friends," said Virginia, "I've discovered it lets me eat what I want, only I find I want less.

"Why," she continued, "I enjoyed such delicious dishes as beef stroganoff, macaroni and cheese—even ice cream—and still lost 9 pounds on the Ayds Plan. Anyone can do it!"

Curious to know more about this reducing-plan candy, this writer did a little investigating and uncovered some significant facts.

Unlike liquid crash diets and reducing drugs, both of which can be harmful to health, Ayds Candy is absolutely safe. In fact, it is medically approved by physicians. In over 500 clinical studies, Ayds has been shown to be far more effective than any other product tested.

And best of all, reducers say that once excess pounds are lost on the Ayds Plan, it's the easiest, pleasantest way in the world to help control weight and stay slim.

One thing more—the economy of Ayds. It costs only eleven cents a day, just a fraction of what you pay for most fad formulas. A box of Ayds holds a thirty-day supply. If you'd like to trim down the way the stars do, see your doctor before reducing and have him write for the medical journal report on this candy. Then get Ayds Reducing Plan Vitamin and Mineral Candy (the vanilla caramel kind or the softer chocolate fudge-type) at any drug or department store.

Campana Corp.

PEACEABLE LANE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 56

He winced at an at-first-unidentifiable blast of human noise, and then, peering under the newspaper, realized that his son and a raucous accomplice, Benjy Abram, from across the street, were charging around the house in pursuit of a football.

"Catch it, butterfingers!" Bill Jones screamed. He launched a wobbly pass and Benjy charged downfield. Matt cringed as the flailing young cannon ball came down on him.

"Hey!" he yelled. "You monsters trying to kill me?"

Benjy pulled up, abashed at the sign of hostile life. Bill blandly retrieved the football.

"Try it again, butterfingers!" he yelled.

"Stop!" Matt lapsed into a pleading tone. "Look, son, why can't you go play in Ben's yard?"

"Because my mother chased us out already," Benjy said. "She said we were too loud."

"She's right. You're too loud. Look son, you and Ben find something quiet to do and I'll blow both of you to the price of a Good Humor, the de luxe kind."

The opposition consulted through extrasensory perception, decided to surrender, collected and departed.

"I knew he'd pop for it," Billy muttered as they left. Matt heard and shuddered.

From somewhere came the high-pitched whine of a lawn-mower engine. Probably Zack, Matt thought. Nobody on Peaceable Lane mowed his own grounds except himself and Zachariah Gold, who kept up the mortgage on the acre to his left.

He turned his head as the mower's whine grew louder and he saw Gold's tall, heavy figure moving steadily up the slope. Looks hot, Matt thought, and on impulse straightened up and yelled. Gold shut off the engine and came leisurely across the grass.

"You trying for a heart attack?" Matt asked. "Sit down and cool off and I'll make you something."

He arose, found a glass, peered into the ice bucket, saw its contents were still solid.

"It's good," Gold acknowledged, sipping at the drink as he settled into another chair.

"Zack, how come you mow your own lawn?"

"Two reasons," Gold said. "Number one, I can't afford the eighty bucks these Italian barbers would charge for it. Second, I need the exercise."

"I should have been able to figure that out for myself," Matt said. "It was idle curiosity, you and I being the only do-it-yourself grass barbers in the neighborhood."

"Why do you?"

"Same reasons, same order of importance."

"Well, it isn't going to kill us to cut our own grass," Gold said.

Matt Jones and Zachariah Gold were casually and comfortably friends. It was an undemanding relationship, but probably closer than most friendships on Peaceable Lane, whose eleven householders were not much given to intimacy.

Their talk was desultory, in tune with the day. Gold gibed at Matt mildly for his failure thus far as chairman of the street's community swimming-pool committee to get the pool ready for summer. Matt defended himself on the ground that another neighbor and committee member, John Ainslie Outerbridge, had not yet hired a lifeguard. When David Bronson, Matt's neighbor on the other side, appeared distantly in his back yard, Gold was moved to observe that he had heard Bronson was trying to sell his house.

"That," Matt said, "is a sign of spring as sure as robins. Every year Bronson tries to sell his house. How about another of these?" he asked, jiggling his empty glass.

"Not me, thanks. I still have what looks like a quarter section to go." Gold raised his heavily muscled bulk and moved off toward the hemlocks.

The lawn mower coughed and began to howl. Matt, lying back dreamily, heard a door bang and saw his wife coming toward him across the grass, tall, blond, with usually, somehow, an aura of freshness and light about her. He watched her a with approval, forgetting that she w ably coming to call him to unwelco at the grill.

"How are you, good-time Charley said, smiling down at him with s belying the insult. "Coming back to

"Don't nag me, darling," Matt sa fortably. "You know how I am—from the undertaker."

"Do you think you have the stre burn the steak?" Ellen asked.

Matt grunted, "I guess I can face gathered his lanky parts together and to come upright. Ellen picked up the t they walked to the cedar shakes and f pile of the Jones castle.

Matt found the salt, pepper grinde of garlic, the heavy knife he liked steak laid out on a wooden tray. He the fire for a moment before driving t into the heavy slab of meat and dro on the grill precisely where he wante once the meat sizzled hotly and sen haze of aromatic smoke.

The telephone rang. "I wonder w is," Ellen said. "Not one of those twen ute party post-mortems, I hope." She into the house.

"It better not be," Matt said dang to her retreating back.

"Don't worry, I'll cut her off, whoeve

But she did not, and Matt, guid steak toward the precise degree of pi grew first anxious, then irritated. At lifted the meat from the fire and soun indignation.

"Hey!" he yelled. "You want to eat Billy! Ellen! Come on, knock it off."

"Stop squalling," Ellen said, comin the house. "We're ready—that is,
Billy's in the bathroom washing off t nacles. Everything's ready. Bring the "Where were you?" Matt asked ir

"That was Laura."

"Oh, the Cusack. I should have gu

The nearing hoofbeats of Jones Juni ing the parts of both Matt Dillon and sand bloodthirsty Comanches in down the stairs put a stop to that subj

"I want that part," Billy announced, ing off the war whoop to point an ima scalping knife at the tenderloin. "No mom. Gimme a little potato. No butter.
no butter. Aw gee, jeepers!"

"You'll take butter and like it," Mat
"What did Cusack have on her—you excuse the expression—mind, Ellen?"

"The Bronsons are selling their hous

"I know. Zack was talking about it."

"To a Negro?" Ellen said. "Did he t that?"

"You mean like Clarice?" Billy dem showing interest.

"Let it go, let it go," Matt said, so a note of warning for Ellen. "Come o give those potatoes a break, hear me?"

"I did. I ate most of them." Billy so aggrieved. "There was a black man an at Bronson's today. Not black exactly. of brown. The lady's pretty."

"You saw them?" Ellen asked.

"Sure. They were there twice this With some white man the first time.
be excused?"

"May, dear. 'May I be excused?'"

"O.K., may," Billy agreed.

He was gone, and Matt looked at his
"How is it we managed to father a tor he asked above the receding clatter.

"You fathered it, remember?" Eller primly. "Anyhow, he makes me enviou to say proud."

"I'm proud of him, but I'm not goi let him know it too often. He's about t on me most of the time the way it is. Ta way he appears to have been casing the sons; and that reminds me, what di Cusack have to say anyhow?"

"Laura said Mrs. Weissman told h Bronsons have an offer from a Negro."

"Laura Cusack is off her rocker abou enty per cent of the time and the other she's just plain mean."

CONTINUED ON PAG

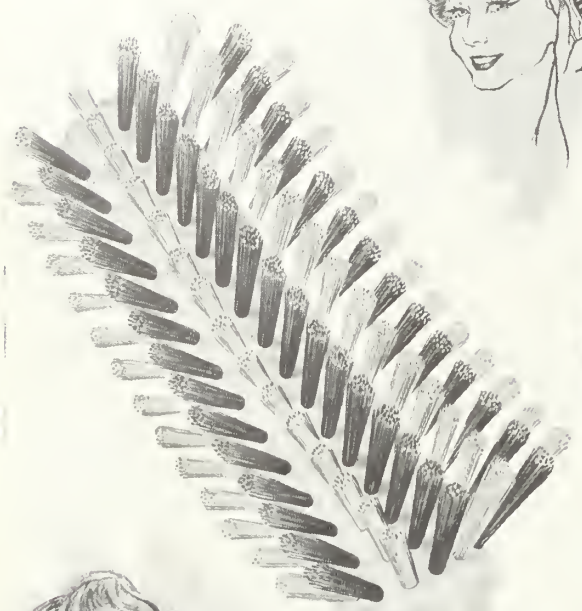
e of the most exciting women in the world: Meg Westergren

STERGREN, elfin, exquisite—busy! A hard-working she is also a devoted wife and the mother of two ung children . . . "I'm often tired, but I must never show it." She uses Pond's Cold Cream to deep-cleanse and moisturize, to ease away tension lines . . . "Pond's leaves my skin so clean, keeps it beautifully soft and smooth."

SHE'S BUSY . . . YET SHE'S BEAUTIFUL . . .
SHE USES POND'S

! POND'S COLD CREAM IN BOTH CREAM AND NEW FLOWING FORM

or you who love lotions—Pond's Flowing Cold a wonderful new form of Pond's Cold Cream! clusive new flowing cleanser is creamy-rich as e cold cream can be . . . never strips your skin drying liquids. Pond's, in cream or flowing form, beautifies as it cleanses. Moisturizes to soften and smooth . . . "plumps up" skin cells so tired lines fade, tension vanishes. Use Pond's to beauty-cleanse at night, to moisturize under make-up all day. With Pond's you need never be too busy to be beautiful!



It's New!

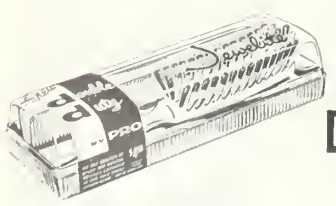
The Jewelite Double Duty is a new kind of HAIR brush—with two kinds of bristles!

White nylon bristles "comb" hair—gently massage scalp!

Black natural bristles hold moisture, spread natural oils through your hair!

Small modern handle! Curved bristles hug your head!

Rounded nylon tips won't snag hair, and they guard your precious scalp!



Look what's happened to your hair brush! Think what can happen to your hair! The new Jewelite Double Duty Brush is a new style for any hair style. A safer brush for your hair and scalp —because Jewelite rounds the end of every nylon bristle. Made by the makers of the famous Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush and other quality tooth, hand and hair brushes and combs. Developed and tested by famed Hair Institute. Illustrated, white nylon, with comb, $4.95. Other styles in marbled beige, blue and white, $3.95. At your favorite store. PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., Florence, Mass.

Jagged nylon tears and wears out hair!

Round-end Jewelite nylon guards scalp as it grooms hair!

Jewelite
DOUBLE DUTY
HAIR BRUSH BY PRO

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 146

"This came from the Weissmans. You know how Mr. Weissman is; he knows everything that goes on. And remember Billy."

Matt sat back and considered for a moment and then let his head fall back and the laughter roll out. "A colored family! Straight across the street from John Ainslie Outerbridge! Oh, brother!"

"Matt, I hope you're out of last night's laughing jag. Straight across the street from the Outerbridges is next door to us."

As Matt Jones was nursing the steak on his back-yard grill, a scarlet Jaguar roadster wheeled onto Taconic State Parkway and went flashing south.

"Trying for another ticket, honey?" The voice of the woman beside the driver fell somewhere between irritated affection and anxiety.

His quick grin flashed at her. "I'm watching," he said. "I'm watching. Trust papa."

"I'll trust you right into jail someday."

"Promised the sitter we'd be back by five. We'll make it." He fell silent, giving an intent, joyous concentration to the car.

At this swift pace only the car was spectacular. But, had it been at rest, anyone encountering its occupants would have seen the woman first. It was not only her costume, although it was notable: a loden-cloth car coat with its hood trimmed in mink. The face, framed by the oval of mink, was arrestingly beautiful. Her mouth was rich and sensuous. The mouth and the lustrous huge eyes seemed at first to make all of her face. But there was more. Those who had time and the chance to study this arrangement of features, particularly the man beside her, were not likely to grow weary of it. Over a dozen years he had painted her a hundred times and unfailingly found new ways of seeing her vivid beauty.

The man himself was worth a second look. The face, a triangle wedging down from wide-set, confident eyes and high cheekbones to a mobile, somehow arrogant mouth, was instinct with vitality. Here were two vibrantly handsome human beings, and both were Negroes.

Far ahead a glint of sun on metal seemed to suggest the possibility of a state patrol car. He studied it, narrow-eyed, and then eased the pressure on the accelerator. The driver turned a pleased, inquiring look toward the woman.

"You liked it, Margo?"

"Why ask? You know I liked it. I would like the moon, too—and I'm just as likely to get it."

He laughed exuberantly. "You'll get this one, baby."

"We thought that once before."

Sudden, sullen anger darkened the man's expression. "I know. But not twice. Nobody's going to put the freeze on me the second time—not after I think I'm in."

Pride and worry chased each other across her face as she studied him through the wind-lashed fringe of mink. "You're so tough. It scares me. Nobody gets everything they want."

He grinned at her. "I do. I got you; anything else is easy."

She was silent wondering, as often before, why it was that anger, more than anything else, seemed to nourish and enrich this man. Others of their race either made peace with circumstance and learned to live with it, not necessarily in craven humility, or were destroyed by it. But not Lamar Winter; there was no compromise in him. She felt a puzzled glory in him, but he frightened her as well.

"I made him an offer. I'll bet you another mink coat he's going to take it."

"Oh." All at once the daydream bred a nightmare fringe of terror. "Lamar, stop this thing. I can't think or talk the way you drive."

He flashed an indulgent grin at her and let the pressure ease. The car slowed until he braked it smoothly and it rolled onto the grassy shoulder of the parkway. "We're plumb solid stopped, baby. You can start talking—thinking, too, if you want."

"Don't be smart-alecky. You know you scare me."

"O.K., I scare you. But I love you too. That's why I'm going to get this house for you."

"Will he dare? I mean dare take y fer?" The creamy face was taut with s
"You don't understand." Winte curled. "This one's a pigeon, our l pigeon. Bronson's sore enough at his ne not to give a damn. For us that kind diamonds."

She was silent, brooding. "But we'd live there—with them. Will they let us today . . . those kids in the yard. Wha the kids? What about Tod?"

Winter's face softened and he to hand gently. "Margo, listen. You've face up to it. We can hand ourselves an ber of reasons for wanting that house.
it's reason enough that you want it an afford to pay for it. I grew up on th side of Chicago. You know what it w No kid of mine is going to grow up i lem. Especially not Tod. He's not enough."

"This may be worse," she said. " these people aren't going to take us down—just like that. You know they'r
"Look, baby, all they have to do is l alone. I ask no more than that, but I'n to see we get that."

She sighed. "I hope you're right. How did you offer him?"

"What he asked. Thirty-six thousand "It's an awful lot of money. Is the worth it?"

"No," he said. "To a white man it w be worth within four thousand of that.
that and he knows it, and we both kn other knows. Bronson's a thief, but exa cause he is, he's also my pigeon."

She shook her head. "I can't help it. I dangerous to me. Isn't it there somewhe man you work with lives? The adv man?"

He grinned at her. "Sure, that's wher lives—right next door."

"Oh, Lamar. Can we do this to him frowned. "And there's something else. like that man Fox. Do we have to have broker?"

"I'll go at that one backward," Winte
"We don't have to like Fox but we've use him. We'd never get to first base with a guy like Bronson—unless we white broker out in front. I know it an knows it and that's his business. Th other part. Matt. How's it going to hurt

"You know what I mean. How d think he's going to take it—a client, a m work with?"

He sobered momentarily. "If Jones a Macmillan outfit stopped bringing me somebody else would. But I did think the other part of it. I really did. I do wor the guy and we work good together, bu ple like us just plain can't afford to let like that stop us. We have to look out fo selves—we can't look out for him."

"Does he know?"

"He does not. There are two good r for not telling him. It's none of Matt J business where I live or how I spen money."

"But it's his business where he lives."

"I know that, honey, and that's the part of it. The truth is, I like the guy, like him. So I can't put that on him. You I tell him he'll have to take a stand. He'l to be for us or against us."

"But you can put a pri on your wife and son!" Ell
Jones said. Which should co first with a man — his family his principles?

READ
PEACEABLE
LANE
BEGINNING ON PAGE 56

"But if he's against us? What then?"

Now he was entirely serious. "I told you, honey. I like him—I don't like many white men. The truth is, I don't dare put the pressure on him. If he went bad on me under pressure—and the pressure on him would be terrific—then, bam, I'd have to hate his guts."

"But he's going to find out anyhow—in the end."

"That's the difference. So long as he doesn't know beforehand, it's impersonal. This way it's nothing between us."

Monday morning Matt waited at the bus stop under the parkway overpass. Ordinarily Ellen would have driven him to the station, but this was her car-pool day. She was off already making the first of the four daily round trips required to transport the Gold, Cusack, Cavanidis and Jones progeny to and from their classes at Wacapo Consolidated.

It was a murky morning, threatening rain, and Matt hoped it would hold off until his eleven-thirty appointment with Thurston Young. It could be a delicate business, handling this first meeting between the owner of Glamour-Glow and Lamar Winter.

Matt went over in his mind what he knew about Thurston Young. It was mostly trade gossip. Young was an autocrat, a strange, harsh figure to bulk so large behind a dollars-and-cents business whose essence was as fragile as its façade in the make-believe land of feminine beauty. Incongruous, but you couldn't deny success. Glamour-Glow was a name to rank with Chanel or Verlaine.

John Ainslie Outerbridge's conservative black Packard came through the underpass, slowed and stopped. Matt slid into the seat beside the lawyer, said, "'Morning, John Ainslie. Thanks. You're early; making the seven-thirty-three?"

"Yes. Business." Outerbridge hesitated. He always spoke with deliberation. "It is a business, I believe, which concerns you as well as myself. Indeed, it concerns us all."

"How so?"

"You may not have heard that Bronson has his house on the market—and that he is reported to have had an offer?"

"I heard. Some talk he aims to sell us down the Suwannee River."

"Yes." Again Outerbridge paused. "What do you make of it?"

"Sounds screwy to me," Matt said. "He may be sore at the place, probably is. But I doubt if he's that sore. Besides, why would a colored man want to live with us?"

"I am afraid more is involved here. A Negro who could afford it might well wish to better his surroundings. I do not wish to seem to voice anything that could smack of prejudice, but I am sure you know, if you will reflect, that a Negro, seeking to invade a white community, would make the effort only where there are a significant number of Jews."

"Huh?" Matt said. "Come again?"

"Yes," Outerbridge said. "They make common cause—for reasons of their own—with the so-called liberal movements."

"If you mean Bronson is a Jew and is out to clobber the Christians, I don't think I buy it," Matt said. "I got the idea—or my wife did—that the Bronsons are Unitarians."

"I hope you have not been deceived," Outerbridge said. "A Manhattan jeweler? Would you be likely to find many Christians in that business? Then the name, Bronson. I believe, if you care to trace that name, you will find that it was changed at about the same time Bronson became a Unitarian."

Matt grunted, feeling uncomfortable, vaguely sickened. "You trace it. I'm not going to bother. In my family there's already enough trouble with genealogy. There's a rumor that one of my grandfathers was a quarter-breed Sioux. It's fairly widespread in Wyoming."

Contrary to expectation, the train was on time, and Matt, having gone through the convention that the man given a ride buys a Times for his host as well as himself, settled down beside Outerbridge on the narrow seat. They did not speak again, for it was also a convention that once the newspapers were open, conversation was dead.

Matt was still going through his mail when Grant Macmillan's secretary called, asking him to step in. Macmillan looked up and grinned as Matt came through the door. "A nice recovery. You went at that party the other night as though you were sore at yourself."

"I was," Matt admitted with a smile.

"I picked up a bruise or two myself," Macmillan said reminiscently. "You're seeing Young this morning?"

"Yes. You know, he isn't quite fetched yet."

"You'll do it."

"I hope so. The presentation is ready, including the implication that it's all Young's own idea, which is not entirely a lie. I called Winter. He's meeting me there—sketches and one finished painting."

Macmillan frowned. "You sure it has to be Winter?"

"I don't see any way out of it. He talked about Winter's work. If I don't produce Lamar he'd likely think I couldn't get him."

Macmillan sighed. "I suppose you're right. But two bastards to deal with at the same time in the same place seems one too many."

Matt felt a familiar unease at Macmillan's use of the epithet. He knew that "bastard" applied simultaneously by Macmillan to both Young and Winter had a slightly different meaning. Winter was sometimes a nuisance; if that were all that lay behind Macmillan's dislike, it would be understandable. But deep within him, Matt suspected, Macmillan's sense of natural order was offended that a colored man should possess such talent and maintain it in such insolent assurance.

The subterranean strain did not actually hurt the firm. Macmillan was too thoroughly in possession of a sound and healthily avaricious business sense to let that happen. All the same, Matt thought it was a shame, this business of race intruding into professional and personal relationships which were complicated enough without it.

The taxi delivered Matt at the richly unobtrusive entrance on upper Fifth before Winter arrived. He was waiting outside the door when another taxi drew up and the artist slid out, carrying an ungainly picture case.

Together they entered the decorously gleaming salon which was Glamour-Glow's face before the world. Shortly thereafter, passed from one retainer to another, they waited while a secretary announced them to Thurston Young.

The secretary beckoned, and Matt, waiting for Winter to enter first, came up close beside the artist. He was aware of the tenseness with which he was watching for a sign, trying to read the face of the small, bald man who rose from behind a vast desk.

"Mr. Young, this is Lamar Winter," Matt said.

"How are you, Mr. Winter?" The voice was dry, precise and carried no undertone, neither reservation nor—what would have been worse—an excess of cordiality. The touch of hands, one white and carefully groomed, the other brown and slender and corded with muscle, was firm. So it was going to be all right then?

Young waved them to chairs and went back behind the polished plain of his desk.

"I am sure we all know what I intend to do?" It was couched as a question, but Matt felt that Young meant no question.

"I think so," Matt said carefully. "The heart of it, as I understand your concept, is elegance."

"That's the guts of it," Young said dryly. "The Cadillac approach—on a higher level."

"I don't know how much you are prepared to spend on me—that is, if you decide I'm your man," Winter said. "But there's something I've wanted to try and have experimented with enough to know it could work for television. I can animate the paintings—a kind of Mickey Mouse business except on a lot higher technical level. I warn you, though, it would cost like sin."

"Yes?" A flicker of interest lighted the controlled features. "How much like sin?"

"Enough. Even with farming out the rough stuff—movement of fabric and the like—it would run up the bill maybe four times as high."

"I assume you are fairly expensive at any level."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 151

Here's the best home dental care anywhere—the new Double Duty Tooth Brush by Pro! No tooth brush polishes teeth brighter—yet the Pro Double Duty never damages gums as some hard-bristled brushes do. Outer rows of gentle bristles act as a buffer between the inner rows of stiffer polishing bristles and your gums. Insist on the Pro Double Duty next time you need a new tooth brush. (Most people need one right now.) PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., FLORENCE, MASS., makers of quality hair, hand and tooth brushes.

PRO

DOUBLE DUTY

TOOTH BRUSH

Make Memories with this Freestone Flavor.

You know Freestone peaches, don't you? They're soft, ragged and juicy-tender—the old-fashioned kind. But their main claim to fame is flavor, and that goes double for Del Monte Freestones.

We select Del Monte Freestones for their taste, not their looks. We pack them eating-ripe. We choose syrup that brings out natural fruit flavor, instead of drowning it in sugary-sweetness. And you'll say these Freestones are the closest thing yet to orchard-fresh peaches. Next time, take home Del Monte® Brand, for real Freestone flavor.

)NTINUED FROM PAGE 149

"Fairly." The Negro's quick grin was a irst of sunshine.
"Well"—Young paused, impassively oughtful—"I may try it. It's an interesting ea. That is—if I like your paintings."
Matt watched as Winter arose and zipped en the picture case.
"This is the only one I have finished," Win-said, drawing out a canvas on wooden etchers. Confidently, without bothering to uge the pale light of the overcast day, he d the painting before Young.
Well as he knew this work, Matt could not ist rising to look at it again, to try to see it rough Young's eyes. That luminous, glow-quality he knew so well and never ceased wonder at. The blond girl looking up at m was radiant, the small smile lighted with er gaiety, invested with mystery.
"The dress?" Young's voice was dry.
"Dior. This year's collection," Matt said.
"So? Does Mr. Winter usually dress his dels in Paris?"
Winter grinned, enjoying his moment.
lo, the dress is her own. She has a closet-
."
Young frowned faintly. "You must be aware t this girl—or some girl—will be carrying amour-Glow in her hands. Personally, I an. There will be only one woman, and her tinction will have to be unmistakable and ove challenge. I will have no dealings with a mp, Mr. Winter. Not even a beautiful mp."
Winter looked at him, and Matt knew that artist was standing back, letting him ad-nister the coup de grâce.
"She's no tramp, sir. Her name is Alice llins, and she is a graduate of Barnard.
e's being married this summer to the top of class at Annapolis—who is a son of the irman of the board of General Metals.
r family owns a good share of the pineapple
d sugar cane in Hawaii. They've been there, ighly, from the time of Captain Cook."
Young stood over the painting, his face crutable. At length he spoke.
"I do not doubt the dossier, Mr. Jones. But y is a girl of her background posing com-rcially?"
t was coming now, Matt knew with quick ad. He heard Winter drawl the words deerately: "If you mean why is she posing for igger, Mr. Young, I'll be happy to tell you.
e poses for me because she knows I can nt."
Young's expressionless gaze measured the nting, dark face beyond the desk.
"Those are your words, Mr. Winter. They not mine. I am curious about this girl. I not propose to invest several hundred usand dollars in someone I know nothing out. But I ask you to believe"—the voice s passionless—"that I do not have the htest interest in whether you are a nig-—your word again—or a Finnish fisher-n. One thing more: I, too, know you can nt."
oung picked up the painting and walked und the desk with it. He handed it to Win-and made a small dismissing gesture.
"I do not propose to make a decision on s one painting. I expect to see you both in, as often as I think necessary as you dep a program." He smiled without warmth.
suspect you may be able to give me what I nt."
Young's interlocking chain of retainers sed them back from gloved hand to gloved d until they emerged into daylight.
"Looks as if we made it," Winter said as y stood at the curb waiting for a taxi.
"You nearly made a mess of it," Matt said
rly. "Can't you ever unload that telephone e off your shoulder?"
Winter grinned at him. "Yassuh, boss, yas-. Whatever you say, boss. But he took it, n't he? Man, he sure took it."
"I'm not so sure he took it," Matt grunted.
looked to me more as if he fielded it and you looking a little silly."
Winter turned to him, suddenly contrite.
on't be sore, Matt. I know I'm ornery and metimes I regret it. But I wouldn't cross
, you know that."

"O.K., Lamar," Matt said, letting his resentment boil away. After all, they hadn't lost Young. "How about lunch?"

"Where you want to take me, white man?"

"Want to make it the Plaza? And sit downstairs with the first-class citizens?"

"O.K., if you think you want to take a whack at it. Those folks could be nasty."

"For nasty, I'll put you up against them any day."

The builder had put a lot of money as well as good sense and sound craftsman's heart into Peaceable Lane. When it was nearly ready for occupancy, every Sunday had brought streams of lookers up from the city.

The first house, a white colonial under a slate roof, went to a Manhattan jeweler named David Bronson John Ainslie Outerbridge, an Ivy-suited junior member of a firm venerable in corporation law, took the house across the road and put his family up for membership in the Congregational Church. He was preoccupied by the desirable nearness of Grassy Tor. The Outerbridges were accepted by the club almost as promptly as they were by the church.

The lane was filling up all that summer and fall. The purchasers came from various backgrounds and they did not have much in common beyond a desire to live in the country and the ability to raise a down payment averaging $10,000.

Peter Yale had built a following on the West Coast as a late-night disc jockey. Yale came to live on Peaceable Lane against his will. His working hours were outlandish, and ill adjusted to the commuter schedules. But he yielded to his wife Annabelle, who had visions of gracious country living. As time passed, Yale became less and less inclined to forgive his wife or his misjudgment.

Gordon Draper was the youngest man on the lane. He was able to buy because his father, a successful contractor, produced the down payment.

Then came Dr. Wolff Abram, who was on the staff at Mount Sinai Hospital and well on the way to professional rehabilitation as a neurologist, although his careful English still carried the flavor of Vienna, from which he had contrived to escape in 1938.

Steven Cavanidis bought because he wanted these surroundings for Nicholas and Angela, the children of his first marriage. His new wife Cyd would have preferred to remain in Manhattan within convenient reach of the beauty people, who were already beginning to have trouble preserving the glossy blond good looks which had moved Cavanidis to take her out of the Latin Quarter chorus. Cavanidis, who was indulgent with Cyd as long as what she wanted did not conflict seriously with what he wanted, paid her protest the compliment of an absent-minded grunt before he completed the deal. When he thought of her at all, Steve thought of Cyd as a decorative testimonial to how far and fast he had come since he had been born Stavros Kavanodopolos, the son of a fisherman of Piraeus, the port of Athens.

SolomonWeissman was the oldest man on the lane. The small Wall Street brokerage in which he was a partner had prospered during the war. He owned a passion for growing things, chose the sunniest acre in Peaceable Lane and laid out most of it in beds for hybrid tea roses.

The people who are named here are not real. But this new condensed novel—complete in this issue—deals with a real issue, pressing upon U. S. society and touching every family.

READ

PEACEABLE LANE

BEGINNING ON PAGE 56

Paul Cusack was an investment counselor in the trust department of the Surety National in Manhattan, and he had his sights relentlessly set on a vice presidency. Although neither Paul nor anybody else much liked his thin, spiteful wife, Laura, he agreed with her determination to win acceptance by Grassy Tor's membership committee.

Jerome Kelly and his family moved up from Mount Vernon. He was a young dentist with an office in Rockefeller Center. The three children, Hilary, Eileen and Marie, had made it clear that a five-room apartment was no longer adequate.

Nobody on Peaceable Lane loved its roomy serenity more genuinely than Zachariah Gold and his quiet wife, Beth. The Golds basked in sun, air, the green earth, and even mud when it rained; here was blessed release from a prison of brick, exhaust fumes, the angry strivings of too many people too close together. It had taken the Golds a long, hard road to reach this haven. Even Gold's law degree from Columbia had demanded monumental struggle.

Matt and Ellen Jones were the last two to arrive. With some misgivings he had accepted transfer to New York from a comfortably successful career, first as a salesman, then as manager of the Chicago office of Macmillan Associates. New York was frightening, and Matt asked Grant Macmillan's advice.

"There's a nice little street of new houses only a couple of miles from my place," Macmillan said. "It's even less from my club—and that's something you'll want to think about too. There's only one thing. It isn't restricted. You would have some Jewish neighbors."

"What of it?"

"Some people don't like it. Still, that's good property up there, worth what they're asking and bound to be worth more."

"We'll look at it—maybe next Sunday."

Unexpectedly, Matt found that he liked and was stimulated by his job in New York. When it came to living, he was glad he had chosen Peaceable Lane.

Most of Peaceable Lane's eleven families were fairly young. They had substantial employment in executive, creative or professional pursuits, and each owned a fierce, fond pride in his share of Peaceable Lane. This, more than any other thing, they held in common. Slowly the lane developed into a community. Socially, in the summer, the swimming pool furnished a center of activity. But the lane never did become a clubby place in the sense of many close personal friendships. There were a few cocktail parties, and there was the ceaseless round of children's birthday parties, but that was about all.

If Peaceable Lane did not practice intimacy, it was to learn within five years that it could unite militantly against common danger. They learned of the danger when the New York Thruway Authority announced its intention to convert the old Mount Kisco-Ossining trail into a cross-country parkway link.

The lane raised $1500 among its members, and for nearly a year Zack Gold and John Ainslie Outerbridge fought a delaying action against the power and majesty of the state of New York. They were defeated, but John Ainslie contrived to win a small internal victory. The Thruway Authority modified its plans slightly and, when building the half cloverleaf connecting Peaceable Lane to the parkway, put the access loop in David Bronson's back yard instead of, as originally blueprinted, in Outerbridge's.

For what seemed the thousandth time and may in fact have been the hundredth, Matt was finding himself at issue with his son's unbridled zest for expanding horizons. The issue was joined by Ellen's summons to an exercise of parental authority while driving him home from the 6:02 through the woodsy dusk of the watershed park land.

"Billy was down here today—with Jerry Gold," she said.

"On their bikes? Again?"

"On their bikes, of course," Ellen said. "I don't want to spoil their fun, but you know this road is dangerous ——"

"I'll have a go at him," Matt promised.

For once Bill was matching his own serious demeanor and even gave outward signs of listening. Looking at him, the close-cut hair, somewhere between Ellen's clean gold and his own mouse brown, fitting his head in a crisp helmet, the wide-set gray eyes, Matt felt the swell of pride and love.

"How many times have I told you to stay away from that woods road?" he said.

The gray eyes were direct. "Lots of times, I guess. I forgot."

"You scared the daylights out of your mother. Do you think that was fair?"

"No-o-o, I guess not. I just forgot."

"And Jerry too. Did he just forget?"

"His mother said his father was going to tan him. Do you want to tan me too?"

The offer was straightforward, an honest attempt to pay for injury inflicted. Matt had trouble with his voice before he could go on. "No, son, I don't intend to tan you, although I'm tempted to take your bike away."

An instant of panic flashed in the gray eyes. "Honest, pop, I am careful. How do we get down to the lake if we can't take our bikes?"

Here was something new. Matt paused to consider. "Any special reason you have to go to the lake?"

The boy's face lighted with the excitement of communicating discovery. "We found an island. It's right near the shore and there's a big old dead tree you can get across to it on. It's our own island, Jerry's and mine; the other kids don't know about it."

Man-to-man reasonableness rushed out of Matt Jones with a roar. He was working up to a yell of outrage when Ellen's call summoned him urgently to the telephone. His mind was far less on Solomon Weissman's voice over the wire than it was on a vivid image: Bill and Jerry Gold catfooting it along a swaying log high above deep and waiting waters.

"Matthew?" Weissman said. The retired broker had a liking for formality in address. "Matthew, if you're not too busy I'd like to have you come over this evening after dinner. We're having a little meeting."

"What about, Sol?" Matt asked.

"You probably know already, and I'd rath not say over the phone. Bring your wife if yo like."

"I'm afraid she'll have to stay here with th kid," Matt said. "But I'll be over."

Weissman's pert, eighteen-year-old daugh ter, Lana, answered Matt's ring. "Come in an join the mourners," she said and Matt, sti preoccupied with the baffling mysteries c childhood, wondered if all kids these day were smart-alecky to their elders.

The room was crowded. Solomon Weis man, cherubic with his brown, smiling face ur der its halo of white hair, surveyed his neigh bors.

"If you don't know why we're here, yo haven't been keeping your ears open," he sai "We thought we might as well get togethe and decide what to do—if we do anything."

"If I may interrupt ——" Outerbridg broke in.

"You go ahead, John Ainslie," Weissma said. "You've been doing the investigating.

The lawyer pursed his small mouth an looked around their circle. "A week ago wha we have heard about Bronson might hav been mere gossip," he said. "However, I hav made certain inquiries, and I am now unde the painful necessity of reporting to you tha he has, indeed, been dealing with a Whit Plains broker who specializes in obtainin properties for Negro clients. The broker is white man."

"A white man? What goes on anyhow? Is h nuts?" The voice, rasping in angry bewilde ment, was Peter Yale's.

"No, quite sane, I should think, Mr. Yal But greedy, yes." Outerbridge primly acknow edged the interruption, then went back to h own theme. "I am informed that the broke has given Bronson an offer from a Negro—an that Bronson is seriously considering it. I ca tell you, as a basic fact, that each of us stand to incur a considerable financial loss if Bronso sells to a Negro. Even the brokers are unab to estimate the loss. The most conservativ placed it at eight to ten thousand dollars."

Lana Weissman's young voice cut into th room's collective concern: "I don't see wh all the fuss. I had Negroes in my Girl Scou and I've got them now at school."

Sol looked up at his daughter with resigna tion. "Shut up, sister," he said, not unkindl "You can talk when you know what you' talking about—or paying your own bills. Th is a question of money—not of Negroes."

"Well, I certainly can't speak for you, M Weissman." Here was Laura Cusack's irrita ing voice. "But as far as I am concerned, it ce tainly is a matter of Negroes."

"But"—the voice was timid, colorless an coming from Estelle Outerbridge. totally u expected—"have we any right to interfe with Mr. Bronson—or to say who may li where?"

Matt caught the quick frown behind Oute bridge's shiny glasses. "I fear we are digres ing. Bronson has not yet sold his propert Should he sell, knowing beforehand that would injure us, we may be able to apply legal remedy."

"What remedy?" Gold's question was pr fessional.

"If deliberate financial injury is demonstr ble, it is also actionable," Outerbridge sai "Say Bronson's action costs you ten thousar dollars. You have a case against him, ha you not?"

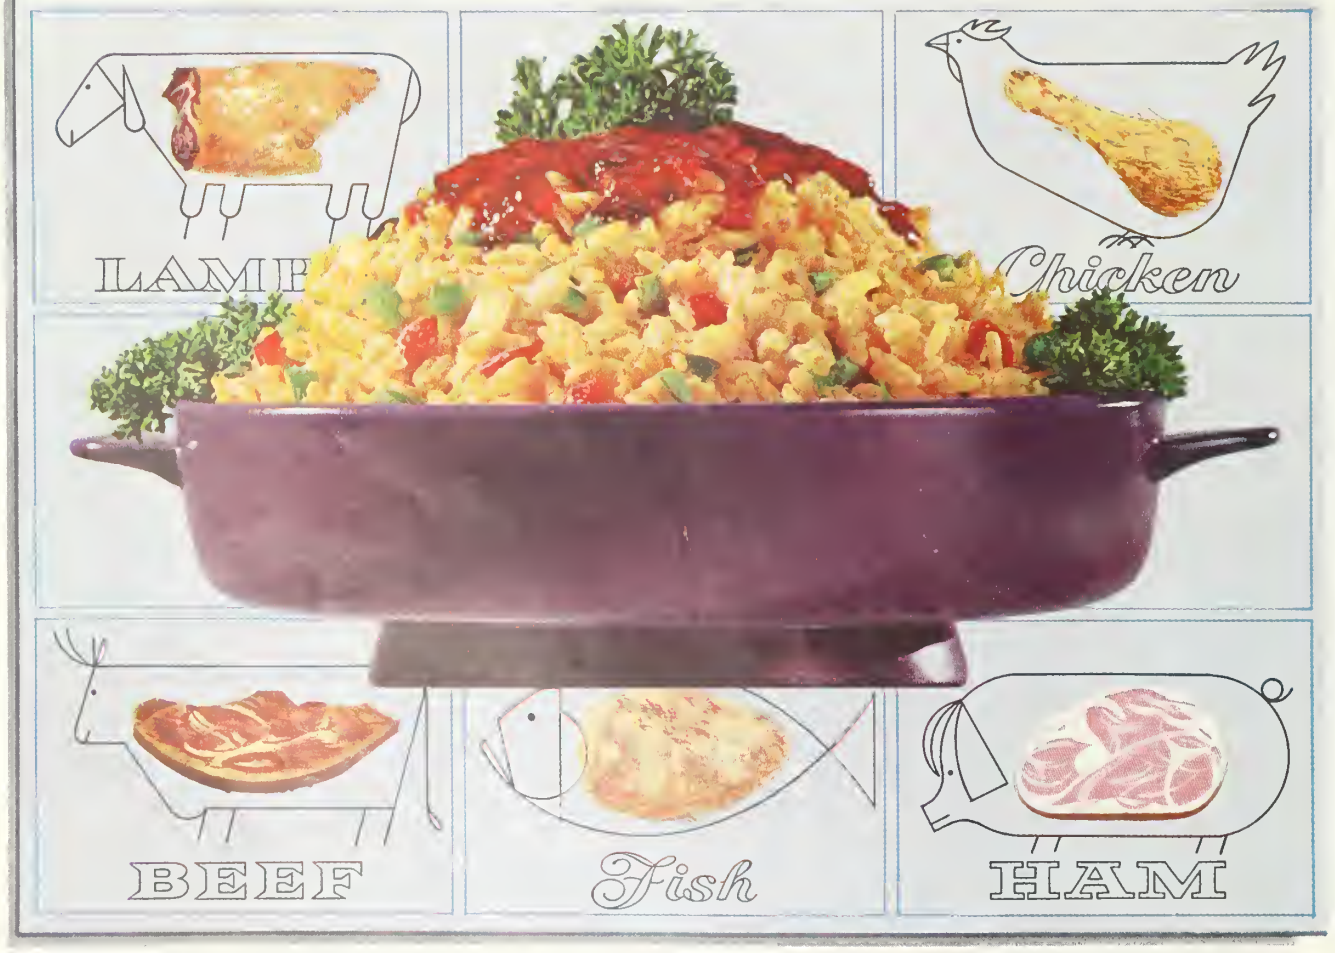
Gold frowned and answered slowly, " don't think it would work, John Ainslie. Firs in order to prove damage, you—or one us—would have to sell at a loss. Then would have to prove that Bronson's action n only caused the loss, but was deliberate."

"And you think that would be difficult?"

"Perhaps not. But you'd have to take it to jury and, with the temper of today's times, would take luck for a jury to find for you."

"You may be right. I submit that the thre of suit alone might be serviceable in dissua ing Bronson—that is, if he actually inten to go through with it."

"Well"—now there was a smile on Weis man's face—"I've been wondering wheth we haven't been getting the cart a little ahe



Miss Fluffy Rice says—

My Deviled Rice is a hit with any of these! Just try it!

With pork or chicken—with beef or lamb or fish—Deviled Rice is downright delicious. And it's so easy, too. Today's good rice is so carefully prepared you don't even have to wash it.

To fix Deviled Rice for five, lightly cook ½ cup each chopped onion and green pepper in 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add ¼ cup prepared mustard, ⅓ cup sour cream, ⅓ cup currant jelly, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire Sauce and 2 tablespoons chopped pimiento. Mix well and heat, stirring occasionally. Combine this mixture with 3 cups of freshly-cooked rice. Garnish with parsley and serve with a topping of jelly.

It goes with everything! Yes, that's one of the reasons why rice is such a help—it fits in any menu, goes with most any food, makes it so easy to vary your meals.

Plain or deviled, rice partners any meat most pleasingly . . . seafood and chicken, too. It's a natural with cheese and tomatoes . . . great with fruit and cream for breakfast . . . makes newsy salads and delectable desserts.

Start now to find out all the ways nutritious rice can help you. For round-the-clock good eating, you just can't beat America's good rice!

Easy, delicious versatile, nutritious RICE is your most useful food!

Rice Council for Market Development

rse. Before we do anything else, why make sure what Bronson is up to? I nd discussing it with him. All the like to have somebody with me. You nt to name a committee?"

new the room's eyes were going ex- toward Outerbridge, but the voice of avanidis cut in.

Ainslie, how about you skip the I know you're smart. But I also know you irritate Bronson. I'd like er Zack or Matt go with Sol. They're neighbors."

tirred, hesitated. "If you don't mind, not. Do you mind, Matt?"

all right, Matt thought. Still, Steve ously right; Outerbridge was not the he job. "O.K.," he said reluctantly. if I'll be worth much, but if you want, ong."

n Weissman telephoned Matt at his nidmorning. "Matthew? I wanted to that we are going to have a little spell. I went over to Bronson's this His wife said he went out to the nvention in Chicago. Won't be back day."

it gives us time to figure how we're handle it."

He can't very well sell us down the e he's in Chicago."

had scarcely hung up when John Outerbridge was on the line. "I to let you know that I have engaged a n for the pool."

s fine, John Ainslie. Who is he?"

fine young man. Princeton. He has he swimming team there."

can we have him?"

weekend. He will be coming up Fri- , and I have made the usual arrange- him to live in my home. He'll work art time, keeping up the grounds, to his board and room. His name is tten."

Cotten, when Matt met him Saturday proved to be a sleepy-eyed, crew-cut, handsome young giant. He and h an audience of a dozen of the lane's spent the day washing down the ater had scarcely begun to flow he filter when Bill, Jerry Gold and bram charged through the pool's tall rhododendron, all wearing bath- s and clearly ready for action. Cotten white-toothed grin on them.

o fast, fellows. Do you know how th water is?"

we don't care if it's cold." Bill n imploring look on Matt and he hat here was an appeal to higher au- oing over Cotten's head. Carefully othing and waited for the younger establish his authority—or surren-

The grin was still there, amiable but d I say no swimming for at least two t till the water warms up."

w-w-w!" The wail of protest came hree. It was a wail of acknowledged

s for not butting in, sir," the boy s all right. They have to know who's att said. On the whole, he thought, emed likable enough, except for that irring him, which, he thought, was essary way of reminding him of his ad trouble getting to sleep that Satur- . The prospect of the next day's in- with David Bronson preyed on him. was a hard man to talk to under the rcumstances. And the worst of it was t was by no means sure that what did was any of their business.

ound the jeweler watching the first a Yankee-White Sox game.

't suppose I need to explain why e, David," Weissman said.

weler nodded glumly. "Say what t to say. I know you hate my guts."

s not it, Dave," Matt broke in. "No- s your guts. But we've heard certain things and we hope you won't think we're butting in because we'd like to know the truth."

"If it's not butting in, maybe you'll tell me what it is," Bronson said hotly. "But all right, since you seem to think it's your business—I am selling. I've been trying to sell the place for three years."

"I know you have, David," Weissman said. "But who would want it, the way it is? The middle of a noise factory. They all say the same thing. They can't live with that highway in their laps."

"You know we fought it, but you can't lick a thing like that," Weissman said.

"And such a fight that was!" The voice was working up to a screech. "Outerbridge!" The name was a snort of bitter contempt. "Don't think I don't know how he fought!"

There wasn't much they could say to that.

"Three years," Bronson said again. "Three years and not one decent offer."

"Do you mind telling us what you're asking?" Matt said.

"Why should I mind? Thirty-six five."

Matt was astonished and started to protest, but Weissman was quicker. "Why, David, that's four more than you paid for it. How can you ask thirty-six five when you say yourself the parkway is a nuisance?"

"So why shouldn't I ask thirty-six five? You think I haven't put that other four into it? Storm windows, shrubbery, carpets, what else? And agent's commission? At thirty-six five it's still costing me."

"David"—by the tone Matt knew Weissman was going to lay it on the line—"we hear you've had an offer from a Negro buyer—and that you want to take it. I want to know if that's true."

"So what if I have? Whose business is it? I got a right to get my money out."

"Look, David, what if we could help you get it out some other way?" Here we are, ten men with a lot of connections. There's no

fresh Sour Cream

America's newest, smartest flavor idea

New flavor for salads. Spoon fresh dairy Sour Cream right from carton over crisp vegetables or fresh fruit. Add a little lemon juice, if desired. Only ⅓ the calories of mayonnaise.

New flavor for desserts. Delightfully easy, too. Just spoon fresh dairy Sour Cream directly from carton onto devil's food or chocolate cake or gingerbread. Sweeten slightly with confectioners sugar, if you wish. Delicious!

New flavor for dips. Just blend fresh dairy Sour Cream with Onion Soup Mix or other seasonings. Garnish with pimiento, chopped olives or green pepper. Enjoy with potato chips and crackers.

New flavor for baked potatoes. Top with plenty of fresh dairy Sour Cream. If desired, garnish with paprika or crumbled Blue Cheese. Serve while piping hot.

Here's why fresh dairy Sour Cream adds so much flavor to so many foods Something wonderful happens to food when you discover how to use dairy Sour Cream! Sour Cream adds a sparkling tangy flavor that's delicious and creamy smooth. And did you know that modern Sour Cream is always made fresh at your dairy from pure, sweet, country cream? It's easy to use. Keep Sour Cream on hand for luscious ideas like these.

AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION

Representing the Dairy Farmers in your area reason why the ten of us can't find you a buyer. Say we get you a buyer—at the best price we can. Maybe the rest of us could make up the difference so you get everything you think it's worth. I don't know about the others, but Matt and I can take it up with them."

"I'm not trying to hurt anybody." Bronson was whining now. "But I got a right to get my money. If you think you can do something, go ahead and try."

"You haven't taken any money from the Negro yet?" Weissman demanded.

"No. Just the offer, that's all."

"Well, then, let's handle this like business. In effect we want an option to get you a buyer. How much time are you willing to give us?" Weissman asked.

"I don't know. A week, two weeks?"

"Well," Weissman said, rising, "we'll see what we can do."

"No!"

In the years he had known Grant Macmillan, Matt had never seen such chopfallen astonishment on that controlled face. He had just told the president of Macmillan Associates and chairman of Grassy Tor's membership committee that Peaceable Lane lay open to a colored invasion.

Macmillan said, "Do you have any idea what this is likely to cost you if it goes through?"

"I've been told, and I admit it sounds pretty scary," Matt said. "On the other hand, I can't really convince myself it'll actually happen."

"What do you mean?"

"We had a talk with him . . . that is"—Matt could not resist using a little needle—"one of my Jewish neighbors and I had a talk with him. We talked him into giving us a couple of weeks to do something."

"Do what?"

"Peddle his house for him—to somebody we're willing to certify as white."

"It's not much time." Macmillan frowned. "There are a couple of real-estate men in the club. Let me talk to them. They ought to be as interested as anybody—more, if anything—in keeping the area from going to pot."

Irritably, all through the day, Matt was aware that the talk with Macmillan was riding him. There must be something here that's not getting through to me, he thought. He remembered the almost palpable feeling of tension in Solomon Weissman's living room, the venom in Laura Cusack's face and voice, the measuring look of Steven Cavanidis. Angrily he shook it off. This was all too silly.

Matt and Lamar Winter were standing at the long layout table in Matt's office. Four paintings, in different degrees of completion, stood on the table, propped against the wall.

"She's a lovely dish, isn't she?" Matt mused.

"Nothing's too good for Thurston Young and his perfume works."

Matt walked along the row of paintings, studying them.

"That thing in the negligee is terrific."

"I wonder a little about the one in the tennis outfit. D'you think perfume goes with tennis?"

"Sure. Anyhow, it ought to."

Grant Macmillan came in, unannounced, and shook hands with Winter. "Hello, Lamar," he said. "This the stuff for Young?"

"Part of it," Matt said. "Great, isn't it?"

"H'm-m." Macmillan gazed at the paintings with an abstracted air. Puzzled, Matt watched him and wondered at his lack of animation. "Nice, Lamar," he said. Then abruptly he turned to Matt. "Step into my office for a minute, Matt."

"Sure, we'll be through pretty soon," Matt said.

"No, now. I'm taking a noon plane to Washington and I'll have to be leaving in a few minutes."

"Of course, Grant." Matt's voice revealed a puzzled concern at Macmillan's unaccustomed sharpness of tone. "You'll excuse us, Lamar?" He was vaguely uneasy about walking out on the Negro, knowing very well that the painter was capable of reacting with quick anger to cavalier treatment. Macmillan's interruption had been nearly rude.

"Has your group made any progress on that house deal?" Macmillan asked, wheeling to face Matt as they entered his office.

"Nothing yet. We're supposed to come up with something by the end of this week or the first of next."

"Well"—Macmillan spoke heavily—"I've got some bad news for you. I want you to know it before I get out of town. I told you I'd try to get some action at the club—through Sloane or Kern. It isn't going to work."

"Why not?"

Macmillan's face was coldly angry. "You people in that little interracial village of yours are going to have to face up to something. Unless you can get this Bronson business settled by yourselves, you might as well have smallpox. Nobody'll touch you with a ten-foot pole."

Now Matt himself was growing angry. "Well, it isn't smallpox. It's just a house and it isn't contaminated with anything except Bronson wants to sell it. I'd think Sloane and Kern would be just as anxious as you seem to be that the Negro doesn't get in."

"They are; oh, they are. Just so it's somebody else—not them—who keeps him out." Macmillan was caustic.

"I don't get it."

"Because they're scared. They're afraid of the Urban League and of the N.A.A.C.P. and of their own shadows, for all I know. You're responsible for it."

Matt hid the uprush of anger in a baffled shake of the head. "All right, what do you want us to do? Burn the house?"

"Don't talk like an idiot." Macmillan's usually bland face was drawn and his voice peremptory.

Matt spread his hands in resignation. "The time's not up yet," he said; "but short of shooting Bronson, I confess I don't know what we can do."

"You'd better do something—and fast," Macmillan said coldly.

Winter was still sprawled in the leather chair, smoking and reading a magazine, when Matt returned to his office. The painter looked up with curious, appraising interest.

"What's eating Macmillan?" he asked.

"Nothing much." Matt said shortly. "Personal matter. Sorry I was gone so long." He was trying to force his mind back into the groove of Winter's paintings and the campaign that would center around them.

This is silly, he thought. If I had any sense I would ask Lamar about it—or tell him about it. If there's something this mess needs, it's a different point of view. But he smothered the temptation. He was learning caution.

Later, on the train clattering toward Chappaqua, he found his mind prodding at that obscure hesitation to seek from Winter the understanding he could probably find nowhere else. One thing he did know: it wasn't because he was white and Winter was not. There were no taboo subjects between them. They had settled that long ago.

It had not been easily or quickly done. When Matt had first begun to work with the artist seven years ago, it had been difficult. Each had recognized the other's professional quality, but slowly their relationship became more than that. Neither had to say it when at length they had come to regard themselves as a single set of minds to create and hands to execute. They had become friends, and if Winter still guarded himself from others, Matt felt that he no longer guarded himself from him. This, Matt came to believe at length, was a man's friendship, uncomplicated, undemanding. He trusted Lamar Winter, and if Winter still kept some part of himself in reserve Matt was not aware of it.

Lamar Winter had been prowling the tall white studio living room and now he stopped, fists locked behind his back, and stared moodily at the Rouault. It was the first of other painters' paintings that he had admired and bought even when he could not afford them. Now that he could afford them, they still nourished him. Next to his wife, Margo, the paintings gave him a greater sense of pleasure and fulfillment than anything else in his life. Winter was not quite sure how he felt about his son Tod. He loved the boy, of course; but Margo and the paintings were somehow less of a problem. They were beautiful and they bent easily to his will and they were under his protection, his to admire, his to cherish.

The trouble with the boy was that he was too much like the paintings and Margo. Womanish. Yielding. Winter had had to fight for his rights. He knew a dark foreboding that his son would have to fight too. It was not fitting that a boy—a boy of his race—should be gentle and malleable.

Margo Winter, bright and decorative in black toreador pants and a yellow sweater, sat on the zebra-skin divan that lilled all one wall opposite the painting.

"Can't you calm down?" she asked, a frown plucking at her creamy forehead.

"Somebody's fiddling with it. I wa[nt] know who," he said abruptly, not r[ising] from his stance before the painting.

"It has only been a couple of weeks

"Honey, don't be naïve," he grunted [No] something's going wrong. Fox should[n't] him tied up by now."

"Fox?" For a moment she was pu[zzled] "Oh, you mean the broker."

"Yeah." He stared at the painting. "[If] I'll move this. The light's better on the [big] wall."

"Lamar, we don't have to have that [us]e I'll be almost relieved if we don't get it

He began to pace again, to the R[ou]l pause, turn, back across the shaggy wh[ite] toward where she sat behind the ebony [de]sk tail table.

"Why do you think something has[ha]p pened?" she said.

"Bronson," he grunted. "When we w[ere] there he was drooling. But he's been s[ick] ever since—his lawyer's out of town, or [he] to go to Chicago, or he thinks maybe he [can] move after all. Maybe he thinks he can [get] me up for more. If he thinks that, he's [prob]ably right—a little bit more, anyhow. [If] the rest of them have caught on, they [may] putting the blocks to him."

"If you feel that way, what do you [think] they're going to do to us?" She was back[ing] to the unknown, the atavistic terror [of] turning into a forbidden place.

"Forget that. Once we're in, we're in [he]re can't touch us."

"Oh, Lamar, how can you be so sur[e] Re member what's happened other places. [Bul]pickets—they could drive us out."

"Not that bunch, baby." The gri[n] was wolfish. "They won't like it, but they'll [have] take it. They're upper-class white fol[k] and they're stuck with being civilized."

The Jones acre was half mowed in mi[d]- noon when Matt yielded to his son's insi[st] that he come along to the pool and [be] witness to Bill's accomplishments as [an] Olympics material.

"You're getting a pretty good tan," [he] said as, stripped for the pool, he and [Bill] walked along the lane.

"Yup," Bill admitted complac[ently] "More'n you."

"You don't need to get uppity about [it]. If didn't have any worse problems tha[n] fourth grade, I could get out in the sun [all]

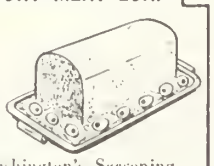
The pool was out of sight behind its [scr]een of rhododendron, but they could hear [the] roar of the young. They passed throu[gh] gate to the tune of more yells and [splash]es through the screen of bushes. Matt re[ached] the top of the ladder to the pool deck, [took] time to watch his son race madly acr[oss] deck and leap for the water, one hand pi[nching] his nose and his face contorted in [an] terror. Matt grinned.

Olympics, huh? he thought. If I ever [can] belly flop in reverse, that was it. He l[ooked] around and felt his jaw drop in astonis[hment]

There in the sun, far enough from the [wat]er to be safe from the juvenile splashing, [Steve] Cavanidis lay on a red towel. The total [area] the blonde's white bikini suit could no[t] much exceeded the square-inch total [of] dark goggles which shielded her eyes. [Mm]-m gosh, he thought, one wiggle and she'll [fall] out. He realized that he was staring and, feeli[ng] surge of color to his face, tore his eyes [away]

He dived in and swam the length of th[e pool] Hauling himself out at the far end, he [sat] the coping and watched Mark Cotten try[ing] work some co-ordination into the deter[mined] flailing of Angela Cavanidis. At eight, [wide]-eyed Angela was both fat and awkward [as] the young Princeton giant wore a l[ook] bored but patient despair.

Cotten clasped his hands around A[ngela]'s chubby waist and tossed her up on the c[oping] "That'll do for now, sis," he said. He [dropped] himself up and squatted beside Matt. "[Practically] one ever even learns to dog-paddle, it's [a] miracle," he said.



"She's got a build, but it sure isn't th[e] [kind] ma has," Matt said. "How're th[ings] doing?"

CONTINUED ON PAG[E 15]

WIN $50 for NEW RECIPES ...using 'all-purpose' G. WASHINGTON'S® SEASONING and BROTH

For every recipe we publish, using famous G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth – we'll pay $50. Mrs. Diane Riso of Bayside, L. I., is the lucky winner this month for her delectable meat-loaf recipe.

SAVORY MEAT LOAF

1 lb. veal
½ lb. of pork
1 egg
5 slices bread soaked in milk
2 envelopes of "Rich Brown" G. Washington's Seasoning

Grind pork and veal together. Mix with drained bread, beaten egg and one envelope of G. Washington's. Shape into loaf in greased shallow baking pan. Sprinkle remaining envelope of G. Washington's Seasoning over top. Bake in moderate oven (350° F) about 50 minutes.

G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth adds just the right 'taste-touch that means so much' to almost any food you prepare: casseroles, eggs, vegetables, meat, fish, stew, gravy and soup. And simply by adding hot water to an envelope of G. Washington's you can enjoy a delicious, instant, no-fat broth that contains only 6 calories. Be sure to buy a package of G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth at any food store and send us your favorite recipe.

Here's How to Win $50

Every Entry Reeeives Free Recipe Booklet

Send your recipe (old or new) using G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth, together with a box top, to American Home Foods, Dept. W, 22 E. 40th St., New York, N. Y. You may be a lucky winner! All recipes become the property of American Home Foods. And every participant will receive an exciting new recipe booklet containing delicious new low-calorie recipes.

2 VARIETIES

- "Rich Brown" with beef-like flavor
- "Golden" with chicken-y

Only Royal makes these Exciting Flavors

PEACH
…es just like fresh
…e ripened peaches.
…only Royal makes it.

BLACKBERRY
Gives you a ripe, juicy Blackberry flavor. And only Royal makes it.

PINEAPPLE
Enjoy the sun-ripened flavor of this tropical fruit. And only Royal makes it.

…yal also brings you
…ese other popular flavors:
Str…berry, Raspberry, Cherry,
Or…ge, Lemon, Lime, and Watermelon,
…nother exclusive Royal flavor.
For Exciting Flavors Switch to Royal

Get New Royal Gelatin…Try It And See Tastes Like Fresh Fruit* And Has Vitamin-C

Royal

*…a fresh fruit flavor … with artificial flavor

Dr. Scholl's SHOES

Masterpieces of Foot Ease and Tailored Smartness

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, smartly styled Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet—devoid of any "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort[2] Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for new catalog to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. 13S4, Chicago 10, Ill.

ON A LAXATIVE MERRY-GO-ROUND?

TAKE NR TO-NIGHT...TOMORROW ALRIGHT! SPARKLING BRIGHT!

Searching for effective overnight relief? Try NR tonight! You'll know why millions use it with utmost confidence. NR works overnight . . . and gently aids the function of elimination, with no restlessness or sudden necessity. NR is an all-vegetable laxative that gives easy relief.

NR REGULAR CANDY COATED or NR JUNIORS

helps you feel better ...and look better!

Nature's Remedy NR-TABLETS-NR

ALL VEGETABLE LAXATIVE

microlite HALF & FULL SOLES

At all fine shoe repairers

"SPECIALTIES of the HOUSE"

See Pages 108 . . . 117

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 154

When Cotten did not answer immediately, Matt turned curiously and saw that Cotten's eyes were on Cyd.

"She sure hasn't," Cotten mused.

"Bill learning anything?" Matt asked.

"He's coming along all right. The problem with all of them is keeping their minds on it. They'd rather play."

The same could be said of you, buster, Matt thought. Just then a whoop from the other end of the pool pulled their attention.

"Hey! Pop! Watch me, watch me, pop!"

It was Bill. With a thrust of panic, Matt saw him teetering on the outer edge of the high board. He opened his mouth to yell a warning, but Bill beat him to it, again screaming, "Pop! Hey, pop! Watch!" Bill seized his nose in one hand and went thrashing down, more or less in a sitting position, to disappear in a horrendous splash.

Matt was on his feet as the boy's head came up. "Boy, am I going to tan his fanny!"

He turned abruptly at Cotten's burst of laughter. "He's all right. Don't worry."

"Don't worry! The fool kid could break his neck. Do you let 'em get away with stuff like that?"

The young man eyed him levelly. "Let them get away with it? No, Mr. Jones, I taught them to do it. Maybe that looked a little wild, but it wasn't really. The most dangerous thing that can happen to a kid in the water is lack of confidence—next to overconfidence, that is."

"You don't think that was overconfidence?"

"No, sir. I'm not teaching your boy to be reckless. But I hope I'm teaching him to know how much he can do, and do it without fear."

Cotten's earnestness impressed Matt in spite of himself. "Maybe you're right."

Later, as he was dressing after a shower, Ellen came into their bedroom. "How was it, Tarzan?"

"Pretty good—it gets the barnacles off." He laughed. "Pretty stimulating place, that pool. Cyd was down there taking a sun bath. I could hardly keep my hands off her."

"You'd better keep your hands off her, mister," Ellen said. "And your eyes, too, if you don't mind."

"That's quite a lot to ask of a man."

"Don't think she doesn't know it." Ellen said grimly. "She's out there in that—that fig leaf every day."

"So? What do you suppose she's after—aside from catching a cold on her bare lungs?"

"Trouble, natch!" Ellen's reply was an indignant snort.

You wouldn't need a barometer to measure the pressures building here, Matt thought as he entered Solomon Weissman's living room. They were nearly all there—all the men, anyhow, and most of the women.

Weissman sat back and ran his bright, inquisitive eyes around the circle of his neighbors.

"We've run out of time," he said without preamble. "You all know it. We're here tonight to decide what to do about it."

"That maniac ought to be arrested." Matt wondered why Laura Cusack's voice must always carry that shrill saw edge.

"If you mean David Bronson, as I suppose you do, Mrs. Cusack, I doubt if there is anything in the statutes forbidding the sale of a house," Weissman said mildly. "Each of us, in the last two weeks, was supposed to canvass his contacts, hoping that one of us might find a buyer. I can tell you that I have made no progress. Does anybody have anything to report?"

Paul Cusack cleared his throat. "I thought I might have something going with the broker who sold me my house. First time I talked to him he said he'd be glad to help. But by the time I called him again, he'd gone shifty on me. After that I couldn't reach him—every time I called, his secretary said he was out."

Outerbridge took off his glasses, rubbed them with a handkerchief and restored them primly to his nose. "I believe Mr. Macmillan offered to explore the possibilities at the club. Mr. Jones, would you know what response he got?"

"No different." Matt spoke shortly. "We're untouchable."

There it was—out in the open for all of them to look at, to recognize.

"Anybody else get an offer to sell to a jig?" Peter Yale's voice was brittle. His light eyes, usually mocking, were hard now. "Anybody here ready to run? To pull the plug?"

Gold's sigh was a troubled rumble. "I did, Pete, if you need to know. Or, anyhow, I suspect I did. I got three calls from people who said they were brokers and they'd heard I wanted to sell." He turned his brooding gaze on the broadcaster. "If you're curious, I'm not running."

Cyd Cavanidis stood up. She yawned, and the lifting of her arms raised her breasts provocatively against the red cloth. "You all talk about it a lot." Her throaty voice was bored. "Just talk. I'm going home. G'night all." She moved lazily, out the door into the night. Cavanidis watched her go, an amused glint in those narrow eyes.

"That's my Cyd," he said expressionlessly. "She's against talk."

Outerbridge watched her go with pained disapproval. "A certain amount of talk is necessary," he said. "I do not intend to discuss here the pros and cons of having a Negro in this neighborhood ——"

"If there are any 'pros,' they certainly escape me," Laura Cusack snapped.

John Ainslie was not to be distracted. "I propose to address myself only to the realities. I have checked this with reputable and responsible authorities. A Negro moving in will cost each of us somewhere between one fourth and one third the value of his home. We have one alternative. We can buy the Bronson house ourselves—as a syndicate."

Kelly's sigh was explosive. "What are we going to do with another house? I'm strapped every month now."

"None of us is likely to enjoy this, Dr. Kelly," Outerbridge went on. "In your case the penalty may be imposed more quickly. You have said that the size of your family has already forced you to seek a suitable house elsewhere. Are you prepared for the sacrifice of making a forced sale on a street whose values have been radically altered by the presence of a Negro owner?"

"Don't rub it in," Kelly said. "You know I'm not. Right now we've got a binder down on a house in Connecticut. If it wasn't for that we could stay here. We're crowded. The kids are, but they'd survive—I guess."

"With nigger children?" Now that she had at last got the word out, Laura Cusack found it easier to use the second time. "Jerome Kelly, are you willing to see those little girls of yours playing with niggers?"

Damn that shrill, hysterical nag, Matt thought wearily. This might be simpler if you didn't have to keep reminding yourself that, whatever you're in, you're in it with Laura Cusack.

"Let's get down to cases, John Ainslie," Yale broke in. "Are you suggesting that we buy that house, just keep it because no broker will touch it?"

"No, I don't think that is indicated. I have been assured privately that if we buy the house we can expect help in disposing of it."

"Whose help? What kind of help?" Yale's question carried the note of challenge.

It was a quiet little neighborhood. And there are hundreds like it. Slowly—almost imperceptibly at first—began the subterranean stirring leading to the avalanche.

READ

PEACEABLE LANE

BEGINNING ON PAGE 56

"I'm not at liberty to reveal that."

"And how long will that take? Ten y

"We will have to be ready for it t some time, a few months."

"And you think that we ought to put money for a down payment, carry the gage, pay insurance and taxes, and go it for God knows how long—while the stands empty?"

"Frankly, Mr. Yale, I don't think yo much choice."

"I don't either, Peter." Solomon We let his bright, inquisitive look roam th of his guests. "I am for buying the house put up my share of the money. I work thirty-five years to get a nice place for m and me and I do not intend to give u piece of it simply because somebod never laid eyes on has a whim to liv

"I do not think you need to guess wh feelings are." Outerbridge said. "I fav procedure I have recommended."

"Who's next?" Weissman asked.

There was an uneasy stir in the roo Matt, glancing from one to anothe caught by the sight of Estelle Outer staring with bright, frightened eyes husband.

"Mr. Cusack?"

Cusack ran a finger around under h white collar as though it were too tigh buy it," he said. "It's the worst investme ever recommended to anybody"—he s "but I'll go along."

"Dr. Kelly?"

The dentist frowned. "I—I don't There's a lot of money involved here. H body figured it out? How much for eac costs and all?"

"Not precisely," Outerbridge acknow "Roughly two thousand each to close keeping it going until we sell."

"I would feel better if I knew how hundred," Kelly said. "I'll come in, of I know it's necessary. But I wish it w

"That's what we all wish, Jerome," man said. "Mr. Draper?"

"Well"—Draper, Matt thought, looked absurdly youthful—"I don't whether my dad will put up the money. him . . . well, that is, if he will ——"

Pretty Shirley Draper clutched at h "Oh, Gordon," she said, "the children

"He'll put it up. I know he will," said firmly.

Weissman turned toward the broad "Mr. Yale?" There flickered, for a mo those bright, warm eyes a glint of ma pleasure, as mocking as Yale's own.

"This is blackmail ——"

"We all know it's blackmail, Mr. Weissman's voice was expressionless.

"There's one thing more." Yale's lau bitter. "I'm coming in—not because I w but because I'm in a corner where I h But if anybody in this room pulls a cross ——"

"I don't think anybody will. Dr. Ab

The doctor's face was pale, a thin a tured mask. He stood up and began t "I . . . gentlemen . . . forgive me. I do n to make a speech, but I must explain coming with you. I wish I had the cour some other choice, but I do not have look around was imploring, full of pa

"Yes, doctor," Weissman's tone was "Whatever you want to say."

"I do not want to say anything bec because it will sound like special plea come in with you. I join in buying the because I am a Jew. This is ironical, the denial of what a Jew should do. It understandable because I am also a Je has been taught cowardice." He stopp looked at them, and the wretched eyes for understanding.

"Yes, doctor?" Weissman said softly

"I do not want to recite to you the Vienna. You know it anyway. For a Vienna, owning a useful place in societ denly, without reason, finding every h that society raised against me —— I explain—only I could not stand it aga

He fell silent, and the silence around as an oppressive weight upon them al

CONTINUED ON PA

This sheet was washed in blue Cheer*

*If you want your sheets . . . your wash . . . this white, Cheer is for you.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 156

saw John Ainslie Outerbridge's tight little mouth open in astonishment. Tiny, mouselike Estelle Outerbridge was on her feet.

"Dr. Abram, you have indicted yourself. With all my heart I grieve for you, but there is something more and something worse. You have indicted us, all of us. You must answer for your soul. I must answer for mine."

"Estelle—Estelle." Outerbridge was frowning, and his voice carried a commanding peremptory edge. "This is not the place ——"

"Don't stop me, John. Please, John." It was a plea, but more than a plea. Her eyes ran swiftly around the circle. "Can't you see what we have almost done? Can we refuse this man—whoever he is—sight unseen, and ever again enter a church without guilt?"

"Estelle!" Outerbridge was on his feet. "Estelle, I want you to go home now."

She looked at him and, with a sob, turned and ran out of the house into the night. Slowly Outerbridge went back to his chair.

Weissman's voice, when it came, was a harsh break in the silence. "Matthew?"

had shaken him, Matt knew. She had shaken them all. And Abram had shaken him before her. And now it was up to him. What was the issue? Whether Dr. Abram had suffered by being a Jew and quailed at the fear of suffering again? Whether Estelle Outerbridge feared to betray her religion, but feared to defy her husband even more? And what did it mean to Matt Jones himself, to Ellen Jones, to Bill Jones? Where was his obligation? To a vague, debatable principle, or to his wife, his son and—to a real extent—the people among whom he lived? He looked at Weissman and spoke.

"I'm in."

"And you, Zachariah?"

The big man had been silent. But now Matt was aware that Zack's big fists were tight and his forearms corded across his knees.

"I never knew"—the words came ponderously—"I would never have believed that a man might have to make a choice of what to betray." He stopped, raised his eyes to Weissman's. "Count me in."

"There wasn't any other answer, Zachariah," Weissman said gently. He turned to face the last man. "Mr. Cavanidis?"

The watchful face was as expressionless as ever and the lean body as relaxed and controlled. "Maybe you should have got to me earlier," Cavanidis said. "Count me out."

"You dirty Greek!" The voice was Yale's, crashing into the shocked silence. Yale was on his feet, moving furiously in on the controlled, watching man.

"Don't try it, sonny. Don't try it." It was softly, clearly spoken, but the voice carried such concentrated malevolence that it brought Yale up short. Cavanidis inspected them all carefully. "I owe you no explanation," he said. "But I'll give you a quick one. I don't like jigs any better than you do." He nodded at Laura Cusack. "But I'm a tall man in a big union. It's a democratic union, which means the officers are elected. About thirty-five per cent of my members are jigs. Good night."

"It's late," Matt said, "but we've got some talking to do. Come in and have a drink."

"I need a drink. About four fingers in a washtub, if you're feeling generous," Zachariah Gold said, turning onto the flagstone walkway to the Jones front door. The big man sounded depressed, and Matt wondered, as he had been wondering ever since the astonishing final act of the meeting in Weissman's living room.

Cavanidis had left, leaving them but nine. "There is one thing more," Weissman had said. "If nine people sign their names as buyers, this deal will look as phony as it is. Somebody here has got to front for all of us." He ran a quick inspection of the room. "We could vote on it. Or we could take a volunteer."

The room was silent and, looking around, Matt realized that this hush was the lethargy of fear. Their faces were withdrawn, reluctant.

"Oh," Matt said, on an impulse that he could not at once define, "I'll take it."

Afterward he thought the impulse had been close to that which had sometimes moved him to evident rashness when he had been an infantry platoon leader. When there was dirty work to be done, it was quicker and in some obscure way more satisfactory to do it yourself than to force it on somebody else.

Gold stood up and spoke, still in that choking reluctance which made him seem to hate his words. "This business needs a lawyer. If it's all right with Matt, I'll go along with him."

Now they were together in the Jones living room, and Matt watched curiously while the big man splashed bourbon into a glass.

"Don't take me for a buttinsky, Zack," Matt said, "but tell me, why did you do it?"

"To be honest, I don't quite know. That is, I know and I don't know. I came along for the same reasons I think you did—because eight or ten thousand bucks is more of a whipping than I can take. The only difference is I'm a long way from sure the reason is good enough. Necessary, yes, but good, no."

"There's a worry closer than that one," Matt said crisply. "They're all in—or say they are ——"

"Except Cavanidis," Gold reminded him.

"Yeah, except Steve. Boy, did you see the way Yale backed down?" He shook his head wonderingly. "Steve's tough, if that's a virtue, and he's practical."

"Well, he's out. Now we got to worry about the ones that are in."

The doorbell chimed, and they both started. "Now what?" Matt said, getting up. "It's after midnight." He switched on the porch light as he opened the door.

"Turn it off," Steve Cavanidis said crisply.

Automatically, with his finger still on the switch, Matt responded to the Greek's imperative tone. "Come in," he said. "What's on your mind?"

"I'm already in." Cavanidis smiled his tight, controlled smile. "You're the front men, aren't you?" He nodded toward Gold, silent and watchful in his chair.

"How did you know?" Matt's tone was sharp.

"Elementary. I waited until your little prayer meeting broke up and called Sol."

"We're having a drink," Matt said. "Can I offer you one—worth roughly two thousand bucks?" It had occurred to him that this man had just cost him a lot of money he couldn't afford.

"No, thanks. I'll just speak my piece and beat it."

"Just as you say. What's on your mind?"

"This." Poker-faced, the Greek reached into his pocket and withdrew a wad of bills. He dropped them on the coffee table. "There's three thousand in that," Cavanidis said. "You can count it if you want."

"What's that for?" Matt asked.

"You're buying a house. It takes money."

"But you've already dealt yourself out."

"That was for the peasants. D'you think I'd be nuts enough to go along with something that every newspaper in the country is likely to have its hands on in a couple of days? Not me. I got to live and I intend to."

"Three thousand bucks is more than one share," Gold put in.

"I doubt it," Cavanidis said. "It may not even be a full share. Don't ever tell anybody where you got it. You ever try to hook that money to me, I'll call you a liar."

Matt picked up the money and tossed it thoughtfully. He turned to Gold. "What do you say, Zack? Do we let a man pay his money but take a free ride every other way?"

The big man stared musingly at the impassive Greek. "Sure, take it. It's money, and money we're going to need." He paused, then nodded toward Cavanidis, his voice as toneless as the Greek's. "Any way you slice this it's a mess. The least we can do is let a man pick his own way to get dirty."

"I told you I didn't want any part of those do-gooders in this business," Lamar Winter said, eying the lanky, long-jawed man sprawled in a swivel chair. The desk, chair, a bank of wooden filing cabinets and a liquor-store calendar comprised the furnishings of the shabby office.

"I didn't call them in." Alexander Fox studied his caller under eyelids lowered far enough to forestall being studied in return.

"They're in," Winter said crisply. "Somebody did."

The broker shrugged. "They deal themselves in sometimes. They watch things like this and decide to move on their own."

"Well, let's deal them out," Winter said. "I don't want anybody messing this up. It's a straight proposition—there's a house for sale and I want to buy it."

Fox considered his client thoughtfully. "It's not simple," he said. "I thought we had him, but he's getting slippery. It could be money."

"All right. Find out how much more."

"What if it isn't money?"

"What else?"

"His neighbors. Those people can make it look pretty rough to Bronson if they find out."

"You never thought they weren't going to find out, did you? I figured that long ago. That's what you're for—to figure a way around it."

"You know, Mr. Winter, you're a tough man," the broker said carefully. "In some ways I'm a tough man, too—as tough as I need to be. You know a man named Frank Barton? Real-estate man?"

"No." Winter hesitated, began to lose patience. "I've got one broker—why would I need another?"

"You'd probably call him a blockbuster." Winter studied the broker narrowly, considering. "So that's it. You want to call in the muscle. Tell me how this Barton would operate."

"Depends. Persuasion, I guess you'd call it."

Winter snorted. "Persuasion is what the N.A.A.C.P. would call it. Reasoning. That's what the Justice."

"I think Barton might do better than that."

"Cut the double talk. How, then? What's his pitch?"

"Well, Fox said, "he might go to see some of those folks first. Jiggle them a little. Talk about the newspaper, the churches, look for weak spots, maybe about the always a weak spot someplace."

"Sounds kind of weird," Winter said. "This kind of thing do any good?"

"Sometimes a lot of good. This man Barton's pretty effective when it comes to hurrying it along."

"Look," Winter said decisively. "I'm not sure I like this. I'll go this far: you can talk to this Barton, get an idea, then let me know what he says."

"Sure, sure, I'll talk to him."

"But there's one thing." Winter's face was hard again. "No muscle stuff. I intend to live there, and I don't intend to move into a shambles. No rough stuff. You get it?"

"Yeah, yeah, I get it," Fox declared.

Jerry Gold and Bill Jones were sitting on the curb with Benjy Abram. They had confided to Benjy the big secret of the island in Wacapo Lake. They were now discussing the feasibility of violating the interdiction placed on the island by the men who held themselves to be boss in the Gold and Jones families.

"Heck," Benjy said, "my dad wouldn't care. What're we waiting for?"

"You say that because your dad doesn't know what you're thinking about," Jerry said out of hard-earned wisdom. "Wait'll you get paddled when he finds out."

"My dad doesn't paddle me."

"Who does, then?"

"My mother," Benjy admitted. "But she's not so tough. Anybody can take her lickings."

"Mostly I get talked to," Bill said. "But I'd just about rather get tanned."

"Here comes the slob," Jerry said suddenly, jerking a warning thumb toward where a figure had appeared, pumping a bicycle.

Paulie Cusack, big-boned and heavy for his thirteen years, the natural enemy of all his juniors on the lane, was aboard the bike. The three watched his approach warily. The bigger boy lazily swung his wheel toward them and dropped one foot to the pavement.

"What're you punks doing?" Paulie asked.

"Nothin'," Bill said evasively. "Sittin'."

Paulie kicked down the stand of his bike and took a place in the row on the curb. He looked up and down the lane cautiously, then took a long cigarette butt from his shirt pocket and lighted it. The three smaller boys watched with fascinated alarm.

"Boy, you're crazy," Bill said. "What'll you do if your ma catches you?"

"She won't," Paulie said with con superiority. "I smoke all the time."

"Broth-er-r!" Jerry said in awe. "Can a puff?"

"You're too little, punk," Paulie sa disdain. "You'd just get sick and tell mother, and she'd squawk to mine."

"I ain't either too little," Jerry said nantly.

"You better look out anyhow," Bill "If old lady Bronson sees you, she'l your ma."

Paulie stared at the Bronson house a the street contemptuously. "Oh, her. She tell, because my mother won't even spe her. Those nigger lovers!"

"Who's nigger lovers?" Benjy asked the highly absorbent interest of being years old.

"The Bronsons are nigger lovers," P said. "They tried to sell their house to gers."

"My dad won't let me say 'nigger,'" said.

"He's crazy," Paulie said disdainfully. gers are niggers, but anyway they're not to move in here. My mother said she'd ge Bronsons put in jail."

"Haw!" Jerry snorted. "You said my crazy, but your mother's the crazy one."

Paulie dropped the half inch of rema cigarette into the gutter and reached out took Jerry by the nape of the neck and with a vicious jerk, pulled the boy's hea ward him, and with the other hand pu upward across Jerry's face from chin to brows, flattening his nose.

"Don't talk about my mother, punk, said.

Bunching his muscles, Jerry tore hi free and jumped to his feet. "You big Someday you'll get yours."

Bill, too, was now on his feet, movin instinctively to form a solid front with Jer

Grinning confidently, Paulie stood up. asked for it, punks," he said easily. He spr and though they tried to duck, he got t both by the neck and, ignoring their fla arms and legs, pushed their faces together rubbed them hard. Jerry's nose, which easily, began to spout.

Suddenly they were flung apart, falling the hard pavement. As they gathered th selves and vision cleared through the te they saw Paulie mounted on his bike, laug back at them as he pedaled away. In b fury Jerry started to pursue, then turned and stared at Bill.

Bill stared back at him, face white, eyes with hate. "Someday we're going to get guy . . . good!" Bill said.

The thing was taking shape, Matt refle as he sat at the desk Tuesday evening, g through the envelope with its sheaf of ch and Bronson's receipt for $3000. There two new checks today—Outerbridge's Dr. Abram's—which Gold had left for He also had left a note.

"Outerbridge wanted a receipt—natura Gold had written. "I gave him one. Th something else: I wouldn't want to say Yale's trying to take a powder on us. But out of town—and left without saying anyt about the money. His wife said he was ca out in a hurry for some network chor Washington—and maybe he was."

Well, thought Matt, if Yale was pullin sneak, there wasn't much they could do a it. They could make it without him. They Cavanidis' money.

Once again Matt was trying to con grips with himself and with the issue. It seemed simple enough, and he had thou he was responding to an exact, calcul necessity: the necessity of measuring $2 against $10,000. Where was it complicat The problem here was not a man, n family. The enemy was disembodied, face shapeless, even colorless—the simple di ence between $10,000 and $2000.

Ellen came down the steps and put opened bottle of beer, frosty with cold, on desk before him. He looked at her and smi pleased, as always, by the clean handsome nouncing a fabulous new laundry machine that completely frees you from washday drudgery...

CONTINUED ON PAGE

e all-new PHILCO HI-SPEED DUOMATIC Bendix combination washer-dryer!

Washes better than a washer ... outfeatures any dryer ... outperforms every other combination!

ompletes average family wash loads in just 58 minutes... can e used as a washer alone, as a dryer alone or as a combination!

Before you spend a dollar on any washer or dryer, see the amazing "shag-rug" demonstration at your Philco dealer!

o just load the Duomatic ... set it ... and walk away from washday. Your Duomatic washes and ri in one continuous operation. No more watching, waiting to transfer heavy, soggy wet wash to he lothesline or dryer. The time you spend on washday becomes minutes, the time saved hours!

ashes better than a washer. The Duomatic handles every fabric, any load. There are two wash y s, three rinses ... even an exclusive automatic soak cycle that's a must for diapers. The Dispenser Ce er holds bleach and fabric softener, injects the right amount at the right time automatically. And nl the Duomatic brings you true high-speed (560 rpm.) spin drying.

utfeatures any dryer. Fully automatic drying, no guessing about time, no checking for dryness, n no more sprinkling either. Exclusive Moisture Measure lets you "dial the dryness" — damp-dry fold-dry ... any dryness you want. Drying is safe for all fabrics and the fastest ever!

utperforms any pair, any other combination. Washes and dries the average family load (two he s included!!) in just 58 minutes! See a demonstration soon!

Fits anywhere a washer will. Only 26¾" wide! Own a Duomatic for less than the cost of many washers alone!

PHILCO

Famous for Quality the World Over

GAS MODEL CG-716. ALSO AVAILABLE IN HI-SPEED ELECTRIC MODELS

Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada. ©Sucaryl—Abbott's Non-Caloric Sweetener

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 158

of his wife. Youth and freshness seemed to cling to Ellen and, even after fifteen years together, it still made him glad to be with her. She frowned as she looked at the checks.

"How many more?" she asked.

"Three. Draper, Cusack . . . and Yale. Only Zack thinks Yale is trying to get out of it."

"Why would he?"

"I can think of several reasons. The most likely one is simple: money."

"I wouldn't think he would dare. After all, they live here. I wouldn't think he could look the rest of us in the face afterward."

The doorbell rang. Matt started up, but Ellen was already on her feet. "I'll get it," she said. "I wonder who ——"

A moment later her voice, calling his name, brought Matt to his feet, startled by the thin note of urgency and alarm. He found her standing in the hall, one hand on the latch of the screen door. Two men were beyond the door. Matt saw that they were Negroes.

"Yes?" he said, trying to keep the stiffness out of his voice.

"You're Mr. Jones?" the older of the two men asked. He was heavy, almost portly, and probably in his fifties. The smaller man had a thin, curious face, a nervously smiling face with restless eyes behind thick spectacles.

"Who are you?"

"I am Francis Barton, an attorney" the older man said. His voice was dignified. "This is Edward Smith. Here is my card—this is a professional call."

"What can I do for you?" Matt asked guardedly.

"I think you know, Mr. Jones," the big man said. "There is a matter we have come to discuss with you. It concerns the Bronson house. May we come in?"

The thought flashed in Matt's mind that he could refuse them entrance. But instantly he warned himself that barring them would be both churlish and childish. He led them into the living room and indicated chairs.

"If you will state your business, Mr. Barton," he said cautiously.

Unsmiling but seemingly at ease, the Negro studied Matt a moment before replying. "We understand that you represent a syndicate and that you propose to buy the Bronson house."

"Not a syndicate," Matt said flatly. "I am buying it. Mr. Gold, an attorney on this street, represents me."

"So?" The big face was expressionless. "May I ask why you are buying it?"

Resentment tugged at Matt's mind, but he put it down. "I could say that my reasons are private," he said levelly. "I'll say this much: I'm buying it as an investment."

The big man studied him again. "Would it be fair to say that by 'investment' you mean you are hoping to maintain or enhance the value of this house by preventing a colored man from moving into the one next door?"

Anger stirred in Matt, but he checked it. "You said that, not I," he said shortly.

"Yes, I said it. I merely sought to bring the sparring to an end. We will get somewhere only when we begin to speak frankly. I urge you to do so."

"I don't want to be offensive either," Matt said. "But you will forgive me if I say that I fail to see how my intention to buy this house is your business. You spoke of getting somewhere; where, precisely, do you hope to get?"

"I hope to persuade you of the truth of several things. First, that your fears are groundless. A Negro moving into the Bronson house will not, unless it drives you people to panic, reduce the value of your properties. We can prove that, in cases where Negroes have moved into all-white communities and where the whites have not yielded to panic, property values have not gone down. Believe me, the Negro who wishes to buy the Bronson house is not a fool. He would not be stupid enough to invest a good many thousand dollars in something which would immediately become worth many thousand dollars less. Would you like to know who he is?"

For a moment Matt allowed temptation to tug at him. "No, I think not," he said. "Since I'm not likely ever to meet him, I don't think I'm curious about his name."

"That may be another error. Having made the one, you and your neighbors seem bent on compounding it."

"That may be, but I doubt it. If your man is such a substantial citizen, why doesn't he come out here himself instead of, to put it bluntly, hiding behind your skirts?"

"I doubt if he would come here either seeking or expecting neighborhood popularity."

"That's what baffles me. Knowing that he's likely to be disliked, why would he even contemplate moving here?"

"Tell me, why did you move here?"

"Because neither my wife nor I can stand cities. But I don't see where that applies."

"Don't you? Isn't it conceivable that our man, too, might dislike living in a city? Do you imagine that a liking for fresh air, sun, trees, grass and flowers is the exclusive province of souls wrapped in white skin?"

"No-o-o. I didn't say that. But I still can't understand a man who, in order to get those things, is willing to damage his potential neighbors with a heavy financial penalty and accept the penalty of their resentment."

"You won't see, will you? You will not believe that the financial penalty is a figment of superstition. You will not understand that a man might be willing to risk your temporary displeasure in order to claim his fundamental rights as a human being."

"What makes you think my displeasure would be temporary?"

"Because, inevitably, you would begin to get over it once you saw it demonstrated that he was not here to injure you. Maybe this will convince you: I would not pretend that our people are more tolerant, more moral, more sensitive to the rights of other men than you are. One of the compelling reasons why this man wants to move here is to get away from Negroes, from colored slums. This is an attitude we understand and, although we do not condone it, we are willing to help him—even though his intent be selfish."

"Well," Matt said, "it fails to incr enthusiasm for having him next doo wasting each other's time."

"You're just asking for it, white Matt turned to look at the slender you whose voice was raised for the first tim eyed him, feeling the anger rise in him

"I don't like threats," he said. "Mr. I don't think that we have anything say."

The portly man rose, a monument "I had hoped you would be amen reason. Since you have chosen otherw gret it. I must say to you, Mr. Matthe you, too, will regret it."

"It's time to go," Matt said thinly.

On Wednesday, Matt met Paul Cus lunch at Billy the Oysterman's downt ready curious about Cusack's reques had brought him so far from his norm town haunts for lunch, Matt noted tha of unease was showing through the b usual reserve.

"What's on your mind, Paul?" Ma as the drinks were set down.

"That mess out at the lane, nat Cusack said. "A couple of things. One- the money here. But something else I chew over with you: I wonder what we ourselves into."

"Why, what's different?"

"I don't know exactly. But som fooling around with it, and I don't lik

"What do you mean?"

"Laura called me right after I got office. She got a phone call. I couldn much sense out of what she said—s hysterical. But I gathered he called he thing he could think of, the real lo four-letter words."

Matt looked at Cusack with conc remembered the slender young man w malign, shifting eyes behind thick glas

"It could have been a nut. What w about the house—anything?"

"That's the baffling part. Nothing w about the house. I'm going to call the p Matt sighed. "You can't police the tele-one lines, Paul. If they call from a pay one, and they probably do, it'll do a fat lot good to trace a call."

Cusack slammed one fist down on the table.
ne sure thing, I think we have to go to the nty or state police and get a full-time pal in the lane until this is finished. If they'll l a thing like they did on Laura, they'll obably do anything."

The afternoon became a nightmare for ceable Lane and the rest of the week grew rse. The telephones rang repeatedly. Some-ies, when the receiver was lifted, the line uld seem dead until the listener became are of a soft, panting breath, unspeakably nacing. Sometimes voices came over the e, gruff or cold, abusive In one house, the sacks', the telephone shrilled every quarter ur until Laura ripped the instrument from wall with the convulsive strength of steria.

In fear or fury the wives called their husnds. Each train, through the early after-on, brought more of the men home. Matt ched Chappaqua on the 4:32, tense with meless foreboding. Unwilling to wait for bus, he took a taxi. The house stood serene d lovely, garlanded in the scarlet of climb-roses, drowsing in the golden light of early ening. He hadn't known what to expect, but had known that he was afraid. The serenity s deceptive, he knew, when Ellen met him at door.

"They called you?" he demanded.

"Twice. Matt, it was . . . unbelievable!"

Rage tore at him, corrosive in his helpless-ss. "What was said?"

"There's no use repeating it. Anyhow, I uldn't . . . don't want to." It was almost a il, but she got herself under control.
Matt, do you think there'll be more?"

"I don't know."

It was sometime after midnight Thursday.
first, shocked from sleep into conscious-ss, Matt did not know what had awakened him. Then he became aware of a hideous, ululating blare of sound and he was out of bed, fumbling for his shoes and trousers. He was aware of Ellen, tense and cold beside him.

"What is it?" she breathed. "Oh, Matt!"

"Go stay with Bill!" he commanded. "No, first I'm going out. Lock the door behind me."

In the hall he grabbed up the old putter he kept behind the door for back-yard practice and then he was out, stepping into a crazy cacophony of noise. It was a moonless, starless night, but now he could make out the bulk of autos passing in front of the house, lightless, moving slowly. Their horns were blaring, and from somewhere among them came an inhuman screech of human voices.

He started across the lawn. The cars, nearly unseen, had turned the circle and were coming back. He ran toward the street, his fists locked on the steel shaft of the putter. The first car came abreast as he swung the club and heard the brittle crash of breaking glass. The car stopped.

Matt felt, rather than clearly saw, its doors swinging open and half-seen figures spilling out. Suddenly he was engulfed in a bewildering, surging wall of human flesh. He reeled under a blow against the side of his head, and the salt taste of blood welled in his mouth. Then the blows came from all sides. He struggled to get free to swing the putter's steel blade. Agony knifed into him. Then he was down in the street and felt himself going under as a heavy foot smashed against his temple.

He was fighting back toward consciousness as the last car passed him and, wallowing to his feet, he had started after it when he felt an arm go around him and take up his sagging weight. "Let 'em go, Matt! Let the filthy thugs go!" It was Gold.

At noon Friday, stiff in every muscle, Matt found the card left behind by Francis Barton and called his Manhattan number. After a brief wait he heard the measured voice courteously asking after his health.

"You probably know my state of health as well as or better than I do," Matt said. "I'm just calling to let you know that I am buying the Bronson house tomorrow and that I do not, from here, see how you can stop me. There's a state patrol car in front of my house, another at Bronson's, and two county radio cars are patrolling the area on twenty-four-hour shifts. That doesn't leave you much but the telephone, does it, Mr. Barton?"

"No, I agree with you, Mr. Jones." The voice was still calm, courteous. "It is possible that we tried to do too much in too little time. I regret your injuries, Mr. Jones, and I wish you a speedy recovery."

With a soft click the line went dead.

Thoughtfully, absently fingering the ring of keys that symbolized possession of No. 1 Peaceable Lane, Matt stood with Zack Gold, watching a moving crew load the last of Bronson's possessions into a van.

"Well, let's go over and give it a look," Matt said as the van grumbled up the ramp toward the parkway cutoff. "Not that we'll be able to do much about it if he decided to kick in the plaster or take a hammer to the furnace. But we might as well look."

"Yes." Gold sighed. "Let's wrap it up."

They found the house bare, wearing an air of desolation.

"It'll need a coat of paint," Gold said appraisingly. "Otherwise they left it in pretty good shape. I don't know whether I'm surprised or not."

"He left quietly enough," Matt acknowledged.

"Yes," Gold said somberly. "But he left his mark on us all the same. The thing I hate having to remember is that he opened up the weakness and meanness in all of us."

"Remember this: it was the other side that fought dirty—not us."

Gold sighed. "I'd like to think that. I don't know, Matt. Maybe I'm wrong; I hope so."

Matt stayed at home Monday and Tuesday. But Wednesday morning he got into his working uniform of gray summer silk and had Ellen drive him to the station. The kiss he planted on Ellen's mouth was lingering, warmer than the usual station leave-taking.

"Call me if anything comes up," he said in a voice carrying the impact of an order.

"I will," she said, smiling at him.

He wouldn't have gone to the city, but the Glamour-Glow work wouldn't wait. This layout session with Lamar Winter had been scheduled for more than a week. Young wasn't a man to be stalled off and, for that matter, neither was Winter.

When his secretary came in to announce Winter's arrival, he rose and was walking toward the door when Winter came in briskly, carrying the flat, heavy picture case. He saw Winter's look change suddenly to one of surprised consternation.

"What hit you, man? Your face looks as if it had gone through a meat grinder."

"I got beat up," Matt said shortly.

He looked at the artist and was suddenly baffled by an expression he had never seen there before. Abruptly, with only a fleeting sense of caution, Matt decided to talk.

"Let's let the paintings go a few minutes. Sit down. I need your advice. If I make you sore, tell me and I'll drop it, but we know each other well enough for you to know I'm leveling with you. It isn't business—it's personal."

He began to tell the lane's decision and ordeal in a flat, unemotional voice. He recited the facts, leaving out nothing. He watched the attentive, impassive face across the desk, seeking to read the effect of his words on this man to whom, as a Negro, he was now appealing for a Negro's special knowledge.

"And that," he finished, "is how I got clobbered. But that's not what's bothering me particularly. I thought you might be able to help me by explaining how a thing like that would come up in the first place. Why would a colored man want to come in there with us—with a bunch of whites?"

Abruptly the painter rose from his chair and strode to the layout table. He lighted a cigarette, inhaled deeply. Matt could sense the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 163

BE REALLY REFRESHED... AROUND THE CLOCK!

RECIPE: Take a center slice from a round loaf of dark or white bread. Decorate with ring of devilled ham and egg salad. Mix yellow processed cheese-spread with softened butter and pipe along the edges with a pastry tube. Garnish with cucumber slices, sliced green and ripe olives, cream cheese, a radish. Cut into wedges to serve.

KING • REGULAR

For a midnight supper...serve this Hors d'Oeuvres Pie with King Size Coke and be really refreshed! Only Coca-Cola gives you that cheerful lift...that cold crisp taste that makes any snack taste better. Sign of Good Taste

COPYRIGHT © 1960 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY. "COKE" IS A REGISTERED TRADE-MARK.

me?"
," Matt said angrily, "quit picking at it. keep it simple. You say you have the to live where you want—I agree."
y watched silently while their steaks and were served. I wish this was over, Matt inking. There ought to be pleasure in this. 's just something that has to be done, and rd work.
ow do you think you're going to handle Winter asked. "You know you can't do he open. Man, they'd lynch you."
w there was this to be faced and Matt nized it. "We'll have to sneak it," he said. eing all that the word might mean, hat- e taste and sound of it. He had never felt d, so wrung out. "Do you want it?"
eah," Winter said, "I want it. I'm sorry, I've got to use you. You're a tame white n was pale and her face wore a look of ed bewilderment. "I'm trying to under- ," she said. "I'm sorry. I just don't under- ."

now," Matt muttered. Remembering his blind groping after truth, he felt the im- ility of communicating it, even to her. don't know him. That makes it harder. e's my friend."
iend?" Her voice was nearly shrill. could a friend do what he did to us or he had done the night you were beaten Was he one of the people in those cars, ng and screeching?"
o. He made a mistake. But he didn't have ing to do with that."

hy didn't he stop them if he's your ?"
e didn't know they'd do it."
hat's what he says. How do you know elling the truth?"
len, I've worked with him for years."
didn't know you worked with a colored You never told me."
urprised him, but it was probably true. act that Lamar Winter was colored had had so little effect on their professional association that it was unlikely he had ever talked about it at home.

Ellen loved Matt and most of the time had confidence in him, but she was no spineless wife to take the incredible on faith merely because he asserted it.

"You know him. So now you say you're not afraid. But I am. You were afraid it would destroy the value of our home. We couldn't afford it. Can we afford it now—or have you just forgotten it?"

"No, I haven't forgotten it, Ellen, you can't put a price on a man. You can't accept him on every other level—work with him, trust him—then shut him out on another."

"But you can put a price on your wife and son," she said bitterly. Instantly she wished the words unspoken, but even in the quick rush of shame for having said them, she knew that here lay the heart of her bewilderment: what came first, a man's family or this wild, quixotic notion?

"No." His voice was cold. "Sometimes you have to take a chance—even with the things you love. I won't kid you—this may not be easy, not at first anyhow. But there's no real danger."

She shook her head. "Matt, I'm not afraid to take my share of something that has to be done if it's right and necessary. But this seems so—so impossible. How about the others? What are you going to do about them?"

"The only thing I can do," he said woodenly. "Cheat them."

"Oh!" She sat frozen, her hands locked so tight in her lap that the knuckles were white. Matt saw her and felt the despair of a man who knows his position is untenable but that it must be defended anyhow.

All right, Matt thought bleakly, don't try to duck it; this is plain fraud. Only one thing would make it possible: he had to believe it was essentially right and the only thing that could be done. There were times in the process when he disliked Lamar Winter almost as much as he despised himself.

He learned that betraying those who trusted him presented no problems. For a monument to deception, the mechanics of conveying the deed to No. 1 Peaceable Lane to joint tenancy in the names of Lamar and Margo Winter proved childishly easy.

Gold should have wondered, and Matt had half expected it and tried to prepare himself to deal with the big Jew's doubts. But he accepted Matt's news in seeming calm. Matt knew Gold's distaste for what they had done; he put down Gold's ready acceptance to relief that the unpleasant task could be finished.

He kept the structure of deception to a bare and—he realized—suspicious minimum. A white shill was necessary. Alexander Fox, with the cynical skills he had developed as the county's most successful broker for Negroes, furnished a plausible-appearing professional stand-in who called himself Arthur Lakeland. Matt told Gold that he thought he had a prospect. Matt described him as an advertising man who wanted to escape Long Island. He had met the man briefly, he said, and he had looked all right and seemed to have money. He thought Gold should handle the details, had made an appointment for them to meet.

"Fine, Matt. That's good news," Gold had said. "When and where?"

That weekend Gold brought Lakeland out to look at No. 1 Peaceable Lane. Later Gold found Matt in his back yard.

"He seemed to like it," he reported. "Did you know how deep he was ready to go? Pricewise?"

"I didn't talk money with him," Matt said, telling the literal truth.

"He made an offer," Gold said. "I told him what we—you, rather, as the seller—had in it. He said he could match that."

"You mean we get out free?"

"He said so. You want to take it?"

"Why not?" Matt said, then added prudently, "If he's on the level. What do you think?"

"He's a buyer. He's the right color," the big man said dryly. "I didn't take a binder, but I will if you agree. It'll be getting out quicker and better than we could have hoped."

The ceremony of any real-estate closing in New York holds a nightmare quality for both seller and buyer. They find themselves mere paying spectators at a ritual whose performers are the brokers, the lawyers, the mortgage men, the guarantors of titles. This time Matt found the business of writing and handing checks back and forth and the stylized transfer of documents even more endlessly harrowing than the buying of his own house had been. He ached for it to be finished and was sweating when at last they all stood up and shook hands.

"I suppose you'll be moving in soon?" Gold said to Lakeland as they parted.

"Two, three weeks, I think," Lakeland said lightly. "Some things to settle first."

"Come on, Matt, let's get a drink," Gold said, as they left the mortgage company's office. It was a muggy day, and the blast of air conditioning was a relief as they found a back booth in a bar and ordered beer.

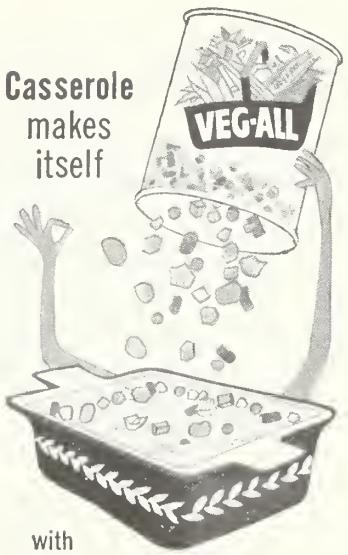
"That's that," Matt said woodenly. "What's next on the agenda?"

"Getting the money back into people's pockets. There are some details besides what we paid for it. New title search, interim insurance, adjustment for taxes and amortization. We had it less than a month and they don't come to much. At a rough guess, the whole deal cost two hundred dollars." He studied Matt coolly. "I suggest you and I split the loss. We can't very well ask the others to take that on."

Matt felt the cold clutch of surprise. He met Gold's gaze steadily, waiting for him to say it.

"Do you know how much time we have before Lamar Winter moves in?" Gold asked quietly. "It might make it a little easier if we have time to get people's money back to them."

"How long have you known?" Matt asked.



"Almost right away. I guessed at first. After that it was a simple matter of checking. You didn't really think you were going to get away with it, did you?"

new
Wish-Bone Deluxe FRENCH
hugs the salad...not the plate

Lettuce-lovin' new Deluxe French . . . superb ingredients magically blended to cling tight to each frilly lettuce leaf
All its subtly-spiced French flavor stays on the salad.
Try new velvety-smooth, mild and mellow Wish-Bone Deluxe French now!

give your salads a "touch of Genie-us"
with Wish-Bone
• Italian Dressing
• French Dressing
• Cheese Dressing
• Russian Dressing

Casserole makes itself with

VEG-ALL®

7 garden mixed vegetables

Send label for FREE RECIPES:

The Larsen Company, Dept. A12, P.O. Box 728, Green Bay, Wis.

PY-O-MY BROWNIE Mix?

Py-O-My is the original Brownie mix. Its old time flavor is unique. So is the handy aluminum pan it comes in. Makes chewy or cake-type brownies. Kids love eating and making them! Serve this week. Most grocers have Py-O-My.

MORE PEOPLE USE refreshing, calorie-free

Sugarine LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE

Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.

USE-TESTED McCalls

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.— 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

TRY BRUSHING MEATS Before Cooking with

GRAVY MASTER

THE PROOF IS IN THE EATING

ZUD removes RUST & STAINS from BATHTUBS · SINKS bottoms of COPPER POTS TILE FLOORS · METALS AUTO BUMPERS

FREE SAMPLE

Give names of your dealers.

ZUD is sold at Grocers, Hardware, Dept., 10c Stores

RUSTAIN PRODUCTS, P.O. BOX 502, FAIRLAWN, N. J.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

High School at Home

Many Finish in 2 Years.

Go as rapidly as your time and ability permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H. S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.

American School, Dept. H73, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37.

"I'm not sure what I thought. I knew I had to try. And I did get away with it. You could have gummed it up. Why didn't you?"

"That was my first impulse," Gold admitted. "I knew you must have got an awful jar, making that hundred-and-eighty-degree switch—and trying to do it on the sly. I talked it out with Beth, and in the end I left it up to her. But I told her, if Matt is willing to turn crook to do something right that we'd all done wrong, then what would we be doing trying to stop him?"

"She bought that?"

"It scared her, but she bought it."

"So did Ellen," Matt said moodily. "I suspect she thinks I'm crazy."

"There's a good chance we both are," the big man said somberly. "I'm not worried about myself, at least not so much as about Beth and the kids. But there's the street to worry about. If they find out—too soon—they could come apart like a firecracker."

"There's still what scared us first. Property values," Matt said. "I'll admit I'd lost sight of it. What do you think?"

"I can't afford a licking now any more than I could a month ago." Gold said. "But I hope there doesn't have to be a loss. I've had a good look at Winter. He's a quality citizen if any of us are. Maybe we can keep the lid on and the lane will absorb him. At least your boy's bound to raise the tone of the joint. That'll be the only Jaguar on Peaceable Lane."

Peaceable Lane's children and women were suffering an onset of the affliction which kills cats. The painters spent three days in the house at No. 1. Then delivery trucks and plumbers, electricians and carpet layers arrived in waves. They carried in a glittering army of de luxe kitchen and laundry appliances and followed with an enormous roll of carpeting. When the burlap was stripped away on the lawn, the carpet was seen to be luxuriously piled and of a perilously impractical eggshell shade. All this was accomplished without benefit of visible supervision by the new owner, who was, they understood somebody named Lakeland from Long Island.

"She'll go crazy trying to keep that thing clean," Laura Cusack confided when, after observing the carpet during a reconnaissance patrol, she went to the pool and encountered Cyd Cavanidis. Laura disapproved of Cyd but she was the only handy recipient for news.

Laura stayed to watch the furniture carried into the house section by section. Her interest did not abate when it was followed by a grand piano, the gleaming black expanse of the ebony cocktail table, and lamps like Japanese lanterns on wrought-iron stands.

"You wouldn't think Long Island could produce something like that," Laura told Ellen Jones when they met in the supermarket. "Those people must certainly be exotic."

So Peaceable Lane was on stand-by alert when at last the scarlet Jaguar slashed down the ramp into the lane. Laura was on patrol at the moment as the car whirled into the driveway. Lamar Winter jumped out, walked around the car and scooped his wife into his arms and carried her into the house with a flourish.

Half laughing, Margo wiggled and gasped, "Put me down! You're making a spectacle."

Laura was still staring when a black Cadillac limousine slid down the ramp and into the driveway. A chauffeur in gray livery descended and helped a small boy remove a red-and-silver model airplane from the tonneau. The driver saluted amiably as the boy turned toward the house with his treasure.

Laura was nearly home when she had recovered her breath sufficiently to begin to get mad. It was about then that what she had witnessed began to register. By the time Paul reached home the news was widely distributed.

Before dinner Solomon Weissman strolled up the lane. He was making for the Outerbridge home, but hoping to supplement the neighborhood grapevine with some firsthand evidence en route. He got all he needed, for Lamar and Margo Winter were in the front yard with Tod. Winter tossed him a negligent neighborly wave, and because Weissman was a hard man to catch off base, he waved back.

"So it's true, John Ainslie," Weissman said as the lawyer admitted him. "I had my doubts when Paul Cusack telephoned and said the new people were colored. Do you know how this happened?"

"No, I don't," Outerbridge said. "Have you seen Jones or Gold?"

"No. I wanted to make sure first." Weissman shook his head. "It's—it's unbelievable."

"Frankly, I was suspicious when we got our full price. The place simply wasn't worth it."

"Yes?" Weissman looked mildly skeptical. "You didn't say anything, John Ainslie."

"No," Outerbridge admitted. He was frowning. "Do you suppose it's possible somebody got to them, Gold or Jones or both?" He hesitated. "I mean with money?"

"No." Weissman was emphatic. "They could have been duped. They may even have been stupid. But they couldn't have been got with money. I'd swear to it." He sighed. "The question is what do we do now. For the moment I believe our safest course is to do nothing. This street needs calm as it never has before."

"Yes," Outerbridge said thoughtfully. "We'll have to be very careful."

Outwardly there was nothing to reveal that Peaceable Lane had suffered a volcanic shock. Matt Jones was oppressed by the deceptive air of calm, and communicated his unease to Gold.

"We could have been wrong," he said moodily. "Maybe we underrated the place. They're taking it better than we thought they could. Maybe we'd better level with them."

"Come clean and you can head for the hills," Gold said earnestly. "They're still in shock. We have to go on pretending it was an act of God. As long as they believe they were licked by an organization too big to fight, they can accept the idea that it was hopeless. That way they won't like it, but they'll take it and learn to live with it."

"I'm not sure you're right. It might be smarter to let them know how and why Winter got here. That way they'd know he was here to live, not to wreck the place."

"Maybe, later—but right now I'm afraid it would pull the plug. Let's wait awhile."

Out of the paralyzing shock of the first week there came a few sparse but encouraging signs. Estelle Outerbridge came to the door as Ellen was pouring another cup of coffee after Matt left.

"You're just in time. Join me," Ellen said.

"Ellen, I want to say something," Estelle said, busying herself with sugar and cream. "Please don't be hurt. But you must know people are talking and wondering how your husband and Mr. Gold could have been fooled by those people."

Ellen stiffened warily and said nothing.

"Well, I just want you to know—of course I wouldn't dare say this to John Ainslie—I'm so pleased . . . so happy. I really believe it was meant to be. . . . God sometimes saves us from ourselves. I hope your husband understands that and can accept it and be thankful."

Ellen got up and went around the table and took the small creature in her arms. "Thank you, Estelle, thank you very much."

The conviction Dr. Abram expressed to Zack Gold was not much different. "I wish to congratulate you," the doctor said. "Somehow, by good luck or bad management, you have saved us all from a sickening crime. For the first time in many years I feel like a brave man. I must thank you."

Does a man—any man—have a right to buy the house next door? Everyone with a house on Peaceable Lane had to search his heart, and decide.

READ

PEACEABLE LANE

BEGINNING ON PAGE 56

There was that much. It was not en
The lane had been stunned. It had not knocked out. Slowly, beneath the surfa most imperceptible at first, began the s ranean stirrings leading to avalanche.

It was early when Macmillan's sec asked Matt to come in. Macmillan was window, looking out at the gray day. Hi still lay untouched on his desk. Matt s shadow of agitation and something anger?—on the blandly self-assured fac

"What's going on down on your st
Macmillan demanded abruptly.

So that was it. "We've got a new neigh Matt said cautiously. "I suppose you he's colored."

The look Macmillan bent on him wa fled and angry. "I thought you had that tion under control. How did it happen?

Matt shrugged. Lying was getting
"We were taken," he said shortly.

"Taken how?"

"As John Ainslie Outerbridge says can't fight an organization. They put ringer on us."

"How about that lawyer of yours? I he investigate?"

"As much as he could," Matt said tiously. "It was a neat job."

"Neat!" Macmillan snorted. "Do realize that's the first break-through i part of the country? And now they're in won't stop there." He stared gloomily wall.

"I don't think it's the beginning of break-through." Matt said carefully sounds as though you don't know wh
If you knew you might have less reas worry."

Macmillan looked up sharply. "Wh you mean?"

"Lamar Winter."

"What about Winter?'

"Winter's the man who moved in."

"What?"

"Yes. That's why I don't think it's the of a flood."

"Winter? I don't believe it," Macm breathed, but staring at Matt and readin firmation in his face, he rallied. "Didn know you lived there?"

"He probably did," Matt admitted, g ing himself against saying too much.

"You take this pretty lightly," Macm said. "You don't suppose he really think let him get away with it?"

"There isn't a lot we can do," Matt Macmillan snapped, "I do not propo tolerate being double-crossed and ma monkey of by a man in my own organizat
Matt knew it was reckless, but he didn' being talked to that way. "Winter is not organization, Grant," he said. "And chances are, if you still want Glamour-you can't have it without having Winter
"Perhaps," Macmillan said. "Just per
I have yet to see an indispensable man.

The next development in the affai Peaceable Lane was serious. Matt was cl in on the last swaths of the front lawn or urday morning when he saw Jerome come up the lane. Matt shut off the chatt lawn-mower engine and crossed the fr mowed greensward to meet the dentist.

"Hi," he called. "What's with you?"

"I wonder if you would help me with s thing," Kelly said. "Advice—sort of."
looked depressed.

"I'm a lousy source of advice," Matt
"But sure. What's on your mind?"

"You're a member on the hill," Kelly and then rushed on with it. "If you ca range it, I would like to meet Mr. Sloa
Mr. Kern—you know, the real-estate m know they're pretty important."

"I know them," Matt said. "Not so you could call us buddies. What's on mind?"

"You know I had my house listed wit Maccauley agency for months. Only now don't want to handle it."

"They give any reason?" Matt asked.

Kelly was a deliberate man with a habit of speech. "Well, there was the ow! Borden's cream cheese in isy-to-serve "butter dish" bars!

CONTINUED ON PAGE

ive most wanted flavors!

METHING WONDERFUL has happened to cream cheese! w you can enjoy the convenience of cream cheese in 6-oz. s, shaped to fit any butter dish. Makes serving and slicing er than ever. Storing is easier, too. New heavy foil wrap ls protectively over unused portion of the bar.

den's—and only Borden's brings you cream cheese bars delicious flavors.

BORDEN'S fine cheeses VERY BIG ON FLAVOR

© The Borden Company

Cream Cheese with Chives. Enjoy the tempting taste of chopped chives picked while young and tender from Borden's own chive gardens.

Borden's CHEESE BAR — CREAM CHEESE WITH CHIVE

Borden's CHEESE BAR — PASTEURIZED CREAM CHEESE

Plain Cream Cheese. Light, fluffy texture. So good, so easy to spread or mix for all your cream cheese uses. Enjoy it at breakfast, too.

Cream Cheese with Pimento. Cream Cheese bright with bits of pimento gives you a happy tasting treat. Colorful in stuffed tomato. Perfect for snacks.

Borden's CHEESE BAR — CREAM CHEESE WITH PIMENTO

Borden's CHEESE BAR — CREAM CHEESE WITH RELISH

New! Cream Cheese with Relish. The tang of relish, combined with the creamy flavor of Borden's Cream Cheese, makes for a tasty snack.

Cream Cheese with Dates and Nuts. Here's a combination that's always a hit with children. Popular with grownups, too. Offers a welcome change for sandwiches.

Borden's CHEESE BAR — CREAM CHEESE WITH DATES and NUTS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 166

first. They said they were sorry they hadn't been able to move my place, but with the market slow right now and the taxes so rough here, they hadn't been able to locate a buyer. But they knew I was anxious to sell, so they had decided to release it and they hoped I would do better with some other broker."

"You bought that?" Matt asked.

"Not exactly," Kelly said. "I didn't see why people like Maccauleys would think somebody else could sell a house if they couldn't. So I went to see Maccauley himself. He finally admitted the real reason."

"What was it?" Matt asked automatically. But he knew it already and felt the cold, sick weight of it.

"That," Kelly said. He turned and nodded toward where the slate gables of Winter's house and the raw frame of the new dormer were visible above the shrubbery. "Maccauley did a lot of hemming and hawing. But what it came down to was that, because they are the top and intend to stay there, they won't handle a deal in what he called 'questionable and unstable circumstances.' I suppose what he means is, they're scared."

"The jerk," Matt said. "What do you want to do, Jerry?"

"Whatever's best. That's why I want to talk to somebody about it. We're crowded, but we can manage if we have to. The only thing is, it leaves me in a box. I had already put down earnest money on the place we were dickering for in Connecticut."

"I'll talk to them. See if anything can be done," Matt said.

Stripped to the waist and sweating in the combined heat of the sun and his Saturday chores, Zachariah Gold rested on a bale of peat moss and listened to Matt in somber, thoughtful attention.

"He put down fifteen hundred on the Greenwich deal," Matt said, finishing his report. "What's his chance of getting his deposit back? Legally, I mean."

Gold shook his head. "Not much. That's what a binder's for. Sign of intent to go through with the deal. If he doesn't, the other man is entitled to keep it."

"He can't afford it," Matt said.

"I know."

They looked at each other and each knew what was in the other's mind. Here was another burden, one they hadn't counted on. But it was inevitably their own. Kelly, that inoffensive man, must not be punished for their deeds. And running desperately through each man's mind was his own perennial lack of margin, the relentless, proliferating pressures that made another $750 bulk so huge.

"It'll take a little time to get it up," Gold said. "I'll have to borrow it."

Looking at the heavy, thoughtful face, knowing it bore worry and concern, but no trace of resentment, Matt felt the warmth of his affection for this big man.

"So will I. But how do we handle it? We can't just give it to him."

Suddenly Gold was laughing. "I'll figure a way to handle it."

Winter had abandoned the Harlem studio and had, himself, ridden up the parkways with the truck bringing the easels, canvases, cans of brushes, boxes and bottles of paint and thinners and varnishes—all the disorderly paraphernalia of his craft. Now he felt the stuff had to be moved up from the garage—at once.

"It would make more sense to go fishing," Margo protested, as he staggered up the stairs with the first load. "Don't you know what the radio says? It's going over ninety."

"I want to see what it looks like," he said.

She sighed. "O.K. What goes first?"

"You stick to hausfrauing," he said. "The big stuff is too big for you, and the little stuff Tod can handle. He's big enough to give the old man a hand."

The job was finished in midafternoon. Sweating and content, Winter stood at the big easel on which rested a half-finished portrait of the Glamour-Glow girl. Winter studied the work, trying to decide if this light was different and how much the difference meant.

"Looks good, hey, Tod?" he said.

"She's pretty," the boy agreed soberly. "You want me to call mother?"

"You can if you want," Winter said, "but it's not necessary. One of the things you need to understand about women—and will eventually—is that they don't know much about men's work and care less. They're not geared for it."

"Well, gee," Tod said. Winter laughed and gripped his shoulder.

"I've got a better idea," he said. "Let's give her a surprise and take her swimming."

"Swimming?" The boy's face lighted. He bolted, yelling, "Mother!"

Winter found Margo in the living room. "Where did he go?" Winter said.

"His swimming trunks," Margo said. "He came through here yelling we were going swimming, and then, whoosh, he was gone. Where do you think you're going swimming?"

"The pool, of course. Didn't you know there's a pool on this street? And that we own a hunk of it?"

"You're not going there!"

"Sure. Why not?"

"Lamar, are you crazy?"

He saw the quick lift of terror in her eyes and spoke soothingly. "Honey, we're never going to make it walking soft and babying these folks. There isn't any halfway. Where're our suits?"

So, for the first time, the Winter family crossed the lawn and moved down the lane toward the pool to whose use and enjoyment their deed clearly entitled them. Margo wore a long terry-cloth robe concealing her white suit and the contrasting grace of her slender brown body. Walking between husband and son, each with a towel across his shoulders, she could feel hidden eyes on her. But only two pairs were watching, in fact. One pair belonged to Lana Weissman. Lana, in a new skintight suit which she fervently hoped would make lifeguard Mark Cotten's eyes bug out, strolled up the lane from the opposite direction. The other pair, concealed behind o curtains, belonged to Laura Cusack.

The sound of splashing and juvenile and screeches came to them. The scre police whistle cut piercingly through t roar. Flinching, Margo felt Tod stiffen her, and Winter felt a prickly tighte skin as the whistle shrilled again. A else on Peaceable Lane would have dis the two long blasts and one short as a nary, unalarming code message in the c nity's mother-child signal system. Th sage meant that Paulie Cusack shou home on the double.

Cyd Cavanidis was on the pool deck in languor and little else. Lana We was just behind the Winters. Mark was halfway along the pool, trying ordinate Ruth Gold's kicks and s Ruth was fat like Angela Cavanidis, had a sense of timing and Cotten had h her. The pool was raucous. Jerry Gold Abram, Bill Jones, four of the Kellys, olas Cavanidis and Paul Cusack Jr. the deep end or bounding in and out of Winter dropped his towel and moun high board. The kids were startled as th dark body knifed down among them in hard dive. But they were too intent o own uproar to be more than mome abashed by the alien presence. After ment's staring silence the noise began Cyd rolled over on her towel and w Winter come up the length of the pool i crawl and spring lightly up to the dec was too lazy to hate anybody, particu man with shoulders and legs like that was too intensely and alertly curious t anybody but Cyd.

Winter moved toward his wife an "Come on, it's great," he said.

Margo shook her head, but managed smile. "Don't rush me." She was still robe and felt an anguished conviction t would never be able to take it off.

Winter turned to the boy. "Come o Last one in's a white baby."

FOR THE SPECIAL NIGHT when you want to be all things beautiful, fashion your legs to sheer perfection . . . with Belle-Shormeer stockings. Exclusive legsize knit assures a wonderfully faultless fit from toe-tip to top . . . flattering your legs to new loveliness. It's also the secret why stockings by Belle-Shormeer wear so much longer . . . fulfill their promise of beauty day after day. Your choice of seamless or fully fashioned in all of the season's most desired shades. At fine stores everywhere . . . when you want to be completely alluring.

He saw eagerness and doubt struggling in d's eyes and, in a kind of despair, saw doubt ning. He felt an impatient impulse to ch down and seize the boy and fling him o battle.

Lana Weissman saved him from it. Lana tated nearly everybody on Peaceable Lane, luding her parents. When she was not be- smart-alecky, she cultivated a grating air weariness with all adult opinion. These alities successfully concealed the fact that na was not only pryingly interested in the rld around her but also owned an all-inclu- e fund of sympathy for anything that was t or weak. She had temporarily forgotten rk Cotten and his reaction to her swim t. She slid over and squatted beside Tod.

"Can you swim?" she asked.

Caught off guard, Tod answered, "Sure."

"O.K." Lana grinned. "I'll race you from e to the board and back. Come on." She bbed his hand and before Tod knew it he s in that alien water.

Winter stood staring after them. "Well, I'll damned," he said.

Suddenly the police whistle sounded again— long blasts and a short. It was louder this e, piercingly loud and shrill. Not even ilie's long experience in the arts of con- ient deafness could ignore this one. Star- d and sullen, the boy climbed out on the k and disappeared.

"Wuff! What a stinking day," Matt groaned he stepped off the station platform and nted the sweat-sticky seat of his pants in station wagon beside Ellen.

"Sorry, darling," Ellen said, looking at him pathetically. "You'll feel better after 've had a drink."

First things first," Matt grunted. "I'm go- to have a swim—then a drink."

You have a surprise coming. You can't m—the pool's being drained."

Nuts! I wonder what went wrong."

I don't know. You could ask Bill. He was re most of the afternoon." She paused. "ll said the colored people were there to- —swimming. I'll bet it took some working their nerve—the first time."

They pay their share," Matt grunted. hy not?"

I know," she said. "But, Matt . . . I der . . . could it cause trouble?"

hanged into an old pair of shorts and a e shirt, Matt felt better. He found Bill in back yard in a game of three-cornered h with Jerry Gold and Benjy Abram.

What's this about draining the pool?"

I dunno. Mr. Cotten chased us all out and he had to drain it. Mrs. Cusack came r and they were arguing, and then Mr. ten told us to beat it."

Oh?" Matt said. "Mrs. Cusack, huh?" strode toward the pool, oblivious of the t. He knew now what he would find and he would find it.

otten, in bathing trunks and dangling a g-handled scrub brush across his knees, sitting on the coping watching the water l go down. The pool was half empty.

What for?" Matt demanded.

Mrs. Cusack told me to do it," Cotten gloomily. "I knew there'd be trouble."

There is trouble. Shut off the drain and t filling. Now!"

You're the boss," Cotten said, getting up moving toward the control box. "But I e you'll square me with Mrs. Cusack."

Don't worry about Mrs. Cusack. You've ped a hundred bucks' worth of water and going on her bill."

Matt, you can't talk to my wife that way!" der a strain, Cusack's face was likely to mottled.

All right, I don't want to act tough, and if ave I apologize," Matt said. "But let's e sense. If everybody is going to decide way that pool's run, you can get another irman. I told Cotten to fill it again and I t it understood it's going to stay that way."

Not if those people are going into it ain!" Laura said. "You can just tell them to st out, since you're the chairman."

I'll tell them no such thing," Matt said ly. "They have the same right to that pool ou do. Let's show some sense."

"Now, look here," Cusack said. "You're taking a funny attitude. First you and Gold go to sleep and let this colored man stick it into us. And now anybody'd think you're trying to make him feel right at home."

Matt stared at Cusack. "It's not a bad idea. Meanwhile I want that pool left alone."

"You bet your sweet life it'll be left alone," Laura snuffled through her handkerchief. "Oh, why couldn't those horrible people leave us alone?" As Matt rose, she collapsed on the sofa and began to sob convulsively.

In a general way Matt had expected Peaceable Lane to resist Winter and his family. He had been prepared for suspicion and resentment. He had even considered the possibility of violence. He and Zack had hoped that with time the lane would become reconciled to Winter in peace. But it wouldn't wait. That ugly business of the pool had made it clear. The Winters needed to be humanized. Perhaps the lane could concede them some small but essential measure of the quality if somebody the lane knew accepted them as such. Simply asked them over, as you might any other newcomer. He was unprepared for the resistance he encountered.

"Matt, are you out of your mind?" Ellen said. "Have them here? To dinner?"

"Why not?" he insisted doggedly. "They're people. They are new here. Besides, I know them. It is funny to pretend that they don't exist."

Ellen shook her head. "Matt, we live here too. It's—it's impossible."

"I don't get it," he said. "It doesn't sound like you—simply because they're colored."

That stung. "Oh, Matt," she said helplessly, "you know better. With people already suspicious—prying—insinuating. You don't know how these women are."

"They're just people," he said again. "Somebody has to take a little of the scare out of this street."

When dry, thirsty skin needs quick refreshment... Revenescence Cream quenches. It soothes, smooths and protects. Helps replenish lost moisture: keeps your skin constantly dewy, younger-looking, supple. Hold back the years... treat your skin deeply, daily, to moisture-protecting Revenescence Cream! Generous introductory size, $3.50 plus tax. At favored department and specialty stores. Charles of the Ritz

"Matt, why does this man mean so much to you?" she asked. "Do you think he would do this for you—if things were the other way around?"

"Huh?" he said. "That's a goofy question. How could it be the other way around? White Protestants don't need help—not this kind."

"But if it was, do you think he would?"

"I don't know," he said, looking her full in the eyes. "But that's not the question."

In the end, still unwilling and ridden by dark and unshakable foreboding, Ellen consented.

She did not know, although she might have guessed, that Margo Winter came in equal apprehension. But both young women had capacities for grace under pressure, and probably because of them the evening went off fairly well on the surface. Still there was about it an air of unreality.

It began with the front-door chimes. If the Golds—or any other neighbor—had been coming to an outdoor summer dinner, Ellen would have expected them to drift in unannounced, and the man would surely have been as sloppily dressed as Matt. But here, formally waiting on the doorstep, stood this handsome, dark-skinned trio, dressed superbly.

"This is Margo, and I'm Lamar Winter," the man said. "The boy, here, is Tod."

"Please come in." Ellen smiled. "Matt's in the back yard with Bill. Why don't you and Tod go on through?" She nodded toward the open door leading to the terrace. "I'm afraid we live outdoors—until it snows."

"I should have known." Winter smiled. "It's what the magazines call gracious country living. I've painted it often enough."

"You'll find Matt a messier chef than the ones you paint." Ellen laughed.

Winter, showing no sign that his handsome dark silk suit, white button-down shirt and small-figured tie were more than the occasion demanded, turned toward the terrace door. "Out this way?" he asked.

"Through there and keep going," Ellen said. She turned toward Margo and, making a quick appraisal, was not deceived by the simplicity of the yellow linen dress. It was plain; it looked cool; it was undeniably perfect, and Ellen knew that it had cost at least twice the price of the best formal in her own closet.

"What a lovely house," Margo said, taking in the room's air of lived-in quiet and comfort.

"It's shabby," Ellen said dishonestly. "And it's not very orderly. It's probably my fault, but I prefer to blame Clarice."

"Clarice?"

"The maid." For no reason that seemed to make any sense, Ellen was suddenly embarrassed by remembering the color of Clarice's skin. "But she has only one day a week to undo the damage," she said quickly.

Winter found Matt beside the grill, inspecting a two-inch-thick slab of dark, fat-veined meat. An ice bucket and a tray with bottles and glasses were close at hand.

Matt turned to Bill. "How about fetching me the charcoal? This fire needs hotting up. Take Tod along—he can help bring some Cokes. And why not turn on the lights? You could play croquet."

"I'm overdressed," Winter said as the boys left obediently. "All right to shuck my coat?"

"It's about time," Matt grunted. "Better shed the tie too."

"What'll I do with them?"

"Toss them in the living room. I'll make a drink while you're at it. Gin and tonic?"

Matt and Winter knew each other. The women had no such bond to ease their way.

Ellen was relieved when Matt went to prod experimentally at the steak and lifted it, smoking, from the grill. "Come and get it," he said, wearing an infuriating air of self-satisfaction.

It was easier while they ate. But both Ellen and Margo still felt the uneasy sense of talking too much, laughing too quickly.

"Have you seen the school?" Ellen asked—and instantly damned her foolish mouth. With any other woman this would have been a subject of absorbing mutual interest. Why should it be something else with this woman? But she knew it was.

"Yes, it's a lovely school," Margo said. She sensed the peril, too, but was as helpless as Ellen to keep out of quicksand. "Do they have to leave early?"

"It's complicated," Ellen said. "They're on split sessions. The morning is better if you can work it out. It means getting started awfully early, but then they're home early in the afternoon."

"Is there a school bus?"

"Yes, but it's a disgrace. We're at the end of the line. First to be picked up and last to get home." Ellen hesitated. "We do better with car pools."

Margo thought, I'll have to face it sometime. I can't escape it any more than she can. "How are the car pools arranged?" she asked.

"We work it out among us," Ellen said. "I'll let you know when I know more."

Something like real ease came with the coffee. The endless evening was ending. Soon there would be privacy and the chance to put aside the mask of pretense.

"It was a lovely dinner," Margo said. She was surprised by the thought that now, unbelievably, Peaceable Lane had granted her that cachet of acceptance, a social obligation. On the heels of the satisfying notion there came a rush of panic at the prospect of fulfilling it.

Francis Barton had infuriated, inspired, intimidated or puzzled many men, but he did not puzzle himself. He remembered nea every step of the path he had trod. The o blind spot he suffered was that in maturity had deliberately chosen to forget the clean h zeal of the young man who had first set fo upon it. The son of a preacher, he had dra on all the respect his father enjoyed in th Michigan community to win acceptance in l school. He had slaved his way through—bo at his books and at the eight-to-midnig lunchroom job that fed him and paid the t tion. He had emerged just in time to colli headlong with the great depression.

He had been on relief. He had been a pu lic defender, partly because his poor shin could bring him no more lucrative clients b mostly because, in that time, it was politica useful for the machine to have a few carefu selected Negroes in the public pay. He h become, in Detroit, a minor relief adminis tor concerned with housing. The job h driven home something he already knew: th of all America's unfortunate citizens in th years the least favored were the Northern u ban Negroes from whom he had sprung.

There was a hot pride in breaking his fi block in Detroit, thereby loosening by a lit the white strictures on the colored ghetto. I broke others thereafter and became skillful and ruthless—at the work.

Somewhere along the road he had not much lost the passion as deliberately aba doned it in favor of ambition. He learned th once a white block was broken, its remainc tended to crumble quickly—especially if fc could be planted in it. And he discovered that knew how to move more quickly and surely th either his beneficiaries or his victims. He w also a patient man, full of experience and cra He had learned to lose skirmishes with gra But he did not like to lose campaigns and s dom did. He regarded Peaceable Lane as lost skirmish. The fact that Lamar Winter h got a house did not satisfy him. His own ra had failed. Peaceable Lane was still a ca paign that Barton intended to win.

He summoned Edward Smith, the slend owl-spectacled man who served as his sco and also commanded his troops in the fie

"I want you to look over Peaceable La again," Barton said. "I think you may find soft spot. There should be one by now."

"You want to finger one?"

"Not yet. Any one of several might serv There is a Dr. Abram. During the war he caped from a German concentration camp Austria. I believe he can be frightened. Y are aware of Peter Yale, the commentat There is the banker, Paul Cusack. His w hates niggers."

Edward Smith's eyes glittered behind th thick spectacles. "Anything you want me to with the pigeon when I decide which one is?"

"I'll let you know when I want him broug in," Barton said.

Smith stood up and moved to the do "You know, Mr. Barton, I'm glad we're goi into this one again. There's one out there w thinks he's tough, that Jones. He's on my li That last night when we went out to jig them a little, Jones came out with a golf clu He was the one did this to me." Smith open his mouth to reveal a gap in the gleaming façade of his upper teeth.

Barton regarded him thoughtfully. "Y will refrain from personal animosities, E ward. This is not your private feud."

They were alone at the breakfast table in t sunny kitchen. Bill had bolted his oran juice, eggs and cereal and was already away some demanding business of nine-year-olds.

Matt said, "What did you think of them

"The Winters?" She had expected the que tion. "She's nice . . . I think. She was nervou But what else could she be? So was I."

"And Lamar?"

"I don't know, Matt. He's pleasa enough—and sure of himself. Maybe tha it—too sure. There's something hard abo him—and cold."

"If you think he's hard, you're right." Ma admitted. "He's a colored man in a wh man's world. He had to be hard to make it

"I know it must be difficult for them," s said somberly. "But, Matt, it's difficult for

Your key to fun and learning at home — Milton Bradley Teaching Aids

The next best thing to a teacher:

YOU...AND A MILTON BRADLEY TEACHING AID

Today most schools are crowded. Teachers are pressed for time. They can't always give the individual attention your children need. But now you can help — in a way that makes learning fun — with Milton Bradley Teaching Aids.

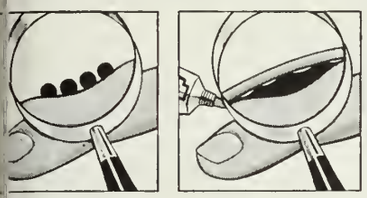
These popular aids are the identical ones teachers use in the classroom. All are educator-approved and grade-identified. There are Milton Bradley Teaching Aids to help your boy or girl with reading . . . spelling . . . arithmetic . . . social studies.

Link Letters, Flash Words, Understanding Numbers, Phonetic Drill Cards and many other Milton Bradley "Keys to Fun and Learning" are now on display at fine stores everywhere. Inexpensively priced. Help your children at home and note the improvement in their report cards.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Send for free illustrated folder of Milton Bradley Teaching Aids
Milton Bradley Company
Dept. L-100
Springfield 2, Massachusetts



Also available in Canada

MB MILTON BRADLEY

100 YEARS 1860 1960

UNGUENTINE® BOOSTS NATURE'S EALING POWER

no plain antiseptic can!

ature sends its healing m to the surface of a injury. But tension keep serum droplets t. As germs get through, ing slows down!

2. Unguentine instantly spreads this healing serum, creates a protective blanket to lock out germs and to promote healing more effectively than nature itself!

ives instant aid to everyday cuts, scrapes, cratches, as well as burns—Relieves pain, ghts germs, promotes healing and forms protective antiseptic dressing as no ream or liquid can! Nothing's safer for ll kinds of everyday skin injuries—also happed hands and lips!

lay it safe—
et Unguentine take over!

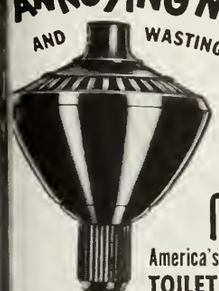
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ANTISEPTIC FIRST AID DRESSING
UNGUENTINE
WITH DIANESTOL

NO MUSS . . . NO FUSS!
KRYLON SPRAY PAINT
DRY IN MINUTES!
F YOU PRIZE IT . . . KRYLON-IZE IT!

Feet Burn

Perspire, Sore, Tire?



HERE'S FAST RELIEF!

You'll love the refreshing "lift" Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder gives you . . . and the way it keeps your feet , dry, bath-fresh and com- able all day. Essential to y grooming; helps pre- Athlete's Foot. Try it!

Dr. Scholl's FOOT POWDER

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE
WATER MASTER
America's Largest Selling
TOILET TANK BALL

Noisy running toilets can woste over 1000 ollons of water o doy. Stop this onnoying oise, woste and expense. The efficient pat- nted Water-Moster Tank Boll instontly staps he flow of water after eoch flushing, stops he flow everytime, not just some af the time.

5c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE
Higher in Canada

too. We didn't invent this race business. We just inherited it."

He looked at her with a sudden grin, proud and warm. "You did a lot to disinherit yourself last night. You're quite a woman."

"Honestly, Matt, now that it's over, do you really think it did any good?"

"Someday I think you'll agree that it did," he said. "And you kind of stuck your own foot in it with that car-pool talk. You're really on my side and don't know it."

"Oh," she breathed, remembering, "what can I do about that? Everything's running away with me. It's mad."

It was mad. And it got worse. For the next few days it all belonged to her. It came to her first at the meat counter in the supermarket. Trundling up with her basket, she saw Shirley Draper and Laura Cusack talking to the butcher. Ellen smiled and offered a cool "Hello." There was no answer, but Laura's head turned so quickly that Ellen made the mistake of thinking she had not heard.

In all her life Ellen had not had much practice at being snubbed. She wasn't quite ready for the reality. And so she repeated the greeting when all three met in the aisle between the salad dressings and the canned dog foods. Shirley looked startled and unhappy and even seemed about to speak. But Laura first looked through Ellen and then turned to fix Shirley with an intimidating glare somewhat colder than the frozen codfish cakes.

Ellen's face stiffened. In cold fury, she wheeled her basket with such abrupt and possibly intentional violence that it collided with Laura's and toppled the hamper of Cusack groceries into the aisle. Laura's outraged gasp was enough to cushion Ellen's shock and send her away up the aisle filled with evil glee.

Ellen was not much for committees, but she had agreed to help plan and produce the annual Halloween children's party at Grassy Tor. She had been bidden to a lunch with the committee's seniors, Mrs. Harry Strauss and Mrs. Grant Macmillan. Mrs. Strauss was fat and full of good works. Sybil Macmillan was svelte for fifty, expensively and attractively turned out. Because Sybil was Matt's boss's wife, Ellen tried to like her and so far had managed to conceal the truth that she did not.

Grassy Tor activities were always planned well ahead. Halloween was far away in the bracing autumn, but this was still sultry summer. Ellen parked and went through the castle's mighty oak door and found the two ladies seated at a shaded veranda table.

"I'm late," she said. "I'm sorry. At the last minute Bill ——"

"Forget it, dear," Sybil said sweetly. "I know it's awful having to do all your own work, even in that tiny house." She inspected Ellen lightly but searchingly. "And with all that, you do keep yourself up beautifully. Your hair is lovely—did you do it yourself?"

All right, Ellen thought grimly, so it's going to be like that, is it? "I'm lucky. It curls naturally," she said.

"There's the waiter," Mrs. Strauss said quickly. "Don't you want a drink, Ellen? We have ordered."

Ellen shot her a grateful look but watched doubtfully as the waiter placed Martinis before the two older women. "I don't know. It's too warm for gin and me in the same package. I think I'll have a daiquiri."

"I think you're wise, dear," Sybil said. "You'll probably have to drink more gin than you can stand from now on—without doing it here at the club too."

"Huh?" Ellen said inelegantly, completely baffled.

"Your new neighbors," Sybil said sweetly. "Do they drink anything else?"

"Oh!" Ellen's gasp was involuntary.

"New neighbors?" Mrs. Strauss looked perplexed.

Sybil turned to her. "Oh, didn't you know? The new family in Peaceable Lane. Ellen and Matt had them for dinner."

"The colored people!" Mrs. Strauss's round face was thoroughly dumfounded. "Ellen, did you? What was she like?"

It had happened. It hurt. But the numbness was wearing off. Ellen was down but she wasn't out, and cold rage was welling up in her.

Three times more fresh beef protein in one can of Red Heart than any dry dog food... most canned dog foods

Three tasty varieties: Beef, Beef-plus-Fish, Beef-plus-Liver
For dogs who think they're people! ©1960, Red Heart Div., John Morrell & Co.

"Like any of us," she said coolly. "She's very pretty. She was at Vassar—daisy chain, you know." She was sure about Vassar, although not quite sure about the daisy chain. "She wore a stunning new Givenchy dress." Turning to Sybil she asked, "Isn't that your Givenchy—that you got year before last?"

Sybil had been stabbed and knew it. "How fascinating," she said. "I hear they have a son—Billy's age. Billy's such a fine youngster." She turned to Mrs. Strauss. "Grant and I are so fond of him. I hope this hasn't embarrassed him—with the other children."

"He doesn't seem to be," Ellen said carefully. "He liked him. I could bring Tod Winter to the Halloween party—as Billy's guest," she said sweetly. "Would you like that?"

It wasn't a victory, but neither was it total defeat. And the duel had been forced on her. But sick regret swept over Ellen that she had let herself be provoked into enlisting Bill. I'm getting as reckless as Matt, she thought.

One thing the women on Peaceable Lane were glad to forget for the summer was the car-pool system which transported the lane's young to and from Wacapo Consolidated.

School was only three weeks away. Subconsciously Ellen had been putting it off. There was the Winter problem, and she began cautiously to feel her way toward a solution. She telephoned Cyd Cavanidis. Cyd's stepchildren, Nicholas and Angela, had been part of a job lot including Jerry and Ruth Gold, Paulie Cusack and Bill, the year before.

"Why, honey, I thought you knew," Cyd said. "It's all set up. Laura arranged it."

Ellen caught her breath. "Do you mind telling me what was set up—that is, if you have Laura's permission to say?"

Cyd could smell strife when it raged around her, but she was lazy and did not intend to let herself be drawn into it.

"Somebody must have goofed, honey. Laura just said things needed to be rearranged this year—with the Draper kids starting. She g- gested splitting up into smaller groups—d that's what we did. There'll be Paulie Cus k and the Drapers and our kids in one car. he said she understood the Yales and Kellys re working out something."

"Did she?" said Ellen. "I assume she s- posed of the Gold children too?"

"She didn't say. But I suppose she thou t you and the Golds and . . . that new yo g- ster . . . well, you know."

"I know," Ellen said. "Indeed I do. I right, Cyd, thanks."

Matt was thinking that, no matter w many times you went through it, it was alw s an adventure, that suspenseful moment w n you submitted to another man's judgment he work you had done in pride and believed as good. This time the suspense was multip d by what Thurston Young was and by wha he meant to Macmillan Associates.

The paintings were propped against the w ls of Young's office and the floor was spr d with page proofs, to facilitate Young's ins c tion. He moved deliberately from one pair g to another. His face was unreadable.

The artist sat, smoking, in one of You g's deep chairs. Matt found himself starin at Young's back, trying to read the set of t se slender shoulders under the costly dark cl h.

At last Young left the paintings and c e toward them. "I would like the first of t se to appear in October," he said. "The sec d week. I want the series to build up impac o- ward the Christmas season." He eyed Matt. "Can you schedule space in Life that quic ? I doubt if there will be a question with Va e or the New Yorker, but Life may be diffic "

"What kind of space?" Matt asked.

"The inside front cover, if it can be ar n- aged. If you can't, the back cover."

"You know the rates?"

"I am aware of the rates," Young id dryly. "Can you do it?"

"I think so. But that is premium space we will need to guarantee continuity."

"Naturally. But there are twelve. Tw e successive weeks, four-color and cover—i n or back. It is possible that the series will b re larged and continued."

"I guess you like them," Winter said w a contented smile.

"Did you think I might not?" Young as d "They are superb. They are what I inte ed they should be. Will you leave the pain g here overnight? I want to have my peopl e them."

"You going back to the office and sprin h news on Macmillan?" Winter asked as e reached the street.

"He isn't there," Matt said. "He has s n wheel in town from a Chicago account ar h took him out home to soften him up on golf course." Suddenly it hit him. They Young, the next to impossible. They ha made. "Office? That's for peasants." beamed at the artist in delight. "Come on lad, let's howl!"

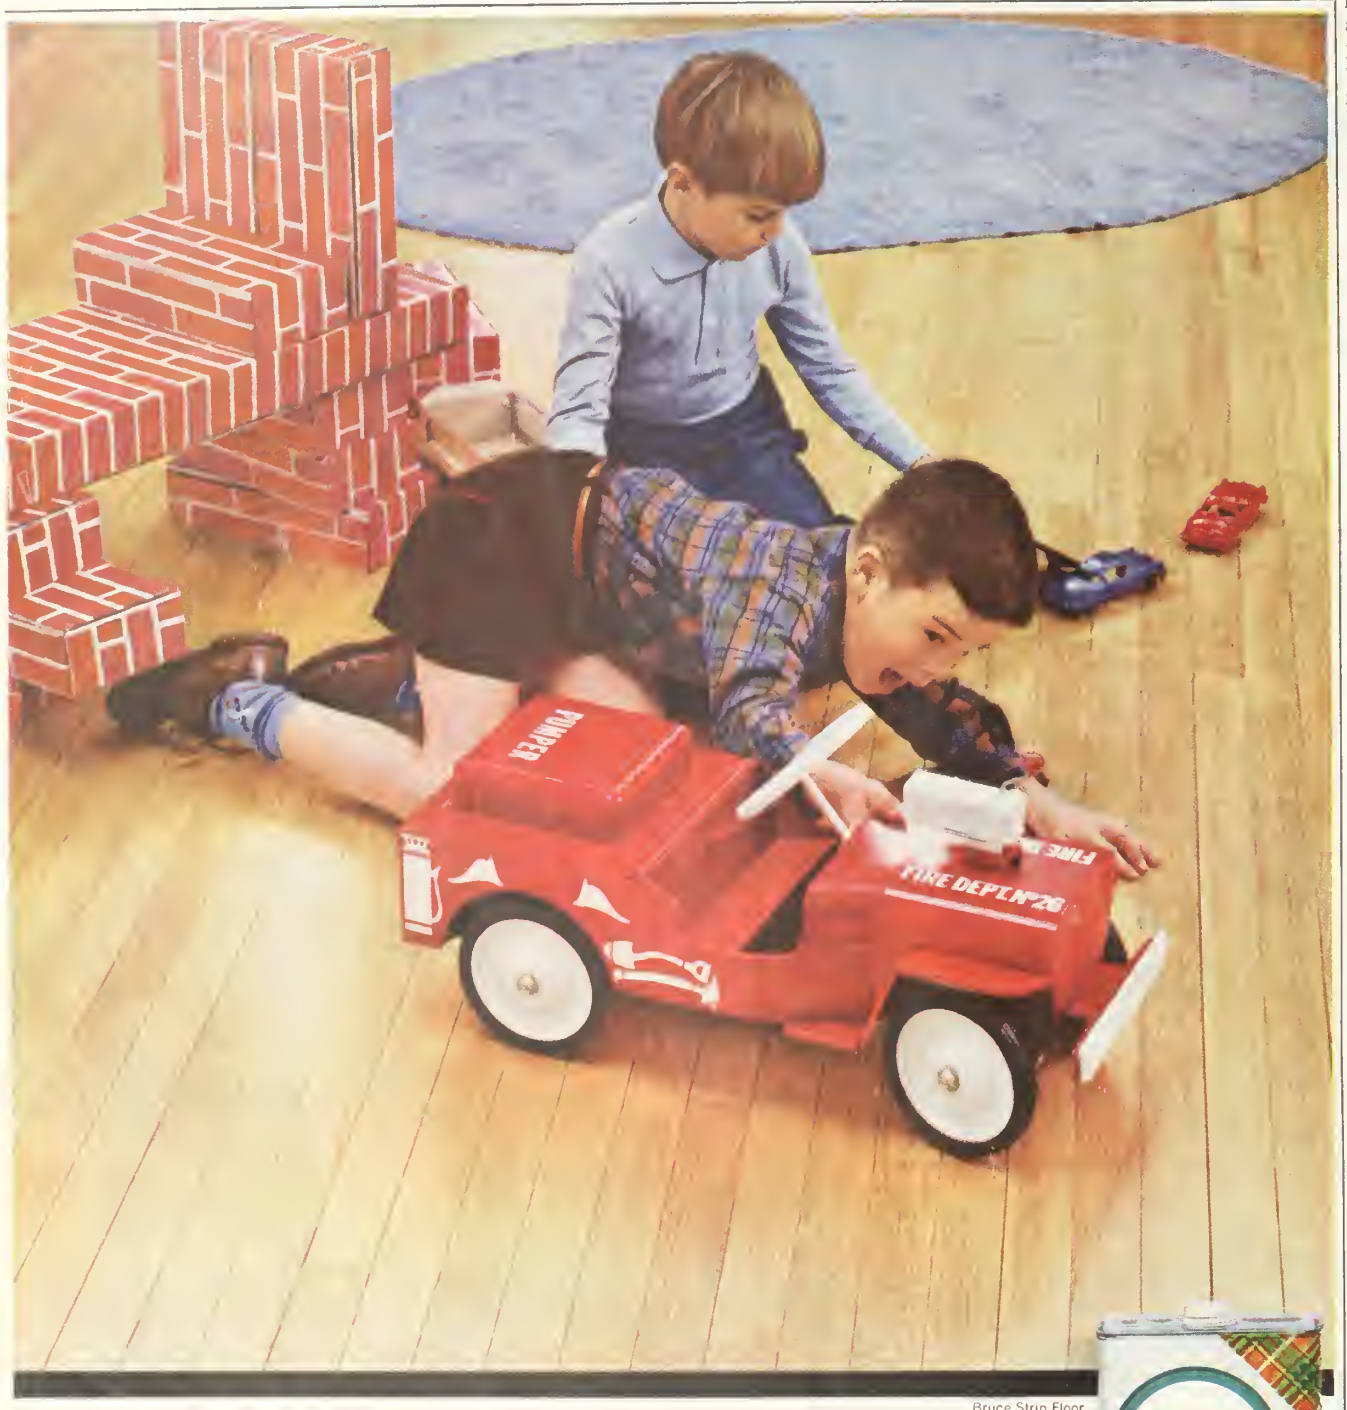
Two hours later the frame of mind ind ed by Thurston Young, combined with ce il chemical reinforcements, had left Matt o once, immune to the way Winter drove a t Through a rosy glow of contentment he r ed that the Jaguar had left the parkway and a straightening out on the cutoff toward P e able Lane.

"What'd you say?" he yelled above th x hilarating rush of wind around their u heads.

"I said, with Young in your pocket, y n blue-ribbon vice-president material," W e yelled back. "You want an office boy?"

"Never mind that. You've got work," a shouted. "For an office boy I'll get Mi el angelo."

The car swooped over a hill and started h long roll down toward the entrance to P e able Lane.



"Whoa up!" Matt yelled.

"What's your trouble?" Winter aske the car slowed.

"It just occurred to me I could stand n other. Let's go up there and have one."

"Up where?" Winter asked.

"Up there to the club," Matt said, w n airily at the castle crowning the hill a v

Bruce Strip Floor

Even with living-room truck drivers
. . .wood floor care can be oh-so-easy!

No need to revoke their driver's licenses, Mom! Take a short cut and avoid the hard work of harmful floor washing with clean-as-you-wax Bruce wood floor care.

It's the easy way recommended by the world's largest maker of hardwood floors.

Here's how it works! Just pour this combination cleaner and liquid paste wax on your floor. As you wipe up the marks and dirt, Bruce leaves a new, clean coat of paste wax on the floor. It's that simple!

What's more, Bruce gets up stubborn spots and ingrained dirt that ordinary cleaners can't. And the paste wax buffs back to gleaming beauty time after time.

Try BRUCE CLEANING WAX for a heavy coat of wax. For lighter waxing on wood and linoleum use BRUCE FLOOR CLEANER. NEW! Try Bruce 5-Minute Wax Remover for all non-wood floors. It really works!

for floors use Bruce . . . Paste Wax . . . Self-Polishing Wax . . . Tile Cleaner

Know the facts about Funerals ...beforehand!

A bit of knowledge can be so helpful when YOU are the one who must "take charge." That's why you're urged to have a copy of this FREE informative booklet on hand...

FREE— "FACTS Every Family Should Know"
SEND A POSTCARD OR LETTER TO: WILBERT, P. O. Box 147J-3, Forest Park, Illinois. (No obligation and no sales contact will be made.)

Your funeral director can explain how WILBERT Burial Vaults afford the best "peace-of-mind" protection. Scientifically made and proved through over a quarter-century of service, WILBERT Burial Vaults are made from heavy, reinforced concrete 1, fused to a thick, precast water-repellent asphalt liner 2. They are sealed by a special sealant 3. You should insist... in time of need... on the FOREMOST and MOST RESPECTED NAME IN BURIAL VAULTS...

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Wilbert® BURIAL VAULTS

® Trademark of Wilbert W. Haase Co.

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

...IUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips 60c at your drug store

MOTHER! TUFFer-totes

WEAR LONGER!

TOUGHER with So-Lo-Prene bottoms and sides that can't rip or tear. New "totes" are so light & stretchy toddlers put on alone. Cute! Colorful! Wear guar. At Shoe or Dept. Stores in Red or Blue. For Children's shoes sizes 3½ to 11... sizes, 11½ to big 3 ... $1.99 pair. $1.49 pair. Marx Rubber Co., Loveland, Ohio.

FOR WET, MUDDY SHOES! NO STRUGGLES!

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words. No symbols: no machines. Uses A-B-C. Learn at home or through classroom instruction. Low cost. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing. 44th Year. Write for FREE booklet.

Speedwriting®

Dept. 9910 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

BELOW'S "Instant Comment"® TEA

Everybody likes it!

Tea orange bits... spices... delicious

For you ...your family ...your guests

For 6-cup sample, send 10c to BELOW, INC., Dept. LO • 15 Merwin St., Norwalk, Conn.

them. "I'm a member. So's Macmillan. He might be back in the locker room by now. Let's go hand him Thurston Young—all tied up in ribbons."

Suddenly Winter made the quick, bleak descent from their carefree cloud. He stared at Matt, slit-eyed and cold.

"Are you anywhere near sober?"

"Too close," Matt said happily. "That's what I'm trying to get away from."

Matt was not sober and knew it. He also knew that this was reckless and that probably only the twin glow of triumph and booze could have led him into it. But deep underneath, he knew that it was inevitable. He had gone too far in his championship of Winter to draw any line short of all the way.

When they left the men's bar two hours later, Macmillan had not appeared. It would not have been a good time for it if he had. With the imperturbable aplomb acquired in twenty years behind Grassy Tor's bar, the steward steered them successfully away from the locker-room door and out to the Jaguar.

"Yes, sir, Mr. Jones," he said, closing the car door, "I'll tell Mr. Macmillan to call you." He turned to Winter. "Take it mighty easy down this road, boy. They's a lot of folks coming up at this time of the evening."

Seated at his desk, Francis Barton looked up as Edward Smith came from the anteroom. "I brought him," Smith said. "Are you ready for him now?"

"How is he?" Barton asked.

"Jumpy." Smith let an edge of contempt creep into his smile. "Real jumpy. He ain't sure why he's here."

Barton said, "Let him stew ten minutes, Edward. A little sweat won't hurt him."

Smith turned and let himself through the door. "Mr. Barton will be with you in a few minutes," he said, addressing the slender man sitting forward, elbows on knees.

Peter Yale looked at him and the frown tightened over his eyes. "I don't have all day," he said sharply. "He asked for me—I didn't ask for him."

"It won't be long," Smith said soothingly. He settled himself in another chair and began to thumb through an old Esquire.

Yale had been on his feet for two minutes, pacing the narrow room, when a discreet buzzer sounded. Smith arose quickly. "Please, Mr. Yale. Mr. Barton is free now," he said.

Barton wore a smile of disarming warmth as he came forward with hand outstretched. "I know you, Mr. Yale. I seldom miss your broadcast. Let me say that you are doing more for this country than perhaps even you are aware."

A little of Yale's tension melted. "You didn't ask me here to talk about my show," he said.

"No. But your show has something to do with it. Because of your show I know something of the man you are. It has made me feel that I can—and should—confide in you."

"What do you mean?" Yale asked.

"It will take a little time," Barton said, still smiling. "Please sit down." He waited until Yale sank into the leather chair beside the desk and then went back to his own. "You are a man of breadth and awareness. I would not insult you with pretense. Therefore I admit that I have asked you here on a matter that is in my interest. I ask you to believe that it is also in your interest."

"How do you mean?" Yale said.

"Permit me to state it bluntly," Barton said. "You live in Peaceable Lane. Six weeks ago a colored man bought a house on your street. There was a conspiracy to keep him out."

"I didn't have anything to do with it."

Barton smiled at him. "I am aware that you had nothing to do with it, Mr. Yale. Six weeks have passed. I am curious. What is the climate of the street after six weeks?"

"You ought to know—you created it," Yale blurted. "The place is in a panic. What did you expect it to be?"

Barton's expression did not change. "That is why I called you here, Mr. Yale. To tell you that I had nothing to do with the Bronson house being sold. No, you were sold out inside the lane. Your neighbors placed it in the hands of Jones, as you probably know. Jones arranged the sale to Winter—with the connivance of Gold."

"No!" Yale breathed.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Yale, exactly that."

"I don't get it," Yale said.

"You will," Barton said. "And when you do, you will probably also understand that it was not the sort of transaction which meets my approval." Barton sat forward. "Mr. Yale, do you want to sell your house? Make good the loss you have suffered? Perhaps better than merely make it good?"

Bill Jones and Jerry Gold were shooting baskets into the hoop Zack had put up against the back wall of the Gold garage. Since this was a pursuit demanding a man's full attention, it was only by accident that Bill happened to see Tod Winter watching from the hemlocks.

"D'you know that new kid?" Bill panted as Jerry dribbled out from under the basket and circled back toward where he would pivot and give him the ball in a short, hard pass.

"Nope. Why?" Jerry puffed.

"He's over there in the trees, watchin' us."

"Let him watch."

Bill was having one of the flashes of perception which come oftener to children than they do to adults. He hesitated, bouncing the ball against the flat of his hand. "You care if he comes over and shoots a few baskets? He ain't having much fun."

"You'll catch it if your mother hears you saying 'ain't.' I don't care. Tell him to come on over."

Still bouncing the ball, Bill peered toward the hemlocks. "Hey, Tod! Wanta shoot baskets?"

All three were still there an hour later. They could have kept it up until they dropped and might have done so had not Paul Cusack Jr. come around the house. Paul charged in, tipped Bill's shot off the rim of the basket and, blocking the smaller boy aside with hips and elbows, recovered the ball.

"Come on, creep." Bill bawled his indignation. "That's my ball and my turn. If you wanta shoot, get in line."

"Dry up," Paulie said. "It was your turn—now it's mine." He pivoted away and dribbled around the circle, ignoring Tod, who was waiting with hands out to take the ball.

"Come on, Paulie, pass the ball," Jerry yelled. "It's Bill's ball and my house. Come on, pass it!"

"You dry up too," Paulie told him and spun away as Jerry charged in, trying to knock the ball from under his dribbling fingers. Bill tried it and was fended off with such force that he lost his balance and went sprawling.

"You big lunk!" Bill yelled. "Give me my ball. Nobody asked you here. Why don't you go swim or something? Or drown?"

The bigger boy stopped dead, holding the ball. For the first time he seemed to pay attention to the Negro boy.

"The reason I'm not swimming is him," he said, staring at Tod with cold hostility. "My father says I can't go in the pool again until he moves away. What do you think of that?"

"If you ask me," Jerry said, "I think you're a creep. What's he got to do with the pool?"

"He's a nigger. That's what he's got to do with it." Paulie's eyes were malevolent.

Suddenly the three white boys became aware of Tod. His face had gone pale under the dark skin, frozen but for a faint trembling of the chin. It was as though he was driven against his will. But out of the pinched, fear-raddled little face Tod's eyes blazed hatred.

"I am going to kill you," he said. The words came in a thin sobbing gasp. He moved forward as though mesmerized, never taking his eyes from Paulie's face.

"Why, you little nigger punk," Paulie said. But Paulie was startled. It showed as he dropped the ball. He spread his feet and dropped his shoulders and, bunching his muscles, put his hands out, wide apart and half clawed. "Come on, punk. Come and get it." It was intended to be a jeer.

For as long as Bill Jones could remember, the humiliations and injuries inflicted by Paul Cusack Jr. had been followed by vows to get even with him someday. He and Jerry had planned their vengeance more times than they could remember. Suddenly Bill knew that it had to be now.

to order your copy of the new

Ladies' Home JOURNAL COOKBOOK

2500 RECIPES • 728 PAGES

you read about on page 63 use the handy coupon below or call the telephone number listed for your area

In and Around	Call . . .
Baltimore, Md.	Mulberry	5-3300
Boston, Mass.	Hancock	6-6666
Chicago, Ill.	Dearborn	2-5700
Cleveland, Ohio	Superior	1-7273
Detroit, Mich.	Woodward	3-4350
Houston, Texas	Fairfax	3-9381
Los Angeles, Cal.	Hollywood	9-3903
Milwaukee, Wisc.	Broadway	1-1101
New York, N. Y.	Plaza	9-7211
Philadelphia, Pa.	Locust	7-7860
Pittsburgh, Pa.	Atlantic	1-3302
St. Louis, Mo.	Chestnut	1-2222
San Francisco, Cal.	Yukon	2-3337
Washington, D. C.	Republic	7-2121

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
Dept. 1470, Independence Square
Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Please send me____copies of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL COOKBOOK

☐ Regular edition @ $4.95

☐ Thumb-Indexed edition @ $5.95

Name_____

Street or R.D._____

Town_____ Zone____ State_____

☐ Payment enclosed (Penna. residents add 4% state sales tax)

☐ Bill me the cost of the edition I've chosen, plus a few cents for postage and handling.

For foreign orders please include postage with payment for book.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTEE If you're not completely satisfied, return the book within 7 days and pay nothing—or receive a full refund if you've already paid.

"Jerry!" Bill yelled. Moving swiftly, he ran in behind Paulie and dropped to his hands and knees. "Hit him!" he yelled. Jerry, slipping first into Tod's line of advance to cut him off, suddenly flung himself forward, throwing every ounce of his slight, bony weight against Paulie's chest. Paulie was down and then engulfed in a blinding, flailing, desperate tangle of arms, legs, fists. Almost at once, in shock, outrage and sudden fear, Paulie knew he was going to be licked. Almost simultaneously, in sweet exultation too long delayed, both Bill and Jerry knew it too.

And Paulie was theirs for one minute and thirty-seven seconds. At the end of that time the advantage of size and weight heaved him up out of his unbelievable Waterloo. One eye was closed; his face was smeared with his own and Jerry's blood; his exploring tongue would gingerly discover later that he had two loose teeth. Sobbing in great, anguished gasps, Paulie fled.

The thing wrong with knowing where the body was buried, Peter Yale reflected sourly, was that it stuck you with the burden of deciding when and under what circumstances it would be safe or useful to dig it up.

He had left Barton's office, hugging the knowledge with vengeful glee. His first impulse was to use it immediately to cut Jones and Gold down to size. But his natural calculating wariness had reasserted itself in time to keep him from going off half cocked. First things first. And the first thing, naturally, was to ensure his own safety.

Barton had suggested that he use Alexander Fox as his broker. When he made up his mind, he moved cautiously. He took the trouble to call Fox from a pay telephone. When Fox said it would be necessary for him to inspect the house, Yale made sure that he would come at night and only when he could be sure of being alone. He made an opportunity by persuading Annabelle to take the kids to a movie.

All the same, he was jumpy by the time Fox's cream-colored car slid into the driveway, and he let the broker into the house.

"I thought you were coming at eight," he said sharply. "We won't have much time."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Yale," Fox said apologetically. "I had to meet a man and got hung up. But this won't take long, and after that we can go out in the car and talk where it's private." Fox paused. "The man I had to meet was Barton's man, that fella Smith. I think he wants to talk to you."

"Talk to me? What about?" Yale said sharply. "You didn't bring him here?"

"No, of course not," Fox said hastily. "We'll meet him down the road."

"I don't know why Smith should want to see me," Yale said. "And I don't know why you thought you had to see the house either. It's here and Barton knows it's here, and it's his money."

"It won't take long," Fox said. "Just so I get an idea of the layout."

Yale's uneasiness did not abate when they drew up beside a waiting car along the shore of Wacapo Lake and the slender, owl-eyed Smith ducked quickly into Fox's car. Unease drove Yale, more abruptly than he liked, into flinging his concern at Barton's lieutenant.

"Before this deal goes any further," he said, "I want a guaranty it'll stay covered up afterward."

Smith regarded him calmly. "It'll stay covered up," he said.

"I still got to know how you're going to handle this," Yale said stubbornly.

Fox told him carefully, deliberately trying to soothe his fears. "You see," he finished, "it'll all be covered up right from the start. Here you are, home, and take my word, Mr. Yale, there's nothing to worry about."

"No," Yale said sharply. "Take me down a couple of houses. I'll walk back."

Obligingly Fox drove on and stopped along the curb of the Cavanidis lawn. Yale opened the door, winced as the automatic dome light winked on, slid out quickly.

"Good night, Mr. Yale," he heard Fox say softly. "I'll see you middle of next week."

Yale was not to know it for a while, but he was unmasked in the brief seconds the car door was open and the light illuminated both his face and Fox's. It probably would not have materially affected his dismay to know that he was undone by love.

Steve Cavanidis had been away for two weeks on another of his long swings around the country in behalf of the union. During that fortnight, the brevity of Cyd's bathing suits, and her languorously steamy air, had finally won out over the firm young flesh and the coltish overavailability of Lana Weissman.

This was the fourth night on which Lana had kept her lonely vigil over the Cavanidis house. Lana was lurking among the rhododendrons, waiting to see how late it would be before Mark Cotten came out.

She was there when Fox's car drifted to a stop along the curb. For a moment she felt a wild surge of hope that this was Cavanidis, unexpectedly home. Then the door opened, the dome light flicked on, and Lana's staring eyes recognized Yale and saw the man he was with. Instantly Lana recognized Fox; like every other child on Peaceable Lane, she had seen that face more than once in the weeks while David Bronson was negotiating to sell his house. Lana knew how to put two and two together and promptly did so.

Next morning Lana told her father, at the same time wishing in a red passion that providence would grant her as deadly a tool as this to deal with Cyd Cavanidis.

Matt was involved in the deep-August curse of rooting out crab grass. For several seasons he had rotated from one to another chemical preparation, each labeled with a glowing description of its selective death-dealing properties. The trouble was that the stuff always either killed everything or killed nothing. Matt had resigned himself to fight the good fight by hand. This year, after propaganda intended to trap his son into the illusion that work was fun, he had succeeded in acquiring an unpaid assistant—more or less.

This was not an unmitigated triumph. Bill developed a suspicion that he was being had, and with it a tendency to dawdle. "Why do people have to have grass?" he asked.

"I sometimes wonder," Matt grunted. "Gives you kids something to play on. That's one reason."

"When I grow up I'm going to live in the city. Let the squares pull the crab grass."

"How many times have I told you not to use that word 'square'? Anyhow, if you live in the city, where do you think your kids will have to play?"

"I'm not going to have any kids."

"H'm-m-m," Matt said. "What have you got against kids?"

"We-l-l-l." Bill furrowed his brow. "Nothing much, I guess. Only they are a lot of trouble. That new kid, he told us his family went to all the trouble of moving here just for him."

"He did, huh? Did he say why?"

"He said his mother didn't like to have him playing on the street." Bill paused. "Next thing his pop will have him pulling crab grass and he'll wish he was back in the city."

"Somehow I don't think his father is the crab-grass-pulling type," Matt observed. "He's more the hiring type. He'll get somebody else to do it."

"Why don't we do that?"

She was a gentle woman, a beauty. He was brilliant, successful beyond the dreams of most of the men on Peaceable Lane. But they found no welcome on the quiet little street.

READ

PEACEABLE LANE

BEGINNING ON PAGE 56

"I can't afford it."

"I guess then Tod's father has more money than you have?"

"Just between us, I suspect Tod's father has more money than any two people on this street." It occurred to Matt that here, without laying too much stress on it, was an opportunity to take a whack at the mysteries of what went on in his son's mind. "Do you like Tod Winter?" he asked.

"I guess so," Bill said indifferently. "He's pretty good with a basketball."

Matt hesitated, weighing his words. "Son, there's something I've been wondering about."

"About me?"

"Yes, you and Jerry. You two took quite a chance lighting into Paulie Cusack. He's bigger than both of you together. I keep wondering why you decided to take him on. I know you've taken a pushing around from him before."

"I know it. He's a bully," Bill said.

"I wish you'd tell me this," Matt said earnestly. "Did you beat him up because he called Tod Winter a nigger?"

Bill looked at him in astonishment. "Heck, no!" he said. "What do I care what he calls the kid?"

"I thought you said you liked Tod."

"I do, but what's what you call him got to do with it?"

"Well, then," Matt said in bafflement, "why did you beat up Paulie?"

"He had it coming," Bill said reasonably. "Besides, he was paying attention to Tod, and it looked like a good chance to get a head start on him. We'd been waiting for him a long time."

"And that's the only reason you whipped him?"

"Well, no, maybe not," Bill said. "It was kind of scary. The little kid was awful mad. Jerry and me would have looked silly if the little kid had licked Paulie before we did."

"Oh," Matt said.

Peter Yale did not enjoy the process of worrying, but he worried, nevertheless, and resented it. Fox had assured him that the necessities would be taken care of by the middle of the week. His relief was profound when Fox called him at his office and asked him to stop off in White Plains that afternoon.

"This business is shaping up nicely, Mr. Yale. I got a buyer—fella named Greenwood, white as all get out. Even got a white broker to look like he represents him. If you can handle your end, I don't see any reason we can't close a week from Saturday."

Yale said, "I'll handle my end."

"There's just one thing more," Fox said. "Barton thought this might be about the right time to kind of get the word around what happened to the Bronson house."

Yale's eyes narrowed, calculating. "I intend to," he said shortly. "But I'd rather wait until I'm in the clear."

"Don't you worry, Mr. Yale. You're in the clear already," Fox told him. "Barton said he'd give it to you in writing if you're worried. But he would like that word to get out right about now."

Yale was far too acute to miss the threat in Barton's relayed message. "All right," he decided. "I'll see the word gets out. Tonight."

And he did, with nearly as much relish as he had expected. He called on Paul Cusack and explained how Lamar Winter had come to be invited to buy a house on Peaceable Lane.

"I suppose you know the charge you're making is serious," Grant Macmillan said, staring sourly over his drink at Paul Cusack, who sat with him and John Ainslie Outerbridge around a scarred oak table under antlered heads on the walls of the men's bar at Grassy Tor. "You'd better be able to prove it."

"I know it's serious," Cusack said, "and it can be proved. Pete Yale swore it came from a solid source."

"Who's Yale?" Macmillan asked brusquely.

"The man who brought this to me. He lives in the lane."

Macmillan glowered at the man across the table, thinking that he had never liked Cusack. Macmillan was both depressed and angry. It wasn't merely injury coming from a man he had trusted. Almost worse was havi up to the fact that you had misjudg
He had treated Matt Jones as a son.
at Cusack, disliking him for wha forced him to see.

"Precisely why are you here with What do you want out of it?"

Cusack looked surprised, take
"Why, because it concerns you, t ously. It concerns the club. Believe we don't take this lightly—not kno it costs us, what it costs the whole ar

"Don't call me Grant," Macmillan and turned to Outerbridge. "Wher fit into this?" he demanded.

"I am not here by choice, Mr. Ma the lawyer said. "I came with Mr.
first, because he asked me—but sec hope of dissuading you from any
The situation is bad enough, I believ further precipitate or ill-judged acti

Macmillan snorted. "It seems to been enough bad judgment loose ar to sink the county."

"That is precisely what I have in Negro is now in the lane. I do not co connivance of Jones and Gold with
But I have had Winter investiga oughly. I am convinced that he is n probably fear, the forerunner of a w vasion. He is out for himself, and senses he may actually prove to be tion against further invasion."

"But we've still got him!" Cus out, and then turned to Macmillan both of these men are employees of can't stay if you tell him to get out."

Macmillan, broodingly silent, thinking that when a man destro faith in him he inevitably destroyed you as well. "I don't own Winter a own Jones," he said. "And I don't
And I don't like your street or the m made of it. Good evening, gentleme ing home."

Lamar Winter told himself it w curiosity that led him to drive to Wh to see Alexander Fox. But it wasn't osity; he had learned long ago that who best protected himself was likely man who was best informed.

"I thought there might be someth on up there where I live," he told t pleasantly. "Something you mig about and I ought to."

"What sort of thing, Mr. Wint asked with a carefully casual air. "S worryin' you?"

"Not exactly," Winter said. "I wondering if somebody might be do thing to somebody else—and if t what it was likely to cost me."

"Cost you?" Fox's expression w innocent curiosity. "What sort of th that be?"

"Oh, like knocking the props out der what my joint's worth," Wi
"Something like that."

"Well, sir, I would sure be surpris anything like that. You got someth on? Anything that makes you thi thing might be happening?"

"Enough to know I'm curious, said crisply, aware that the broker
ing. "There's a guy up there, ra name's Peter Yale—one of my neigh
"I know who he is." Fox nodded.
have to guess any longer; this one something. The discovery made comfortable.

"Well, of course it's a broker's d the best he can for any client," h righteously. Then, feeling the quick Winter's alert interest, he added hast that Yale is, you understand."

"Oh, sure," Winter said.

Fox rallied his faculties and made to feel his way into this mocking ma a little.

"But just say, for example, that is Yale should be thinking about sel
Would that interest you?"

"It might."

"H'm-m-m," Fox said. "Was th thing you had in mind that you w to do?"

PRETTY HANDS BY JOY

Joy saves your hands for nicer things than dishwashing

Your hands can look as fresh and pretty as this flower if you use Joy every time you wash dishes. It's different from other liquids. Joy has a mildness you can see on your hands...leaves them smooth and soft and nice. That's because Joy is as mild as a bubble bath. You get Joy. See how it helps keep your hands nice, for all the nice things they have to do.

Mild as a bubble bath to your hands

NEW Beauty Bottle

Joy®

liquid for dishes

pampers your hands

JOY HAS A MILDNESS YOU CAN SEE ON YOUR HANDS

New soft plastic bottle

"I might want you to shop around a little and see what you hear. You know, just service to a former satisfied customer."

Fox watched as Winter let himself out the door, moving with sure-footed grace. "Whew!" he said, when he was sure the artist was gone.

Grant Macmillan had long ago decided that distasteful necessities were never rendered palatable by delay. He had no intention of shirking this one. What had happened and was continuing to happen on Peaceable Lane affected Macmillan personally; it was a matter of where he lived and how his way of living was affected. He loathed the idea of Grassy Tor and its gracious environs going to pot. But business was involved here also.

This could be costly. The rooting out of error must inevitably jeopardize his firm's new and valued relationship with Thurston Young and Glamour-Glow. Nor would Young feel bound to him if he lost the ability to deliver what Young wanted. Macmillan, no readier to spare himself than another, recognized that what Young wanted was Lamar Winter's talent.

It was testimony to Macmillan's uncompromising belief that, knowing the probable cost, he knew what he would do. It was also characteristic of him that he did not wait for the unpleasant chore to come to him; he went to it.

Nevertheless, he was taken aback on Monday morning when he walked into Matt Jones's office unannounced. He had not expected to find Winter there, but he was. The artist and Matt were at the layout table, studying the engraver's color corrections.

"Hello, Grant," Matt said easily. "I'd have been bringing this stuff in soon, but since you're here ——"

The smiling attentiveness of the younger men surprised Macmillan. "Let them go for now," he said. "I have something else I want to say."

Winter came quickly alert. "If it's private, I'll go," he said, turning toward the door.

"No," Macmillan said. "You'd better stay. You're concerned in this. Winter, what is your understanding of the rights to the Glamour-Glow paintings?"

"Same as always," Winter said quietly. He knew something was coming and was preparing to meet it. "When they're finished and Young accepts them—and I get the money—I release the rights to you as Young's agent. Except, of course, the basic right to forbid misuse or mutilation. Otherwise they'll be in your control. Until then they're mine."

Macmillan's sigh was barely perceptible. "What I have to say has nothing to do with the paintings—although it may affect them. I want it understood I recognize that possibility."

"I don't understand," Matt said in a puzzled tone.

"I think I do," Winter said. "Just in case you want to change your mind, Macmillan, I can tell you your guess is correct. It will affect the paintings."

"Even knowing that it means in the neighborhood of forty thousand dollars to you?" Macmillan asked.

"It will mean more than that to you." Winter grinned. "Besides, I'll still have the paintings."

"I was prepared for it. Do you want reasons?"

"Briefly, white man, briefly," Winter told him.

"I'll keep them brief. I believe you presumed on your relationship with this agency and its personnel to move your home next door to him." He nodded toward Matt. "Neither of you are children. Therefore, I assume these were knowing and willful acts. I recognize that I was responsible for permitting the existence of the circumstances that made them possible. That makes me responsible to the area for the damage that has been done to it."

Matt had been listening in fascinated disbelief. He had trouble finding his voice. "You will be getting around to me," he said. "You may as well know that you haven't left me much choice."

Macmillan turned. "I have left you even less choice than you imagine," he told Matt. "Your contract calls for a year's salary in advance if the firm wishes to break it. The check and the necessary papers will be ready when you are."

Except in monosyllables, when she could not avoid it, Margo Winter had not spoken since he had come home with the news. The artist didn't think he was being punished, at least not precisely that, but he did think she was getting more mileage out of silence than the occasion deserved.

"Come off it, honey," he said. "The world hasn't ended."

"Lamar"—she looked up suddenly—"how did Mr. Jones take it?"

"Shook—after the mad wore off a little. Trying to pretend he wasn't—but shook all right." He chuckled.

"Lamar, don't!" The passion in her voice took him by surprise. "Don't joke."

"Why not?" He cocked an eyebrow at her. "Matt just got stuck with a predictable result of holding the unconventional notion that a colored man is a human being. He sticks around me long enough and he'll get used to taking his lumps."

"Lamar, stop it! Don't you have any feeling, any at all?"

"For white men, baby?" He gazed at her coolly. "Let's not kid ourselves just because we live on this charming street among these charming folks. We're still colored. Don't make the mistake of going soft on them—you'll just get kicked in the belly."

"Who got kicked in the belly this time?"

"Matt did," he said coolly. "I told him he would when he first stuck his big soft head into this. So he did."

"And you laugh about it!"

"Now, stop this a minute," Winter snapped. "He got hurt because he got deeper into something he didn't understand than he knew he was getting. But he isn't killed. People have been fired before."

"Only because of you—of us," Margo wailed. "What's going to happen to him now—to his family? Oh, Lamar ——"

Winter grinned again. "Well, he won't starve, if that's what you mean. He's sitting on a year's salary."

"And after that?"

"Something else a long time before that." He smiled at her. "It probably never occurred to you, but your old man happens to be Thurston Young's favorite painter. And Thurston Young has a million bucks' worth of business to do that he can't see his way clear to do without my paintings." The grin, chill before, was now sunny and delighted. "And, it's a funny thing, but old Pappy Winter can't paint a lick without the advice and co-operation of Matthew Rice Jones."

He watched the glow of relief grow on her face—but then doubt darkened it again. "Do you think he'd take it?" she asked. "Wouldn't he think it was charity?"

"It wouldn't be," he said flatly. "Not even Thurston Young would think so. He'd be lucky to get Matt and he's smart enough to know it."

But Lamar Winter was shaken, more deeply than he could have brought himself to admit. He had watched the wrecking of a man's career and had seen the shattering of his pride. Winter was realist enough to acknowledge that Matt had let himself be destroyed for his sake; he was not quite realist enough to see that his own hard code that the colored man owed no quarter to the white had been shattered as well. His cross was here to be borne; he took it up rebelliously, for once not sure of himself.

The fact that Alexander Fox had been mortally certain Lamar Winter would come again failed to render the sight any more enjoyable when he heard his office door open and looked up to see the artist.

"Hello," the broker said with cautious cordiality. "Glad to see you. What can I do for you?"

"Just dropped in to see what you've found out about that matter," Winter said mildly.

"What matter's that, Mr. Winter?"

"You know what matter. Yale," Winter told him.

"Oh, that," Fox said. "Yeah, I remember. I've been pretty busy ——" Fox's voice trailed off apologetically.

"I can see that," Winter said, his tone suddenly crisp. "I told you I think Yale is getting ready to sell out to a colored man. Say he does it." His eyes turned cold and watchful. "What happens next?"

"I guess that would depend on a lot of things."

"What things?"

"Well ——" Fox hesitated. "It would depend on how those people out there would take it. Can't anybody tell about that."

"I can," Winter said. "Except for one, two—maybe three or four at most—they're ready to come unstuck."

Fox had what he thought might be a savage inspiration. "You ever think about making getting out yourself, Mr. Winter? You don't owe anybody there anything and what's the point in getting hurt if you don't have to?" In the pleasure of conviction that he had hit on the right answer, Fox decided to do something he seldom did and tell a customer some of the truth. "If Yale sells to a colored man that street will be a turkey. You could get out ahead."

Lamar Winter had decided to quit playing games. He stood by Fox's desk, staring down at him. His voice was savage.

"Just in case you still have any doubts about what I know, I know Yale is making a deal. I also know who is making it for him." He paused, watching the rush of panic to the broker's eyes. "And I think I'll put a spoke in your wheel, you slippery ——"

Winter turned and walked out.

Francis Barton put the telephone on the cradle. He had made up his mind by the time Edward Smith reached the office. "I had a call from our friend Fox this morning," he said. "Winter let him know that he has found out Yale is selling his house and that Fox is like a broker. He threatened Fox."

"With what?"

"Nothing specific," Barton said. "I don't think he knows himself yet. I want you to change his mind."

"Me? Change his mind? How?" Smith looked owlishly puzzled.

"Listen carefully," the big man said. "If this is done properly, it will work. You will understand if you try to think as Winter must be thinking—feeling, rather. He has been through a difficult summer. He and his family have been under a strain, subjected to tension, insult and injury. On the other hand, he has accepted help from white men, more help than he could have expected. Right now Winter is a bewildered man. He could go either way. What you are going to do will remind him that he is a colored man—inescapably one of us."

"But ——" Smith was still baffled. "But boss—what if this drives him out?"

Barton smiled gently. "I don't think it will, but if it does, I do not greatly care. I intend to turn that street colored and I do not propose to take the chance that Winter might stand in my way."

It was a restless night, muggy and dark, with an intermittent flicker of lightning and thunder muttering in the distance. Matt sat alone in the back yard. There was no bitterness in him, but he knew that he and his had been heavily damaged. Now he was trying to decide whether to allow his son to risk even another hurt.

He got up and started toward the hemlock and Gold's back door. Zack's in this, too, he thought. The girls had cooked it up, but he was a long way from sure that it ought to be left that way.

"I've been thinking about it," Gold said a few minutes later. "A couple of times I almost called you to say nothing doing. On the other hand, I hate to see the little guy try to make it on his own."

"It can be rough. There's a thousand kids in that school and a normal percentage are meaner as copperheads," Matt said.

"If they take it into their heads to let him have it, they'd be likely to let our kids have it at the same time."

"When's school start?" Matt asked.

"Right away. Tuesday—day after tomorrow. Have you talked to Winter about it?"

"No," Matt said. "It's too much like hitting below the belt, letting him know I'm worried about Bill in the same car pool with his kid. He's like the rest of us—if you want to kill him, hit him where his kid is."

"No," Gold said. His voice was somber. "Winter's no world-champion humanitarian, but I doubt if he'd think our kids owed it to his kid—or to him—to take a beating. Anyhow, I think he ought to know about it."

"All right. Let's go talk to him."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 179

The only woman in the world who can wear this beautiful girdle and bra is you...

...because Spencer designs, cuts and sews your girdle and bra individually for you alone—for the ultimate in figure control.

• Heights and lengths—every measurement—individually yours!

• Perfect-fitting bra cups!

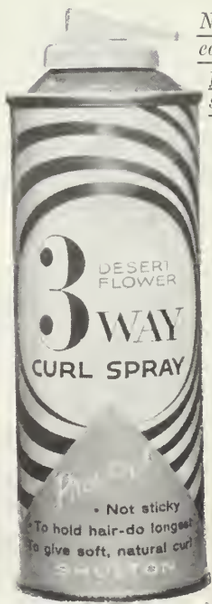
• Every detail to your preference—from shoulder straps to garters!

• Choice of 24 fabrics in 9 fashion colors and luxury laces!

Imagine the heavenly delight of a girdle and bra created just for you. And longer-lasting Spencers actually cost less to enjoy per day than ordinary ready-mades, with budget payments if you wish.

Your personal corsetiere is listed in your phone book under Spencer Corsetiere or Spencer Support Shop. Look in the yellow pages and phone today. Or mail coupon.

Please send FREE 16-page booklet. ☐
I would like to make money as a Spencer Corsetiere. ☐
Name_____ (Please print)
Address_____
City_____ State_____
MAIL to ANNE SPENCER
141 Derby Ave., New Haven 7, Conn.
(In Canada—Rock Island, Que.)
10-60



Spencer®
foundations and bras designed individually for you

NOW! A 3-DAY HAIR SPRAY

Renews its holding power every time you comb ...works softly without sticky stiffness!

Te 3 Way Curl Spray does away with constant es raying. It holds your hair-do softly, naturally or three full days! The secret's in the superfine holized" mist that conditions as it holds. Once p ied you can't see or feel it, but at the touch of a a p comb the mist "comes to life" again! 3 Way Spray renews its holding power without a trace of the sticky stiffness you've found in other sprays. And 3 Way works this damp-comb way no matter what the texture of your hair—no matter what your hair style. So spray away with new 3 Way... and you're set for tomorrow and tomorrow. 1.50 plus tax

New easy-aim lever for perfect spray control

new 3 WAY® CURL SPRAY

"We like Carter's sleepe because we're always dressed for staying-up-till-the-compa
comes!"

SNAP-FASTENED SAFETY-STEP SLEEPERS with "Gro-feature" waist. 6 mos.-4 yrs. $3.50 each.

"FOULARD PRINT"
SAFETY-STEP SLEEPER.
Blue, red.
3-8 yrs. $4.00.

"Carter's knits are prack-tical. For instance, you can sleep in them. (Everybody kno how soft and cozy these sleepers are.) You can put them in the washer and dryer. (Mot says goodness knows how much she loves not having to iron them—and they ne shrink out of shape, either.) And, of course, you can get to stay up much later in th ...because Carter's knows prack-tically nobody can resist us in our handsome new sleeper"

Carter's
THE WILLIAM CARTER CO. NEEDHAM HEIGHTS MASS

INUED FROM PAGE 176

oss the street John Ainslie Outerbridge ome out of his house trying to estimate er the squall would pass. He hoped the ould strike; it had been a dry summer.
w the lights of a car approaching. Sud-he was alert and curious. The car d along his curb, across the street from r's. The lights were switched off and rd a car door close softly, but he was ous that the engine was still running.

vard Smith was happy. He never felt than on the edge of or in the midst of en Smith's train pulled in at White at ten o'clock he picked up the package d kept in his lap rather than trust it to ggage rack. Down on the platform, he d briskly with the crowd, through the station. He emerged, saw Fox's car d in the roundabout.

rry I kept you waiting," he said as he to the front seat beside the broker.
n used to it," Fox said in resignation.
, as he expected, had seen the broker's is eyes go to the package. "What's ' Fox asked.
don't know. Something Barton told me p and give to Winter on the way."
hat's Barton doing giving things to r? I thought Winter was sore at him."
ow would I know?" Smith said. "Maybe rying to make friends with him."
turned onto the parkway cutoff, and were rolling down the long grade and alat the ramp leading into Peaceable Lane
e Smith spoke again.
st stop down there across from Winter
'll run in with this. You can wait—I be more'n a few minutes—and then go down to Yale's." Smith knew that r he nor Fox would be going to Yale's that night, but it was essential to keep hinking they were.
e car whispered to the curb along the bridge property. Fox switched out the and Smith slipped out, carrying the ge. "Be right back," he said.
oving up the walk, keeping to the grass to the thud of heels on flagstone, Smith few drops of rain. He didn't think it d matter. It would take a real cloudburst mpen seriously what he was about to do.
eached the house and slipped among the hes of a blue spruce beside the entrance.
ent and swift, Smith tore the paper wrap-from the package and unscrewed the cap e gallon can. The smell of gasoline rose s nostrils. He began to spill the stuff in splashes, first on the lower branches of the e up to shoulder level, then against the l of the front door.

att Jones and Zachariah Gold had taken hort cut across the darkened back yards.
way across Winter's yard they shifted tion, circling toward the front door. They within twenty yards when lightning shot s the sky—and they stopped dead. Some-was moving between the door and the pruce. Then they smelled gasoline.
e spruce exploded with a soft, sucking sh and brilliant light. Instantly it was a r of flame and roiling smoke.
ld yelled, a harsh and wordless roar. His body lumbered toward the side of the e where he knew there was a tap and, ably, a garden hose.
ozen for a moment, Matt saw a hunched, ing figure pelting along the flagstones to treet. Without thought he plunged after it.
ross the street an idling motor roared to lights switched on and the car lunged
d, flinging gravel from its spinning wheels.
Ainslie Outerbridge started as the lights d up. There was only a flicker of time, but awyer's eyes went automatically to the license plate in its illuminated frame. VV, ought, as the car sped into the lane. VV—
? Six or eight, the first figure. He couldn't ure. John Ainslie turned and trotted as as his legs would carry him toward his ge, where he kept a five-gallon fire extiner.
nith grunted a curse when the car leaped motion while he was still a hundred feet short of it. Running, he fumbled inside his jacket for the gun; he did not intend to let Fox get by him when he turned the circle and came back up the lane.

He was in the street now and stopped. But then he heard feet pounding behind and, turning, saw Matt silhouetted against the fire and running toward him. Instantly he decided he was in trouble, but it wasn't worth a shooting—yet. He turned and sprinted toward the underpass.

Gold ran around the house with the spurting hose. Then he stopped. The rain had become a downpour, and Gold was incongruously conscious of how the great drops hissed in the torch of the spruce. Lamar Winter was down on one knee and the flames set up a dancing flicker on the barrel of a gun as he raised it to his shoulder. Gold dropped the hose and dived, hitting the kneeling man with all the force of his more than two hundred pounds. He heard Winter's sodden grunt, and there was a blast in his ears as the gun went off.

Matt could see nothing of the man he pursued. But he could hear the labor of his breath and the thud of his feet, and when he sensed that he was near enough, he went for him in a running dive. His clutching hands closed on cloth and muscle, and they were down together in the blackness. Instinctively Matt rolled to get on top and smashed a fist down into an unseen face. He felt a satisfying crunch of flesh and bone; Edward Smith had lost another tooth. But then Matt felt nothing more as light exploded in his skull; Smith had swung the hard weight of the gun. It was a glancing blow against the side of his head, but Matt's weight collapsed soddenly. Smith staggered erect and ran into the darkness.

Matt had no idea how long he had been out when consciousness and, with it, blinding pain came back to him. Fumbling to his hands and knees, his right hand encountered something smooth and angular and, without thinking, he kept a grip on it as he staggered to his feet. He reeled and nearly fell, but, summoning his will, he walked toward the lighted open door and window of Winter's ground-floor playroom. He reached the door and sagged against the frame, seeing the four people in the room. Margo Winter, clutching a robe around her, stood in the other doorway. Sodden, streaked with mud and soot, John Ainslie Outerbridge stood just inside the door. Winter was slumped in a chair, elbows on knees and head drooping. Gold stood over him with a double-barreled shotgun broken open across one arm.

Gold turned at the sound of Matt's footsteps. "What happened to you?" Gold asked.

Matt raised his left hand and pressed it against the pain that filled his head and, drawing it away, saw the blood. "Fought," he grunted. "He got away. I always lose my fights."

Winter's head came up at the sound of voices. He looked dazed. "Man," he muttered, "you hit like a ton of brick."

"Sorry," Gold said. "I was in a hurry."

"Why?"

Gold jerked his head toward Matt. "One of those people you were gunning for was Matt."

"Matt?" Winter muttered. Slowly, full comprehension grew in his face and, with it, shock and horror.

Gold said somberly, "What you were doing was murder. Listen, Winter, I know you've been through hell. I don't excuse it. But I don't excuse you either. You're not the law."

"No," Winter said. "I know who the law is, all right. White men are the law. They're the law even when they're burning out a nigger."

Gold said in sudden, explosive disgust, "Talk sense! There's also a law to handle the people that tried to burn you out." He turned to Matt. "Who was the guy you tangled with?"

Matt shook his head. "It was dark. I never saw him."

"What's that in your hand?" Gold asked sharply.

"Wh——" Matt started to say, then looked down at the thing he had picked up and forgotten. It was a pair of horn-rimmed spectacle frames. "His, probably," he muttered.

Outerbridge took the broken spectacles and held them up to the light.

"Very nearsighted" he said thoughtfully. "It may be possible to trace them. There's something else. I saw the car start up. I got part of the number. It began with V V and the first number was either six or eight. It was a light-colored car. With fins."

"H'm-m-m," Gold said. "It's something to start on, anyhow." He turned to Matt. "Look, fella, you better hit the sack. You're beat."

There was a queer, fumbling smile on Winter's face as he looked up again. "Yeah," he said slowly, "beat it, Matt—and thank you."

Margo Winter had slept little. She was haggard, and defeated, when she went down to the playroom in the morning and found Winter sitting with the broken spectacles in his hand.

"Lamar, I can't take any more," she said. "Please, let's get out of here."

"Don't lose your nerve, honey," he said gently. "Nothing worse can happen."

"How can you say that?" she said wildly. "They won't stop anywhere."

He got up and drew her into his arms, sensing how fear had shrunk and broken her. "Who do you think 'they' are?" he asked.

"Oh, Lamar. These people. They won't have us! Next time it'll be worse."

He released her and when he spoke his tone was brisk. "Listen, honey, I'm going to check

THE ANSWER TO

Fast, Easy Fund-Raising is in These Tins...

Wonderful, old-fashioned "sealed-in flavor"

Kathryn Beich Candies

make this America's most popular fund-raising plan

No matter whether your fund-raising goal is $250, $2000 or more it's much easier to reach with Kathryn Beich Candies.

Easier because Kathryn Beich Candies are "tops in popularity" . . . incomparable in quality . . . reasonable in price.

Little wonder that your personal friends frequently exhaust your entire candy supply. And since one tin of Kathryn Beich Candies only whets the appetite for more; it often becomes a matter of filling the demand instead of selling . . . makes fund-raising more "fun" than you could have imagined.

If yours is one of the many clubs that continues to raise funds easily year after year with these superb candies, we are telling you nothing new; however, if your club has never used Kathryn Beich Candies, we invite you to send us the coupon today! We will promptly send you full particulars.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Kathryn Beich
Dept. 12P
Bloomington, Illinois

I am interested in fund-raising with Kathryn Beich Candies. Please send me complete information.

NAME OF ORGANIZATION.....

SENT TO.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....ZONE.....STATE.....

Unfailing Protection

on the days a girl needs a deodorant most

In the opinion of a leading pharmacologist QUEST Deodorant Powder contains the safest—yet the most effective—deodorizer for Sanitary Napkins. QUEST can be used where strong irritating sprays or creams may be dangerous to sensitive tissue.

QUEST relieves chafing because it is soft and absorbent. It's so neat to use. Get QUEST at all drug and toiletries counters.

RUST STAINS
Vanish in 15 Seconds with WHINK

At your favorite store, or from your tea and coffee man. If not supplied, send $1.00 per bottle postpaid.
WHINK PRODUCTS, ELDORA, IOWA

MONEY...
In Your Spare Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
485 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

KRYLON®
You have a use for SPRAY PAINT
No Muss! No Brush! No Fuss!
IF YOU PRIZE IT...KRYLON-IZE IT!

Ingrown NAIL

Just a few drops of soothing Dr. Scholl's ONIXOL in nail groove relieve soreness and pain, soften embedded part of nail for easy removal. Sold everywhere.

Dr. Scholl's ONIXOL

Only Preparation H Contains New Healing Substance That Can Shrink Hemorrhoids Without Surgery

Relieves Itching and Pain in Minutes.
Speeds Healing of Inflamed, Injured Tissues.

A world-famous research institute has discovered a new substance which now makes it possible to shrink and heal hemorrhoids without surgery. It relieves itching and pain in minutes, then speeds healing of the injured tissues all while actual reduction (shrinking) takes place.

Tests conducted under doctor's observations proved this so – even in cases of 10 to 20 years' standing. And most amazing of all this very striking improvement was maintained over a period of many months!

In fact, results were so thorough that sufferers were able to make such astonishing statements as "Piles have ceased to be a problem." All this was accomplished without the use of narcotics, astringents or anesthetics of any kind.

The secret is the astonishing new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) which quickly helps heal injured cells and stimulates regrowth of healthy tissue again. It is offered in ointment or suppository form called Preparation H®. In addition to actually shrinking hemorrhoids – Preparation H lubricates and makes elimination less painful. And it helps prevent infection, a principal cause of hemorrhoids. Just ask for Preparation H Ointment or Preparation H Suppositories (easy to use away from home). Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

something. Right away. When I get back I'll know whether we ought to leave. If you're right, we will. I promise you."

He went to the telephone and dialed, and after two rings recognized Zachariah Gold's voice. "Zack," he said crisply, "this is Lamar Winter. I think I'm going to need a lawyer. Does your pride permit you to work for a nigger?"

"That's a fine question," Gold's voice said sourly. "What's on your mind?"

"I'll be able to tell you in an hour," Winter said. "Can you give me that much time before you leave for the office?"

"All right," Gold said. "But don't stall. I got an appointment in town."

Winter found an open parking space within a block of his destination and walked toward Alexander Fox's office. He found the finny, cream-colored car parked in front of the building. One quick glance gave him the license number—VV6916.

Catfooted, calm, he walked in. Fox sat in his swivel chair with his heels on the desk. But one startled glance galvanized the lanky body and brought his feet crashing to the floor.

Winter grinned wickedly. "Take it easy," he said. "This is a social call—sort of. I want to give a guy something he lost and I thought maybe you could help. Ever see these before?" He reached into his shirt pocket and held out the broken spectacles.

Without actually moving, Fox seemed to recoil. Winter smiled more broadly.

"Take 'em," he said. "They're Eddie Smith's, aren't they?"

Abruptly the artist moved toward the desk. Fox's feet kicked out involuntarily, driving his chair back toward the wall.

Winter said, "You seem kind of tongue-tied. I just want Francis Barton's phone number." He picked up the memo pad on the desk and thumbed through it, grunting with satisfaction when he found what he sought. Picking up the telephone, he flicked a grin at Fox. "Mind if I use your phone?"

Barton answered. Winter knew the voice. "This is Lamar Winter," he said. "I'm calling from Alex Fox's place. We were having a chat. About arson."

"That's curious," Barton's voice said calmly. "It occurred to me that you might be, but I hardly thought this quickly. My congratulations. What can I do for you?"

"It's more a matter of what I'm doing for you," Winter said. "I doubt if Alex here or Eddie Smith—or, for that matter, you, as an accessory—would enjoy a stretch in Sing Sing. I just called to suggest that you get your fingers out of Peaceable Lane—and stay out."

"I was already reconciled to something like that, Mr. Winter," Barton said. This time there was a perceptible pause. "You can't win them all."

"No, I guess you can't," Winter agreed. He glanced at Fox and spoke again. "There is one thing you can do for me, Mr. Barton. Just hang onto the phone and listen a minute." He put the instrument on the desk with the mouthpiece facing the broker. He spoke crisply. "All right, you white yellow —— Stand up."

Fox stared up at him and seemed to shrink even further. Winter reached out a sinewy hand, grasped the broker by the shirt front, and pulled him to his feet. Holding him upright with his left hand, he sent a short, vicious blow to the belly. Fox crashed against the wall and lay gasping.

Winter picked up the telephone. "That was just about what it sounded like," he said pleasantly. "By the way, if Eddie Smith wants his glasses back, I'll have them for him."

An hour later, Zachariah Gold stood in his living room, gazing down in sour contempt at Peter Yale. Yale's thin face was livid. Winter sat aside, relaxed and silent.

"You're here because Winter thought it would be better," Gold said. "How much was your deal with Barton?"

"Forty thousand," Yale said defiantly. "That's what it's worth, and if he thinks he's going to buy it"—he jerked his head toward the artist—"that's what it's going to cost him."

Gold looked inquiringly at Winter and saw him nod slightly. But then he shook his head in angry rejection and turned back to Yale.

"It is not," the lawyer said crisply. "I might be willing to pay it, but I don't intend let him. That was a blockbuster price and all know it. I know what you paid for t place—thirty-four. That was eight years a and it isn't worth that now, but I'll let Win settle for that. No more, no less. You be in office tomorrow afternoon at four with yo papers. Bring a lawyer."

"You're not going to blackmail me," Y said hotly. "I'm not going to be pushed arou by any shyster and his nigger client."

Gold glanced at Winter. "If you want to him, I'm not looking," he said.

Winter grinned and shook his head.

Gold turned back to Yale. "You're alrea pushed," he said. "If you think you're n pushed enough, I can arrange the full tre ment. I don't know whether I could mak conspiracy charge stick, but I promise yo could give it a powerful try. But I don't need A blockbuster deal, that's enough. Where you want me to start? With your wife or w the network?"

Staring up balefully into the brooding, co temptuous face, Yale knew he was beaten.

"Four o'clock. You understand?" Go said.

Lamar Winter thought he ought to f more amazed at himself than he did. Someti later the jolt might hit him. But it had caught up with him yet. Instead he felt tensely alive and sure of himself, taut w singing inner excitement. It was going be a busy day. But something else had to done first. He had to see his son off to his f day in a white school.

Ellen Jones had volunteered as car-p chauffeur. When the Jones station wag with Bill, and Ruth and Jerry Gold, alre aboard, stopped at the foot of the walkw Tod was ready. Margo stood with him at door and she could not resist stooping fo last fierce and fearful hug as the horn too and Tod opened the door.

"Relax, baby," Winter said. "He'll be right." He hoped his voice carried the conv tion he intended that it should.

Then, suddenly, he was impatient to get with the day. He strode across the living ro and took down the Rouault.

"Guess we'll have to put something else h for a while," he said, surveying the bare sp "Might even hang one of my own."

Margo looked at him gravely.

He cradled the painting in its heavy fra and, jutting his chin awkwardly across kissed her. "Hold the door for me," he sa He went to the garage.

She was still standing in the door as backed out in the Jaguar.

"Honey," he called, "I'll be gone all d You'll tend to that, won't you?" He pointe the black, bristling spine of the burned t and the scorched door and heat-cracked gl of the picture window.

"What shall I do?" she said.

"Get the gardener up here. He can put i new tree by tonight. You can look up a w dow man and a painter in the telephone boo He grinned. "Get the highest-priced help y can—I'm going to send the bill to Barton."

He backed into the lane and swung Jaguar. Then he was gone. An hour later left the car in the Waldorf-Astoria garage a juggling the painting, took a taxi to the eleg gallery of a renowned Park Avenue dealer was not yet eleven when, having watched dealer's helpers hang the Rouault, he pocke a check for $20,000.

"I'll hold it for a year," the dealer sa "You can have it back within that time fo thousand more. You could hardly do bet at a bank."

"I know it." Winter grinned. "You're favorite hock shop."

It was a short walk to the Chase Bank Rockefeller Center, and soon the artist left t bank, feeling rich and powerful.

It was still only eleven-thirty. It struck h that this day had the feel of going right. W not clear up the whole shebang whil thin were clicking? He had made an appointme with Thurston Young for later in the wek b on impulse, he went to a telephone boot Things really were going right. Young agre to see him immediately.

hat was it?" Young said, as Winter talking. "I had only a telegram from at he had been removed from the ac-Nothing more. No word from Mac-impression was that Macmillan your business was up the flue any-Winter said. "I own the paintings until ess you buy them and I accept your or I sell them somewhere else."

harp face permitted itself a thin smile.
on't seem to doubt your ability to dis-them."
n't," Winter said. "For ten years no that I had to sell has gone unsold."

"What does Jones plan to do?" Young asked suddenly.

"He'll have to work with me on this. He planned and organized it. My work stops at the easel. His begins before that and continues after it. For the last five years I have worked almost exclusively with Matt."

"Macmillan is a fool," Young said. The tone was so quiet, the frosty face so impassive that the artist was startled. "Now I want this program to go ahead without any more delay. Will you send Jones to see me about a new contract?"

"I would rather not," Winter said. "I mean I would appreciate it if you sent for him yourself. Getting canned doesn't do much for a man's morale. Matt's is all right now, I think, but a little boost wouldn't hurt."

Young's face, for once, carried a diluted but unmistakable hint of warm amusement. "Of course," he said. "I should have thought of that myself."

Winter's step was jaunty as he reached the street. The big check was crisp in his pocket and the world looked nearly as crisp and satisfactory—and certified—as the check. Matt and he would divide something on the order of $150,000 from the Glamour-Glow campaign. After that, who knew? But, in his present mood, it didn't seem likely it could be anything but good.

The day had begun drenched in warm sunshine. In Manhattan, Lamar Winter was too pleased with the way things were going to notice when clouds rolled in above the city's towers. Far to the north, shortly before noon, a violent squall broke over Wacapo Consolidated. Thunder crashed and reverberated, and lightning lit the modernistic glass-walled classrooms with dazzling glares.

All this was just as well. Playing second fiddle to the storm, Tod Winter had a less eventful day than he or anyone else had really hoped.

He did not, of course, pass entirely unnoticed. To most of Wacapo's thousand, the dark, alien presence was an object of intense curiosity—but not of hate. The staff, from principal to janitor, had been alerted and was on guard. Wacapo's small fry owned a lively sixth sense for adult surveillance: their instinct for it was as sensitive as radar. And so the peace was kept.

It held until three o'clock when the dismissal buzzer sounded and the doors swung open. The driveway suddenly swarmed with shrieking, undersized humanity.

Ellen Jones had dreaded this day. Trying to enforce nonchalance on herself, she waited until a quarter of the hour before getting out the station wagon and driving to the school.

She made it in good time and jockeyed into the melee of cars crawling up the driveway. Most of them were driven by mothers preoccupied by the thought of muddy feet and hopeful of getting up to the paved plaza in time to forestall a wild dash through the mire. Normally Ellen would have felt the same concern; today she merely wanted the four kids inside the car as quickly as possible.

She made the plaza at last and saw them gathered at the curb. She tooted a short summoning blast on the horn and they came tumbling in. The doors slammed. Ellen rolled her window down and turned to watch for oncoming cars as she inched her way into the moving traffic.

She never saw it coming, though Bill did and yelled. A figure had darted out of the crowd, ahead of the car. Trying to watch both ways, Ellen jammed on the brakes to avoid it. She did not see it bend down and scoop up a handful of mud. She did not see it thrown. She took the gooey, gravel-seeded blob full against the side of the face. Through the shocking pain and blindness she heard a jeering, hysterical shriek, "Nigger! Nigger!"

She heard Bill mouthing curses she had not known he knew, heard the rear door slam open, heard him yelling, "Come on, Jerry! Come on!" She struggled out of the car, mopping the mud away on her sleeve. Then she saw Bill plowing into the crowd, head down and elbows flailing; Jerry was just behind him and so was Tod Winter.

She stopped them. Afterward she never knew how. She got them back into the car. It ese stores have the new ANNON nata Bedspread

proximately $13.98
, double or matching draperies

KA
nchorage Northern Commercial Co.
airbanks Northern Commercial Co.

ONA
ucson ..... Steinfeld's

FORNIA
akersfield .... Malcolm Brock Co.
resno ..... Rhodes
os Angeles ..... The Broadway and Branches os Angeles ..... Broadway-Coulters edlands ..... Harris Co.
iverside ..... Harris Co.
acramento ..... Hale's an Bernardino ..... Harris Co. an Francisco ..... Macy's Hillsdale, Richmond, San Jose San Leandro and San Rafael oise ..... C. C. Anderson Co.

IO

GON
ugene ..... Bon Marche-Russells ortland ..... Meier & Frank Co. Downtown and Lloyd Center alem ..... Meier & Frank Co.

HINGTON
eattle ..... Rhodes Downtown and University Village pokane ..... The Bon Marche acoma ..... Rhodes Downtown and Lakewood

See Cannon's Sonata Bedspread in the advertisement on this page

ANNON
non Mills, Inc., 70 Worth St., New York 13

Decorator-right, bright and versatile

CANNON'S new Sonata

Delightful with traditional furnishings, marvelous with modern, Sonata's all-cotton beauty has lovely practical virtues. Durable, colorfast, wrinkle and lint free, the rich-textured fabric need never be ironed. Twin or double with gracefully rounded corners, full-to-the-floor dimensions; or matching pinch-pleated draperies, surprisingly low-priced. Heather blue, fern green, candy red, russet brown.

For price and store nearest you, see list on this page

CANNON CAREFREE BEDSPREADS are designed to wash beautifully—to lead a long, colorful life CANNON was a physical struggle to handle Bill; he was sobbing in rage. Jerry was muttering, pale with anger. The Negro boy subsided into the seat, saying nothing. A high, screeching taunt came from somewhere in the crowd. Stiff of back and face, ignoring the excited, indignant flapping of a teacher, Ellen drove away.

It was six o'clock, and Yale, his lawyer, the representative of the bank which had held his mortgage, and the man from the title-guaranty company were gone. In the quiet office, Winter sat pensively in the leather chair beside Gold's mahogany desk. He was holding the deed which signified that he was now sole owner of No. 10 Peaceable Lane—as well as No. 1.

A slow smile grew on the artist's face. "He was pretty tame, there at the end," he said.

"Yale?" Gold said. "Yes, it was time for him to be tame."

"Then there's this," Winter said. He withdrew a folded paper from his inner breast pocket. "I don't know if it's legal—I wrote it myself. But I guess it might be if you got your girl to witness it."

"What is it?" Gold asked curiously.

"You know already. I don't know what you'd call it—a conveyance maybe. Names Matt manager of the property—with full authority to rent or sell, as he sees fit." He grinned. "No salary either. He'll have to do this for free."

When Gold spoke again, his voice was heavy with a curious, hesitant reluctance. "Listen, Lamar. I know what you've done and I don't have to tell you I'm grateful. Why you did it, I suppose, is really none of my business. But you never struck me as a man who'd put himself on the line to do something like this—save a white community from blowing up. Frankly, I don't get it."

"I don't know that I do, not entirely," Winter said. He fell silent, thoughtfully tapping the deed against the desk. "I'm a colored man," he said at length. "I don't propose to make a lecture on what that means, but one of the things it does mean is that you work uphill. You learn early that people, white people, are going to slap you down. Then, if you're the way I am, you slap back. Maybe after a while you get so you enjoy it."

"I thought you still did," Gold said.

Winter grinned briefly. "I wouldn't be surprised," he said. "When I decided to do this I could hardly stand my own amazement. But let's look it in the eye. I jolted the living hell out of that street and they've jolted me back. I can take it and dish it back as long as they want to keep it up. But the other thing is the kids. You take my kid—he isn't a born gouger or kicker. I used to be scared because he wasn't. Now I'm beginning to wonder. There have been a few things around there that got to me. Things I couldn't understand. You know the day I went down to the pool and Mrs. Cusack raised so much fuss? What you probably don't know is that Tod got into the water that day. That Weissman gal, pretty little kid, got him in before he knew what was happening. Then your kid and Matt's kid treating him like any other kid on the block. I've even seen him playing with one or two others. I keep my eyes open, and I'm around there more than you are." The artist paused. "There's one thing that still baffles me."

"What's that?"

"That fight. The day your kids clobbered Paulie Cusack."

Gold smiled wryly. "He'd had it coming for quite a while."

"I expect he did," Winter said. "The point I'm trying to make is this—I doubt if Peaceable Lane is going to enjoy having me for a neighbor if I live to be a hundred. And I doubt, barring a couple of exceptions, that I'm going to lose much love on Peaceable Lane. But the kids might make it. There's a chance they can solve a problem that our generation is too old and ornery to deal with. That's why I did it."

"You mean that's why you kept Yale's house out of Barton's hands?"

"Yup. I know Barton. He wasn't fixing to turn that street mixed. He was fixing to turn it colored. If he'd got Yale's house, the place would have come apart like a hand grenade—and the kids never would have had a chance to see whether they could work it out."

"I see," Gold said. "Did it bother you any that, to give the kids a chance, you had to take the side of the whites and keep another colored man out of Peaceable Lane?"

"Some," Winter acknowledged somberly, but then he smiled. "You ought to know how it is. You've done some of that yourself." He stood up, dropping the deed on Gold's desk blotter. Then he reached for the other paper, signed it, and dropped it with the deed. "You can handle this stuff better than I can," he said. "Want a ride home?"

"No, thanks," Gold said. "I've got a meeting in town tonight. Anyhow, I still don't fancy the way you drive that red fire wagon."

Twenty minutes later Winter tipped an astonished parking attendant five dollars, tooled the Jaguar up the slope to the street and slipped into the evening traffic toward the west side of Manhattan and the Henry Hudson Parkway.

In spite of the dark, unsightly bruise on his left cheek and the cut in his scalp, souvenirs of Smith's clubbed gun, Matt had gone to the city that morning. Now in the dusk he had come home and was seeing his own scars mirrored in the gravel scratches of flung mud left on the face of his wife. Rage churned up in him.

"Why didn't you let the kids take him?" he asked harshly.

"No, Matt. There has been too much of that," she said stonily.

"I know who it was," Bill said from the doorway. "Kid named Jim Pierce. I'll get him tomorrow."

"No!" Ellen's voice rose, sharp and forbidding. "No, you must not. I forbid it!"

"I'm going to get him," Bill said again.

"I said no!" Ellen was on her feet. "I will not have it. Brawling through that school, trying to whip every child in it. That's what it will be, having to fight every child in school."

"Aw, it won't either," Bill said stubbornly. "It was just Jim. I'm going to get him."

"Billy!" Ellen shouted. "Go to your room. I don't want another word out of you. Now!"

Silently, keeping his head down to hide the shaming tears, the boy turned and went.

Puzzled, feeling slapped and in combat with forces he had never known existed, Bill Jones trudged from the playroom and, so far as his parents knew, went on up to his room. Instead he stopped in the kitchen and stood for a while, undecided. Abruptly he went out the garage door and got his bicycle out onto the driveway. He did not know what he intended to do, but he knew he was not going to his room.

It was almost dark as the bike coasted down the driveway. He was almost upon him before he saw Tod Winter sitting on the curb.

"Where you going?" Tod called.

Bill flipped his heel down on the coaster brake. "I dunno," he said. "Why?"

"Just wondered," Tod said.

"I'm near ready to run away," Bill said.

Tod's voice was suddenly fierce. "I'll tell you one thing—I'm not going back to that school. I don't care what my father says, or my mother either."

"It's all right for you," Bill said. "I'll have to go back. I live here."

"Where do you think I live?"

"You don't live here. You just moved here, that's all."

"I never asked to come here and I won't stay here. If they won't go, I'll go by myself."

"I think you'd better. You shouldn't have come," Bill said in sudden flaring anger.

They would never afterward know why they fought. These two had been on the edge of becoming friends and would have, had the world let them alone. But, there in the street, it all came to focus: the pain, the humiliation, the inexplicable failures of the adult world and the reasonless savagery of the child world. There had been few fights more senseless than this. But they had to do it and they were blind and deaf to everything around them.

But the world was not quite blind or deaf to them. Paulie Cusack was out in the street, giving the Cusack chow his evening walk. He heard the panting, scuffling struggle and hurried toward the noise. His start of surprise was followed by a slow, pleased grin. He moved back a little to stay clear of the melee so that he and the straining chow were standing almost in the middle of the street.

Racing around the blind curves of the Wacapo road, thinking about the day's work, anxious to get home and tell Margo about it, going fast but not worrying or even thinking about the car because his touch at wheel and brake operated with such sure instinct, Winter drove the Jaguar through the underpass tunnel and slashed into Peaceable Lane. He was almost home, a place, he thought now, which might someday become truly home.

Then he saw them. There was the tumbling, thrashing movement of bodies near the curb. Ten feet away stood a boy and a dog. The writhing confusion of the fight was near the curb, and he might have got by it safely but for the other boy. Lamar Winter wrenched the wheel savagely to the right, and the Jaguar, obedient to the end, leaped the curb onto the Outerbridge lawn and hurtled toward the bole of the biggest oak in Peaceable Lane. He did know, whoever they were, that he had missed them.

After they had returned from the funeral in late afternoon, Matt walked across the back yards and found Gold waiting for him on the terrace. "Have they left your house yet?" Gold asked.

"They're with her now," Matt said. "Zack, I hate to put her through this."

"She's stood up under everything so far," Gold grunted. "And this is necessary."

"You've made sure she can afford it?"

Gold grunted again. "Winter must have been one of the most insured guys in Westchester."

"How much was there?"

"When it's all cleaned up, expenses and all, quite a hunk. He paid cash for the Yale house. There's a mortgage rider on one policy that takes care of the other. So she'll own both clear, and the cash will run close to two hundred thousand."

"I knew he made a lot. I didn't know he'd stashed that much away," Matt said. "And there's still more to come in."

"How's that?"

"Thurston Young saw it in the Times and called me in. He owns the account Lamar and I were working on when I got fired. He wants me to carry through the campaign, using Winter's paintings. Her share of that will run seventy-five, maybe even eighty thousand."

"Bails you out, too, doesn't it?" Gold asked.

"It sure does," Matt said somberly. Suddenly, feeling the pain of grief and the uselessness of it, he drove his fist savagely against the solid wall of Gold's house. "Why did the crazy fellow have to drive like that?"

"He was a hard-living guy," Gold said. "That way and every way. Come on, let's get over there."

It occurred to Matt as they entered that the scene had not been much different outwardly as then. Mrs. Weissman was bustling about with hospitable anxiety. Sol sat in an easy chair. Steve Cavanidis was silently watchful, nursing nothing, John Ainslie Outerbridge [illegible] erect and faintly disapproving. Was there a difference beneath the surface? If so, [illegible] reached into the depths of Laura Cusack looked at her and wondered whether what he saw on that pinched, acidulous face might be a shadow of confusion, of doubt.

There was one difference. Margo [illegible] drawn but composed, sat on the divan between Ellen and Beth Gold.

Weissman stood up. "Most of you know why we're here," he said. "You don't need a speech from me, but I think you'll want to listen to Zachariah."

Gold, balancing on a dining chair, [illegible] stand. "I won't take much time," he said. "But you should know this: on the day he [illegible] Lamar Winter bought Pete Yale's house [illegible] all know somebody tried to burn his house. [illegible] learned—don't ask me how—that Yale was dealing with a colored blockbuster and that the blockbuster arranged the burning as a deliberate ruse. He wanted to convince Winter that the whites were and always would be enemies.

"The blockbuster intended to drive [illegible] out—all of you—and make this street colored. Winter decided to stop him. He did not [illegible] his decision especially out of sympathy for the people in this room. Winter did not believe it likely that you—we—would ever accept him as an equal. He did believe that his son and our children had at least a chance to find a way to live together in peace—possibly even in friendship." Gold stopped and let his eyes rove the room from one to another. "I and some others, Mr. Weissman and Mr. Outerbridge among them—have asked Mrs. Winter to stay here and give his child and our children the chance he meant them to have."

Weissman stood up again. "Any comment?" He waited calmly, but nobody stirred. "All right, I take it we agree. Anything you want to say, Mrs. Winter?"

Margo's eyes were swollen. She bit her lip, trembling, then got control of herself with an effort. Then she spoke.

"My husband was not a patient man—how often he made me afraid. Coming here was one of the things I feared—especially for my son. But I trusted my husband—I will do what he wanted . . . I will stay—with Tod."

"Thank you," Weissman said. Then he turned to the room. "There's something else you need to know. Winter put the Yale house in the keeping of Matthew. You should ask what he proposes to do with it. Matthew?"

Matt looked around the room, measuring Peaceable Lane's people one by one. He felt again the upsurge of grief a man may feel for a lost friend, and he was impatient to be done and let him rest. His voice was harsh.

"Lamar Winter was a tough man. He did not have much affection for white men and he had even less trust of them. But he was willing to bet on our sons. In the end he bet his life on them. It has been suggested to me that we ought to find out right away what we're made of by deliberately looking for another colored family to take the Yale house. But Winter left the Yale house to my judgment—and I am trying to exercise some. I'm going to keep it empty for a while. Six months from now it may turn out to be better or braver—or more even smarter than Winter suspected—then we ought to be able to figure out a way to demonstrate it."

"It may be risky," John Ainslie Outerbridge said to Steve Cavanidis as they walked toward home. "It may not even work, but I suspect that this summer has showed us all that it is to be tried."

"Yeah, I guess so," Cavanidis said.

"I confess I was a little surprised at your accepting it," Outerbridge went on. "Excuse me for saying it, but it seemed to me that you would always want to make absolutely sure your interests were safe."

Cavanidis gave a short, grunting laugh. "They are. Way last summer I got the union to buy my house—and give me life tenancy in it." He laughed again. "Free too."

NEXT MONTH

"Why did you come here?" asked Belinda. "We don't want you. Why don't you go home?"

There was so much for Nona to face. The whizzing cars, the bad-tempered Mr. Twillit, the unfriendly school children. Her own homesickness. And, worst of all, the frank belligerence of the dreadful Belinda!

A story to read aloud and cherish,

MISS HAPPINESS AND MISS FLOWER

Novella by Rumer Godden

complete in the November Journal, to be published in book form by Viking Press.

A GREAT NEW CAKE MIX FROM BETTY CROCKER

Deep and dark and chocolate-fragrant. Meltingly rich, like home-made fudge. This is real old-fashioned devils food cake. Only one mix could make it—our new Country Kitchen Cake Mix. We found the flavor secret by searching hundreds of chocolate cake recipes we've collected in our Betty Crocker Kitchens. Look for new Betty Crocker Country Kitchen Devils Food Cake Mix in its beautiful new package.

"Through all my housework in an hour"

"Friends seem continually amazed at me," says Janice Crabtree, of Grapevine, Texas. "By 8:30 A.M., when my youngest goes to school, my whole house is clean and neat and I am dressed for the day. I am free to play bridge, attend club meetings or stay home and read, listen to Beethoven and just plain loaf."

After you have read this article maybe you will wish to write your reaction to our Readers' Letters Editor.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: Do you receive many letters from housewives who are through with all their housework by 8:30 in the morning? It is the most natural thing in the world for me.

I have a large house—five bedrooms, three baths, 2500 square feet in all. I have never had or wanted a maid. And there are five in our family. My husband Billy is certainly the most lovable man I have ever known, but far from the neatest—four years in military school didn't help him a bit. Our two sons, Billy Jr., 13, and Jim, 8, are handsome, brown-eyed live wires who seldom willingly pick up their clothes and toys. My father, Knollis Thompson, also lives with us. So, you see, it is not a small house or a careful family that accounts for my speedy getting the chores over with. It is, rather, a will to keep the house looking as lovely as possible, getting sufficient sleep at night, getting up at 6:30 and maintaining a kind of schedule.

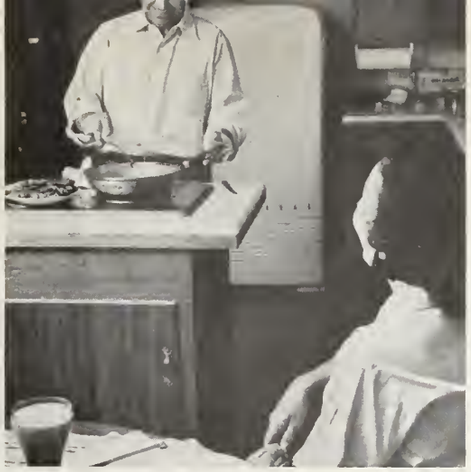
I would welcome a visit from some of your staff. I believe they would find it rather heartening to observe firsthand one housewife who gets through with the chores in order to enjoy a serene setting for reading, loafing, thinking or entertaining.

Sincerely, JANICE CRABTREE

Outside the Crabtrees' handsome pink brick ranch home on the best and newest street in Grapevine, Texas, the hot, dry wind picks up clouds of red dust. To the east across the flat plains the skyscrapers of cosmopolitan Dallas are barely visible; to the west is Fort Worth, where the great Western cattle country begins.

Janice Crabtree sits on a pale aqua satin sofa gazing out her picture window at the street. She is a rounded young woman of thirty-four, with wavy, blue-black hair and very white even teeth. Even at this hour in the morning—it is barely 9 o'clock—she is wearing rouge, powder and lipstick, and her cotton dress is

"It's hard to get to church by nine A.M., but we come pretty close, beds made and the kitchen clean before we go." After church, they often lunch at a nearby cafeteria.



Janice says she's the worst bridge player in her crowd—but plays three days a week.

Saturday is cleaning day—"There are no bridge games, the children don't go to school, and Billy is often out hunting or fishing."

BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN
hotographs By ESTHER BUBLEY

He cooks. "Janice takes spells of trying, but I change her recipes a little—then I'm back in the groove."

"I am grateful for my blessings—wonderful husband, handsome sons, best father in the world, big house"—two TV's, two fireplaces, two cars—"sparkling friends, memories of my mother."

immaculately fresh. The chords of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony crash majestically from the phonograph as she sits serenely enjoying a fourth cup of coffee.

Comments one neighbor, "Often in the early morning when I'm a mess and so's my house, I look out and there's Janice sitting idle by her window. Plenty of times we meet when I drive the children to school at eight thirty. I just slip a coat over my shortie nightgown and wonder what on earth I'll do if I get a flat tire. But Janice"—she sighs—"always looks like a bandbox. Any time you drop into Janice's house it always looks neat and tidy, and she's always cheerful, pleasant, all dressed up and ready to go."

How does she do it? Janice is careful to explain that her "day" begins the night before when she whips through the place at 9 o'clock, picking up coats and stray shoes and newspapers and carrying out empty cups and glasses to the kitchen. Then she measures out the coffee and water for the electric coffee maker. By 9:30 she's in bed and so is her husband, Billy. (She calls him Billy to distinguish him from her first husband, whose name was also Bill.)

Billy gets up at 6 A.M. and plugs in the coffee maker. At 6:30 Janice joins him for a cup and reads the paper. Billy, who is 5′9″ and weighs a solid 175, diets by sticking to coffee and doughnuts. Janice has coffee and toast, and her two boys (the older protestingly putting toast into the oven) have eggs, toast and milk. Occasionally Janice's fifty-six-year-old father joins them for coffee, then leaves to eat breakfast at a restaurant.

Billy Crabtree, a deep-voiced, homely man with a wide, amiable smile, leaves the house a few minutes before seven for his job as electrical inspector at Chance Vought Aircraft near Dallas. The next hour Janice moves so fast that "someday I'm sure I'll have a coronary," she remarks laughingly. Her husband, who was raised in a large Southern household with many servants, describes his wife admiringly as "greased lightning," and adds, "When Janice gets up, she hits the floor working."

Hurrying about in her pajamas and robe, she makes four beds in quick, stepsaving motions (Billy Jr. makes his own bunk bed) and hangs up night clothes. She wipes three lavatories and straightens the towels. Then she may run a dustcloth over the grand piano or buzz the vacuum over some crumbs.

"My system is to stagger the big jobs," explains this 5′5″ housewife. "I don't try to wash all the Venetian blinds at once, just a few at a time on Saturdays. I change some of the beds during the week. If I start a job, I finish it. If the phone rings, I don't answer until I'm finished with a particular chore. There's no chair by the telephone, either, so I'm not tempted to collapse and start gabbing."

While the two boys are eating their breakfast, Janice fixes a lunch box of jelly sandwiches and banana for little Jim, a poor eater who doesn't like the school-lunchroom food. She rinses the breakfast dishes, sticks them in the dishwasher, and then sweeps the kitchen floor.

Next she starts her bath water, and while it is running she checks the boys' appearance, and may order some grocery staples or drugstore needs by telephone. Sometimes she washes and towel-dries CONTINUED ON PAGE 187

Hooray! It's Aunt Jemima Day!

Even if you got up half an hour early and mad your own pancakes from scratch, you'd still be hard-pressed to match Aunt Jemimas fo taste and tenderness. Why?
The exclusive Aunt Jemima blend of flours gives you extra flavor and lightnes.

TRY ALL THREE KINDS
The Original Buckwhet
Buttermilk

Aunt Jemimas and frizzled ham.
"M-m-m—what a wonderful Mom we've got!"

O INUED FROM PAGE 185

er ir before sitting down at a bridge table t 30. Mornings she is having bridge at her ou are the busiest, for then she must get ut he tables, cards, tallies, prepare fresh of and organize lunch.

hen she is not bridge hostess, her deadline or ork is 8:30. "Most mornings I can get ar gh all my housework in one hour," ex- ia; this well-organized mother, "which pa; me a half hour to bathe and dress. The 3 leadline developed rather naturally when he der boy started to school. I had to drive ir very day, so I tried to get through with ll y chores so I could go shopping or visit- g nd return to an inviting house. Clutter sses me."

hen her boys are in school, practically all d e's leisure time is spent playing bridge. He present "bridge kick," as she calls it, ta d a year and a half ago. During the win- er onths she may play as often as four days w k from 9:30 to 3 P.M. During Lent last ye she gave up bridge two days a week. "But to entirely," she laughs—"that would be m ssible." She also devotes two afternoons a nth to a young women's club called the Tu day Study Group.

hice is careful to be home before her sons ar n from school at four o'clock. Billy Jr. is sky boy with a considerable amount of lf-reliance. He barely says hello to his m er before dumping his schoolbooks and g oing his fishing pole or shotgun. To date hi hirteen-year-old has bagged 9 ducks, 50 ki s, 14 quail, and one spectacular afternoon he lled 55 sand bass, weighing at least three po ds each, out of Lake Grapevine.

n, the younger boy, is a bright and charm- in oy of eight. Extremely independent, he is metimes still up at 11 o'clock watching te ision, and he will never willingly stop pl ng to eat. Both boys enjoy many gifts fr their grandfathers—too many, their par- er sometimes feel. S. B. Crabtree, a well-to- do allas businessman, has given them special cl es, money and toys, including a little toy ra g car with a motor which goes 35 mph. R ntly Janice's father, Knollis Thompson, st ed Billy Jr. to $40 worth of model-railroad eq pment. Little Jimmy at once demanded $ for a bicycle. "That Jimmy's a real hard- ho led little kid," remarks his father with ad iration. "He figures out ahead of time ho how to wheedle something out of you."

oth boys are crazy about their father, ac ording to Janice, and want to dress and ta . and act exactly like him. "Billy's a won- de ul father," she says. "Not in the least high- st ng; always patient, never critical."

he boys never tire of hearing how their fa er tackled his first Montana grizzly bear al by himself at eighteen, or how during W ld War II his B-17 managed to return fr n bombing the Ploesti oil fields with 72 fl holes in its wings. Billy, who was crew ch f, won the Air Medal and four oak-leaf cl ters.

nother favorite family story concerns the ti : Billy was driving past the former Dallas a ort one misty, rainy morning when a big co mercial airliner crashed into a hangar. B rescued three passengers, one of whom h ulled out of the fuselage while it was ex- p ling. Nineteen others died in this disaster. "I'd stopped to think, I'd have kept right on d in'," Billy drawls.

ere is seldom a repair bill for the Crab- u s. Billy can fix the TV set, the oven and re igerator, and even dismantle and reas- se ble the entire dishwasher works. He tink- e with the car motors ("I take a car to a m hanic only when I don't have the proper to s to do the job," he says) and keeps his 3 orsepower outboard motor in roaring g d shape. He built his first fourteen-foot r about himself in the garage; sold it three y rs later at a $100 profit.

On weekends Bill's so active he makes me t d just looking at him," says the neighbor a oss the street. "He mows the lawn at a dog- t ; next he's washing the cars or the win- o vs or he's up hammering the roof. He does a the house painting too. He's just as proud o he place as Janice and works just as hard k ping it in tiptop shape."

Billy is also the family cook. When he gets home from the aircraft plant at 4:30, he show- ers and changes and then checks the refriger- ator. He enjoys deciding what the family will eat that night and running uptown to the meat store in his little Opel station wagon.

During hunting season, he plucks and cooks the ducks, doves or quail he shoots, and fries venison steaks. He fixes delicious chicken dipped in batter and deep-fried. He also likes to sauté veal cutlets. "Billy does so much frying that I wipe down the kitchen Venetian blinds with cleaning fluid once a month," says Janice, who nevertheless thoroughly enjoys his cook- ing.

Sometimes on Saturdays Billy will fix a pot roast, and when the Episcopal priest came to dinner one Sunday he baked a whole ham studded with cloves and pineapple and had baked beans, relishes and stuffed eggs. Janice fixed the potato salad.

In the summertime, meal getting is cut to an absolute minimum, for as soon as Billy gets home from work the whole family heads for the lake five minutes away. Until dark, they speed up and down the fourteen-mile lake and eat hamburgers at a drive-in stand without even getting out of the boat.

Janice considers herself a dud at cooking, although her friends claim that her bridge luncheons are getting tastier all the time. "If a recipe has just three ingredients, I can cope," she feels. For the bridge group she usually fixes a casserole of noodles, mushroom soup and tuna served with a salad of mandarin oranges, sour cream and coconut, and a dessert of angel-food cake with whipped cream and crushed pineapple. Coffee is served all during bridge and again with lunch. Recently Janice has experimented with an entree of frozen shrimp, tomato soup and rice, since "This year we've all been tuna'd to death."

About a year ago, she decided that it was her responsibility to fix the family meal at night, especially since Billy was putting in a lot of overtime. "At first Billy was touched and delighted. Then when he'd get home and find one of my meals already cooking in the oven, his face would fall. Finally I decided that he actually enjoys fixing food. Also, after a solid month of casseroles every night, the boys were clamoring for dad's cooking."

Saturday morning is Janice's big house-cleaning day. Up at her usual early hour, she changes beds, counts laundry and wet-mops the kitchen linoleum and the front foyer of red tile, the only rooms which are not carpeted wall to wall. (She doesn't wax them be- cause her father once took a bad fall on a waxed kitchen floor.) Then she gives the three bathrooms a good scrubbing and vacuums carefully.

The pale gray paint in her L-shaped living room and dining room is five years old, but still in perfect condition. The boys seldom set foot in the two front rooms, and the pale peach and yellow and aqua damask upholstery looks spotless after eight years' wear. The boys could traipse in and out through the back kitchen, the back TV den (the room most used by the family) and their back bedrooms. Her father's bedroom is off the living room on the opposite side of the house from the family's sleeping quarters, so that he can slip in and out the back door without disturbing anyone.

Janice had planned to have the two boys sleep in the same big back bedroom with twin beds, but Billy Jr. soon moved into the tiny utility room off the kitchen. This was supposed to be the laundry room, but Janice has never bought any laundry equipment. There is barely room for Billy Jr.'s narrow bunk beds and bureau, but it's close to the refrigerator and back door and suits him fine. He has even converted the ironing board which folds into the wall into a rack for his guns.

"Janice doesn't even own a clothesline," remarks a friend. She does a small amount of hand laundering in the bathroom; everything else goes out. The Crabtree laundry bill runs between $12 and $15 a month, but Janice jus- tifies the expense this way: "If we bought an automatic washer, then we'd need a dryer, since the wind blows so hard here it tears the clothes on the line. When you figure the cost of two machines and paying for repair parts and depreciation and soap and water, it's considerable. Then, too, many of my friends do the wash themselves and then pay some woman to iron it. I really think we come out just as cheaply in the end. At least I've per- suaded my husband this is the case!"

Janice does no special spring or fall house cleaning, tackles closets and bureaus "when- ever I can't stand them any longer." Saturdays she empties and washes the refrigerator and once a month defrosts it. She has cleaned her wall oven only twice in five years—"the black grease from the broiler defeats me."

Her friends sometimes wonder why she picks Saturday for her major house cleaning. "There's nothing else to do," she explains. "No bridge games. It's a long day for me." Her sportsman husband may be off hunting with his father in Arkansas or North Dakota, or he may be at nearby Lake Grapevine in a heated duck blind he constructed with a group of friends. Billy Jr. is usually busy with Boy Scouts or hunting or fishing. Jimmy sprawls in front of TV until his mother starts vacuum- ing the back den, then he runs off to a friend's house.

Saturday night Janice and Bill go either to dinner and a show or to a party. These parties are usually co-operative affairs where the guests bring spaghetti and salad and end the evening playing bridge or poker. Since Janice's father spends most evenings in his own bedroom they have no need to hire a baby sitter. Janice spreads a couple of peanut- butter sandwiches for the boys, pours a couple of glasses of milk, and she's off for a gay eve- ning. Once a year this popular young couple hold open house for 60 to 70 friends—their one big party of the year.

"We all enjoy Janice's parties," says a friend. "She's a very tactful and cheerful person—in fact, I've never heard her or Billy say a mean word about anyone. And she has a wonderful sense of humor—if some mishap occurs, she just laughs and immediately puts everyone at ease."

Sunday mornings the whole family gets to the St. Lawrence Episcopal Church by 9 A.M. Janice's beds are made and the kitchen clean before they go. The young Episcopal priest, just out of seminary, has found the Crabtrees a wonderful help. The new mission is very small, with only twelve or fourteen families who attend church regularly. Billy not only helped hammer on the church roof, but has served as vestryman and warden for six years. Janice takes her turn cleaning and dusting the church building. During Lent the priest held twenty- five services a week. Concerned that he might find himself alone in the church, Janice at- tended as often as she could during the six weeks, sometimes twice a day.

After church on Sundays, the Crabtrees usually eat at a local cafeteria "where we can eat well for a total of $4." Then from May through September they hitch up the boat trailer and head for the lake. Billy keeps his mahogany-hulled sixteen-foot runabout in his garage year round while Janice's 1956 car sits outside taking a weather beating. Lake Grape- vine, a very large artificial lake, has made Central Texans "boat happy," according to Billy. On weekends the road from Dallas is clogged with cars hauling boats; there are even oceangoing yachts and cabin cruisers on the lake. Central Texans approach water sports with the same happy abandon as they do flying or driving. Since Lake Grapevine was created six years ago, there have been twenty- six drownings. Nonswimmers happily water- ski, and one of the great sports on the lake is driving a boat in closer and closer circles until it turns over.

Janice, who has never learned to swim, makes her sons put on their life jackets even before leaving the house. And she won't let them water-ski at any time. "I'm probably overprotective," she admits.

Monday is Janice's day to collapse. "Even if we don't do anything special on Sundays, it's a tiring day for me," she says, "with doors slamming and people coming in and out. Monday's the day I really enjoy, when I revel in the serene quietness of my home. I even hate for the phone to ring and interrupt my solitude on Mondays. I love my home," she says. "I take pleasure in everything about it and wouldn't change a single thing even if we were millionaires."

One reason Janice is so proud of her home is that she spent seven years planning it—she drew plans to scale, so impressing an architect that he asked if she wanted to work for him. It is a spacious, handsome place which looks like a lot more than the $24,000 it cost to build. Another reason her home means so much to her is that almost all her furniture be- longed to either her mother or Billy's mother and she plans to keep each piece "until it literally falls apart."

Even as a small girl Janice was highly par- ticular about her things. "I used to line up my dolls and other toys around the room, and when my little cousins came to play and dis- arranged them, I was livid. When I was older, they used to rummage through my closet and bureau drawers and this, too, infuriated me." Janice realizes that as an only child she had little experience in give-and-take. "My par- ents gave me anything I asked for. I was grown up before I realized that my father wasn't wealthy."

Her parents were very proud of her grades, for she was an honor student all through high school. She organized her work so well and concentrated so hard in study periods that she never took a book home. Fun-loving and pretty, she was extremely popular with boys. "When I was sixteen I had a date with some boy every night all summer long," she recalls, "and often late-dated too." She was also a drum majorette at the big Dallas high school she attended. "During football games we froze, but the fun came later when we went on-dates wearing our white uniforms and ev- eryone pointed us out. A heady experience."

HOW THE CRABTREES SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Income: Bill Crabtree made $7258 with overtime. He and Janice also receive $1200 a year from rental property. Total: $8458. Monthly income: $704.83.

Food (some fish and game almost all year round)	$120.00	Car expenses (includes $50.00 payment for Opel)	90.00
Clothing (grandfathers give them "special" things)	30.00	Household cleaning supplies	3.00
House payment, tax	135.00	Laundry, dry cleaning, shoe repair	20.00
Fuel, light, water	35.00	Children's school expenses (Jim's school lunch, Bill's milk)	7.00
Telephone	8.00	Club dues (P.T.A., women's clubs)	1.00
Insurance (G.I., $7.70; car, $17.30; property in La., $7.00; hosp., $8)	40.00	Magazines, newspapers	1.00
Medical, dental	12.50	Vacation fund	20.00
Recreation (includes eating out once a week at cafeteria)	40.00	Savings fund (retirement and bonds)	20.00
Church	15.00	Income taxes	70.80
Furniture and appliances (not paying on any furniture)	10.00	Upkeep on rental property	18.00
		Miscellaneous	5.53
		Total	$704.83

Janice quit school after one year of junior college at Hockaday in Dallas and got a civil-service position with the Army Corps of Engineers. "A wonderful job," she says, "dealing with lots of young officer engineers." Then a high-school beau, Bill Adin, who had been her steady when she was fifteen, came home on leave wearing his Army Air Corps wings. Janice had been his best girl for four years and he wanted to get married right away. "I was so proud of him. . . . He looked so wonderful in his uniform. . . . I hated to let him down"—these are the reasons Janice gives today for marrying at eighteen in the face of her mother's disapproval.

The newlyweds moved into a single room near his air base in Alabama and were "very happy" for three months. Then Bill Adin was transferred to Laredo, Texas, and Janice moved back with her parents until he found suitable quarters. "Bill knew how much nice, clean surroundings meant to me . . . he wrote that all he could find were horrible holes." He came to Dallas to spend Christmas with her and they planned a weekend together in February. When the weekend arrived, a telegram came for Janice. It told her that her husband had been killed in a crash of his P-40 fighter in Laredo that morning.

For several days Janice couldn't take in the news. When she finally realized that her husband of six months was gone, she couldn't eat or sleep and lost fifteen pounds. Because staying at home gave her too much time to grieve, she went back to work and was briefly distracted by the honor of being named War Bond Belle of the Civil Service Commission.

After three months of widowhood—"I began to date again, but nothing was the same, nothing seemed any fun"—a school friend from Hockaday suggested a double date with her first cousin, Tech. Sgt. Bill Crabtree, who had just completed fifty bombing missions overseas. When Janice came out the door in a pink-and-black peasant dress with a scoop neck, Bill Crabtree thought to himself, "That's the one." He liked her size, her looks and her personality. On her part, Janice was attracted by his deep voice and quiet good manners. "I've always gone for the solid-citizen type," she says. "No wolves! I knew at once that Bill was a natural gentleman."

In the next few weeks she took many days off from work. With Billy, she drove out to his father's 400-acre registered-Hereford ranch near Grapevine. "After living all my life in Dallas, I thought Grapevine was such a quaint little country town," recalls Janice. She met Billy's father, S.B. Crabtree, a Dallas businessman and a nationally known sportsman with one of the finest kennels of field-trial dogs in America.

Billy proposed to Janice almost at once. At first she said they would have to wait a year. But the war gave a sense of urgency to everything, and after she had known him seven weeks they decided to elope. Ironically enough, Billy was also stationed at Laredo. This time she moved right down with him and they lived in a single rented room.

Billy had attended Kemper Military School in Missouri four years and worked two years for his father. He then enlisted as an air cadet, and when he was mustered out in 1945 it was decided that he would run his father's cattle ranch. Mr. Crabtree Sr., who divided his time between Dallas and his Montana hunting lodge, fixed up a house on the place for the newlyweds.

"I was just twenty years old and one month pregnant," Janice recalls, "when I began my first bouts with cooking." It didn't help that she suffered severely from morning sickness. Most days she stayed in bed while her vital mother, who was then only thirty-eight, came out three or four days a week from Dallas and did the cleaning, mending and food ordering. After she had left and Janice got out of bed to cook supper, Billy would first offer to grill a steak, and then fry the potatoes, until pretty soon he had taken over the cooking.

Billy Jr. was born in November, 1946. Billy stayed by his wife's side all night in the labor room. "I had no sedation during eight hours of hard labor, but I'm proud to say I never cried out once. I despise women who do," recalls Janice. When she regained consciousness after the delivery, her husband was bending over her and grinning ear to ear. "We have a little boy," he said, "and his ears stick out just like mine."

The new parents moved back with Janice's mother. Before long, Janice's parents bought a large four-bedroom house with two baths so that the two families could live together permanently. "Mother was beautiful, sweet, kind, gentle and sentimental," says Janice and adds, "with a will of iron. However, the arrangements gave us great freedom. All we paid for was our food, and mother did all the cooking and cared for the baby. Every night Billy and I went out to dinner and a show." Billy was still on his father's payroll and drove the forty miles daily back and forth to the ranch near Grapevine.

When little Billy was almost two, Janice realized that he loved his nanna more than anyone. "I guess Billy and I had just been a couple of irresponsible kids. Suddenly I yearned for a home of our own." Accordingly, they at once moved out to the Grapevine ranch. "Mother was simply crushed."

For a while little Billy missed his grandmother sorely. Gradually, however, he became accustomed to life on the farm. "He was a nice little boy who never demanded company," said Janice. "Like Jimmy—I could give him a handful of pine cones and he'd be happy for hours." She has never read stories to either of her sons, nor bought them children's records, which she considers "awful." The only records played on the family phonograph are her Beethoven symphonies.

When Janice had been married about four years, a series of tragedies struck. The first was the death of her lovely, vital mother at the age of forty-two from Bright's Disease. She died on Thanksgiving Day, which has since made this holiday a poignant one for Janice. Janice was with her mother during her last seventy-two hours when she lay in a deep coma. "This was the lowest point in my life," Janice says, her eyes filling with tears. "It was ever so much worse than losing my first husband."

Then Billy's younger half brother, of whom he was very fond, died in a bizarre accident when an overheated soft-drink bottle exploded, severing his jugular vein. "We had gone to Alexandria, Louisiana, for George's wedding," explains Janice, "and six weeks later we returned for his funeral." Two months later Billy's fifty-two-year-old mother died of a heart attack, brought on by her grief over her son's death.

"Until my mother died I couldn't do anything—not even make a bed properly—because I relied on her so much," explains Janice. "When I lost her ten years ago, I grew up suddenly because I had to. I plunged into housework and literally 'put my house in order.' It gave me the boost I needed and so I've continued. Also, I began going to church for the first time in five years. I was a Baptist then."

For several years Janice was too depressed to think of having another child, so that there is almost a six-year gap between her two sons. During her second pregnancy she again suffered from prolonged nausea. To divert herself she began drawing up house plans. "I must have drawn thousands," she says; "it kept me happy for years." She also began saving for a house. She and Billy inherited properties from their mothers which bring in a rental income of $1200 yearly; Janice began setting this aside. In only a few years they had paid $1900 for their corner lot on East Worth Avenue, Grapevine's most beautiful street, and had $6000 in savings.

> A hundred times every day I remind myself that my inner and outer life depend on the labors of other men, living and dead, and that I must exert myself in order to give in the same measure as I have received and am still receiving.
>
> ALBERT EINSTEIN
> THE WORLD AS I SEE IT

Janice's father, a self-employed accountant and tax consultant, who had been living alone, contributed $3000 (the contractor's estimate) for his bedroom, bath and garage space. Then with a $15,000 mortgage, they built their present house. At about the same time Billy gave up ranching, which was giving him ulcers, and got a job in an aircraft plant.

Having an in-law under the same roof has been no problem for the Crabtrees. "Billy and dad have never exchanged a cross word," says Janice. "In fact, daddy often tells me what a wonderful guy Bill is and how lucky I am to have him." Mr. Thompson eats most meals in Dallas, where he works, and is frequently away on weekends.

Last year Billy earned $7258 with overtime, and the additional $1200 from rents boosted the family income to $8458. They have never lived on a budget, but consider carefully major purchases. The only thing they are currently buying on time is Billy's Opel, which costs them $50 a month. The two grandfathers give them special clothes. Their usual tion in Montana at the Crabtree h lodge near Yellowstone costs them on transportation back and forth. Billy's pays for the hunting and fishing license over the years has given Billy $8000 wo guns. He has also taken out policies co young Billy's and Jim's college educa Billy is his only child and the boys his grandsons.

"Sometimes I feel I'm too passive, to tent," remarks Janice, fondly regardin wristband of large family diamonds she even when the watch itself is being rep She enjoys sitting on the carved sofa was a favorite possession of her mother gazing at her mother's Duncan Phyfe table. In the shelves over the fireplace living room are heavy pieces of antiq glass which belonged to Billy's mother. J hardly dares breathe when she washes in the kitchen sink. Her favorite family session is her four-poster spool bed w pink taffeta canopy. Since Billy snores sleeps alone—her pretty pink-and-blue room adjoins Billy's with an accordion between. "I feel just like Queen Eliz sleeping in that bed," she says happily. It from Spain some two hundred years ag was shipped from New Orleans up the M sippi to the old Louisiana homestead of B mother. Janice recently spent $80 having finished, after being assured that this wou no way diminish its value as an antique sleeps in another family heirloom.

"About the only furniture we've bough a coffee table and breakfast set," says J proudly.

Billy shares his wife's strong family fee After spending his boyhood shuttling bet divorced parents, and in the bleak milie military school, he has "a horror of divo says Janice. Comments a close family fri "It would not be putting it too strongly t that Bill adores Janice and the boys. He ways worrying about her doing too mu she catches cold so easily—and he wor too, about her having so much time on hands."

Only one cloud dims the horizon. Billy, used to pilot his father's private twin-eng Beechcraft and who nowadays often flies a doctor friend in his Cub, wants to ge pilot's license. Janice, who considers pri planes terribly risky, is adamant that shouldn't. "Flyin's the only thing we about," says Billy.

"I'm so grateful for my blessings," she s "Wonderful husband, handsome sons dispositions to match, best father in the w big comfortable house and a sparkling c of friends. I'm thankful for my good h and faith in God and such material po sions as two cars, two TV's and two places."

She looks about her soft and femin looking living room where not a speck of shows anywhere: "Perhaps some of my will help some poor struggling housewife has resigned herself to living in almost petual squalor," she adds.

HOW I WANT TO BRING UP MY DAUGHTER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 80

Harry's a lot more pliable. His sister has a will of iron. It might be better, when they grow up, if it were the other way round. But, because of their family background, they stood to inherit a fair share of determination.

Among ancient Irish pioneers who battled from island to island to build their homeland, it was customary to give new territory to the first man who "set hand" on it. The tale is told of one of my forebears who saw that his boat was losing the race to shore, so he cut off a hand and tossed it on the beach, thereby clinching his claim. Kathryn is a worthy addition to the Crosby clan. She's a woman of determination.

Kathryn wasn't at all surprised by the kind of gifts that people gave Mary Frances—pinafores, ruffled pants, lockets, pendants among them—but they were all so diminutive and feminine they increased my bewilderment at first. Right off the bat I had to start overcoming the effect of many years in which anything female was a "doll," typical show-business talk. I guess you could say it boiled down to getting used to little dolls that say "mamma" instead of big ones that say "daddy." It's going to take some effort to get onto all the gimmicks—the tearums, eatums and wettums—but I'm looking forward to it.

Princess, as we call her, likes me to sing to her. I suppose I'll eventually be teaching her songs like Too-Ra-Loo-Ra-Loo-Ra, and maybe a dance step or two. Mostly, though, I'll handle her as if she really is a doll, because I've heard that little girls break easily.

The nursery's on the ground floor and a fair hike from the stairway, which, naturally, is out of bounds. But it won't be long before we'll have to post an extra guard because Princess really believes in investigating things. And she has Harry to provide an example. He adores her, but her reaction to him wavers between tolerance and total disregard.

But the baby's a great one for playing quietly by herself. When my mother, Catherine, puts a blanket on the floor of her bedroom, it becomes a favorite spot, and the two spend hours together. I don't think I've ever seen a more appealing sight. It's a tossup as to whether grandma or Mary Frances enjoys these sessions more.

It's always been my belief that girls are easier to raise than boys. I may get some argument on this point, but my observation is that little boys are apt to be more stubborn as they grow up, and little girls more likely to bow to reason at an early age. I've always been pleased to hear it said that one of my sons took after his mother. And I've wanted someone to take one look at my daughter and declare, "She's a dead ringer for Bing." Of course close resemblance to her old man could prove to be a handicap for Princess. (Some of my friends are sure of this, but they're probably just jea of my good looks.)

At the present time, Kathryn figures M Frances looks most like my mother. She appear to belong on the Harrigan family with her wide, blue eyes, reddish-blond and real Irish face. When she's in her bath, reminds me of one of those soap ads. She get enough of it, and doesn't even mind ing her hair washed. My wife claims th because the baby's hair bears a close res blance to mine. She doesn't have very mu so it's more like washing her head.

Naturally, I've been a bit reticent about vestigating all the ins and outs of little raising. So far, the major problem seems t what to do when she cries. It scares me, e cially when I can't discover the cause of tears. I used to think I could call on othe thers for advice, but found that none of t really knows what to do when a daughter c

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Hunt's Heavenly Peaches – Hunt...for the best

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 188

All parents make mistakes bringing up their kids. I've made my share. I feel fortunate that none of my goofs with Gary, Phil, Dennis or Lin—although they loomed large at the time—couldn't be corrected in the course of time, and that none had any permanently adverse effect.

It's no soft touch to try to get sons to toe the line, but I can't think of anything more difficult for a father than disciplining his daughter. It's a good thing she's likely to need less. Boys eventually get too big to be licked, but girls get beyond that a lot sooner. It doesn't take many years before you don't even think of putting your daughter over your knee.

The solution to this problem probably lies in psychology. With Mary Frances, I'll be in favor of early-to-bed edicts and cuts in her allowance, when necessary, but seriously doubt my ability to apply such measures. A woman never knows what she can do till she cries. From what I've seen of our little girl so far, I'm sure the sight of her with eyes aflow will always make her father pretty meek.

Neither of our kids is being raised by the book. We both love to pick them up. And we believe they should be picked up and held whenever the need arises, as well as many times when there is no apparent need. There's nothing like a lot of affection to make them feel secure.

I didn't make the mistake of spoiling my older sons. If anything, I bent over in the opposite direction. Though I realize the risk of spoiling a girl is all the greater in my case, I still want Mary Frances to have as much fun out of life as she can, while she's still young enough to enjoy it fully. I try to spend as much time as possible with her and little Harry. I think that's one of the most important contributions a father can make.

If Princess is anything like me, she'll get much of her pleasure just from reliving the big moments of her past. I want her to be able to look back on many a happy occasion shared with her doting dad. Even though I'd probably give it a lot of thought before I plunged, I wouldn't be against shooting a bundle on something like a coming-out party for her.

I've never been against things like that, as long as parents could afford them, because of their importance to the main participant. Debuts are like honeymoons. A girl may look ahead to hers for only a few years, but she'll look back on it forever.

Yes, I want my daughter to have fun, to grab her full share of happiness. I've discovered that being really happy calls for doing things that absorb your full attention, apart from the things you have to do. So I'm going to see that our youngsters get started on hobbies at an early age, just as I did with their big brothers, and just as my father did with me.

Dad introduced me to the joy of fishing before I was out of grammar school. Kathryn claims it's no longer a hobby with me, but an occupation. I do know that I get more fun out of fishing—especially sending a dry fly in search of a hungry trout—than from anything else. I've been teaching my wife to cast, and I hope she'll get the kind of thrill I get from hooking a big one.

Besides encouraging the seven Crosby kids to take part in outdoor activity, my father saw to it that we were exposed to music almost as soon as we could hear. One of his early extravagances was a phonograph, and he later went into hock to get us a piano. The first record I can remember hearing was The Merry Widow Waltz, when I was four. Later, in my teens, I went through a spell of imitating Al Jolson—whom I first met when I was a flunky at Spokane's Auditorium Theater—and I think my father had every record Al had made at the time.

Hobbywise, I want my daughter to take up things that really interest her, interest that will last long after the urge to pick up a few pennies has passed. There are some parents, I know, who don't think it's a good idea for girls to be too athletically inclined, but I want Mary Frances to be skilled in several sports—tennis and swimming, at least, maybe even softball—because they're great character builders as well as body builders. Her mother's gone in for athletic activity all her life, and I can't see that it's done her anything but good.

We're also going to make sure Mary Frances pays a lot of attention to religion, and gets really interested in it too. It's something that should be important in her life from beginning to end. Since Kathryn and I are Roman Catholics, she'll be instructed in that faith. But whatever the religion, I feel that a firm foundation is the big thing. You have to get a good grounding if it's to become a faith you can carry with you and count on all your life.

I've always believed I've been lucky, but my mother points out that I wouldn't have accomplished much without the power of prayer. Long ago she told me I'd never get anywhere in this world—or the next—without it. I know prayer can be a potent force, and I've made it a practice to seldom pass a chapel without going in for a few minutes to bend a pious knee.

I want my daughter to grow up with her religion, as I did. Church means a great deal to both my wife and me, and we want it to mean a great deal to our children. I've had some wonderful times, for which I've given thanks. But I've been even more grateful for my strong religious belief at other times, times that weren't so wonderful. What would seem like a king-size problem without faith can be cut down to regular size with it.

As she grows older, I want my daughter to accept me as an adviser. I hope she'll turn to me when things get too tough for her in a world that gives boys better breaks than girls. I want to be able to understand her so well that I'll know she won't object to an occasional fatherly nudge in the right direction.

To me, one of the most tragic spectacles of life is a young person drifting aimlessly through school and into adulthood, lulled by a false sense of security, believing that being well heeled will guarantee being happy. Unless you know where you're heading, you don't stand much chance of ever really enjoying the trip.

However, I don't feel that the goals should be inflexible, that there shouldn't be a switch to something else if certain factors favor the change. In my own case, before I became a full-time singer, I studied law for a year and even clerked in a lawyer's office in my spare time. As for Mary Frances, all I'll try to do with her is to find out where her inclinations lie and encourage her to choose a vocation in which she can follow them.

First and foremost, I want her to get a good education. I'd like her to go through grade school chalking up A's and B's, and then go on to complete a college course. College is important to progress in most professions these days, but it's always been important to progress as a person. The varied contacts help develop tolerance and understanding, providing a better viewpoint in regard to both yourself and others.

If our daughter's much like her mother or me, she'll keep in touch with many of her school chums all through life. I value the friendship of some of my former schoolmates more than that of most other people I know, simply because I've known them longer and have learned how much they can be relied upon.

I wanted very much for each of my four boys to get a degree, yet none of them did. I realize now, had I been less insistent, I'd probably have got better results. I want my daughter to get her degree, but only if she also wants to get it.

I used to dream of the day the boys would be running the Nevada ranch I owned. All four spent several summers working on the ranch. I've since seen that I made the mistake of overestimating their enthusiasm for ranch life. My own enthusiasm was what killed theirs. By overdoing the sagebrush bit, I made them lose interest in it altogether. Then I decided to sell the ranch.

So they followed in my footsteps, after all. They're now doing what they want to do. You're lucky if you can make a living at something you like.

Kathryn and I are convinced that our kids must be allowed to carve out their own careers. She thinks our boy has the makings of either an actor or a politician, because of the ham in his make-up. No doubt he's inherited some from both sides of the house. However, he could well be the one to wind up as the boss of our new ranch in Northern California. If I keep quiet about it.

I want Mary Frances to take part in a lot of extracurricular activities while she's in school. This will help her handle civic duties on h own, later on, in pursuit of such things charitable works and other doings of wo ens' organizations. When she's grown u much of her happiness will come from ha ing interests apart from her vocation or h work as a homemaker.

Along the way, I hope she'll develop a go degree of intestinal fortitude, and always ha the courage of her own convictions. My wif like me when it comes to sizing people u Neither of us has much patience with the who don't defend their beliefs, whether or n we agree with them.

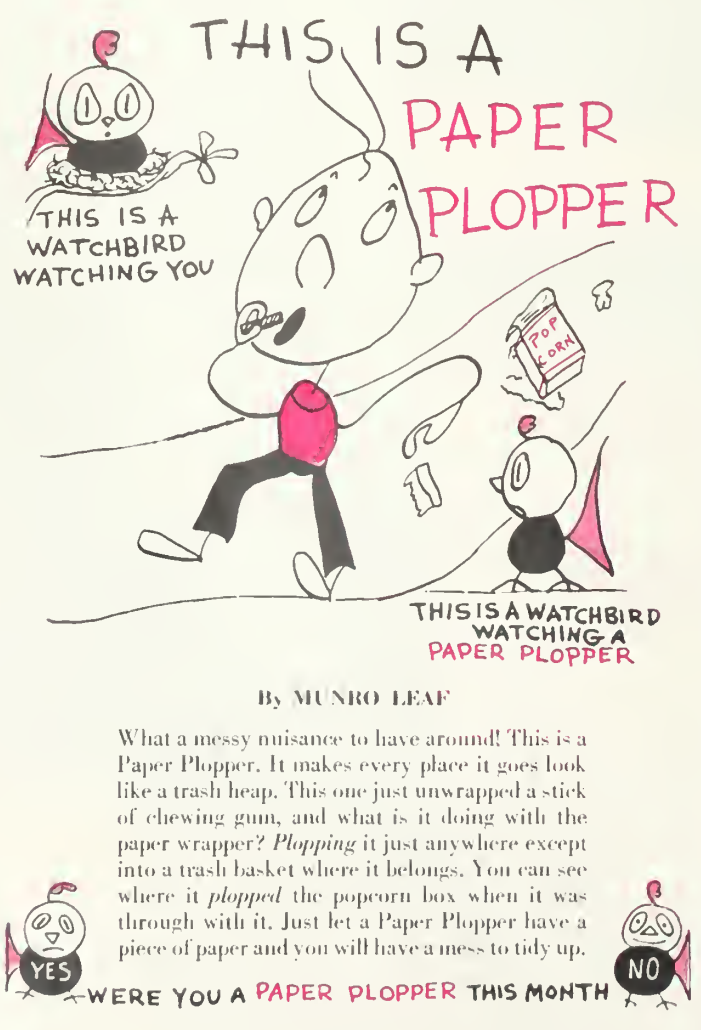
Naturally, no matter what else she prepar for, the time will eventually come for Ma Frances to consider either a religious life marriage as her next move. The choice will up to her; but if she doesn't make the dr most certainly I want her to make the othe The way I see it, the life of a bachelor femal no matter how interesting, will always be u fulfilled.

We keep having waves of teenage marriag from time to time, but I hope we won't be the midst of one when my daughter's in h teens. My grandmother, Katie, married at si teen. But things were different in those day Hers was a world of slow travel and slow com munication. Childhood friends were usual friends for life, and a great many people live and died in or near the place where they wer born. Today's world, with its jet-powere planes and high-powered automobiles, is happy hunting ground for both sexes. Sinc people live longer and don't get old as soon a they used to, young people have more tim and a broader field in which to choose the mates. So teenage marriages don't make muc sense to me.

But I know she'll have to learn the trut about many things herself, even though he fond father would like nothing better than t spare her some of the hard knocks that wi add to her knowledge.

When I was a teenager, I had my share o problems, but life was a lot less complicated i the '20's. I was mainly concerned with schoo sports, music and singing. My biggest hurdl was hooking onto a job that would allow me t more than just get by, that would make it pos sible for me to put a little money in the bank

I was fortunate to have a father who didn' believe in worrying about the future. I inher ited dad's relaxed, casual approach to life an tried to follow his example by living in th present and making the best of things, no mat ter what happened.



My older boys ran into more trouble than did, and there are probably even more prob lems ahead for Princess and Tex. The situa tion facing me as a father is a little more com plex than the average. When you're in the pub lic eye, raising your children presents specia problems. Children of show-business person alities aren't paid extra attention by the solid well-grounded kids they meet, but they also run into bubbleheads who persist in making a big thing out of the fact that one or both o their parents are prominent. The parents have to work to counteract the effect of the old goo that is ladled out, and keep their kids on an even keel.

I'm going to try hard to encourage my two younger ones to come to me whenever any thing's bothering them. I want to be sure they know my ear is always available to them, and whenever they show signs of closing their own to me, I'll endeavor to ease up on the pressure.

I want Mary Frances to wait until she's well into her twenties before she marries. In fact, I'd prefer that she didn't even start steady dating until she's through college, which was my own way. Kids who start going steady while they're still in junior high are only asking for trouble and, one way or another, many of them get it.

Admittedly, I'll probably want to hang onto my daughter as long as I can. But I'll also be prepared for when she may want another man to hang onto her. Though I'll want her to count on either Kathryn or myself for help with most of her problems, I'll let her mother cue her on what to look for in a husband.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 192

Big-appetite sandwich: Kraft DeLuxe Slices, mayonnaise, mustard, teamed with ham and pickles

MORE CHEESE FLAVOR PER BITE!

HIGH PROTEIN POWER PER SLICE!

Pan-fry Kraft DeLuxe cheese sandwiches in melted Parkay Margarine for a great family lunch

Kraft DeLuxe Slices

give you extra goodness

Sure you can buy cheaper cheese slices than Kraft's. But not with the extra rich cheese flavor that comes from the truly fine natural cheeses Kraft uses. And Kraft's are big, full-ounce slices that pack important protein power into every sandwich you make. What's more, only Kraft can use the special method that makes these slices taste so extra good and separate so beautifully. That's why they're called Kraft DeLuxe Slices.

KRAFT AMERICAN • OLD ENGLISH Brand • SWISS • BRICK

PASTEURIZED PROCESS CHEESES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 190

When it comes to picking and choosing a mate in a country where the divorce rate is as high as ours, I think the main thing is to find someone whose whole approach to marriage will guarantee that the union will be well glued and be insurance against its ever falling apart

As for the lad she decides to marry, I'll follow the same course of action as I have with the marriages of my sons. I'll keep out of it. Except for checking into the backgrounds of her boy friends, which is more or less a father's right, even if he risks classification as a fuddy-duddy.

I'll be interested mainly in what a boy represents as an individual. It may not be the most important thing, but it's one of the most important. He'll probably pass my inspection as long as he shapes up as a good citizen and a good provider.

Long before this problem comes up, I think Mary Frances will know the right solution to it. I plan to keep telling her about the right principles, and that sort of thing, and I'll hope she digests my father-daughter dissertations. Hope is about all a father can have in a case of this kind.

Twenty years of his teaching can be blown sky-high in twenty seconds if some good-looking, smooth-talking Lothario zeros in on his daughter. If a girl happens to tumble head over heels for a fellow who leaves a lot to be desired, her parents can only pray for her deliverance. I'm only guessing, but I believe it might be worked out simply by combining the ideal with the fact. My pet theory is that you could break up a thing like this by going along with it, instead of resisting. By removing all obstacles—and maybe slipping a little grease onto the slide—I think the daughter's view of the whole affair would soon dim. In my book, nothing makes young people want to do something more than having older people run it down.

I gave this idea a lot of thought when I was making my latest movie, High Time. I play a well-to-do widower with grown-up children, who goes to college to get the education he missed on the way up. He gets involved with rock 'n' roll, initiations and so forth with teenagers, and has his eyes opened by the younger generation. He also has a daughter, so I figure the film was a sort of dress rehearsal for my future with Mary Frances.

It isn't likely that my daughter will be lacking in determination. Once she's set her sights on something, she'll probably go after it, the way her mother does.

Kathryn and I first met at Paramount, when she visited the studio as a reporter representing her home-town paper in Texas. At the time, I couldn't help appreciating her almost grim resolve to get a good story out of the Old Groaner, even though both she and her editor were aware that I wasn't the easiest interviewee she could have encountered in Hollywood. Her earnestness and straightforward manner made me equally determined that she should not depart without all she needed to complete the assignment.

Later, I was much impressed by the way she made a name for herself as an actress, working her way up slowly and surely, and always standing on her own two feet. If our daughter tackles life the same way, I'll be more than satisfied—whether or not anyone ever remarks on her resemblance to me.

A couple of years ago, Kathryn's interest began to turn from acting to nursing. She studied anatomy, chemistry, psychology and other such subjects at Los Angeles City College, then enrolled for a nursing course. Among other things, she put in a stint as a "scrubber" in surgery. She's now doing lab work and attending nursing classes at Immaculate Heart College.

"A nurse learns discipline and how to [illegible] service with her hands," is the way she explains her enthusiasm for this work. "This is very satisfying feeling. I think it will be a help in my domestic life."

I'm in complete agreement. There's nothing like having someone with know-how around when Princess picks up a case of the sniffles, Tex bangs a knee. Or, for that matter, when I happen to hit a sour note in the bathroom and cut myself while shaving. And, of course, there can be times when it's much more important than that.

Crosby Sunday Afternoons—gathering the clan at our abode—have brought the Holmby Hills house back to life. There's nothing wrong with having money, but to me it's a lot more important to have a happy home with my wife and young 'uns. And to have the rest of my family with me.

I give Kathryn an occasional cooking [illegible] but she doesn't really need any. She cooks up a storm on weekends, usually preparing the main dish for Sunday dinner. My boys' wives bring the vegetables, salad and dessert. The women have great gabfests, dealing mostly with infants, recipes and diets. The little ones—I have three grandchildren now—have a ball together; they're all still in the initial sociability stage. We need only one thing to complete the picture. Gary's going to have to surrender his bachelor status to give it the finishing touch.

The menfolk talk a lot of show business that's sort of second nature—but also cover baseball and football. We usually get a game going before the day is over. On weekdays Kathryn and I spend a lot of time reading, watching TV, fooling around with the kids or just visiting. We both like to have friends over for tea or dinner.

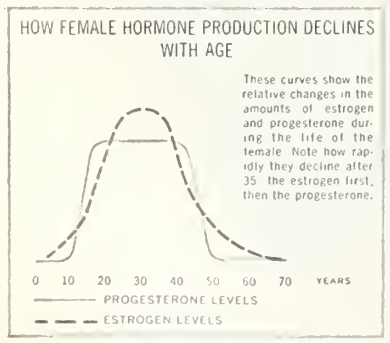
My father was a great lover of his home. His last words were, "I'm going home." I've never believed marriage to be a trap, that having a family and establishing a home meant loss. I was likely to fly out the window. I won't argue that you don't have to work at it, but I believe you stand a lot less chance of losing love if you preserve the closeness of a family relationship. Security comes from belonging and knowing you belong. More than anything else, that's what I want for my daughter.

E[illegible]

How New Wonder Drug Face Cream Restores Young Look to Skin

A Report by Helena Rubinstein

What makes young skin so firm, resilient, smooth? It is rich in the two vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone. These are the very hormones that have helped shape every inch of every woman from Venus to you and me—the same hormones contained in my new Ultra Feminine® Face Cream.



HELENA RUBINSTEIN
First Lady of Beauty Science

Why does a maturing woman need a supplement of these hormones? As she gets older, her body does not produce estrogen and progesterone as lavishly as before (see chart below). We see the difference in the skin—the dryness, the age lines.

Almost every one of us, in an attempt to turn the tide, has tried many of the oils and moisture ingredients that are on sale everywhere. No surface additive of moisture, no man-made lubricant can duplicate the results of nature's own precious estrogen and progesterone.

Throughout my life, I have sought to recapture the female hormone benefits of young skin for the mature skin. Out of my exciting research with the celebrated Dr. Joseph Kapp of Vienna, some thirty years ago, came the first estrogenic hormone face cream. It won half the battle against aging skin.

In recent years I have again been involved in a vast and exciting hormone research project, this time aided by doctors, research scientists, hospitals, universities, clinics all over the United States. The result is my Ultra Feminine Face Cream, the first face cream to contain both vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone.

Medical tests show that Ultra Feminine actually reverses two aging processes of the skin! Now you can look young again!

With renewed estrogen, the cells deep within the skin layers can hold maximum moisture once again. These cells, plumped out once more, support the surface firmly. Lines smooth out. Wrinkles due to dryness are reduced. Young skin tone is restored. With the help of progesterone the oil glands are reactivated to produce at a younger rate again. The skin is soft, dewy, protected. The whole expression of the face looks more youthful!

Ultra Feminine actually replenishes physiological substances within the skin. It comes to you with the highest recommendation, for it meets the same rigid testing as drugs in a doctor's prescription.

Because skin cannot store up hormones, I urge you to give your skin its daily hormone quota: use Ultra Feminine every night. Within one month, your skin will look—and act—young again, and continued use will maintain these results—at a cost of pennies a day—$3.50 for a 30-day supply, $5.50 for 60 days.

You will be fascinated to find out how the female hormones determine your womanliness—how they put lustre in the hair, softness in the voice. Write to me for my free booklet, "The Hormones That Make You Every Inch a Woman" which includes a special section of Vital Statistics of American Womanhood. Address your request to Helena Rubinstein, Department B, 655 Fifth Avenue, New York 22, New York.

© 1960, Helena Rubinstein, Inc.

Advertisement

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

At the age of two, if you would have a child relish any food, from tuna to truffle, just say, "When you're old enough, perhaps four or five, you may have some."

Some advice from the neighborhood's great-grandfather to his male heir: "Before choosing a wife, try to get a peek at her early in the morning, late at night and when she comes in wet from a storm."

A boy writes his first letter home from school: "Dear mom and dad, I'm very well off here except for one thing—money. Your loving son."

To realize how overweighted heredity is, compared with environment, one only has to observe that apple trees keep right on bearing apples, peach trees peaches and that even without protection against pest and blight good fruit often results—or, given the best care, doesn't.

One new mother seems not to be making much headway in getting her husband to take over the baby's two-o'clock bottle; he stumbles around muttering, "Where am I?" until finally she has to put him back to bed.

There's no bond of sympathy deeper nor path of communication freer than that which flows between two mothers, each of whom has lost a child.

At the end of "one of those days" for the cleaning woman, she finally declared, "I'm just going to have to put my head together."

Recently we wrote that in the dictionary of life, as well as in the dictionary of words, "education" and "love" come before "marriage"; and a reader has pointed out that all three come before "sex."

IT'S A MAN'S WORLD

When a girl is born, one of two things is always said: "Perhaps next time they'll have a boy"; or, "Isn't it nice they already have a boy?"

A good rule for talking is one used in measuring flour: sift first.

It is better for a parent to maintain a foolish "Yes" and a selfish "No" rather than to shake a child's faith in the fixity of a promise; but it is better still to take time to consider every implication and complication before making any promise.

CRAFTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL SILVER COMPANY, MERIDEN, CONN.

5-PIECE PLACE SETTING $34.50 INCLUDING FEDERAL TAX

NEW! Swan Lake

Swan Lake is choreography in silver. Its lovely dancing lines are full of grace, endlessly at play with light. For it reflects an entirely new way of working with sterling, one that makes the cool richness of solid silver sparkle like the facets of a gem. You will find no finer balance of contemporary and classical beauty anywhere. See Swan Lake at your jeweler or department store. Learn how you can save on services for four, eight or twelve people.

INTERNATIONAL STERLING... loveliest, by design

A rich new dimension in silverware
International DEEPSILVER*

A lifetime of luxury is measured in the mirrored depths of International DeepSilver. Expressively different, DeepSilver is lavished with pure silver ... inlaid with a block of sterling at backs of bowls and tines of most-used spoons and forks. This extravagantly beautiful silverplate is yours for a remarkably modest price. Complete 52-piece service for 8 (chest included)... $99.50. "Silver Fashion" (shown above) and other exquisite patterns in DeepSilver are at the finest stores.

DEEPSILVER — silverplate by The International Silver Co., Meriden, Conn.

*Formerly Holmes & Edwards DeepSilver

BECAUSE WOMEN CARE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 72

On the contrary, Nina hopes it's quite evident that she shares her husband's enthusiasm—almost devotion—for politics.

For sixteen of their seventeen years of marriage the energetic but quiet-spoken Mrs. Lord has been an ardent district committeewoman for the Democratic Party. She has served as a delegate to two Democratic national conventions and from time to time has lobbied effectively for issues of concern to the state.

Although the Lords' postal address is Princeton, they live in suburban Lawrence Township, where Nina is assigned to District 4. It is the largest voting district in Mercer County.

Whether or not she gave it much serious thought before her marriage to Thorn Lord, Nina is now convinced that everyone should take an active interest in politics. "Look at your tax dollar," she says, as if rebutting an argument. "The Government is the biggest corporation in the country. People buy General Motors stock and they watch it like a clock. They ought to be just as interested in their share of the Government."

Thorn Lord states his case as clearly and a bit more concisely: "The Government has spent more since 1950 than it has in its entire previous history." That, he thinks, is reason enough why people should know what's going on in politics. Thorn, recognized as a rebuilder of the Democratic Party in New Jersey, was a key figure in a group of Democrats who reorganized the party on a twenty-one-county basis after the Hague administration had come to an end.

He succeeded his law partner, Richard J. Hughes, as county chairman of Mercer County, inheriting a well-knit organization which he has strengthened to such a degree that every elective office in the county has been captured by his party since. The margin of voter superiority makes opposition all but impossible.

Thorn was nicknamed "The Lord" when he took over the chairmanship of a county that until then had been a Republican reserve. The name is not inappropriate. He is tall and gaunt, almost Lincolnesque in appearance. He has heavy eyebrows, a wide smile and hands so big that he was once advised against taking a typing course. A friend describes his sartorial habits as "disreputable." Anyone who has seen him in the well-traveled raincoat and fedora that are his trademark will understand why.

Politics is an everyday consuming interest of Thorn Lord, and has been since he started his professional career. For the past ten years or so he has gathered around him a group of associates who share his concern for political science and relish being members of "The Lord's Zoo." The name, their own invention, applies to ten regulars at the luncheon table, and perhaps an equal number of honorary members.

Nina Lord has undoubtedly been equally fascinated. Maybe her initial interest was inspired by an effort to put marriage on a sharing basis. But today her participation is real and down-to-earth.

"I love people and politics is people," she explains in simple terms. "It's our whole life now. We have practically no social calendar except for political meetings, and they account for most of our entertaining. We don't play games and we're not much interested in material things. Twice a year we go to a dinner dance in Princeton." After a thoughtful pause she adds, "You know, I often used to wonder what I'd do with myself when the children were grown. It has all worked out perfectly."

Nina doesn't mean to give the impression that she and Thorn have many quiet evenings to sit by the fireside. More often the fireside is crowded with energetic Democratic Party workers who have been summoned to a planning session or pep talk. And occasionally there are meetings called by Lord as chairman of the Planning Board of Lawrence Township, a job he has held for the past twelve years.

In recent months special meetings have scheduled to discuss a proposed highway will slice through the area, affecting property owners. Prior to this, Law Township was engaged in a tax fight strain the state from reassessing farm according to its high real-estate lot valu

During these and other sessions which been held with increasing frequency in election months, Nina is a warm and tho ful hostess, as well as a lively participan is not the acquiescent helpmate who bo her husband's judgment—at least n politics.

The Lords' house, located on quiet ince Line Road, just ten minutes by car Princeton, is ideally comfortable for sessions that often convene there. It is a room solidly American dwelling that has to its original style for more than 200 y The property sprawls over twenty acr woods and wildness, although the house is in friendly proximity to the blacktop Aged shade trees and rich growths of sl bery provide a sanctuary for a colorful va of birds. The Lords have installed a back feeder further to entice them.

Inside, the house is a cozy conglomer of bright slip covers, traditional furniture early-American pieces that are used an just admired. The atmosphere is informal family photographs, geraniums in clay and a stubborn corner of wallpaper won't adhere above the fireplace.

Oftentimes the sofa's sunny warm claimed by two waggy black dogs tha Lords affectionately call "spoodles." says they are lovable mistakes, and desc their heritage as part spaniel, part poodle complacent one has been part of the fa for ten years. The other, a recent acquisi is a bundle of black puppy whose mar dissolve when the door chimes ring.

Nina Lord, in spite of her gentle va advocates "system." She knows that wit an organized approach she would not be to accomplish as much as she does each Certainly her endeavors bear no relatio her stature. She is small and slim, with hair, patrician features and eyes the colo blue Wedgwood. Yet she would not look of place on a golf course, and in fact was a member of a Massachusetts state golf t

"I like to think of myself as being fifty," says. "It's not that I hate to admit how am, but age is a quality of mind. I've kn people who were old at twenty-two. Re too much emphasis is put on age today people have become fearful of growing Nina's account of her daily housekee routine sounds as quick and efficient as a readying a baseball diamond. She gets u 6 A.M. and regardless of the weather take dogs out for a leisurely walk. In those awa ing hours she reads and watches educati courses on television.

If dinner is to be eaten at home, she part prepares the menu, which often as not inc a hearty stew. Cooking has been a pro during the past months of campaigning w schedules have been subject to last-mi revision. Nina has come to depend on d that will warm and stretch. Her stand-b chicken. She has also learned to keep a su of hamburger in the refrigerator, as well a assortment of cheese and full jars of coo and crackers. There is always coffee on range.

Another campaign concession has be note pad at the bottom of the stairs for jo family messages. Nina, an early riser, goes to bed early when possible. Thorn, says, is a night person who is fully awak midnight.

The only domestic help in the Lord ho hold is a woman who comes each Wedne to clean and iron. Washing is done on Mon or Tuesday. Nina says that although doesn't always have advance warning people are coming, her husband is though enough to call a caterer when he invite large crowd. But if refreshments are li Nina usually prepares them herself and pends on the dishwasher for cleanup aid.

Housekeeping is only a part of her day. is also a successful businesswoman. Week at 9:30 A.M. she is working at her spec on fashionable Palmer Square in Prince-

It is called The Clothes Line, Inc., and tarted twenty-two years ago when Nina wo friends each put in $500 to incorpo-Their idea was to feature reasonably priced stylish junior-size clothes that were not available in Princeton.

na, now sole owner, is concentrating her s on the Princeton shop, having once ated a boys' clothing store and thriving ches in Trenton and Cape Cod.

e present store is actually two connecting
s. One, opened fifteen years ago, is del to children's apparel which Nina dees as "the Tiffany of baby things." It is blue and gay with the tunes of a music that once belonged to Nina's grander. Merchandise, much of it with a delihandmade look, is stacked on open es, carrying out the owner's theory that mers like to touch and examine things e purchasing.

e adjoining women's shop sells casual sport clothes that have a good-taste flair.
is the shop's best advertisement. She s classic clothes and shows a preference lue that becomingly accentuates her silver
She has that enviable knack of looking ell groomed in a tweed skirt and sweater e does in a designer suit. When furs are rm, Nina is likely to capture attention a handsomely tailored cloth coat of rich
.

r workday office is a bright corner of the stockroom. Three times a year she goes to York on seasonal buying trips, and busias-usual is conducted by four trusted en employees. ("You're not a very good esswoman if you have to be on hand all me," she says.) The enterprise is her own,

> A man with a new idea is a crank until the idea succeeds.
>
> MARK TWAIN

she insists that Thorn would no sooner fere than he would tolerate her meddling s law practice.

it both were delighted this past summer their sixteen-year-old daughter, also ed Nina, decided she would like to work e shop. A pretty blonde, she is a student amous Madeira School in Greenway, inia.

te Mrs. Lord has checked in at the shop, usually swings her car homeward to pre-breakfast for Thorn, who has made a t of sleeping late after long evenings of paigning. They discuss plans for the day then she heads back to the store before ing her mother, Mrs. Loring Underwood, unch at the Nassau Inn, across the street.
. Underwood suspects that her daughter's hant for politics may well derive from a t-great-grandfather who was once mayor lewark.

the days when comparatively few women ht college degrees, Nina received a finish-school education at the select Winsor ol in Boston. At the age of nineteen, she me the bride of David H. McAlpin. The riage ended in divorce ten years later.
y have two daughters, Mrs. Kenneth e Brownell, of Greenwich, Connecticut, Mrs. Robert Hauslohner, of Philadelphia, a son, David H. McAlpin, Jr., a Presby-n minister serving as copastor at a Negro ch in Princeton. Nina requires little or no ouragement to produce snapshots of her grandchildren under five years of age.

figure skater in her girlhood, Nina, in her ited fashion, organized the Princeton Ice ting Club and is now an honorary member.
was once featured soloist in a Sonja Henie show at Madison Square Garden, and at time thought nothing of skating four rs a day to keep in condition.

thletic activities have always been a essary part of her life. She sails during the mer months at Chatham, Massachusetts, re she lives in the old family home, and s tennis whenever she can find an oppo-t to match her energy. During the warmer ths in Princeton she often takes a half hour from the shop and goes over to the university courts to hit tennis balls against a backboard.

Nina, a convert to Christian Science, tries to live religion day by day. She says she is constantly striving to improve her relations with people, but anyone who knows her will grant that she is only deepening channels of compassion and understanding that were already adequate. Thorn is an Episcopalian who attends church regularly.

Nina's civic accomplishments show that she believes an individual must assume responsibilities in a community. She has been a tireless worker for the betterment of Princeton, a picturesque borough of more than 25,000 that circles Princeton University.

During the depth of the depression, when malnutrition often lowered the academic standing of otherwise normally bright children, Nina and two friends joined forces to correct the situation. The three young matrons called at local restaurants and business establishments to collect leftover food and donations of cooking utensils. Then they pushed up the sleeves of their sweaters and started cooking hot lunches daily for 300 youngsters. The project continued for five years until the state lunch program was initiated in New Jersey public schools.

Several years later, when Dr. Robert Garber, of the state Neuro-Psychiatric Institute at Skillman, New Jersey, needed help in raising funds, he called on Mrs. Lord. He explained that although state funds provided for maintenance and operation of the institution, the money didn't buy extras that are vital to patient morale.

Once again Nina phoned a few friends and formed the nucleus of a volunteer group to conduct fund-raising activities. The women have been able to build a swimming pool, stock the library, and supply television sets for sitting rooms. Much of the work has been accomplished by the collection of discarded nylon stockings, profitably sold for reprocessing.

For two or three years Nina was a forceful lobbyist, pressuring legislators to pass school bills and other measures that New Jerseyites considered worth while. She helped to defeat a bond issue to construct a reservoir that most Princeton residents opposed as inadequate.

When Nina filed a petition as a committeewoman sixteen years ago, there were only ten registered Democrats in her area. The district which she shares with a committeeman now has 666 registered voters, about 300 of whom vote Democratic.

Nina's job is to keep the voters informed about candidates and issues, make sure that they are properly registered, and encourage them to vote. A good committee worker, she says, works at it all year and doesn't just appear as a stranger at the door a week before elections.

Before each April primary, Nina limits her visits to Democrats, since New Jersey voters can't cross over. But she tries to call on all registered voters well in advance of the general election. As a committeewoman, she becomes a friend of the family, advising on absentee ballots for members who are away or in military service, and making arrangements for moving cards or reregistrations.

On election day, Nina starts work when the polls open at 7 A.M. and ends her day (which is often the beginning of the next) at county headquarters in Trenton to await the tabulation. Periodically during the day she phones voters who haven't appeared, to offer them a ride or her baby-sitting services.

Mrs. Harry Loveless, now Lawrence Township clerk and the only woman elected to public office in the township, recalls the election day when she was housebound caring for her infant twins. "I know they're precious and I'll take good care of them," said Nina, shooing the anxious young mother out the door.

Although there's no compensation for all the effort expended, Nina feels overpaid in opportunities to meet people and sound out their reactions to current problems and attitudes. And of course before the last primary she had twice as much reason to get out the vote. As introduction to voters, she often stood at their doorsteps and held up a sample for this serving fork or spoon...

Only

$1.00

REGULAR CATALOG PRICE $4.50

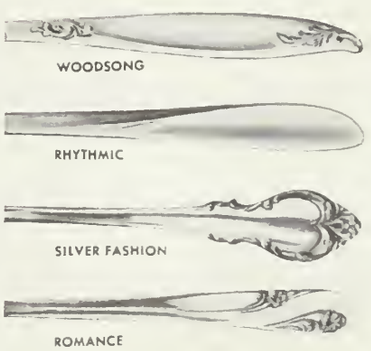
to introduce new...
"HAPPY ANNIVERSARY"
pattern in...
INTERNATIONAL



DEEP SILVER

($2.00 for the two piece set)

A wonderful opportunity for you to examine the incomparable beauty of DeepSilver, a rich new dimension in silverplate by The International Silver Company. Deeply luxurious, extravagantly heavy, every piece is lavished all over with extra silver . . . great depths of pure silver for a lifetime of elegant dining at truly modest cost! Serving Fork for cold meats, salads, bacon, fish and chops; Serving Spoon for salads, vegetables, macaroni or fresh fruit. Paired together, they make a graceful salad serving set.

AVAILABLE IN FIVE PATTERNS—CHECK THE PIECES YOU WANT!

Offer good only in Continental U.S.A. until December 31, 1960.
Made by The International Silver Co.

Mail to: Box 201, Wallingford, Conn.

	Serving Fork	Serving Spoon	2-piece Serving Set
Happy Anniversary
WoodSong
Rhythmic
Silver Foshion
Romonce

Enclosed $ _____ ($1.00 for each piece). $2.00 for each 2-pc. set. Not more than one 2-pc. set in each of 5 patterns to a customer. Send cash, check or money order; no stamps please.

Name _____
(PLEASE PRINT)
Street _____
City _____ Zone ____ State _____

ballot, explaining: "My husband's running for the Senate. He's at the top. I'm running for committeewoman. Way down here at the bottom."

New Jersey Democrats, confident of their strong party ticket, know that Thorn Lord is enough of a political realist to have calculated quite carefully his chance of success. His disadvantage is in not being as well known to the average voter as is Sen. Clifford P. Case, the Republican incumbent. Many voters, particularly those who use New Jersey only as a suburban home, feel that the choice makes little difference since both candidates are liberals, both have union labor support.

Lord has campaigned vigorously during the past months, speaking at dinners and shaking hands with voters in the twenty-one counties. He has gradually gained assurance and many new friends. The nightly campaign grind is not entirely new to Lord, who worked just as diligently for many years in getting voters registered. He was often assisted by his son, Thorn P. Lord, twenty-one, who is now serving in Army Security on Okinawa.

A courthouse correspondent once described Lord by saying: "As he gangles around, looking vaguely like Abe Lincoln but, unlike Lincoln, seldom saying three words in a row, nobody knows what goes on in Lord's mind. That may be the secret of his success."

Lord was highly regarded by his party, with backers booming his name in an effort to make him better known to the public, and his candidacy was announced without opposition. Robert Morris, on the Republican primary ticket, greeted Lord by saying he was happy the Democrats "selected a candidate w well respected and who is a gentleman."

Nina's affluent social background and ticipation in political affairs have bee cellent preparation for her possible role wife of a U.S. Senator. As an official ho she has had considerable practice at " ven," the governor's residence in Princ Nina and Helen Meyner are long-time fri so she occasionally assists or substitutes New Jersey's first lady is away.

In discussing the role of women in po Nina appears to be talking about some that concerns her deeply. "I don't think w should be segregated from men in p when they share their homes and their fu Why shouldn't women help to shape p After all, they have experience in trainin and educating children and in managing hou budgets. Most of them do more buyin handle more of the money men earn a men," she says with conviction.

But she knows that the closed doo policy-making sessions aren't going to open to women until more of them kno the door and show some interest. She d the fact that women, who are naturally sitive to atmospheres and situations, take more of an active interest.

With her genuine warmth and politi people attitude, Nina's interest is never t ened. Other women might wilt under a s barrage of banquet oratory. Not Nina. he has a formula that doesn't fail. "If I get sitting at the head table, then I go ou talk to some of the people," she says vote-winning smile.

INTERNATIONAL designs for changing America

Sea Isle is sculptured with restrained simplicity. It has graceful lines . . . nicely balanced weight . . . a sleek, silky finish.

It's part of the International Stainless Beauty Line collection. These patterns are created for your contemporary living by designers world-famous for the style and quality of their work.

You'll love the way International Stainless fits into your life. Look for Sea Isle and other pretty patterns in the International Stainless Beauty Line at fine stores everywhere. They're made in America—constantly available.

INTERNATIONAL STAINLESS

The International Silver Company, Meriden, Conn.

NEXT MONTH

A Thanksgiving Bounty of Memorable Writing

Featuring works by three distinguished authors: Isak Dinesen, whose "Farah" evokes a torchlit era in the Africa of thirty years ago and plays a subtle light over the master-slave relationship; Victoria Lincoln, who tells in "Love is a Crooked Thing" the story of a boy who did not fit in with the crowd—and of a girl who discovered her place beside him; Rumer Godden, whose delicately embroidered "Miss Happiness and Miss Flower" is the quintessence of every delightful wish.

What Makes Johnny So Spoiled?

The rudest, most destructive child in your neighborhood is easy to understand when he comes from a boorish family. But many adults who are polite themselves beam proudly and, it would seem, blindly at the obnoxious behavior of their offspring. What's the explanation? Why has overpermissiveness become such a common American pattern? World-famous Dr. Benjamin Spock offers his usual expert advice for parents.

The Cancer Nobody Talks About

It causes more deaths in the United States today than any other cancer. Yet it can be detected when there is still a good chance for cure—if we overcome our squeamishness and learn the danger signals. Gladys Denny Shultz tells why sigmoidoscopy should be included in the regular checkups of all women and men over forty.

He's 26, She's 38—How Did it Happen?

How can she be so foolish at her age? Much has been written about older men losing their hearts to young girls, but the problem of the mature woman and the boy is just as poignant. When the woman has a devoted, hard-working husband and two teenaged children, the chances for heartbreak are split five ways. Dr. Clifford Adams discusses an increasingly frequent phenomenon in "Making Marriage Work."

There's More to a Turkey Than Gobble

It's for you to decide whether or not to reveal your roast's tantalizing secret, but expect to be asked for it! Our bird is stuffed with flavorsome smoked oysters in a blend of ham and herbs that is irresistible. There are a cheese-and-chicken pâté aspic, too; savory hot onion canapés; an unusual cranberry relish; and a luxurious holiday macaroon pie to "bake" ahead of time. Traditional dishes, treated in a way that makes the past exciting.

Also, Pat Boone on teenage habits; "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"; beauty and fashion news of the season; an entertainment feature on two kinds of dinners you will want to give, one "dress up" and one "dress down," and much, much more in the November Journal.

Printed in U.A.

LADIES' HOME

JOURNAL

THE MAGAZINE WOMEN BELIEVE IN

NOVEMBER 1960 • 35¢

PATRICIA NIXON – OUR THANKSGIVING – JACQUELINE KENNEDY

HOW I SLIM DOWN: Ginger Rogers, Mitzi Gaynor, Robert Taylor

WONDERFUL STORIES: ISAK DINESEN, RUMER GODDEN, VICTORIA LINCOLN

WHERE ARE ALL THE MEN? Asks A GIRL who wants to GET MARRIED

DANGEROUS FRIENDSHIP: A MARRIED WOMAN AND A YOUNGER MAN—DR. ADAMS

DO BIG CITY SCHOOLS CORRUPT SOME CHILDREN, FAIL TO

BURLINGAME CALIF
PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
JUL 61

Style 87002, with custom inset. Use Palatial upstairs, ground level, downstairs.

Enter the golden age of vinyl floors with Armstrong Palatial Corlon. Shimmering with golden tracery, Palatial transforms the classic beauty of marble into lavish modern elegance. It comes in white, black and six gentle colorings to enhance any room, any décor. Palatial costs about $195 installed in a 12′ x 15′ area. FREE! Booklet of special color schemes and list of stores that have Palatial Corlon. Write Armstrong, 6011 King St., Lancaster, Pa. In Canada, Dept. 110-A, Box 919, Montreal, P.Q. □ Palatial Corlon is one of the famous Armstrong VINYL FLOORS

1860-1960 Beginning our second century of progress

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

November 1960

VOL. LXXVII NO. 11

Journalities

Neal Stuart

NEAL STUART's exciting Fire! Fire! (How America Lives, page 128) recounts the experiences of the Frank Perrons, of Connecticut, a couple with reason for loving their neighbors. The writer, a Journal associate editor, met them when their new house was being built. "But after Judy and Frank told me their separate minute-by-minute versions of that terrible night," she says, "I smelled smoke for days." A hot typewriter, perhaps.

Victoria Lincoln

Speaking of herself: "VICTORIA LINCOLN is fifty-five, and until this year she didn't like to climb mountains. She lives two intensive days in every twenty-four hours, rising long before dawn and taking a wholehearted nap after lunch. She loves clothes and hates shopping. She dislikes TV sponsors and avant-garde magazines for the same reason: they underestimate the intelligence of the American public. Her husband gave her the plot for Love Is a Crooked Thing." (Page 50.)

Don Ornitz

From Los Angeles, photographer DON ORNITZ reports: "Although I've been doing it for years, photographing the actual people for Can This Marriage Be Saved? (page 37) remains a very touchy assignment. I still feel my way carefully when asking people to re-enact situations that upset their marriage. My wife of seventeen happy and fruitful years—two daughters, eight and eleven—takes a doleful view of my 'counseling' efforts. After 'saving a marriage,' I always act as if I were the put-upon husband."

Novella Complete in This Issue

62 MISS HAPPINESS AND MISS FLOWER — Rumer Godden

Stories

50 LOVE IS A CROOKED THING — Victoria Lincoln
52 HER DEAREST WISH — Kate McNair
58 OPERATION TERROR (Conclusion) — The Gordons
72 FARAH — Isak Dinesen

Special Features

11 "NOW THANK WE ALL OUR GOD" — Dorothy Thompson
18 TEEN TIME IS HABIT FORMING — Pat Boone
24 ARE AMERICAN PARENTS OVERPERMISSIVE? — Benjamin Spock, M.D.
30 TELL ME, DOCTOR — Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.
33 LIBRARY ON A SHOESTRING
33 "THEY'RE SOMETHING TO READ" — John White
35 THE CANCER NOBODY TALKS ABOUT — Gladys Denny Shultz
37 CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED? — Dorothy Cameron Disney
54 OUR THANKSGIVING—WHAT IT MEANS TO US — Mrs. Richard M. Nixon as told to Hazel Markel
55 OUR THANKSGIVING—WHAT IT MEANS TO US — Mrs. Jack Kennedy as told to Joan Younger
60 LET'S MAKE IT SAFE TO SEND OUR CHILDREN TO BIG CITY SCHOOLS — Ruth Anne Carew
74 WHAT YOU CAN DO TO MAKE POOR TV BETTER — John Crosby
76 WHERE ARE ALL THE MEN?
128 HOW AMERICA LIVES: Fire! Fire! — Neal Gilkyson Stuart
142 MIRROR, MIRROR ON THE WALL — Jean Kerr

General Features

5 LETTERS OUR READERS WRITE US
44 THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE — Harlan Miller
46 MAKING MARRIAGE WORK — Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.
49 FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN
125 ASK ANY WOMAN — Marcelene Cox
144 THIS IS A FAULTFINDER — Munro Leaf

Fashion and Beauty

56 FASHION IS NOT ONLY NEW CLOTHES — Bet Hart
64 "IMMORTAL SIMPLICITY" IS ALWAYS GOOD FASHION, GIVENCHY SAYS
66 CHRISTMAS BOUTIQUE — Nora O'Leary
68 CHRISTMAS BOUTIQUE FOR CHILDREN — Nora O'Leary
69 HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING! — Bet Hart
70 CELEBRITY SLIM-DOWN — Dawn Crowell Norman

Food

77 DELICIOUS WITH TURKEY — Louella G. Shouer
78 DRESS UP OR DRESS DOWN—TWO DINNERS — John Prince
80 HARVEST FEAST AT APPLEYARD CENTER — Elizabeth Kent Gay

Architecture, Homemaking, Interior Decoration

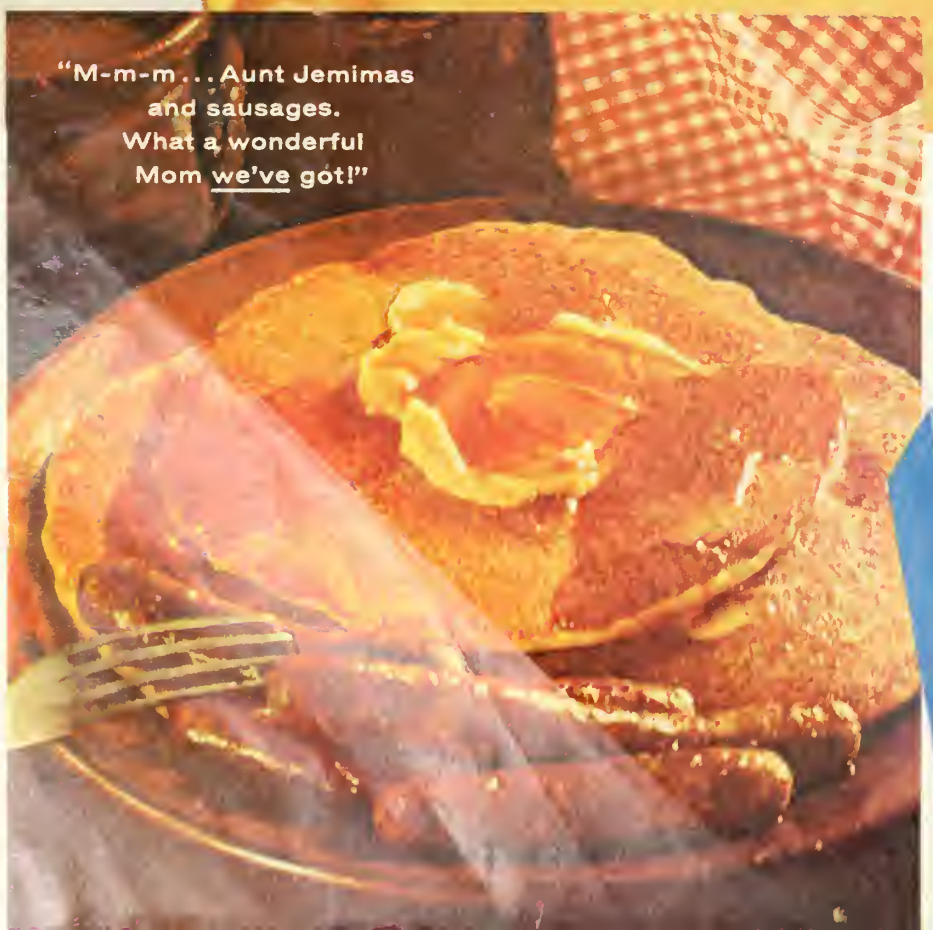
105 TOP-VALUE HOUSE — John Brenneman
146 A GRACIOUS ROOM FOR ADULT LIVING — H. T. Williams
152 MOTHER-DAUGHTER KITCHEN — Margaret Davidson

Poems

13 ELEVENTH-MONTH WONDER — Alma Roberts Giordan
21 POST CARD PAR AVION — Eleanor Brook-
136 DIANE — George Livingstone
159 TRY-ON — May Richstone

Cover Photograph by Joseph Di Pietro

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, ©1960 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Thursday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr. $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed. The Curtis Publishing Company, Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimoalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cory W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.



Now! Pink it or Scallop it for ravel-resistant seam finishes with

WISS

Take your choice of two precise, decorative cuts to finish a seam. New exclusive Wiss Skalloping Shears, 7½", $7.50; 9", $8.50. Wiss Pinking Shears, 5½" to 10½", $4.95-$11.95. New Left-Hand Pinking Shears, 7½", $7.95. J. Wiss & Sons Co., Newark 7, N. J.

Hooray! It's Aunt Jemima Day!

Even if you tried a different mix every morning -- you still couldn't get pancakes that stack up t these for taste and tenderness. The secret? Aunt Jemima's exclusive blend of flours fo extra flavor and lightness. By the way, which is Aunt Jemima day at your house'

TRY ALL THREE KINDS

The Original Buckwhet

Buttermilk

LETTERS
OUR READERS WRITE US

MAGAZINE CHILDREN BELIEVE IN?

NEW YORK

Dear Journal: How can I maintain discipline when your covers invite anarchy?

Yesterday it rained all morning. Promptly after lunch my four- and seven-year-olds made a dash for the nearest muddy gutter. Later, as I removed dripping socks and squishing sneakers, I scolded them roundly. My youngest showed me the brand-new September Journal. "Look, mom, no boots!" What could I say? Reproachfully,
Scarsdale JOAN MCLEAN

COLORADO

Dear Editors: At last! A Journal cover with no big faces, faces, faces!

Well, I guess you did have flowers once or twice. Now promise me you'll never have a face again. Sincerely,
Denver MARY P. CHESTER

• Where would Helen of Troy have been without a face? Mona Lisa? We could go on and on! ED.

BEFORE IT'S TOO LATE

KANSAS

Gentlemen: Your heart-rending "I Reared a Criminal" (August) has meant so much to me that I feel an obligation to thank you for publishing it.

It is my privilege, in connection with my work as Protestant chaplain at the Kansas State Penitentiary, to speak before numerous civic and church groups. I have already quoted from the article and have urged—with every ounce of strength I have—that parents thoroughly read how easy it is for any of us to make the same mistake. Sincerely yours,
Lansing CHAPLAIN JAMES E. E. POST
Kansas State Penitentiary

OHIO

Gentlemen: You may be certain that "I Reared a Criminal" will be required reading for many of the parents of children appearing in our Juvenile Court. Surely this article personalizes the tremendous price we are paying and will continue to pay for our present emphasis on Dependency rather than Responsibility. Sincerely,
Ashland JUDGE MILDRED L. MYERS
Probate and Juvenile Courts

JAPAN

HOUSES, HOUSES, EVERYWHERE

Gentlemen: The construction and outlook of the Big-Little House (June Journal) has overwhelmingly attracted my interest. As I am eager to get its accurate blueprint, please inform me if it is possible for you to forward it.

Looking forward to your favorable reply in the earliest convenience, I remain, yours faithfully,
Tokyo SHINICHI ISHIBASHI

• In 1900, Journal was the first magazine (other than architectural trade publications) to print floor plans for houses. No one knows the exact number which have been built, but we're delighted at the thought of Mr. Ishibashi happily hammering away on his house in Tokyo. ED.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

PRESIDENT MONROE'S FURNITURE

Dear Sirs: In "Looking Over the President's Shoulder" (August), Alonzo Fields states: "Mrs. Hoover made a search and found the original Monroe furniture and had it brought to the White House."

This is not true. Mrs. Hoover's great contribution was in locating furniture and other articles which reposed in the James Monroe Law Office Museum in Fredericksburg, Virginia. She made a trip to the museum and asked permission to have some pieces—including the Louis XVI desk—copied for the White House. This was gladly given and a cabinetmaker made really fine copies, all at Mrs. Hoover's expense.

The originals of the Monroe furniture remain in Fredericksburg. Sincerely,
LAURENCE GOUVERNEUR HOES
President
The James Monroe Memorial Foundation

TEXAS

WHAT'S NEEDED IS LOVE

Dear L.H.J.: My husband has had two strokes. He speaks with difficulty and most of what he manages to enunciate is quite childish and repetitious. This obviously embarrasses our old friends. They telephone, they send cards and flowers. But they do not come.

To be in others' "thoughts" is not enough. Surely compassion could overcome embarrassment.

I am so alone with my troubled days. Name Withheld

ALABAMA

WHY WE'LL HAVE NO FEET IN 2000 A.D.

Dear Journal: Will you please tell me why so many people today seem incapable of getting from one place to another without an automobile? My father walked five miles to his red schoolhouse; thirty years later I rode my bike, roller skated, or just plain walked two miles to mine. Today my nieces have to be chauffeured eight blocks to school, four blocks to a neighborhood birthday party. Frankly, I am ashamed of them! Sincerely,
Mobile LESLIE SEMMES

CALIFORNIA

WHO SAYS WOMAN IS THE BOSS?

Dear Editors: I, as the wife of a man who wears the pants at home and overalls to work, have been increasingly puzzled and annoyed by hundreds of articles stating that women are wearing the pants in the American family. Woman, they say, is the boss. Yet this is true of no family I know. Then why does everyone say so? Suddenly I see it. The question is: Who keeps telling us this? The answer: The upper class!

I do not mean to imply that "upper class" people are superior to the rest of

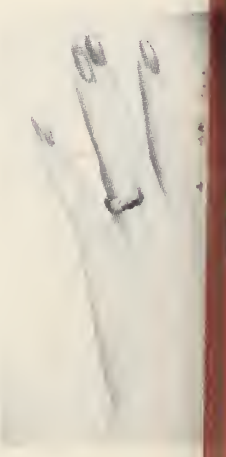
CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

To the 8 women in 9 who do their own housework:

Your hands deserve this super-lotion that works after others wash away

Back when almost everybody had help around the house, all you needed from a hand lotion was a pleasant scent and a soothing sensation. Nowadays you need a super-lotion that works as hard as you do. And that's precisely what you can expect from Revlon Medicated 'Silicare.'

'Silicare' does more than cosmetic lotions do. 'Silicare' sinks in . . . then seals in! That's why it: 1. Banishes dry rough red skin . . . 2. Helps heal cuts, chafes and scratches . . . 3. Protects with an invisible silicone "glove."



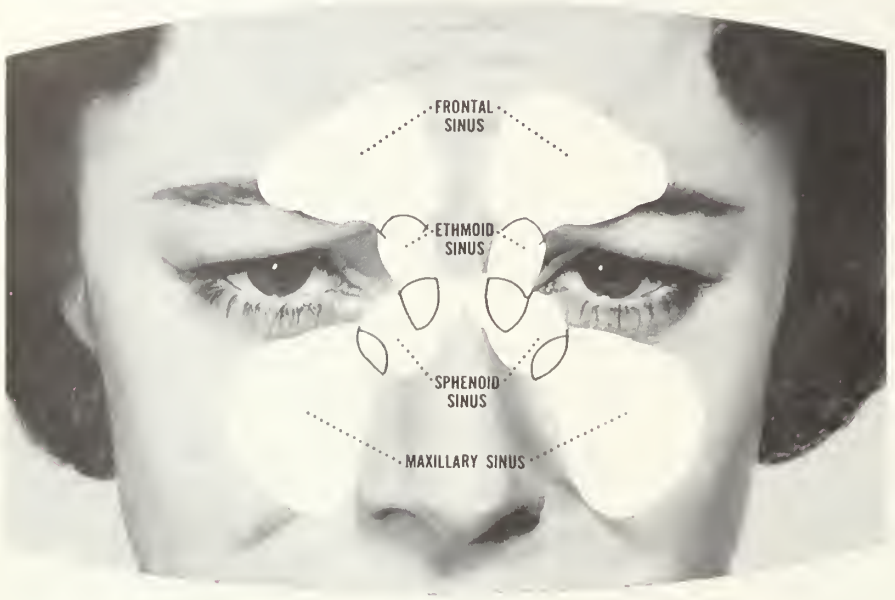
And 'Silicare' keeps working after other lotions wash away. You've seen how harsh detergents cut through grease. They wash away ordinary lotions fast. But 'Silicare's' sealed-in protection lasts through as many as five ordinary hand washings.

'Silicare' costs slightly more than other lotions. But when your hands are at stake, the difference in protection is more than worth the difference in cost. And 'Silicare' lasts longer because it protects longer than ordinary lotions.

Choose 'Silicare' lotion or cream. Use it regularly for one week. You'll see there really is a difference among hand lotions.

Physicians: Write for clinical data. Revlon Pharmacal Division, 666 5th Ave., New York 36, N. Y.

©REVLON, INC. 1960



Revlon 'Silicare' MEDICATED

The Nicest Gifts are TIE-TIE Wrapped
For your Christmas giving. . for gifts to express the warmth of your own special feeling. . trust to your imagination and TIE-TIE gift wrappings.
Original design TIE-TIE gift wrappings and fashion versatile Satintone®, the gift ties that stretch to tuck, wrap, knot, loop... available at fine department and stationery stores everywhere.
CAMILO PRINTED STRING COMPANY • Chicago • Clifton, N.J. • Salinas, Calif. • Made in Canada by Ribbon Fabrics Inc., Riviere-des-Prairies, Quebec

Revolutionary 3-layer tablet to relieve

COLDS MISERIES, SINUS CONGESTION and its PAINFUL PRESSURE

HELPS DRAIN ALL SINUS CAVITIES
EVEN DEEP IN HEAD (critical areas of colds infection)

DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets, working through the bloodstream, bring dramatic relief from colds miseries, pollen allergies and from sinus congestion with its tenderness, pressure and pain. DRISTAN, amazing medical achievement, contains: (1) The scientific decongestant most prescribed by doctors. In minutes—it reaches all congested areas—even deep in the head . . . quickly shrinks swollen nasal-sinus membranes . . . promotes drainage . . . restores free breathing. (2) An exclusive anti-allergent to block allergic reactions often associated with colds plus a highly effective combination of pain relievers. DRISTAN reduces fever better than aspirin and promptly relieves body aches due to colds. (3) Vitamin C to help build up body resistance to colds infection. For quick relief, get DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets. Note: DRISTAN is being widely imitated. But the fact is . . . the exclusive DRISTAN Tablet formula cannot be duplicated. Accept no substitutes!

WHEN COLDS STRIKE, nasal-sinus passages become clogged with germ-laden mucus . . . responsible for so much colds suffering and misery.

TAKE DRISTAN. Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN shrinks all swollen membranes, promotes drainage, restores free breathing

This Exclusive DRISTAN Tablet Formula Cannot Be Duplicated!

DRISTAN is the exclusive 3-layer tablet discovery which for the first time makes it possible to unite certain medically-proven ingredients into one fast-acting uncoated tablet. Accept no substitutes.

There's Nothing Like DRISTAN® Decongestant Tablets

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 5

us. But because of their various professions, they are the ones who inform us. And because of what they do, and because of their high incomes, they live a completely different life from that of the "average" American. I have no doubt that what they are saying is true—for the upper class. But the great mass of population is the lower and middle classes: together we make up America. When the upper-class commentators say "the American woman," they speak for all of us. But they don't know us.

Here in America we do not have a classless society. True, it is fluid. The poor boy can move from the lowest class to the highest by effort, education or lucky accident. But the ditch digger does not dine with the college president. Everyone knows that. (Neither does the electrician, nor the toolmaker, nor any other middle-class worker.) Thus, the people who make statements about the average American do not know any workingmen or their wives. They have never been to their homes. They know nothing of them.

I am one of the great middle class. And among all my friends, the man is the true head of the house. He knows it and so does everyone else. Of course the woman can get her way in many things by using feminine wiles, but this is only more proof that man rules. Because she has to use wiles to get her way. In my class, the wife never makes decisions without consulting her husband or, more often, asking his permission. She never makes major purchases, or social engagements for them as a couple, without asking him. She is home when he comes home from work, and she serves him. True, she does not act subservient, nor does she feel inferior. The husband and wife discuss and share, but it is he who is deferred to, who makes the final decision. Everyone will agree that the workingman makes up the bulk of America's population. Can you imagine a comedy in which a man in overalls comes home to a wife who starts bossing him around?

All these articles about woman domination show concern about this trend in American life. They say children won't know their own roles in life if father wears an apron and mother bosses. And I agree. Fathers should be manly; mothers should be womanly. And that doesn't mean that father has to be a tyrant or mother brainless. In more and more lower- and middle-class homes, parents are becoming more informed; our understanding of a richer family life is broadening. But in these same homes the traditional roles of the sexes are unchanged.

Women in the well-off upper class with leisure and maids may boss their men. (I don't know them, but I guess what they say is true.) But if men are still boss in the great majority of families, then we should know it. For if they keep telling us, through every communication medium, that our country is becoming a matriarchy, then in time we will become one. A lie repeated often enough will be believed as truth. Let's explode this myth for all time. Sincerely,

Culver City CAROL JACOBY

CANADA

AND STILL SHE WRITES DEAR EDITORS?

Dear Editors: I was seven years old when I received the first of many rejection slips from you. Fifty years, plus children, dogs, cats and a hundred-year-old farm in the Caledon hills, and I am still trying to break into the Ladies' Home Journal. Sincerely,

Toronto, Ontario KATHLEEN BLACKBURN

• You're made it, right here. But no one will be happier than Journal editors if next time it's with a poem or short story. ED.

IOWA

IT'S THOSE FIRST DRINKS WHICH DO IT

Dear Sirs: Aren't we mollycoddling coholics today when we encourage the to think of alcoholism as a disease (whi they couldn't help getting) when th really lack moral fiber to resist temp tion? Alcoholism doesn't suddenly velop overnight, in a week or month, l is the result of continuous self-ind gence and lack of will power. Sincer
Ames MRS. P.

PENNSYLVANIA

ONE PER CENT FOR BEAUTY

Dear Editors: The new Carl Sandbu
Junior High School and its mural among the brightest ornaments of it Levittown, Pennsylvania, communi
As far as is known, very few scho anywhere have anything like it.

The gaily colored mural, a mosaic all-weather glass, bands the entire fi foot length of the wall, and its them

FREDERICK GEASLAND & EDWARD SMITH, ART
PAUL D'ENTREMONT, ARCHIT

the development of man's knowle
The cost: well under one per cent of entire cost of the school.

As this one school board has prov new public buildings don't have to l like factories. Sincer
Levittown L.

ILLINOIS

HELP FOR THE AGED

Dear Miss Thompson: On behalf of American Medical Association, I cong ulate you on the sensitive and thou provoking "Who Are the Aged?" (J Journal). I have read many words on t subject, but yours certainly rank am the most memorable and stimulating

Our Washington office has distribu copies of the article to every Uni States senator and the article has b read into the Congressional Record.

Sincerely yo
Chicago F. J. L. BLASINGAME,
Executive Vice Presi
American Medical Associa

NEW JERSEY

TRAINING PERIODS FOR NEW NATIONS?

Dear Editors: Colonialism has bec such a bad word that one by one European nations have been giving their controls over Asian and Afri nations and setting them "free." The sult is often a bloody explosion w endangers the peace of the world.

Wouldn't it be better if the peopl these new countries, who do not h enough trained people to run a gov ment peacefully and efficiently, w through a period of tutelage? I would to see the United Nations take over new nation for about ten years, betw the withdrawal of the colonial power the granting of complete independe
Sincerely yo
Princeton ERNESTINE P. HE

)ne of the most exciting women in the world: Condesa de Quintanilla

ONDESA DE QUINTANILLA—a busy business executive, ıe also helps manage her husband's large cattle ranch—ıd their three lively sons! "I often feel tired but my face never shows it." She uses Pond's Cold Cream to deep-cleanse and moisturize—to ease away tension lines. "Pond's cleanses so thoroughly—keeps my skin soft and smooth."

SHE'S BUSY . . . YET SHE'S BEAUTIFUL . . . SHE USES POND'S

OW! POND'S COLD CREAM IN BOTH CREAM AND NEW FLOWING FORM

ow—for you who love lotions—Pond's Flowing Cold ream, a wonderful new form of Pond's Cold Cream! his exclusive new flowing cleanser is creamy-rich as ily true cold cream can be . . . never strips your skin e thin drying liquids. Pond's, in cream or flowing form, beautifies as it cleanses. Moisturizes to soften and smooth . . . "plumps up" skin cells so tired lines fade, tension vanishes. Use Pond's to beauty-cleanse at night, to moisturize under make-up all day. With Pond's you need never be too busy to be beautiful!

Now more than ever

Kotex is comfort

New Kotex napkins have a softer, more gentle covering.

The napkin ends are pleated to assure smoother fit.

And, the Kimlon center provides a special inner fabric to protect you comfortably, completely.

KOTEX and KIMLON are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Cor

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

BY LEON HARTL, FROM THE BARTHOLET COLLECTION, NEW YORK CITY

STILL LIFE ON A TABLE. This is the second of Leon Hartl's softly colored oil compositions to appear in the Journal. The artist's "Basket of Flowers," reproduced on this page last February, was enthusiastically acelaimed.

EXECUTIVE EDITOR
Mary Bass

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
Peter Briggs
William McCleery
Mary Lea Page
Curtiss Anderson
Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella C. Shoner
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Stanley Freeman
Hal T. Williams

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES
John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills
Conrad Brown
Anne Fuller

ASSISTANT EDITORS
Victoria Harris
Aliee Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Grant Harris
Ann Blackmar
Lee Stowell Cullen
Elaine Ward-Hanna
Carole O'Brien

EDITORIAL ASSISTANTS
Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Dorothy Shuler
Natalie Schram
Julie Ditchy
Lee Pettee

"NOW THANK WE ALL OUR GOD"

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

In the parsonage homes in which I was reared all festivals were celebrated with a full view to their inner meaning and significance, and, in a sense, all of them were "thanksgiving days." At Christmas we were thankful that Jesus had been born to bring light to all mankind; at each birthday we were thankful that the "birthday child" existed; on July 4th we were thankful for our beautiful, free country. And on Thanksgiving Day we were thankful for far more than an unusually good dinner and a holiday.

There was a certain ritual connected with every festivity—the ritual that made it a festival—and I have been recalling my earliest Thanksgivings.

From the moment we woke up we were singing, because we were a singing family. Mostly we sang hymns, because those and ballads and rounds were all the music we knew. We might have sung the old German hymn (arranged from Beethoven):

We thank Thee, Lord, for this fair earth,
The glittering sky, the silver sea . . .

or the early seventeenth-century hymn;

Praise to God; immortal praise
For the love that crowns our days.

or:

For all the blessings of the year,
For all the friends we hold so dear,
For peace on earth, both far and near,
We thank Thee, Lord.

We sang while we were tidying up the rooms and setting the banquet table. And then, always before the meal came on, we gathered around the piano and sang one of father's special favorites:

Now thank we all our God,
With hearts and hands and voices,
Who wondrous things hath done,
In whom His world rejoices—which is far older than the Pilgrim Fathers!

Now we gathered at table. Ours was never, alas, a family reunion, for our relatives were in England, Chicago, Pittsburgh and Ohio, none in Western New York, where we lived.

But we were never alone. Always someone or several were celebrating with us, and always because they would otherwise be alone—a widowed father or mother whose children were grown up and far away, or very likely some queer roving individual to whom few doors were open.

The table at the parsonage would look perfectly beautiful, laid with the best white damask tablecloth, set with the Haviland china that was used on only special occasions, and with the little silver plate we had polished to mirror brightness.

The dinner was then, so many years ago, about the same as that served all over the country today: stuffed turkey (usually, then, with a chestnut dressing, for chestnuts could be had for picking them up), giblet gravy,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

Joy saves your hands for nicer things than dishwashing

You can rate an orchid for your soft, pretty hands if you wash your dishes with Joy every day. It's different from other liquids. Joy has a mildness you can see on your hands—leaves them smooth and lovely as an orchid petal. That's because Joy is as mild as a bubble bath. You try it. See how Joy helps keep your hands nice, for all the nice things they have to do.

Mild as a bubble bath to your hands

New soft plastic bottle

JOY HAS A MILDNESS YOU CAN SEE ON YOUR HANDS

...INUED FROM PAGE 11

...ed potatoes, yellow turnips, boiled ...s, pickled beets, carrots—something of ...e root vegetables grown in our garden ...tored in the cellar—coleslaw, a variety of ...made pickles, cranberry sauce (made of ... cranberries—not that jellylike sub... of today), hot rolls (or corn bread) and ...kin and mince pies.

... had a lot of people to be thankful to for ... meal as well as to God. To the farmer, ...n produce but short on cash, who had ...ubtedly brought us the turkey as a con...ion to the minister's salary; to father, ...had grown and stored the vegetables and ...umpkins; to Auntie Lizzie, who had ... and canned the mincemeat and cooked ...inner. We always, of course, said grace ... meals. But always, on Thanksgiving, ... said a special little prayer of his own of ...ude. And then, on the occasion I espe... remember, he told us about the first ...ksgiving. It went something like this:

..."Where did this celebration begin?"

...who was the oldest, knew the answer ...at: "The Pilgrims celebrated their first ...st in Plymouth, Massachusetts, in No...er, 1621." (Actually, the month is not ...n.)

...t, my father would say, slicing the turkey ...deftly, have you thought what those Pil... went through before they celebrated?

..."u must know, first, why they left Eng... first for Holland, and then for an un...n wilderness. They were a religious sect ...l Puritans because they wanted to purify ...urch and society. The Protestant revolu... had disappointed them. The English ...h had cut itself loose from Rome but ... a compromise and the Church of Eng... was like the Roman Catholic except that ...uld not accept the authority of the Pope. ...did not satisfy the Puritans, who were a ... within the Church of England. They ...d a religion, a church and a way of living ... on the Bible—as they themselves inter...d it; to do away with bishops, deans and ...t parish priests; to abolish all set pray-ers and to establish a society in which people might come somewhere near being able to live by New Testament principles.

They were harried rather than persecuted. Their congregations were broken up and finally one such, having first gone to Holland, returned to England and under a grant from the Virginia Company, a colonizing enterprise, and supported by a group of British merchants, set out for the New World. About 120 of them booked passage in two ships, the Speedwell and the Mayflower. These were small sailing vessels, and hardly had they started when the Speedwell was recognized as unseaworthy and had to discharge its passengers. The Mayflower could not take them all, but did take some 100 or 102. Not all these were Puritans. Some were hardy adventurers who eventually cast in their lots with the others. It was just a small sailing vessel, about 180 tons, dreadfully overloaded and insufficiently stocked with supplies. They set sail from Plymouth, England, in September and it was November before they stepped ashore on the coast of what is now called New England, in Provincetown on Cape Cod. Some must have perished under way; at any rate, only 40 signed the compact in Provincetown, setting up a community government bound by the will of the majority, and elected first a governor named Carver, I think, who soon died and was succeeded by Governor Bradford. A party of them went exploring for a permanent settlement place and decided on a spot they named Plymouth, after the port from which they had sailed. The others followed.

Winter, now, was well under way, and they had come from a mild climate into a very severe one. They were not at all fitted for such a venture. They were peasants, city workers and small tradesmen. The country was forested with primeval trees, and their first concern was to build themselves rude shelters. They soon exhausted their supplies. There were fish in the sea and wild game in the woods and they must have lived on those. But half of them perished that winter from hunger and cold.

Now, then, the spring came and the survivors planted their first crop—of corn, for bread. They must have got the seed from the Indians, for the grain was not known in England. But as the seed began to come up, a drought set in, and the summer was as hot and dry as the winter had been damp and freezing.

If the crop failed, they were lost. So they gathered together and prayed for rain—and I'm sure every one of them was praying all the time, whatever he was doing. And rain came, the corn grew tall, the ears were fat, and when these were dried and husked they ground the grain into meal between stones. And then they celebrated their thanks to God for their survival, in the first Thanksgiving dinner.

And what did they have to eat? (We looked around our groaning board and imagined the first Thanksgiving to be like ours.) They had corn bread—just corn meal mixed with salt and water and baked on hot stones. And they had roasted wild turkey. That's all. And they were more thankful for that than we are for all this bounty, because they had faced death from hunger sustained only by their confidence in having a mission from God.

I was later to learn much more about the Pilgrim Fathers than this story told me, and learn, too, that it was only basically accurate. My father had never read Bradford's own journal and his reports to Sir Edwin Sandys, who had sponsored their voyage. Had he done so, he could have been more eloquent. Bradford described New England as this little band saw it:

> For summer being done, all things stand upon them with a weather-beaten face; and the whole countrie, full of woods and thickets, represented a wild and savage hue. If they looked behind them, there was the mighty ocean which they had passed, and was now as a maine barr and golfe to separate them from all the civill parts of the world. . . . What could now sustaine them but the spirite of God and his grace? May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say: "Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness; but they cried unto the Lord, and he heard their voyce, and looked on their adversitie.

ELEVENTH-MONTH WONDER

By ALMA ROBERTS GIORDAN

I would find new and different words for this fall,
For it is a splendid thing, ancient yet never Before known upon the earth—though the broom grass tall Sways in an amber pattern of past endeavor . . .

Though the elm leaves clatter to ground in a hailstone shower.
Behold, O my heart, the jays at the feeding station—
From thence to the birdbath, as always, yet clean as that hour
The lead morning-glory burst in its August elation.

And the young maple, see: it has grown a yard by all tests.
Now its leaves are gone and the stretch of its neck is observed.
Look on the wonder of heretofore-hidden nests:
The hammock of oriole—slap-dash that robins curved.

There is no fresh phrase? All things in Nature shout
Of the glorious old-new drama never played out.

FUDGE SUNDAE CAKE

Softasilk®

brings you that very proud cake for a very proud day a cake so special you have to start from scratch!

FUDGE SUNDAE CAKE

A rich, moist chocolate beauty of a cake! Make it with our special Softasilk recipe, and serve it proudly. Remember, even if you sifted ordinary flour over and over, it could never be so light and fine-textured as soft . . . soft . . . Softasilk!

⅔ cup soft shortening
1⅔ cups sugar
3 eggs (½ to ⅔ cup)
2¼ cups sifted Softasilk Cake Flour
⅔ cup cocoa
¼ tsp. baking powder
1¼ tsp. soda
1 tsp. salt
1⅓ cups water
1 tsp. vanilla

Heat oven to 350°. Grease and flour 2 layer pans, 9 x 1½". Cream shortening, sugar, eggs together until fluffy (beat 5 minutes high speed on mixer or by hand). Sift flour, cocoa, baking powder, soda and salt together. Mix in alternately with water and vanilla. (Use low speed on mixer.) Bake about 35 min. Cool. Split each layer crosswise into two layers. Frost with Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting Mix (if you like lots of frosting, use two packages). Pour Fudge Sundae Sauce over frosting: combine 6-oz. pkg. semi-sweet chocolate pieces, 2 tbsp. light corn syrup, 3 tbsp. cream, 1 tbsp. butter in saucepan. Stir over low heat until smooth and creamy. (If sauce becomes too thick to dribble over cake, add one or two teaspoons cream; stir until creamy again.)

MARK OF GOOD LIVING · TOASTMASTER ·

you lead two lives

hostess homemaker

TOASTMASTER

TOASTMASTER POWERMATIC TOASTER
Lowers bread, toasts it—all automatically. No levers to press. 3 automatic models, like 2 Powermatic models, make perfect toast every time.

Toastmaster toasters priced from $17.95... 5 models to choose from.*

. . . but one beautiful toaster serves you in both your roles hostess:

The occasion calls for your best china and sterling. Alongside them, your Toastmaster toaster maintains the elegance of your setting. The mirror-like chrome finish gleams with a perfection only Toastmaster can achieve. It is an outstanding example of the Toastmaster tradition of quality. A tradition that makes you proud to have this toaster in your home . . . proud to use it on your table.

homemaker:

You use it so many times a day . . . every day. Yet, year after year it performs with the remarkable precision only Toastmaster can build into a toaster. Each piece of toast comes out done to the exact shade you want, thanks to the exclusive Superflex Timer inside. And it's so easy! This toaster literally takes the toast right out of your hand . . . there's no lever to push. Toasts perfectly every time.

TOASTMASTER®
First in Electric Homewares

TOASTMASTER DIVISION, McGRAW-EDISON COMPANY

TOASTERS · FRY PANS · COFFEE MAKERS · BLENDERS · IRONS · MIXERS CAN OPENERS · GRILL & WAFFLE BAKERS · HEATERS · HOME BARBER SETS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

"TOASTMASTER" is a registered trademark of McGraw-Edison Co., Elgin, Ill. and Oakville, Ont © 1960

*Recommended Retail Prices

Let them therefore praise the Lord, because he is good, and his mercies endure for ever."

But it is true that half of them died that first winter, although the corn-bread story was apparently fictional. Thanksgiving 1621 celebrated not only the harvest for which they had prayed and "a great store of wild Turkies, of which they took many, besides venison," but also the arrival of the British ship Fortune with provisions. It is more than likely that the colonists were, for once, extravagant.

Even thereafter, for several years the colony ran neck and neck with famine. But "they ardently believed, greatly dared and firmly endured." Governor Bradford concluded his annals:

> Thus out of small beginnings greater things have been produced by his hand that made all things of nothing, and gives being to all things that are; and as one small candle may light a thousand, so the light here kindled hath shone unto many, yea, in some sorte, to our whole nation.

But nothing I heard or learned later made such a lasting impression on my mind as the accompaniment to the parsonage feast, and the friendly catechism that followed it. Did God alone save them? No, their faith in God and in their mission, their courage, endurance, industry and mutual aid had to be put at the service of God. Even God, I gathered, couldn't help people who wouldn't help themselves and one another. They survived because they had character and their values became those of a nation and of wave on wave of pioneers.

They set up the first self-governing political democracy on this continent, which was to become the pattern for the nation. They established the Congregational Church whose spires (some of the loveliest in New England) were to dot the nation from coast to coast, a self-governing church without a hierarchy of bishops and elders, but never the church, because the Puritans had suffered for religious liberty. Their spiritual descendants opened the first free public schools anywhere in the world, and 200 years later took the lead for the abolition of slavery.

They could enjoy liberty because they restrained it, and life because they nurtured it.

Of course I did not think all this as a child, but I felt it, intuited it.

There was another part of the Thanksgiving ritual. Each of us told for what we were thankful. I cannot, of course, remember our testimonies, but I do remember for what, in general, we were thankful.

I was certainly thankful for being alive, with that intense, exuberant, receptive aliveness of every healthy, observant child.

I was thankful that I could go to school. For father, too, had been a sort of pilgrim although he came from England in ten days in a big steamship and never wrestled with more of a wilderness than the weeds his predecessor may have left in the parsonage garden. But my father, brought up as a poor and puny relation in an uncle's rich house, had had no more than an elementary education along with his cousins in a little private school kept by a retired Anglican rector. He had gone to work in his uncle's offices at fourteen, and afterward for another firm whose owner was distantly related, and always had studied by himself at night. Brought up in the established church, he had been "converted" at eighteen, "when all the values of my life changed forever," and had studied at night for the Wesleyan (Methodist) ministry. Ordained in England, he had come to America, where brothers and sisters had preceded him, because there was a call for ministers here, and because he was determined that his children should be born and grow up in a country free of hereditary castes and classes, where education was open to all.

He did not come here to seek riches and he neither wanted nor found them. We could not be thankful for "prosperity," for our life, though decent, was extremely frugal. He, too, was a Puritan, at heart if not in denomination.

I was thankful to those early Americans who had risked and lost their lives to battle a wilderness and turn it into a countryside, villages, towns and cities comely and fair. I knew that I was one of their heirs and I hoped I would not waste or befoul that inher[itance] wanted to be good.

I was not good, of course. I was [ill] obstinate, adventurous and ambitiou[s] In [my] life I have done many things I should [not] done, and left undone many that I sho[uld] done. But heaven knows what I mig[ht] done if I had not learned (along with [the] key and the Christmas tree) that I ow[e] to God, and to men and women who l[ived] preceded me, than I could ever repay [and] that I was born in debt, not to the secu[rity] but to life itself, that a sponge is an [in]vi[ous] brate animal, and that gratitude is t[he] compensating of feelings and the ingr[ate] meanest of men.

As Shakespeare says in Twelfth Nig[ht]:

I hate ingratitude more in a man
Than lying, vainness, babbling, drunk[enness]
Or any taint of vice.

Today the wilderness has gone, and [with] America's physical frontiers. Life has [ceased] for all Americans more easy, comfort[able] materially secure than it was even [in] Thanksgiving days of my own childhood.

Yet, if the challenges to life and liberty [are] not the same as those that the Plymouth [Pil]onists faced, they are not less but greater, [and] we experience the paradox that we live [in] and the same time, in an age of plenty [and] anxiety.

It is fashionable to think that because [the] world has so changed, because man [has] diabetes week

NOVEMBER 13 to 19
be alert!... be tested!
be sure!...

fected the fission of the atom and is se[arching] quer space, the virtues of the Puritans [are] fashioned and outdated.

This seems to me profoundly untr[ue]. [It] still true in an immensely magnified [way] the survival of a nation, a people and [civ]ization depends on its character; that if [free] liberty can no longer be preserved [by] destroying war, they also cannot be p[reserved] without sacrifice and the power to [do] that evil must be resisted; that pain is [part] of life; that to live for the fulfillment [of] mediate pleasures is never really to live; [that] that enduring wealth is the creation [of] trious minds and hands, and that if [the] of centuries is consumed in a single ge[ner]ation or two a great inheritance is dissipated; [that] free and voluntary co-operation is the [way] good society; that nobody and no na[tion] bravely face and overcome danger [without] sense of purpose beyond his own [life] embracing the wisdom and experience [of] past and extending, modifying and [apply] them to the future.

If the foundations, that you and [I] laid, are of the indestructible stone of [cardinal] virtues, those who would erect upon [them] gimcrack house and civilization will [soon] blown away in the first storm and Plym[outh] Rock will be a memorial to a light that [failed].

Meanwhile, let us, like the parsonage [children] give thanks for simple things: for the [pump]pie, full of sugar and spice, which I ha[ve] seen anywhere except in America, and [which] think also came to us from the Puritans.

I am grateful, as I write this, for [a] gcously beautiful day.

One generation passeth away, and [another] generation cometh: but the earth abi[deth] ever. The sun also ariseth. (Ecclesiaste[s] [1:4,]

I shall now go out and admire the [rising] sun.

Busiest tomatoes in town!

making dozens of dishes quicker and easier they're ready-seasoned with onion, celery, green pepper

How deliciously different can an easy vegetable be? Just try DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes! They come seasoned with onion, celery and green pepper, ready to heat.

You'll fix this gourmet vegetable in minutes when you start with DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes. Serve them piping hot, with crunchy, garlic-salted croutons.

Everybody has a favorite macaroni dish that calls for tomatoes, onion and green pepper—don't you? Save time and work by using DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes.

It's so easy to give rich flavor to pork or veal chops, chicken, lamb shanks. Brown the meat, add DEL MONTE Brand Stewed Tomatoes, simmer to tenderness.

Making a whole-meal soup like Shrimp or Crab Gumbo, Minestrone, Manhattan-type chowders? Just think, here are four of your ingredients all in one can, ready to add!

Time and time again, you need tomatoes with onion and green pepper for hamburger recipes: meat balls, one-dish meals, spaghetti sauce. Shortcut: Stewed Tomatoes.

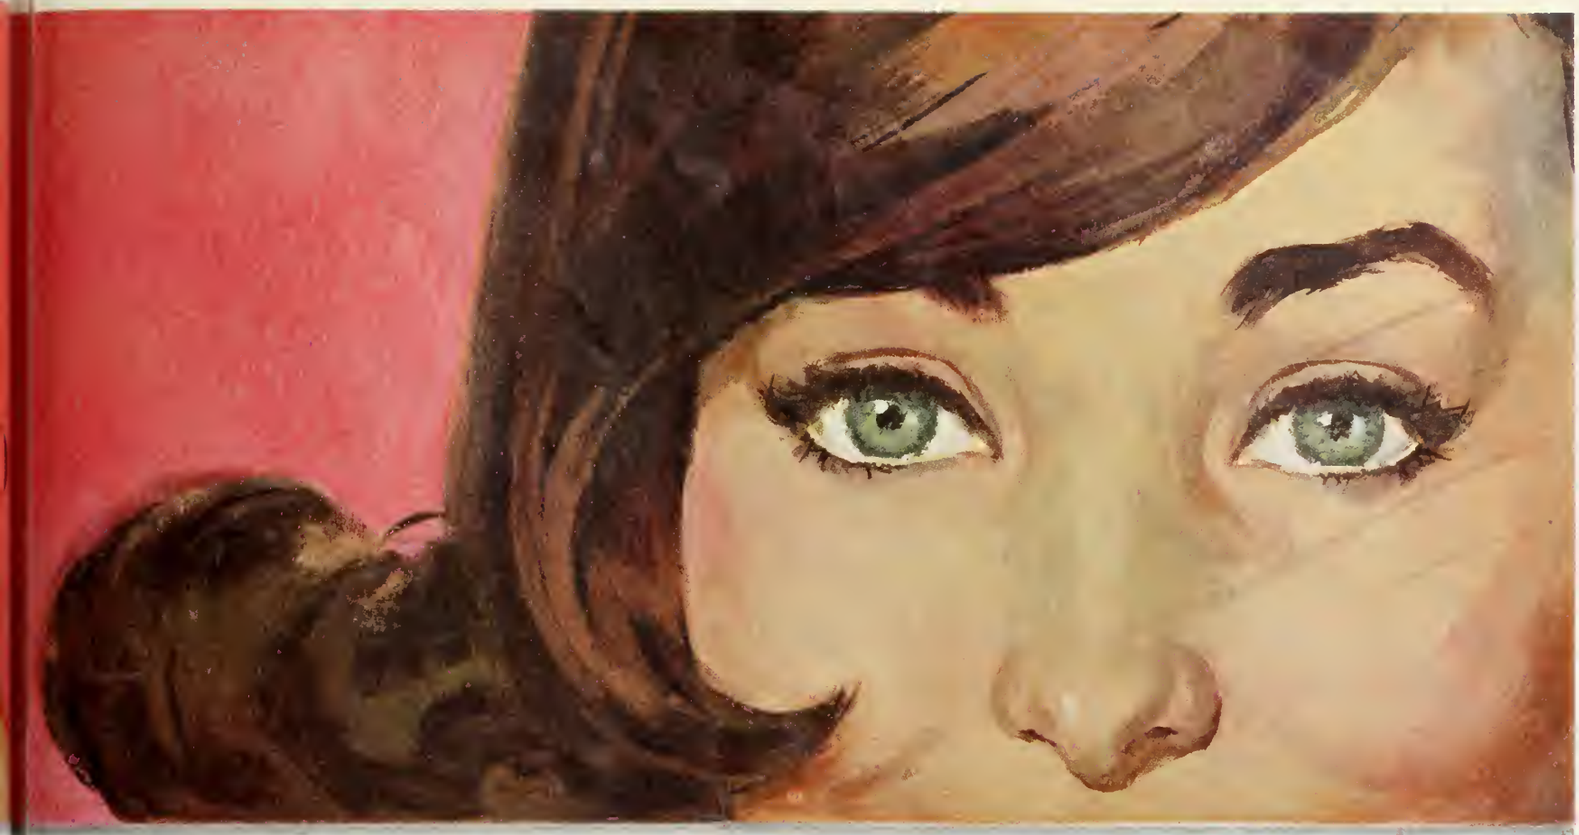
What's new in stew or goulash? DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes—already perfectly seasoned, so you needn't peel onions, chop green peppers or celery. Just add!

Del Monte® STEWED TOMATOES

Greatest sheet news in years!

NOW PIMA IS BLENDED INTO ALL CANNON COMBSPUN® PERCALE SHEETS

Smoother, finer, stronger than ever...and at no increase in price



Discover the fresh luxury of Pima-blend in new Cannon all-cotton percale sheets. Pima, the richest cotton fiber, gives them flawless smoothness, long-fibered strength. Compare them with any other percale sheets. You'll see and feel the wonderful difference. White, certified-colorfast colors and fashion designs—all are lovelier than ever with Pima. Look for the new Pima-blend label on every package.

CANNON

Created to beautify your living...

THE CANNON ROYAL FAMILY OF SHEETS

CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 WORTH ST., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

Cannon Combspun® Percale

NOW WITH Pima-blend

SMOOTHER · FINER STRONGER

TEEN TIME IS HABIT FORMING

LEE BALTERMAN

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEENAGERS

"What's Wrong With a Little Experimenting?" "I'm sixteen," the letter o my desk, signed "Caroline." begins, "and I don't see why I'm not old enough to try smoking, o to have wine with my dinner, or beer on a date. How do adults expect us to learn if we never ge any experience? What's wrong with a little experimenting anyhow?"

Well, now, Caroline, you sure can ask some good questions. Yessiree, you can ask som dillies! Anybody care to answer 'em for me? Looks as if I'm stuck with the job. Well, first of all let me throw this at ya:

Willie saw some dynamite,
Couldn't understand it quite;
Curiosity never pays:
It rained Willie seven days.

Now, Miss C., there's nothing wrong with "a little experimenting." And I never knew sensible adult, be it parent, teacher or minister, who expected a teenager to "learn without ex perience." As a normal, healthy young person, you're bound to put your finger in the "wet paint" once in a while—just to see if it's really wet. But—to avoid a Willie-type catastrophe during th process of gaining your youthful experience, I'd recommend adhering to three simple rules Rule One: Remember Little Willie. Recognize dynamite and stand clear.

Alcohol is "too hot to handle"—as a "little experiment." It's not a safe teen-time experience The wise impersonal elders who make our laws have set twenty-one as the earliest possible ag when you'll be mature enough to fool around with alcohol. It's like sex—one experimental mis take, when dealing with something of this potency, can have consequences as devastating, an even as final, as what happened to Willie!

As for experimenting with narcotics—marijuana and all that stuff—the same impersonal wis men have labeled them too dangerous to be experimented with at any time or any age!

Rule Two: Inexperience Should Listen to Experience. For safety first i experiments, it's a good thing to listen with an open mind to some of us who've walked tha way before. If I got burned, I may be able to save you some blisters.

The idea isn't that folks are so mean they want to cheat you of pleasure—but that they lik you well enough to expose their own failures to save you pain. Get it? For every teenager there' a feast of new goodies spread out to be tasted and tested. But the ones who'll come through with out a touch of ptomaine are the ones who listen to the voice of experience say, "If I were you I'd leave that dish alone."

Now, I didn't personally get blistered by alcohol. I tried it once or twice, but didn't ge burned—I was saved from it by witnessing the pain of friends. When I was a junior in high schoo I decided, along with some buddies, that it would be manly to try the "little experiment" wit beer. An older buddy bought it and the first session, since we were CONTINUED ON PAGE 2

DI PIETR

Giving thanks to God and sharing with others are two "habits" that come straight from the heart

Why tell him it's make-up...he's convinced it's you!

©Revlon, Inc., 1960

And it is you...your complexion perfected by the lasting loveliness of delicate color

Just smooth on Revlon 'Touch-and-Glow' and see a soft, warm change come over your complexion. It's the way you feel in candlelight . . . the way you look in any light when your make-up is Revlon 'Touch-and-Glow'.

So quick, so easy...goes on in minutes—stays freshly glowing all through the day. Just choose your shade from one of eleven beautifully blended skin tones . . . and see your complexion bloom with a beautiful new glow.

'Touch-and-Glow' Liquid Make-up for a delicate glow of color . . . matching Face Powder for a soft velvet finish . . . Pressed Powder Compact for perfect touch-ups.

'Touch-and-Glow' . . . by Revlon

DESIGNED EXCLUSIVELY FOR MC CALL'S BY PAULINE TRIGERE—PATTERN N

What's the newest slant on holiday sewing?

It has to do with a special needle . . . and you, of course.

The needle slants forward—so you don't have to. There's no stretch, no eye strain seeing where you're sewing. It pierces the fabric clearly an inch ahead of the old-fashioned straight-up-and-down type machine needles. An important advance!

With this special slant, lively silks are more controllable. Spirited holiday taffetas stitch up submissively. You can put in a gusset with more than blind faith. Do a line of ticklish top-stitching—boldly.

It's a slant you get only with SINGER* machines. And it's part of what makes the SLANT-O-MATIC* Machine by SINGER the greatest zig-zag machine ever built. Discover this new angle to sewing...soon at...

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

Also headquorters for SINGER* Rug and Floor Cleaning Equipment

Listed in your phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHINE CO.

*A Trademark of THE SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.

TINUED FROM PAGE 18

etty scared, turned out to be a very "small " But the second time we had more con-ce—and more beer.
lieve the bloodshot eye of experience!
t happened to one of my brightest buddies, lentally tiptilted by "one too many," ldn't happen to a sweet sixteener like line, nor a junior teener, male variety—as I was then. No kiddin', the alcohol ed to melt his personality and appear-
! Like a TV screen that'd blown a tube, ent out of focus, starting with his eyes, his voice, then his legs—until I actually ght I was watching Dr. Jekyll turn into Hyde.
scared me.
ter, another guy I knew "graduated" small beer to a mild experiment with gin.
ded and devilish, he thought he was ng the Indianapolis speedway right in the le of town. And this mixture of one car, drink too many and one teenager spelled for three.
en after the law gave me the green light, cided that I didn't want to risk being er the influence" of anything potent

POST CARD PAR AVION

By ELEANOR BROOKS

"Buon giorno," "Bon jour," "Guten Tag" and "Good day"
Are the greetings my tour
Has taught me to say,

And on mainland and island
The responses are dear,
But my heart's in the "Hi!"
land—
My heart is not here.

gh to rob me of what little reason the od Lord gave me. I have a hard enough m managing me when I know what I'm oi!
Now, honestly speaking, how do you do it you?

Three:
periments Are Habit-Forming

V hear a lot today about what is "habitming" and what is "nonhabit-forming."
fically, this may all have a secret mean-ng but in my own experience, any act or ought pattern becomes a habit, if repeated ften enough. One dictionary definition of abit is "a regular and fixed mode of action, whether physical or mental; also the condi-or which causes a tendency to continue uch a mode . . ." All during the teen years ou weaving a web of habits—both good nd bad—by the experiences you choose and he experiments you repeat. And in the end hey govern a lot of your future life.
A giant intellect on this topic—Dos-evski—said, "It seems, in fact, as though the ecret half of a man's life is made up of othing but the habits he has accumulated ur; the first half."
Well, he should know—but both Shirley nd are finding this partially true right here t the end of the first quarter: Shirley bound o a good habit, me to a real loser!
All we developed both these habits—nintentionally—in our teens.

Permanent Habits
and How to Get That Way:

My bride is the neatest woman I know. In act she's so neat that it's something of a joke.
ve in friends' homes she's always unconously straightening up for 'em, emptying shtrays, picking up glasses, talking sociably ll the time and totally unaware that she's oing it.

Now me, I like this—because even though I'm not superneat myself, I function better in a tidy atmosphere. I think most guys do, and I know that when we'd been married a little over a year, when we lived in two rooms in Denton, Texas, with a small baby and no closets, I regarded Shirley's ability to "keep a neat house" as a real talent.

I also believed it was a "talent" she'd been born with. Not so. Four years later, when we were living in New Jersey, I discovered it was a "habit" she had cultivated!

One of our neighbors, the mother of two teenagers, was crying on Shirley's shoulder. "Our house looks like Tobacco Road," she wailed. "Those kids of mine are hopeless. They were born to live in a pigpen. I've done everything I can think of." And she had too.

With the girl, aged thirteen, and very fond of clothes, she had arrived at the unique punishment of dropping all stray garments out the upstairs window—winter or summer! With the boy, aged fourteen, and a hi-fi addict, she put all records and loose paraphernalia in the trash and all extraneous garbage like banana peels, candy wrappers, wet swim trunks in the middle of his bed. But the kids still didn't quite seem to catch on!

"Don't pick up anything—even to toss it out," advised my wife. "And don't give up hope."

"But what are their own homes going to look like?" the frantic mother cried.

"Just like mine," said my shining homekeeper.

And then the truth came out. As a young teenager my Shirley's room was a sight, she admitted. She never knew where her clothes were—usually they were wadded on the floor of her closet. Her schoolbooks were a lost cause—literally! And her mother was always after her—but always cleaning away the mess to get to her. Then one day her entire family just put the lid on! Nobody picked up—and nobody came near her room. And right then li'l' Shirl began the long pull of "breaking a bad habit"—the habit of sloppiness—and by repeated efforts grooved a new habit pattern by which she became very organized and efficient. And that's the way she is today, friend!

After convincing our neighbor that her job was to ignore completely any slovenly mess, Mrs. B. had a talk with the two terrible teenagers and proved to them that the "habits they were forming then" might bind them for a lifetime. Well, surprisingly, they began to make the effort to exchange their current "regular fixed mode of action" for a better one.

And don't think I didn't help. I did. I confessed myself as the "bad" example—not of habitual Slobitis, but as "the ever-late Pat Boone," the-boy-who-couldn't-be-on-time-grown-into-the-man-who-hasn't-caught-up-with-himself-yet.

Oh, this hurts!

I developed the habit of being late in high school—by the simple process of starting off late. From there I seemed to get later and later until I simply couldn't seem to be on time.

My parents and teachers used to say, "It doesn't matter so much now when you're late for class—but later in business and family and social contacts it can create serious situations." I agreed. It made a lotta sense. The trouble was, I thought being late was a habit you could stop right now if you put your mind to it—so I've tried to put my mind to it for ten years. But I didn't start in time.

Out in Texas it was a catastrophe—it caught up with me earlier than any of us thought. Arlene Francis brought her Home show to Fort Worth—she wanted local talent, a trio to sing Western songs. Two fellows who had sung together formed a group and asked me to be the third man. It was not only a network TV show, but it was worth $75. To me—just my share! It sounded like Fort Knox! Shirley was expecting.

Well, the day of the show we were supposed to meet at 9 o'clock at Fort Worth. So I overslept. I woke up at 9 and started late—got there at 9:45—the show was at 11—they had had to get somebody else. I stood around the Western Hills Hotel with a sick look on my face, hoping somebody would need me for something or they'd make it a quartet. Nobody needed me and they were quite happy

Don't buy your next cleaner 'til you see these . . . at SINGER!

The New SINGER* "MAGIC CARPET"

Thorough but gentle on fine rugs and wall-to-wall carpet. Floating Brush adjusts instantly to rug nap. Dual fan suction. Extra-big bag increases suction, lasts longer.

Light, durable aluminum construction. Reaches w-a-y under low furniture, hangs flat in closet. Cleans a wide swath . . . cuts down strokes . . . lights the way.

The New SINGER* "ROLL-A-MAGIC"

This economy cleaner has power equal to many costing twice as much! Ideal for dusting furniture, blinds and shelves, it does a standout job on rugs, too. Coasts along behind you on ball-bearing casters to speed cleaning, reduce fatigue.

New design of the extra-capacity dust bag increases efficiency and makes it easier than ever to change. Durable hose. Comes complete with attachments.

The "GOLDEN GLIDE*" by SINGER

New, streamlined, extra-power design—more cleaning power than many other leading canisters! Glides over the floor without snagging or tipping . . . makes cleaning faster, less tiring. Stands on end for stair cleaning or compact storage.

Triple-capacity throw-away bag . . . convenient toe switch . . . durable hose. Comes complete with attachments including king size floor-wall brush.

Phone or visit your local SINGER SEWING CENTER for free home trial. Easy terms available. Prices start with the Full Power "Roll-A-Magic" at . . . $49.50

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

*A Trademark of THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

DESERT FLOWER

beauty bath transforms the driest skin to petal softness

Now beauty truly begins with your bath!

Toss just one capful of new Beauty Bath into your tub. See dry skin bloom under water to take on the texture of flowers. Chapped hands, chafed legs, embarrassing elbows are beauty-smooth after a Beauty Bath...and there's a joyful bonus: the pretty Desert Flower fragrance that lingers long after. 2.50 plus tax. Special introductory offer—12-bath size, 1.00 plus tax.

SHULTON

At leading cosmetic counters
©1960, Shulton, Inc

DESERT FLOWER BEAUTY BATH—PURE PLEASURE IF YOUR SKIN IS PERFECT, A NECESSITY IF YOUR SKIN IS DRY.

with the trio—so besides losing $75 I got all shook up, had to pay for the gas and had to tell Shirley. I'll never forget that morning.

Some wit remarked that "The easiest way to break a habit is to drop it." Well, I agree. But I'd like to add "drop it in time." If you're developing a personal habit that you don't like—or that you think may be costly to you later on—don't wait! Drop it—like right now!

That's the advice of a guy who got "hooked" on a tiresome personal habit—and is still trying to shake it. Because I can tell you from personal experience that habits are pretty easy to "drop" before you've got a good hold on 'em (or they've got a good hold on you).

It takes a lot of physical stamina to "learn to smoke"—ask anyone who first experimented with a cigar—and most of the people who finally mastered it wish they hadn't. (Ask any smoker if he'd do it again!) Most teenagers swear as an experiment—and if they don't put a lot of mental effort into it or hear it constantly, it fizzles out. With enough effort it can develop into a lifelong and revolting habit—so why try?

I tried my hand at smoking. I even tried smoking the long thin pods that hang on catalpa trees in the fall. Mamma caught me at this and marched me into the kitchen with a whole bunch of the "beans" and made me chain-smoke 'em till I was sick. They never tasted the same after that.

By the time I was in my late teens, I had learned that smoking (at least the inhaling type) is definitely unhealthful. I was on the school teams, wanted to be in the best of shape; and besides, I'd kinda like to stick around this old world as long as I can. I don't want to develop any habits that are likely to shave off even a week of my time!

Swearing just never appealed to me. When my buddies first started trying it, it just seemed so obvious that they were trying to appear older and braver than they were that it made me laugh. As it began to come more natural to 'em, to become part of their personalities, I think they slipped a little in my estimate of them as people—and as friends. It's not that I thought I was any better than they were; it's just that swearing, "cussing," and particularly taking God's name in vain, has always seemed a crude, unnecessary and embarrassing habit.

The very best way to eliminate bad habits and develop the kind you (and others) want to live with is to choose the ones you know are desirable and experiment with them. And avoid even a passing flirtation with the ones you don't want.

I guess everybody wants to be honest and truthful and doesn't want to lie, cheat, steal, and so on. And Thomas Jefferson had an excellent suggestion on this: "He who permits himself to tell a lie once finds it easier to do it a second and third time, till at length it becomes habitual; he lies without attending to it."

The real trick in habit-forming is to think before you act—remember:

Sow a Thought, and you reap an Act;
Sow an Act, and you reap a Habit;
Sow a Habit, and you reap a Character;
Sow a Character, and you reap a Destiny.

The Habit of a Merry Heart:

Now, I said I thought the great Dostoevski was "partially" right when he said man's later life "is made up of nothing but the habits he has accumulated during the first half."

The two words where I hold out on the great author are "nothing but." I don't think life can ever become nothing but an accumulation of "regular fixed modes of action" (making us first cousins to Univac); nor can we be "ruled by habits," good or bad—unless we sink into a real rut.

And who wants to rot in a rut—even a "good" ermine-lined one?

In the book of Proverbs, in the Bible, we read: "He that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast."

So far we've chatted about habits as "modes of thought and action." But I think the habit of a "merry heart" is a state of awareness. It can be an habitual mood. But it takes some personal developin'. Who wants to be the guy with a million habitual virtues who's still so disagreeable even his own shadow wo him company?

I've known a lot of folks who have t of the cheerful heart. And without e they've all mastered three great arts·

First, the art of appreciation.

It's pretty wonderful to carry the gratitude in your heart not only on giving Day but the other 364 days in as well. It oughta make your heart bub just to count your blessings and remem all the good things in your life aren there" or didn't "just happen."

Daily grace at the table has been a in reminding us of this as a family, the table is too big or we're too far a hold hands. All six of us. Then, with Boone chorus, we say, "Our hands w our heads we bow. For food and dri we thank Thee now." If we're too far a say, "Our hands we fold, our heads w Then, to keep us from getting into a ru the words are automatic and without the two older girls take turns say evening prayer. As soon as they're old we like to get away from just memorize A simple expression from the heart much better than a set prayer.

Our civilization owes more to Hebrew prophets than we can press. Spurred by the evils of th times, they exercised a freedom the expression of moral intuiti and fitted out the character Jehovah with the results of th thoughts. They constitute one the few groups of men who cisively altered history in any timate sense. Most spectacu upheavals merely replace one of individuals by another analog set; so that history is mostly barren change of names. But Hebrew prophets really produ a decisive qualitative change a what is still more rare, a chan for the better.

ALFRED NORTH WHITEH

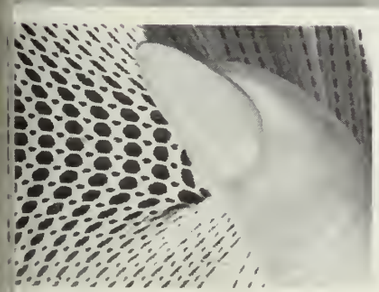
Now, side by side with gratitude cheerful heart is the need to share.

A friend of mine, George Unger private charity. George is a jeweler stocks Braille watches. He gives away thousand a year—many to societies blind. But he also has a lot of errar like me and Dean Martin, Jerry Lewis Belafonte—always on the lookout f people who don't have Braille wa usually have a couple around and you the habit of watching for people these to. And being the "eyes" on the for George's blind folk has helped m aware of the joy of sharing.

But the third and most importar that the merry heart must feed on, it s me, is prayer. Prayer can be a simpl of saying, "Thank you," or asking a for a friend, or just an awareness of you go through the day. The importa to remember is that God doesn't lurk in waiting for you just to drop by at bedt keep that merry heart going, you've g habitually aware of His presence. You habitually trust His will for you, and i ately carry your troubles and prob Him and drop them at His feet.

Our minds are turned at this time to the Pilgrim Fathers. They got the from this statement somebody mad them: "They knew they were Pilgrim they committed themselves to God solved to proceed." And because they still join in feasting and giving each year on Thanksgiving Day. shouldn't be a one-day deal with us—i with them!

To have the "continual feast" a "merry heart" we should resolve to what they did: habitually commit o to God—in prayer, in gratitude, in sh and become Pilgrim Sons of the Fathers.



New bra made for real live people...

'tomorrow'

fits each side individually...

changes with you every day!

regular cup contour cup elastic long-line from $2.50

Expands and Contracts to fit you perfectly all the time in airy, cool comfort.

Till now, all bras have been made to fit an unchanging, "ideal" figure. New 'Tomorrow' fits better than any bra you've ever worn, because it's uniquely designed to meet a woman's special needs! You see, your body has natural differences—so the usual bra may fit you properly on one side, yet be too tight or too loose on the other side. But 'Tomorrow' fits you perfectly on both sides. Panels of sturdy seamless elastic surround each soft cotton cup so it can adjust automatically—individually—to you! Your body changes each day, too, and 'Tomorrow' actually changes with you, to shape you beautifully each day. The airy elastic makes 'Tomorrow'™ the coolest, lightest-feeling bra you've ever worn. So hasten, darling, to your nicest store—Tomorrow.

Best-Selling 'Tomorrow' #2334. White (packaged, too!) or Black, $2.50. D cup, $3.50. 'Under-Grad'® teen version, #1234. $2.00. Slightly higher in Canada

New and Young from Warner's®

New! Warner Wash! Gives professional washing care to girdles, bras, lingerie, woolens. Prolongs their life, preserves their looks. It's Warner's gentle-formula cold water soap. Get Warner Wash where you buy your Warner's. $1.50 for 10 full ounces.

New Curity®

S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

MORE ABSORBENT
for maximum protection

STRETCHABILITY
renews itself with each washing

BETTER FIT
for all size babies

EASIER PINNING
overlaps easily—the stretch does it!

NO BINDING
expands with baby's tummy

LESS BULK
more comfortable, streamlined size

Curity washes softer, smoother in quality products like Ivory Snow, Ivory Flakes or Dash Detergent. Don't forget Curity dress-up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers
DRY FASTER
WASH EASIER ABSORB MORE
WEAR LONGER

THE KENDALL COMPANY
P.O. 11395—Dept. J110
Charlotte 9, North Carolina
Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper. Print clearly. Only one to a family.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Good in Continental United States and Hawaii.

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

ARE AMERICAN PARENTS OVER PERMISSIVE?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M. D.

"My aim is to help the parents who are wasting valuable pati[ence] and energy in excessive deference to their children's whims and m[ood] and minor misbehavior."

A woman I know who runs a children's clothes shop recently told me about a situation which comes up fairly often in her business. A mother will bring in a three- or four-year-old boy who needs new blue jeans. She looks at the style that is available and approves of it. Then she proceeds to ask her son, with some hesitancy, "Charlie, don't you think you need some new blue jeans?" If he chooses to say no, she has to set to work to persuade him that he really does. If and when he agrees that he needs them, she asks him, "Do you like these?" If he says he doesn't, she has to try to convince him that he does, or that he's got to accept them because this is the only kind there is. My friend the shopkeeper didn't think this was a sensible approach. It bothered her. She quickly explained that she was all in favor of letting a child have a choice when a real choice was appropriate—if, for instance, two styles or colors of shirts were available, both of which seemed attractive and practical to the mother. She also added that of course an older child, who desperately wants to dress just like his friends, should be given more choice. I agreed with her on all scores.

In the first place, a mother has enough to do carrying out all the essentials of child care and housekeeping without having to spend hours a day in unnecessary argument. Even if there were all the time in the world, it's bewildering to a small child to present him with a lot of choices which serve no useful purpose. Certainly it rubs him the wrong way to encourage him to make choices if half of them then have to be denied him. But I don't think that a mother who leaves many decisions to a small child is mainly doing so because she really believes that this is educational. On the surface it's an absent-minded habit she has fallen into. But behind the habit in many cases is a mother's vague fear that she may im[pose] her will on him too strongly. If questi[oned] she might say that she doesn't want to sq[uelch] his individuality or that she doesn't w[ant to] make him resent her authority. I think, [with] hesitancy in guiding children, this [and] deference to their wishes, as one asp[ect] what is commonly referred to as overp[ermi]siveness. It often goes along with the ten[dency] to let children be somewhat rude an[d] obedient to parents, or whiny, or contin[ually] quarrelsome with each other, or careless [of] property, or very noisy, excitable an[d] gressive in their play.

Overpermissiveness seems to be much [more] moner in America nowadays than in any [other] country. Of course no one claims that a[ll] children show these traits. One obs[erver] might put the figure at 10 per cent, anoth[er] 25 per cent, another still at 50 per cent. [It de]pends on where you want to draw the l[ine]. I regularly receive letters from sensible-s[ound]ing grandmothers who are distressed b[y the] rudeness and wildness of their grandchil[dren] and by the failure of the young paren[ts to] make any effort to exert control. I have t[alked] with dozens of professional people from [other] countries, who were visiting the United S[tates] for the first time, who have had trouble co[ncea]ling their surprise and irritation at the beh[avior] of certain children they have seen here.

I should quickly add that though all th[ese] itors I've talked with have seen at least [some] badly spoiled American boys and girls [the] more tolerant foreigners have been fre[quently] charmed by the middle range of our chil[dren]. They've admired their friendliness and t[heir] fulness toward adults, their spontanei[ty in] making interesting conversation. The vi[sitors] contrast this behavior favorably with the [more] subdued, less CONTINUED ON PAG

Will he grow to dislike his mother if she's strict about mealtime manners? That depends on how she disciplines him. But he will be miserable if she lets him go on churning up commotions in the household.

ABBOT MILLS

Busy hands stay beautiful with Jergens Lotion

Smooth on creamy Jergens Lotion after every job! Only Jergens gives you all his care: Stops detergent hands! You can actually feel dryness soothed into softness, as Jergens helps replace the natural oils and moisture that water and harsh detergents drain away. Protects! Absorbs in seconds . . . penetrates deep into the skin to combat red roughness. Beautifies! No other lotion is as lovely to use as Jergens. Rich beauty oils leave your hands lightly scented, soft, alluring.

Jergens beautifies your hands as nothing else can

"I always bring home the best with S&H Green Stamps"

says MRS. CHARLES H. MAY, San Bernardino, California

"I expect the best values for every dollar I spend . . . and every stamp I save. That's why I shop at fine stores like The Harris Company, where I earn S&H Green Stamps as a discount for paying cash. You see, S&H has taught me to expect the best of everything at my S&H Green Stamp Redemption Store . . . best selection of fine gifts . . . good brand names . . . best values, too."

S&H GREEN STAMPS

Good Housekeeping Guarantees Performance of America's Only Nationwide Stamp Plan

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Mrs. May is shown in her family room with her daughters Michelle and Renee. The same fine taste and friendly décor is found throughout Mrs. May's gracious home. Like so many other California women, Mrs. May knows she always brings home the best with S&H Green Stamps. Her husband, Dr. May, is a Doctor of Optometry.

☆ 27,000,000 ☆

smart, thrifty women earn the best with S&H Green Stamps

COPYRIGHT 1960—THE SPERRY AND HUTCHINSON CO.

Great Discovery Quickly Stops

PAIN OF BURNS

Contains miracle benzocaine—used by doctors. Puts pain nerves to sleep!

mazing Solarcaine lotion stops the pain in- antly. Contains "wonder drug" medication ot found in any ordinary ointment for kitchen urns. Flows on without rubbing; acts 4 ays to give relief.

Local anesthetic benzocaine, used by doc- rs, puts pain nerves to sleep . . . as refrig- ants cool inflamed skin, emollients soothe, nd antiseptics promote faster healing.

Get greaseless Solarcaine today. Wonderful r detergent hands, itching, all skin pain! Big ving on large size. A product of Plough, Inc.

My husband had a bad burn on his arm. I had m use Solarcaine and it soothed it right away." Mrs. John Rourke, New York, N. Y.

I had awful detergent hands . . . cracked and re. Only Solarcaine gave me relief." Harriette Brudner, Glen Oaks, N. Y.

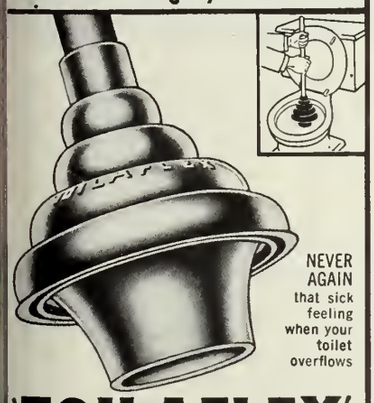
SOLARCAINE

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

mous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses C's. Learn at home or through classroom instruc- n. Lowest cost. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing ailable. 38th Year. Write for FREE booklet.

Speedwriting®

Dept. 9911
55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36



NO MUSS . . . NO FUSS!

KRYLON SPRAY PAINT

DRY IN MINUTES!

IF YOU PRIZE IT . . . KRYLON-IZE IT!

POWERFUL NEW PLUNGER CLEARS CLOGGED TOILETS in a jiffy!

NEVER AGAIN that sick feeling when your toilet overflows

'TOILAFLEX'

Toilet ALL-ANGLE Plunger

- DOUBLE-SIZE CUP, DOUBLE-PRESSURE
- DESIGNED TO FLEX AT ANY ANGLE
- CENTERS ITSELF, CAN'T SKID AROUND
- TAPERED TAIL GIVES AIR-TIGHT FIT

$2.65 fully guaranteed

AT MOST HARDWARE STORES

Higher in Canada

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 24

approachable manner of many children brought up conventionally in certain European countries, where adults are treated with a certain awe. "Proper" American upbringing in the nineteenth century, when children were to be seen but not heard, had some of this flavor.

I myself am all for a considerable degree of friendliness between the generations. It makes for the lack of stuffiness which I like in Americans. I suspect that it plays a part in the spontaneity with which they tackle any new situation.

The fact that friendliness toward adults does not necessarily lead to the slightest disrespect toward them was shown in the descriptions of Russian children which I quoted last month. The American observers made the particular point that almost all the Russian children they saw were noticeably friendly and trusting with adults and yet they were also remarkably well mannered toward them.

If you agree with me that permissiveness is carried too far by some parents, we should try to analyze where it comes from. During the Victorian period the tendency in America was toward traditionalism and strictness in many respects. Parents and teachers and employers were inclined to be authoritarian. Manners were proper. There were general prudishness and repression in regard to sex. It was widely believed that the child was a barbarian to start with and could be civilized only by continual pressure. When children turned out badly it was because they had not been disciplined enough or were just unappreciative. This philosophy encouraged those parents with stern personalities to bear down on their children. But I strongly suspect that a majority of parents of that time, the ones who were basically friendly and trusting, who had no harshness in their make-up, did not apply the Victorian severity very deeply in the care of their children, though they may have conformed to its style on the surface.

It is magnificent to grow old, if one keeps young.

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

Then in the twentieth century the reaction began to set in, gradually at first but with increasing momentum. Many different sociological factors were at work. Among them were the growing respect for science and its tendency, for a while, to lessen the authority of religion, the "emancipation" of women, the increasing acceptance of divorce, the spread of education, the acceleration of productivity and prosperity, the shift of the population from farms to cities and the tendency of young adults to move away from home towns and relatives for better jobs, the disillusioning effect of two world wars. Such changes as these tended to weaken traditions generally and to put people in a mood to accept new ideas. Young parents no longer were as much influenced by relatives, but made their own decisions about raising their children.

At the same time there came a flood of new concepts about child development, from researches in education, psychology, psychiatry and pediatrics: Children raised in loving families want to learn, want to conform, want to grow up. If the relationships are good they don't have to be forced to eat, forced to learn to use the toilet. Interest in sex to a limited degree is normal and wholesome. A certain amount of jealousy between brothers and sisters, a certain amount of resentment against parents are inevitable. Excessive hostility between children and parents may be harmful. Severe repression of hostility or sexuality may lead to neurosis or distortion of personality.

These ideas were startling and unsettling at first. But why did they unsettle some parents much more than others? There were a number of factors, but I think two were particularly important. The parents with a lot of inner security took these new pronouncements in their stride. In a sense they had known these things for the men in your life...

CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

Pendleton®

It's good to see them together, sharing their happiest hours—and sharing a good way of life. That's one reason we make Pendleton 100% virgin wool shirts in boys' sizes now—so sons can learn the real meaning of quality—enjoy, as their dads do, the luxury and comfort of fine wool, the value of careful craftsmanship in a 90-year Oregon tradition—and take pride in the good looks of Pendleton's rich colors and patterns. And you will also appreciate Pendleton's new plaid shirts, because they're now machine-washable. Why not choose matching Pendletons for father and son? All better stores have them.

Men's Sport Shirt 13.95
Matching Boys' Sport Shirt 12.95
Men's Slacks 23.95

At fine stores everywhere

For additional information write dept. F60, Pendleton Woolen Mills, Portland 1, Oregon 1961 Frigidaire somersault washing action bathes deep dirt out without beating!

No Blades, No Beating! No Lint Problem!

See the somersaulting Teddy Bear at your Frigidaire Dealer's. Watch how the Frigidaire Washer gently somersaults clothes under water while the patented 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator surges suds through the fabric 330 times a minute!

Watch clothes get cleaner, cleaner, cleaner! No wonder this Frigidaire Automatic Washer was rated Number 1 for all-around performance by U. S. Testing Co., Inc.*

Frigidaire saves wear and tear! You can wash even a fine cashmere sweater in this washer without worrying! No pulling, stretching or beating!

Floats away lint automatically! No messy lint traps! Frigidaire exclusive Lint-Away System automatically floats lint across water, out of the tub—down the drain forever.

In controlled laboratory tests, the Frigidaire Washer proved best of 6 leading automatic washers considering the following points: soil removal, lint removal, dryness of spin, automatic care of Wash and Wear fabrics, simplicity of use and flexibility, water used, washing time and current used. Report No. 66841, dated May 3, 1960.*

Only Frigidaire has the 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator—secret of Somersault Washing Action! Frigidaire patented the 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator. Its unique up-and-down movement gently somersaults each garment under water. At the same time, it surges the sudsy water through every inch of fabric 330 times a minute to bathe out deep dirt and grime—but never, never beats or pounds!

Custom Imperial WCI-61 Washer Custom Imperial DCIF-61 No-Vent Electric Dryer

1961 Frigidaire Washer dispenses detergents, dyes and conditioners automatically! Dispenses detergent and bleach—liquid or powder. Automatically dispenses dye, fabric softener, rinse conditioner. Rapidry Spin saves time, money. Special Wash-and-Wear settings. Fully automatic soak cycle.

1961 Frigidaire No-Vent Dryer—faster, safer than sunshine! No venting—no plumbing! See the sensational new Frigidaire Dryer with exclusive Moisture-Minder! No expensive venting to outdoors. Removes moisture automatically! Frigidaire "Flowing Heat" system is faster, safer than sunshine.

Frigidaire Factory-Trained Dealer Service Everywhere

FRIGIDAIRE
PRODUCT OF GENERAL MOTORS

ADVANCED APPLIANCES DESIGNED WITH YOU IN MIND

TINUED FROM PAGE 27

itively all along. They were not made un- or guilty by them. So they brought up children with the same old-fashioned bination of affection and firm leadership which they themselves had been brought But other parents, particularly those who been raised with more than average cross- or severity, had grown up with insufficient idence in themselves, a bit too much irri- lity in their make-up, a lingering resent- t against some of their own parents' atti- s. When they heard some of the new ries—that children's behavior problems often be traced to incorrect handling, that ssive parental severity may be harmful— worried in advance, consciously or un- ciously, that they might take out some of own cross feelings on their children and e them dislike them. So they leaned over ward to avoid antagonizing them.

f course the main trouble when parents oo hard to be tolerant and patient is that ren miss the guidance they need, and they sense the underlying impatience in their nts. So they are apt to provoke their par- with worse and worse behavior in order rce them to assume control—and to get air cleared.

here is a second factor I'd like to mention ch can also lead to overpermissiveness. I thinking of certain parents who them- es are unusually considerate of the feelings other people, yet have children who are wn in the neighborhood for their rudeness, andingness, minor destructiveness. These s in children are not too surprising when parents have similar attitudes. They are l to understand when the parents are e the opposite. What particularly irritates neighbors with such a family is that the te parent will sometimes be looking right is child with a proud, beaming expression ne very moment when he is being obnox- s, as if the parent didn't see the behavior ll. Such parents often quote theories about importance of self-expression and individ- ty, the unwholesome effects of repression. en such cases get completely out of hand are referred to a child-guidance clinic, it n turns out that the parents were so perly brought up that they never dared speak or even think aggressively. When come to have a child of their own they onsciously enjoy letting him express the oliteness, selfishness and aggressiveness ch they had to suppress so completely in nselves. This blinds them to the fact that behavior is offensive to others and dis- ing to the child. In fact, they manage to ress pride in their own progressiveness and ts good results.

've been talking as if all parents could be ded into a few neat types. Actually there many patterns and none of them is simple. ne parents, as you know (the ones without t or submissiveness), can be remarkably ntrolling without spoiling their children ll. Other parents (the ones without much shness or irritability) can be stricter than rage without cramping the style of their dren or making them resentful. None of as a parent follows one pattern. Each of has a mixture of feelings and attitudes ut discipline, and we react to one child in way, to another somewhat differently.

My fear in discussing overpermissiveness is t a few readers may get the idea that I'm ing, "Stop indulging your children; get gh with them," as if there were only the alternatives. Perhaps I can clarify the nt that neither is necessary by mentioning w situations in early childhood about which there has been a lot of controversy in this century, and at least three different attitudes.

Until the mid-1940's it was usually taught by doctors that, to avoid spoiling and indigestion, it was necessary to be absolutely rigid about the amounts and timing of a baby's feedings, even if this made him miserable. When this theory was discarded, some parents jumped to the conclusion that regularity itself was the bad thing (rather than the too hasty enforcement of regularity), and boasted of how long it took their babies to get on any kind of schedule. The sensible approach, I think, is to make allowances for the baby's unstable digestion the first few days or weeks of life and then to guide him toward a regularity which will be helpful to him and his parents.

Up until twenty years ago it was often recommended that a baby be trained to the toilet at an early age, with vigorous methods if necessary. When this was shown to be harmful in certain cases, some parents came to the anxious assumption that it was dangerous to make the slightest mention of the toilet or any move toward training, whatever the child's age, and that the only safe system was to wait indefinitely for the child to get the idea entirely by himself. (I think I helped to intimidate these parents by stressing too heavily the risks of severe training, in the earlier edition of my book.) Comfortable parents have almost always succeeded by tactfully watching for the child's readiness and by regularly encouraging him to be grown up in the use of the potty or toilet.

For many years parents were told exactly how many hours a baby of a certain age should sleep and were warned against picking him up during the hours assigned for rest, for fear of spoiling him. Then when the emphasis was placed on individual differences and the need for security, a few overconscientious mothers became fearful of letting their babies cry for a minute. Some of them eventually found themselves pacing the floor with thoroughly tyrannical infants until ten or eleven o'clock every night. Parents blessed with self-assurance realize that sleep needs and patterns vary somewhat in different children, but they generally have no difficulty setting sensible bedtimes and teaching their children to conform to them.

When parents are overbearing or irritable, they can make any chore seem unpleasant and unfair. On the other hand, those who are afraid of imposing on their children or of becoming disliked by them may ask no help from them at all, and this contributes to a selfish, demanding attitude. Mothers and fathers who have no inner doubts about their children's affection and who think of cooperativeness as an essential part of preparation for life don't hesitate to ask for appropriate assistance from their children. Yet they can do it, most of the time, in a manner which makes the children proud of their contribution.

My aim in discussing overpermissiveness is not to try to solve the serious problems of the parents who have a great deal of trouble exerting any kind of discipline. They need the help of a child-guidance clinic or family social agency in getting at the deeper causes and solution. My aim is only to be helpful to the larger number of parents who are not concerned about any particular difficulty but who nevertheless are wasting valuable patience and energy every day in an excessive deference to their children's whims and moods and minor misbehavior. It's no favor to a child to let him get tangled up in a succession of decisions that are not really his, or to let him go on nagging his mother or churning up commotions in the household.

I'm hoping to make it clear that a mild, unthinking overpermissiveness is a uniquely American phenomenon—an American style—of the twentieth century; and that it is partly due to the fact that many parents who are not completely self-assured have taken too guiltily the newer concepts of child development. I am hoping that if I can show them that this was a mistake—in more than one sense—they will be able to throw off their hesitancy, to the benefit of themselves as well as their children.

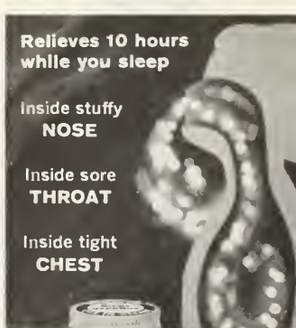
Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

NEVER GO TO BED WITH A COLD

...without Vicks VapoRub

Only the VapoRub way gives 10-hour "sleep-thru" relief in nose, throat, chest... works more than twice as long as aspirin or ordinary cold tablets

Don't wait for that cry in the night when baby has a cold. Give her all-night relief . . . not just four-hour relief with tablets.



Rub her chest, throat, neck, back with Vicks VapoRub at bedtime. Starts easing soreness and tightness instantly. For 10 full hours, penetrating vapor medications go straight inside stuffy head, inside sore throat, deep inside congested chest.

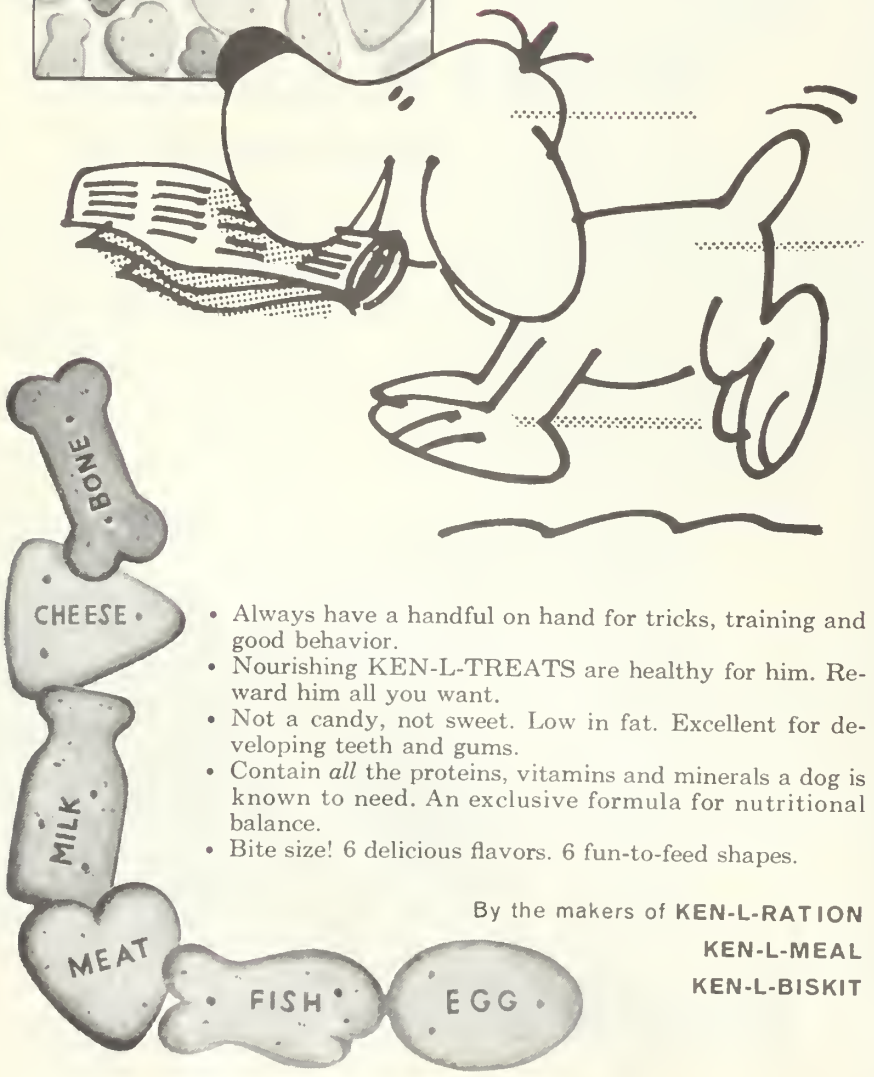
All night long, VapoRub helps break up congestion, makes breathing easier. Helps baby sleep the night through.

So never go to bed with a cold without Vicks VapoRub.

Medicates cold-congested nose, throat, chest all at once . . . all night long. VapoRub's deep penetrating vapor medications start relieving in 7 seconds, keep on relieving for 10 full hours. And there's no internal dosing . . . no stomach or emotional upsets.

Vicks VapoRub

VAPORIZING OINTMENT



World's most widely used colds medication... use as a rub, in steam, around the nose.

Training trouble?

Treats do the trick!

- Always have a handful on hand for tricks, training and good behavior.
- Nourishing KEN-L-TREATS are healthy for him. Reward him all you want.
- Not a candy, not sweet. Low in fat. Excellent for developing teeth and gums.
- Contain all the proteins, vitamins and minerals a dog is known to need. An exclusive formula for nutritional balance.
- Bite size! 6 delicious flavors. 6 fun-to-feed shapes.

By the makers of KEN-L-RATION
KEN-L-MEAL
KEN-L-BISKIT

There are many questions which wom would like to ask a trusted physician. B there is not always the opportunity. I this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doct Schauffler will discuss some of the proble which have been sent to him by reade The situations are all real, but all t names which are used are fictitio

TELL ME, DOCTOR

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M.D.

"Dr. Williams said Phyllis's troubles were all in her mind. But Phyllis doesn't complain unless something is wrong. Don't lots of girls have some pain with beginning menstruation?"

ABBOT M

"Your mother said over the phone that you have been having so rather bad pains and aches, Phyllis." The doctor had seated thirte year-old Phyllis Maxwell in the consultation chair, allowing her pleasa efficient-looking mother to find a seat across the room. Now the doc purposely spoke to the girl first.

"Yes, I have," Phyllis answered. "They seem to come at about e same time every month and last for maybe two or three days. They've been getting worse each time they come and this time they were especia bad. I can still feel them—it hurts right here." Phyllis's hand indicated r lower abdomen. "It makes me feel sort of sick."

Phyllis spoke with a friendly confidence that pleased the doctor. He d seen many early-teenage girls with complaints similar to Phyllis's. Of n they seemed to stand in the mother's shadow. If asked a question, t y would look timidly to mother to answer it. He preferred Phyllis's attitu

"How long has this been going on?"

"For several months. At the start it was just little crampy pains, d p down, rather like a bad stomach-ache. But the pain has been staying long It's sore there right now. It hurts when I cough."

The doctor said to Mrs. Maxwell, "You told me over the phone th Phyllis has not yet begun to menstruate. Has there been any staining or any discharge noticeable on her clothing?"

"No. Naturally, the first thing that occurred to me was that Phy might be getting ready for menstruation. Her breasts are definitely lar and are tender, especially around the time when she has the pains. he hair pattern of puberty appeared quite some time ago. However, th e hasn't been any sign at all of a flow. Her older sister, Marjorie, be n menstruating when she was twelve."

"And how about you, Mrs. Maxwell?"

"I started earlier still. I hadn't even had my twelfth birthday. I ne had any particular trouble with it; neither did Marjorie. Why do you a Doctor?"

"There seems to be a slight hereditary element in these things. To sometimes a mother's mistaken ideas about menstruation, passed alon to a daughter, make it more distressing for the girl than it needs to be.

"However, I don't believe that is the case here. The fact that you d your older daughter, Mrs. Maxwell, had already been menstruating some time when you were Phyllis's age, with no difficulties, would indi e that there is a different condition in her case. Also, Phyllis strikes me a sensible girl, who can distinguish between reality and imaginings. nd may I say I believe she has a sensible mother? You have no idea how hp ful it is to be able to get information about a young girl's troubles from he girl herself. That is one reason why I feel we must find out what is cau g Phyllis's pains."

Mother and daughter exchanged glances, then Phyllis said spiritedly. "That isn't the way Dr. Williams talked—he's our family doctor. He didn't ask us any questions at all. He just said pains with beginning m struation were all in a girl's mind.

CONTINUED ON PAG

PROVE IT YOUR NEXT WASH!

TODAY'S CLOROX®

gets out dirt that suds leave in!

EE WHAT HAPPENS...

almost every wash there's a id of dirt neither detergent nor ht duty dry bleach gets out...

To remove such gray-causing dirt, you need the special cleaning power of CLOROX bleach!

Suds, plus Clorox, give you the cleanest washes you can get... every time!

NO DRIP LIP

NOW IN THE PITCHER-HANDLE BOTTLE!

©1960, The Clorox Company

HARVEY and the Circulation of Blood—reproduced here is one of a series of original oil paintings commissioned by Parke-Davis.

Great Moments in Medicine

The English physician William Harvey scientifically demonstrated his revolutionary theory of blood circulation to students at the College of Physicians of London. Published in book form in 1628, Harvey's theories and proofs upset the traditional followers of Galen and brought new concepts of circulation and anatomy to medicine.

Modern medicine is a living science. What was accepted yesterday will be discarded today if scientific research reveals a better medicine or a better way. Today, your physician gives you the best possible treatment and care, as indicated by the most recent developments in the great many fields o knowledge related to the health professions.

At Parke-Davis, research scientists are continually seeking to improv upon yesterday's discoveries. The resultant new medicines and method of treatment will better enable medical men to combat disease and th destructive processes of aging. This is one of the ways Parke-Davi contributes to the longer life and better health that come with bette medicines.

COPYRIGHT 1958-1960—PARKE, DAVIS & COMPANY, DETROIT 32, MICHIGA

PARKE-DAVIS . . . Pioneers in better medicines

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY
MARGARET HICKEY

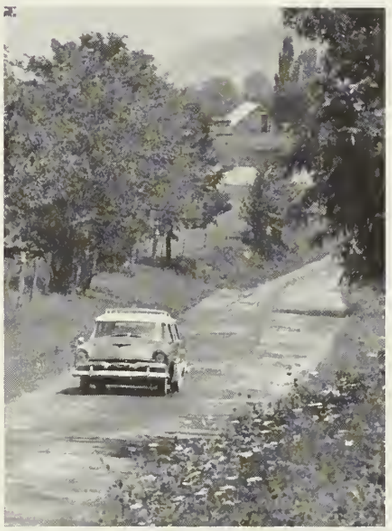
"THEY'RE SOMETHING TO READ . . ."

By JOHN WHITE, age 11

When I first heard about book fairs, I didn't know there was such a thing. I like books—they're something to read. But I never think of going to a bookstore to buy books. A bookstore is out of the way. I don't really buy many books, anyway. If there's a book fair around, that's about the only time I do buy books. Book fairs should last longer. At my school they usually last about two days, but you have to come at special times. There are always more books in the library, but you don't buy books at a library.

Usually the book I'm reading is the book I like. I am reading Gulliver's Travels. I can't remember all the books I've read. I usually read a book and like it, then I get another book I read and like—sometimes I don't like it. I don't really keep the authors in mind except famous authors—Mark Twain, for instance. I like Tom Sawyer. I don't know many famous authors. I just read books—I don't know if the authors are famous or not.

I don't think the world would be very good if it didn't have any books. If there were no books, you would really need a lot of teachers—and they don't like to teach so much, if you ask me.



Many thousands of children's book fairs will be held during National Children's Book Week beginning November 13. Some will be held in public buildings such as the Museum of Natural History in Chicago and the U.S. Department of Commerce auditorium in Washington, D.C. But the great majority of children's fairs are sponsored by local Parent-Teacher organizations, in co-operation with school and public libraries and bookshops in the community, and are held in lobbies, gymnasiums or other large rooms in public-school buildings. Books may be purchased at the fairs, but the principal objective of a P.T.A. book fair is to stimulate interest in reading. Raising funds is of secondary importance.

To many parents, guiding their children to good books is no less important than guiding them in the choice of friends. Bad comics and even pornography on the newsstands threaten the good reading habits of many of today's children, and it is little wonder that some parents are at a loss to know what books to select. Those living in localities where there is no public-library service may find most helpful a Children's Book Council folder, "Aids to Choosing Books for Your Children." The address: The Children's Book Council, Inc., 175 Fifth Avenue, New York 10, N.Y. The price of each folder is five cents.—Ed.

Library volunteers Margaret Allen and Ruth Baker, with librarian Joyce Williams (center), prepare for bookmobile run.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WERNER WOLFF

Volunteer service, including regular bookmobile tours, gives county 100% library coverage.

"My, how they read in Rockoak!" Space in grocery/post office is furnished by owner, Mrs. A. C. Poland (r).

LIBRARY ON A SHOESTRING

. . . IN HARDY COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA

"A love of books, a love of people, and a profound wish to bring them together." That's a nutshell description of the volunteer spirit that sparks operation of the Hardy County Public Library in Moorefield, West Virginia.

Last year unpaid workers circulated more than 15,000 books among the county's 9271 residents, served three branch libraries, and operated a bookmobile which brought monthly supplies of books to six county schools and eight deposit stations. They did it all on a total budget of under $2000—"less than the price of a new car."

With no access to Federal or state funds, 585-square-mile Hardy County has 100-per-cent library coverage—an achievement made even more impressive by contrast with the situation in a neighboring county, one of the nine West Virginia counties that have no library service for their residents.

How do they do it? Mrs. C. B. Allen, who worked as librarian for years, smiles. "For money," she tells you, "we substitute all the free help we can get, community good will, ingenuity, publicity and determination. Our bootstrap bookmobile service is a good example."

Mrs. Edward Baker has handled the bookmobile operation for five years. Monday afternoon she and Margaret Allen select books for each deposit station and load them in the bookmobile—a thirdhand station wagon. Early Tuesday morning they set out, up over Branch Mountain to little white Asbury Church, high on the wind-swept ridge. They gather up last month's books from the back pew, leave a new supply. Then down the steep curving ridge road from whose edge the mountain drops sheer to the gorge below. They covered that in winter when snowdrifts were the all-new PHILCO HI-SPEED DUOMATIC Bendix combination washer-dryer!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

Announcing a fabulous new laundry machine tha completely frees you from washday drudgery...

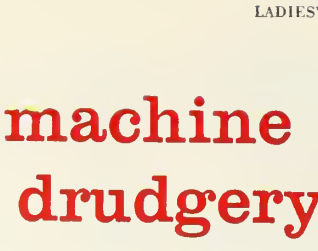
Washes better than a washer . . . outfeatures any dryer . . . outperforms every other combination!

Completes average family wash loads in just 58 minutes . . . can be used as a washer alone, as a dryer alone or as a combination!



Before you spend a dollar on any washer or dryer, see the amazing "shag-rug" demonstration at your Philco dealer!

You just load the Duomatic . . . set it . . . and walk away from washday. Your Duomatic washes and dries in one continuous operation. No more watching, waiting to transfer heavy, soggy wet wash to the clothesline or dryer. The time you spend on washday becomes minutes, the time saved hours!

Washes better than a washer. The Duomatic handles every fabric, any load. There are two wash cycles, three rinses . . . even an exclusive automatic soak cycle that's a must for diapers. The Dispenser Center holds bleach and fabric softener, injects the right amount at the right time automatically. And only the Duomatic brings you true high-speed (560 rpm.) spin drying.

Outfeatures any dryer. Fully automatic drying, no guessing about time, no checking for dryness, and no more sprinkling either. Exclusive Moisture Measure lets you "dial the dryness" — damp-dry, fold-dry . . . any dryness you want. Drying is safe for all fabrics and the fastest ever!

Outperforms any pair, any other combination. Washes and dries the average family load (two sheets included!!) in just 58 minutes! See a demonstration soon!

Fits anywhere a washer will. Only 26¾" wide! Own a Duomatic for less than the cost of many washers alone!

PHILCO

Famous for Quality the World Over

GAS MODEL CG-716. ALSO AVAILABLE IN HI-SPEED ELECTRIC MODELS

THE CANCER NOBODY TALKS ABOUT

LADYS DENNY SHULTZ

As some cancer death rates drop, those for rectal and colonic cancer e . . simply because "no one wants to talk about it," simply because the d ary person doesn't know its symptoms, doesn't seek examination for —d by the time he must acknowledge his suffering, the chance to e a cure has slipped by.

t uses more deaths in the United States today than any other cancer, attacking both s es in almost equal numbers. In 1958, the latest year for which mortality figures are n le, it claimed 37,767 victims; nearly 6000 more than highly publicized lung can- . 1960, its death toll in this country will probably have been in the neighborhood 3 000. In 1961, it is estimated that around 34,000 women and 35,000 men will ju e it. Of the 69,000 men and women in whom it may be expected to appear during e ar, around 20,000 will be saved—because the cancer will be detected early. The re 49,000 presumably will die in the way countless thousands have died before them.

Yet cancer of the colon and rectum to date has had little said about it, as a sep- te ancer entity. The public has not been fully alerted to its danger signals, as it has en those of the other important cancers. Few doctors employ all the techniques for co ering it in early stages, even in a "thorough" physical examination.

It made its first big headlines when it forced a great statesman to lay aside his k nd undergo one operation, then another. For a time the entire Western world n pon word from the late Secretary of State Dulles's hospital room. Yet the disease m hich he suffered escaped entirely the exhaustive discussion and elucidation in e ss that followed President Eisenhower's coronary and ileitis attacks.

Investigation by the Ladies' Home Journal following Secretary Dulles's second ne attack revealed that sigmoidoscopy—the technique best calculated to detect ac of the colon and rectum in early stages—was still not a part of the routine ex- in ions our Government furnishes free to members of Congress, as part of its pg n for guarding the health and fitness of these important public servants. At ne writing there was not even a comparable program for Cabinet members and ne important Government officials. To date, sigmoidoscopy has not been a part of e ysical examination which the American Medical Association offers its doctor en rs at its annual meeting.

How has it happened that, in this highly cancer-conscious era, cancer of the lo nd rectum has been slighted in the vigorous campaigns waged to catch cancers in ne ody sites in time for cure? It leads the list of cancer death dealers, in fact, largely ca e the campaigns against other cancers have been so effective. Each year, for in- an the death rate from cancer of the female reproductive organs drops below what it d en the year before. Informed and alerted, more women have been going to their rt s at the first signs of these cancers; and for routine examinations designed to fer- t o cancer in the reproductive organs before there are symptoms.

But there has been hesitancy about speaking of cancer of the colon and rectum. os ly persons don't even want to think about it. By the time cancer in this site has lle tself forcibly to the attention of its victims, in the great majority of cases the op- rt ity to effect a cure has slipped by.

In past decades, there was some excuse to shrink from the very thought of cancer th olon and rectum, to talk about it only in whispers if it appeared in one's own cir- e, in one's self.

Until not a great many years ago, a malignancy in this area was almost invariably tal ancer of the colon can be one of the most secret of all the "invisible" cancers— os idden deeply within the body. It is one of the few cancers that can proceed the far before it produces symptoms. It can be harbored for a considerable period be- ne ere is any outward indication of its presence. Hence in previous decades cancer gh in the colon was seldom discovered until it had become inoperable..

Cancer of the rectum, on the other hand, is not hard to find, if it is searched r t its early symptoms are not alarming; and they are of a nature one doesn't dis ily discuss. Moreover, the early attempts of surgeons to deal with it were far om eassuring. The mortality rate in the first CONTINUED ON PAGE 149

To Spare your scalp and Save your hair

Jewelite
HAIR BRUSHES bring you
NEW ROUND-END
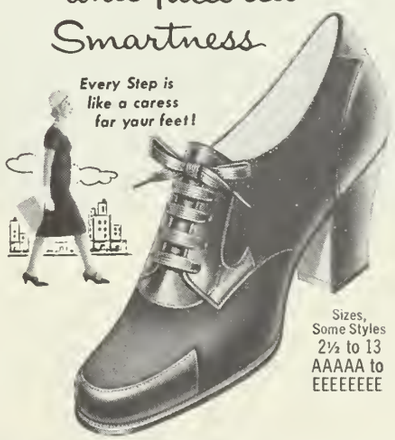
NYLON BRISTLES!

Everybody likes the "spring" and durability of nylon in a hair brush. But jagged-end nylon bristles may tear out hair . . . actually lead to baldness! Play safe—get a Jewelite Hair Brush. The tip of every Jewelite nylon bristle is rounded to massage your scalp gently—brush hair without harshness! Jewelite Brushes, Combs and Dresser Sets come in many styles. $2.50 to $10.00. PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH COMPANY, Florence, Mass., makers of famous Pro Tooth Brushes and Combs.



ROUGH, JAGGED NYLON like this can actually tear out and wear out hair!

ROUND-END JEWELITE NYLON bristles massage scalp gently as they groom your hair.

Dr Scholl's SHOES

Masterpieces of Foot Ease and Tailored Smartness

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, smartly styled Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet—devoid of any "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for new catalog to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. 1355, Chicago 10, Ill.

ON A LAXATIVE MERRY-GO-ROUND?

TAKE NR TO-NIGHT...TOMORROW ALRIGHT! SPARKLING BRIGHT!

Searching for effective overnight relief? Try NR tonight! You'll know why millions use it with utmost confidence. NR works overnight . . . and gently aids the function of elimination, with NO restlessness or sudden necessity. NR is an all-vegetable laxative that gives easy relief.

NR REGULAR
CANDY COATED or NR JUNIORS helps you feel better ...and look better!
Nature's Remedy NR-TABLETS-NR
ALL VEGETABLE LAXATIVE

microlite HALF & FULL SOLES
At all fine shoe repairers

© 1960, MAX FAC

SHEER GENIUS...the incredible new make-up that softens the natural look with a finish more delicate than powder

Whoever thought make-up could be like this... flawless yet so sheer that all you can see is the beautiful difference it makes! Created by Max Factor, Sheer Genius soft-lights your face like the morning sun... then soft-finishes with a magic mist. And it feels so good to be beautiful in Sheer Genius. Your skin feels fresh, young, floating on air. Sheer Genius, sheerest of them all, is a complete make-up in liquid form. Totally new, totally different, it comes in a tube. So easy to use. Eight complexion-balanced shades. It's Sheer Genius... all you can see is the beautiful difference! $1.50

SHEER GENIUS... All you can see is the beautiful difference

MAX FACTOR

Many marriages fail because each partner has a different idea of the role the other should play. If a girl looks back on her childhood with pleasure, and regards her father as an ideal, she unconsciously expects her husband to behave as her father did. "That's what a good husband is like!" she thinks. But her husband was brought up in a very different home, to play a very different role. On the other hand, he has a picture of the ideal wife, his dream girl, and attempts to fit his bride into that picture. If she does not fit (and of course she can't—she wasn't born that way), he thinks, "This is not the girl I married. She has changed!" This process of disillusion is a very important contributor to marital unhappiness in the innumerable homes that are founded on the romantic illusion. Fay and Ira built their marriage on that treacherous foundation. One of the difficulties in such a case is that the persons themselves find it so hard to recognize and accept the facts. They need the help of a disinterested counselor, as given in this case at the American Institute of Family Relations by Keith N. Rholl.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D., President

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "When Ira comes home, he marches straight past me into the bedroom to change his clothes, doesn't even say hello unless I say hello first."

HE: "Fay is a chatterbox. Every afternoon she drowns me in torrents of conversation. She talks, talks, talks at me."

DON ORNITZ

"When I go to bed after an evening of study, she pretends to be asleep. Many nights I've walked the floor hoping she would say something sweet to me, wishing that she would open her eyes and give me a welcoming smile."

Fay tells her side: "Last night Ira asked for a divorce," said pretty twenty-one-year-old Fay in a rueful and bewildered voice. "It was an average evening with us—no outbursts, no quarrel, no particular unpleasantness. I was getting ready for bed and Ira was settled with his books—he carries part-time college courses—when suddenly he gave me a peculiar, examining look.

"He then got up and kissed me lifelessly on the cheek. I was wearing my prettiest nightgown, but he seemed bored and indifferent. I wondered why on earth he bothered to get out of his chair. So I pulled away and asked if he felt sorry for me. Did he think he was doing me a favor? Without hesitation he answered, 'Yes.' He then said he didn't love me, that we had never loved each other, that we should face the facts and separate.

"Not long ago on an equally average evening Ira said he loved me very much, that our marriage was the best thing that ever happened to him. However, last night wasn't the first time in our fourteen months together that he has talked divorce. Last December he left me for two weeks—to this day I don't understand why—but on Christmas he called and begged to come back and I let him. I still love Ira, or I guess I do. But his changeableness shakes me. I don't want to live with a man who kisses me from a sense of obligation or out of pity. It's too hard on my self-respect.

"My parents, who have been awfully good to us, are puzzled and annoyed with Ira. His mother is also annoyed. Very much so. This morning she telephoned me at my office and blessed out Ira for half an hour. I didn't particularly welcome my mother-in-law as an ally, but I couldn't very well hang up on her. She denounced Ira for everything under the sun, including the way he whips into and out of jobs. She said he was as unreliable as his father.

"Ira has baffled me since we first met in the college coffeeshop nearly three years ago. I was trying to light a cigarette—my lighter was out of fuel—and Ira and a classmate were at the next table. Classmate Ed leaned over with a match and introduced himself and we kidded back and forth. I hardly noticed Ira, who sat silent; in fact, I made a date with Ed for Saturday night.

"On Saturday Ed called for me at home—I wasn't living on campus—and, to my surprise, Ira walked up the steps right behind him. Ira spent the evening with us. The same thing happened the following week. Ed took me to the movies and Ira went too. For six weeks every time Ed and I had a date Ira showed up and tagged along. I couldn't understand the communal evenings; it seemed kooky to me. Finally I told Ed not to call any more.

"Next day Ira made his first independent visit to our house and explained the mystery. Ed, it developed, was a well-known campus wolf, a married man who had no business dating single girls. Ira had been protecting me at great inconvenience to himself. He had spent hours watching our house from across the street; this made him Johnny-on-the-spot whenever Ed appeared. Ira told me he had fallen in love with me at first sight, but had been too shy to say so.

"I thought the whole thing was awfully romantic. My parents thought Ira could have shown more common sense, but they both liked him. I guess my mother liked him less than my father. She had secret hopes I would marry one of the young executives in my grandfather's wholesale-grocery business, but I'm an only child and have always been encouraged to be independent and to choose my own friends. There were no real objections when Ira and I announced our engagement.

"I do recall that mother was worried about his moodiness even then. His mother, who is quite a talker and likes to discuss and analyze her children's temperaments, probably stirred her up.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 39

"I take Bayer for HEADACHE!"

"I take Bayer for the pains and fever of a COLD!"

"I take Bayer for BACKACHE!"

BAYER®

BRINGS FASTEST RELIEF!

...the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get from pain, thanks to INSTANT FLAKING ACTION

Men who know medicine recommend Aspirin! In medical journals, in newspaper articles, and in personal interviews, doctors and public health officials repeatedly recommend aspirin as the one thing for headaches, muscular aches and pains, fever of a cold. So, buy the best aspirin — buy Bayer Aspirin.

DOCTORS who looked inside a living person's stomach saw that Bayer tablets are not whole when they enter the stomach but disintegrate on the way and enter in a shower of soft, tiny flakes ready to go to work instantly for the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get.

THE ARKIN GIRLS

ARE PROUD TO PRESENT

GIVENCHY

BOUTIQUE FASHIONS

A collection from Givenchy made in America by Leonard Arkin. See these designs in the following fine American stores. 75.00 to 125.00.

Atlanta, Ga. .....Leon Frohsin
Baltimore, Md. .....Hutzler Brothers
Boston, Mass. .....W. Filene's Sons Co.
Buffalo, N. Y. .....L. L. Berger, Inc.
Chattanooga, Tenn. .....Miller Bros. Co.
Chicago, Ill. .....Bramson's
Cleveland, Ohio .....The Halle Bros. Co.
Dallas, Texas .....Neiman-Marcus
Dayton, Ohio .....Rike-Kumler Co.
Detroit, Mich. .....Himelhoch Bros. & Co.
Evanston, Ill. .....Ruth McCulloch
Indianapolis, Ind. .....L. S. Ayres & Co.
Kansas City, Mo. .....Harzfeld's
Los Angeles, Cal. .....J. W. Robinson Co.
New Orleans, La. .....Maison Blanche Co.
New York, N. Y. .....B. Altman & Co.
Omaha, Neb. .....J. L. Brandeis & Sons
Philadelphia, Pa. .....The Blum Store
Pittsburgh, Pa. .....Kaufmann's
Portland, Ore. .....Meier & Frank Company
Richmond, Va. .....Miller & Rhoads
Rochester, N. Y. .....B. Forman Co.
St. Louis, Mo. .....Stix, Baer & Fuller Co.
Salt Lake City, Utah .....Makoff
San Antonio, Texas .....Frost Bros.
San Francisco, Cal. ....Joseph Magnin Co. (all stores)
Washington, D. C. ....Woodward & Lothrop
Wheeling, W. Va. .....Stone & Thomas

For further information and other fashion store names, write to LEONARD ARKIN 530 Seventh Avenue, New York.

Wanted: You!

IF YOU want extra money and have spare time to put to use, this is for you! You can spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earning generous commissions.

Just send us your name and address on a postal card. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss. Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Write that card today. Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Stops Bad Breath INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offend

No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-clock freedom from odors of strong food, alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., take wonder-working, pleasant-tasting "ENNDS" Tablets containing the miracle extract, Daratol.

"ENNDS" act internally where sprays, mouthwashes, toothpastes simply can't reach. Can't upset the stomach. Trial size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

"There are many times when it is practically impossible to tell what Ira is thinking or what he might do. Yet seemingly he expects me to read his mind. One night he intended to study for an exam, which he hadn't mentioned, and I suggested a movie I was anxious to see. Instead of explaining, he took me to the movie; then for days he burned inside and hardly spoke while I wondered what on earth was wrong. Another time, shortly after we became engaged, he got furious because I didn't urge him to quit a part-time job that was unusually well paid, a job all the other students envied. I pointed out we needed the money if we were to buy our furniture and our silver—I had already picked my pattern—and he flared up and said I was insensitive and materialistic and cared nothing for him. With that, he banged out of the house. It was three days before we saw each other again.

"My parents thought we should postpone our marriage until Ira was graduated—his mother agreed with them—and I suppose Ira wouldn't have minded waiting. But nearly all my girl friends were married and I saw no point in such a long delay. We were married in June at the end of his sophomore year. My parents splurged on a big wedding, six bridesmaids, a reception for 100, and gave us a check for our honeymoon. Grandfather gave us $500 to put on the down payment for a house. It seemed Ira and I had everything a couple could possibly desire.

The more one judges, the less one loves.
BALZAC

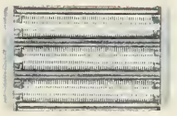
"Our honeymoon was fine, or so I believed. I wasn't afraid of the sex part, and Ira was sweet and gentle. He treated me like a princess. But then on the last day, as I was packing our bags, he dropped a remark that made me think he thought I thought he wasn't a good lover. I thought the exact opposite, as I tried to make clear. But he kept on saying he knew he hadn't satisfied me or my reaction would have been more warm and feminine.

"After our marriage Ira shifted to a part-time college course—he is a math major—in order to work full time. He signed up for summer school and found a job as a statistician, a good job with a future. I dropped college—I don't consider myself a brain—and went to work to help with our installment payments. Between us, we were making nearly $700 a month. Naturally, I assumed we would buy a house right away. We did buy our furniture. I selected Swedish modern, the style he seemed to prefer. We didn't buy our house. Without saying very much, Ira got across the idea that we should reserve my grandfather's gift for an emergency.

"It seems almost illegal to me to be married and pay rent. Mother went into her own home as a bride, and so did my grandmother. For Ira's sake I swallowed my disappointment and we moved into an apartment. We started a regular savings program to buy our house, with each of us depositing a set sum every Saturday. After three Saturdays Ira quit his job and though he soon located another he didn't resume the deposits. I doubled the amount I was putting in the bank. I tried everything to build up his interest in homeownership. I got mother to talk to him. Grandfather dropped a few strong hints. His mother spoke to him.

"Every Sunday for weeks, as we drove to my folks for dinner, we went house hunting. We were shown many bargains, but we saw nothing at any price that appealed to Ira. He wasn't satisfied with our apartment either. He complained it was too cramped and that our beautiful new furniture was too bulky. He said he had no decent place to study.

"The next thing I knew he quit summer school. My people were appalled and his



Elégance Lady Sunbeam ELECTRIC SHAVER

The gentlest, yet the fastest way to be sure of immaculate underarm and leg grooming...

SEE THE Queen Size DIFFERENCE

Sunbeam

Larger shaving area gives faster, gentle grooming.

ORDINARY

Average shaving area ordinary shaver

Small—takes extra time and attention.

...the easiest, quickest way to silken-smooth legs!

This wonderful new Elegance has a Queen Size shaving area—almost twice the size of other lady shavers—to give you the fastest and closest in feminine grooming. And Elegance is so gentle. Special "Guardian Rollers" protect legs and tender underarm areas. No nicks or cuts—ever! In Parisienne Pink and Brittany Blue. Model LSM, $21.50*

Sunbeam THE BEST ELECTRIC APPLIANCES MADE

SUNBEAM CORPORATION, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Ill.
Canada: Toronto 18

*Recommended Retail Price

©S.C. ®SUNBEAM, LADY SUNBEAM

JUST ONE WORD FROM YOU

CAN SPELL FREEDOM FOR HER

The word is —Tampax! Tampax® internal sanitary protection. Read what girls just like you have said about recommending it to a friend:

"Of course I'd tell a friend about Tampax – just as I'd tell a savage that electric light is better than an oil lamp."

"I tell my friends that using Tampax is like moving from the horse and buggy age to the automotive age."

"I'm just rabid on the subject. I can't stand to have a friend of mine in that cumbersome belt-pin-pad harness."

Do users think Tampax is a step ahead? They most certainly do! A step ahead in freedom, in comfort, in convenience! Tampax can't be seen or felt, once in place. Tampax prevents odor. Tampax is easy to insert with satin-smooth applicator, easy to dispose of, convenient to carry. And Tampax meets the needs of every girl with 3 absorbency sizes: Regular, Super, Junior, available wherever such products are sold. Look for Tampax Vendor in restrooms throughout the United States. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Massachusetts.

Invented by a doctor—now used by millions of women mother was beside herself. She had me on the office phone until my boss complained. In a competitive field like statistics, if Ira is to get ahead, a degree in math is darn near a must. Yet he declared he didn't feel he was accomplishing anything by staying in college. In September, after all of us talked ourselves hoarse, he enrolled again, but at that point announced he would major in philosophy. Luckily his college counselor convinced him to stick to math, but by then everybody in both families was limp from the suspense.

"By then, too, I'd had a liberal education in Ira's moods. His spirits go up and down like an elevator, with emphasis on the down. Even when Ira is normal he isn't madly gay. At the rare parties we attend he lurks in the darkest corner. He refuses to dance with me, although dancing is one of my very few talents. When I was seventeen I halfway expected to take up professional dancing, but then I developed a dreadful case of acne, and had to give up the idea.

"Occasionally I can persuade Ira to double-date with another couple, but no matter how I beg he won't take me to a restaurant meal or to a drive-in with just the two of us. Ira used to be crazy about my folks. But now he balks at even Sunday dinner with them. I must say he doesn't play favorites. I can hardly drag him to see his own mother.

"In the afternoons, when he comes home from work, I'm already back from my job and happy to see him. I am bubbling with news of my day and eager to hear his news. Ira marches straight past me to the bedroom; he doesn't even say hello unless I say hello first. I have to be quick in following or he shuts the door on me. In the bedroom he gets out of the clothes he's worn at work, brushes and hangs them up. Next he takes a shower and shaves. When I speak to him, he just grunts. After he puts on the old clothes he wears in the apartment he potters around picking out his shirt, necktie, underwear, socks for next day, and laying them in their special places.

"He won't allow me to touch his bureau drawers or put away his laundry. He is fantastically tidy, which is hard to understand since he wasn't raised that way. My mother-in-law held a job while she brought up four boys and is quite a sloppy housekeeper.

"Every two or three months—the last time was in October—one of Ira's depressions hits him. Until it lifts the poor guy is in agony, though he won't admit it. I always go to bed before he tackles his books—my job is hard and I need lots of sleep—but one time last summer during a particularly bad siege of his I suddenly woke in the middle of the night. Ira lay slumped across the bottom of the bed, his head buried in his arms, and I am quite sure he was crying. That's what woke me. I wanted to get up and put my arms around him, but I was afraid to take a chance on offending his pride. I did ask if I could help him and asked him what was wrong. He said, 'Nothing.' The chill and curtness of his voice taught me my lesson. Ever since that night if I hear Ira pacing around our bedroom or see him huddled on the bed outside the blankets, I keep my mouth shut and pretend I'm asleep.

"In his depressions Ira is beyond my reach, beyond my help. He becomes dissatisfied with himself, with his job of the moment, with his future prospects, with his good sharp brain. He becomes dissatisfied with me: with the way I laugh, the way I talk, with our sexual relationship—particularly the last. Instead of growing better, as it is supposed to do, our relationship has grown worse.

"For some reason Ira has decided I don't respond to him as a truly loving wife should respond. He is disappointed because as yet I haven't experienced the climax that some women experience. The fact that I am perfectly content is of no comfort to him. Sometimes he blames himself; other times he blames me. I've worried so much about it all that I've become unsure and self-conscious and even less responsive than I was in the beginning.

"I have pride myself. I used to be affectionate by nature. Days pass when Ira and I live as platonically as brother and sister, and I no longer care. Our unsatisfactory sex life may be our most important problem, as Ira believes. But I try not to think about it. At this stage, I am more disturbed by his depressions than by anything else. His depressions terrify me and everybody in my family—for a good reason. Ira's mother has told us all about his father. He was a brilliant advertising man, but after a series of nervous breakdowns he lost his mind and died in a sanitarium some years ago.

"My people are terribly concerned about my future. They say it might be wise for Ira and me to break up now before things get more involved and children come along. Maybe they are right. But even though Ira has asked for a divorce and I may find him gone when I return to our apartment, I'd hate to leave him in the lurch. I think he needs me. I know I'll never meet another man for whom I care as much."

IRA TELLS HIS SIDE:

"Fay never should have married me," said twenty-two-year-old Ira unhappily. "She would make some man a fine wife. She is beautiful, she is intelligent, she is a good cook and an adequate housekeeper by ordinary standards. I'm to blame for nearly all our troubles.

"Fay will be less hurt in the long run, as I'm sure her family will agree, if we take the plunge and get a divorce now. She is bound to forget me quickly. I'm rotten husband material. Fay likes gaiety, parties. I don't. It's a real ordeal for me to dance with her. She is expert, but she doesn't follow well; being pushed around a dance floor by a dame isn't my idea of fun.

"If we double-date with another couple, she and the other girl are usually willing to sit back while the other man and I choose the restaurant, the movie, the type of entertainment. But let Fay and me step out on our own and she takes full charge. She has me roller skating when I'd rather listen to a concert, eating chop suey when my teeth are set for a steak, and I don't enjoy it. I wouldn't object to an occasional party if I could observe from the side lines. But Fay drags me in the limelight.

The most wasted day—on which we have not laughed. CHAMFORT

"Peace and quiet count a great deal with me, possibly because I had so little peace and quiet as a boy. Fay is a chatterbox. Every afternoon she drowns me in torrents of conversation. While I am trying to shower and change my clothes and let down from the daily grind, while I yearn for privacy, she talks, talks, talks at me.

"I know I'm a regular old maid about my clothes and my fondness for tidy bureau drawers. Everybody tells me so—my mother, my in-laws, and of course Fay. I grew up in the midst of chaos. My bed was changed once a month on the average; my three brothers were constantly messing up my stuff. But in the Army I learned the pleasure of neatness and order. Fay borrows and loses my handkerchiefs—I once saw her use a clean handkerchief for a dust mop—and the other day I saw her smile to herself when I rubbed a little shoe polish on a leather belt. She looked as lofty and scornful as my mother used to look when I asked her for a freshly laundered shirt to wear at a special school event.

"Most of my Army buddies groused about Army spit and polish, but not me. In fact, I remember pretending I was accustomed to such living, that I'd been brought up by a strict mother who put me through a daily inspection on the crease in my pants, my haircut, the way I kept my room. Actually my mother never noticed whether I looked clean or dirty. She wasn't that interested.

"I sold the other guys in my outfit a bill of goods on my entire family. It amused me to pretend my mother and father were ordinary normal people, fond of each other and proud of their kids. So far as I can recall, my mother never complimented my brothers or me on anything. Her disapproval, her method of showing it, was even tougher to take. She just stopped speaking to me for a few hours or a few days, depending on my crime, and often she refused to tell me why I was punished. One time she praised the cello playing of a neighbor boy; I promptly joined the school orchestra, saved the profits of my newspaper route for months and bought a secondhand cello. My music teacher said my playing was superior, but I won no kudos from either of my parents.

"After my father's crack-up mother went to work in a department store to support the family, and I suppose she deserves credit. However, I've always believed she was largely responsible for father's troubles, that she drove him nuts with her bossiness, her criticisms and contempt. She kept at him until he started his own advertising agency, although he was constitutionally too erratic to operate a business. He went bankrupt and she never forgave him.

"When he tried to go back to working for other agencies again, she put a hex on him by screaming reproaches and predictions of failure. He yelled back at her and one night he knocked her down. I guess neither of them thought of us kids upstairs in bed, shaking with nerves and fear. I hold no particular brief for my father—I hate for anybody to say I resemble him—but I do know he got a raw deal from mother.

"During my two years in the Army I had no hardships—the war was long over—but I was often homesick in a peculiar way. I was homesick for the home I never had. Many a night I lay on my bunk in Germany picturing the home and life I wanted in the future. Brick and mortar and plaster, Swedish furniture, materialistic things were no part of my picture. In the main, I thought about the woman I wanted to marry and live with and love.

"Believe it or not, I dreamed of Fay at least two years before I met her. Asleep or awake I would see in fantasy a tall slim girl with red hair, large gentle eyes and a warm sweet smile. Physically Fay is exactly the girl I dreamed about, but there the resemblance ends.

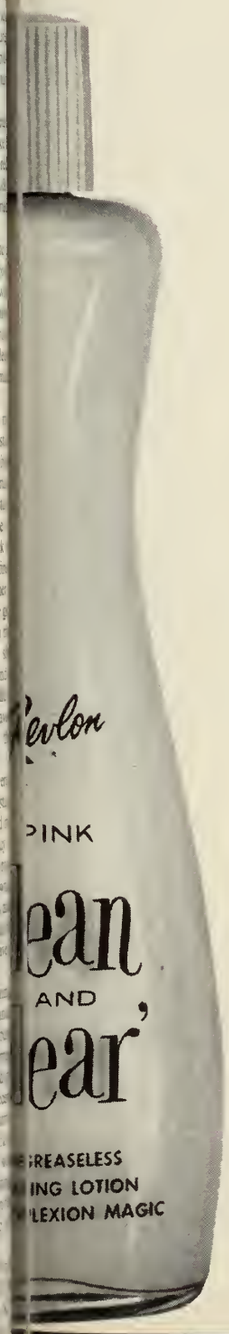
"Fay is like her mother and she's quite a bit like my mother. One day when I was only seven or eight years old I asked mother why she had married father if she didn't love him, and she said, 'He was a loaf of bread, a roof over my head.' Her cold words left a deep imprint on me. I made up my mind no woman would ever marry me for that reason.

"Fay isn't as mercenary and grasping as my mother, by any means, but she is materialistic. She sets a higher value on possessions than she sets on me. Before we were even married she had me tangled up in paying installments on a set of sterling silver. Because of that silver she tried to persuade me to stick to a job with an employer I despised. He fired my best friend in such an insulting manner I felt obliged to quit in protest. An intuitive girl would have sensed and sympathized with my feelings, but Fay isn't intuitive. Indeed, she was so dense and so stubborn that she and I almost split up right then. But how could I stand out against her and a hundred engraved wedding invitations ready to be put in the mail?

"As soon as we were married I discovered she was more interested in owning real estate than in my peace of mind. She pressured me in every way she could think of to buy a house. I don't want to be tied down by property until I decide where I want to locate, what kind of work I want. Fay and my in-laws and my mother blandly assume I'll continue to be a statistician, and perhaps I will, but I have a sneaking desire to decide my own future.

"I want to be free to think about teaching, or saleswork, or, for that matter, manual labor. I don't want to be tied to regular bank deposits, regular payments on installment loans. I have no interest in making a good impression on an employer I dislike. Last December I heard I wasn't receiving a Christmas bonus from the company I was then working for. I quit the job. When Fay took sides against me and defended the company's stingy policy, I couldn't stand it. I walked out on her. On Christmas Eve I found myself eating in a greasy spoon all alone.

"I telephoned Fay. She cried on the phone. But she wouldn't take me back until her mother and all the rest of the kinfolk O.K.'d our reconciliation. That rubbed a lot of the



CONTINUED ON PAGE 42

IF YOU CAN ONLY TAKE OFF YOUR MAKE-UP ONCE A DAY...

One of these night-time cleansers is wrong for you...one is right...

Do you know how to choose?

ANSWER THESE 9 QUESTIONS (be very honest, please) and find the perfect cleanser your skin needs.

1. Are you frequently bothered with a shiny nose? YES ☐ NO ☐
2. Do you have little lines around the eyes? YES ☐ NO ☐
3. Is your skin susceptible to blackheads? YES ☐ NO ☐
4. Does your skin feel taut and tense? YES ☐ NO ☐
5. Does sun seem to help your skin? YES ☐ NO ☐
6. Would your skin dry up without a night cream? YES ☐ NO ☐
7. Have you noticed coarse, enlarged pores? YES ☐ NO ☐
8. Does your skin seem sluggish and unable to throw off impurities? YES ☐ NO ☐
9. Do rich foods make your skin break out? YES ☐ NO ☐

If you have more 'yes' answers than 'no' answers you should use Pink 'Clean and Clear.'

If you have more 'no' answers than 'yes' answers you should use White 'Clean and Clear'.

The most important moment of the day for your complexion is the thorough clean-up before you go to bed.

That's when you must get off dirt, flaking skin and the new clinging make-ups so your skin will be free to breathe all night long. And the very best way to do it is with 'Clean and Clear' because it is a light liquid that melts deeper into the skin... scientifically removes foreign matter... and rinses or tissues off... without enlarging the pores, or making your skin look coarse and old.

Use all the make-up you need, but be sure your bedtime cleanser is 'Clean and Clear'... and you'll find your skin never felt so clean... your complexion never looked so clear!

Visit your favorite Revlon Cosmetic Counter for expert advice on complexion care, as well as any other make-up problem you may have. No obligation, of course... except the one you owe yourself!

PINK 'CLEAN AND CLEAR'*

New greaseless lotion that treats as it cleanses by carrying purifying hexachlorophene into your pores.

also available in a new plastic bottle*

WHITE 'CLEAN AND CLEAR'

Moisturize as you cleanse. Watch your skin change day by day to a younger-looking, fresher complexion.

'CLEAN AND CLEAR' by Revlon... Scientific cleansing formulas for a woman's delicate skin chemistry.

NC., 1960

WHICH ARE YOUR

WINDOW DECORATING PROBLEMS?

CAMEO WILL SEND YOU

YOUR PERSONAL

DECORATOR APPROVED SOLUTION

FREE OF CHARGE!

CHECK YOUR PROBLEM AND MAIL THIS AD TO
Miss Marcia Dunn, Cameo's decorating consultant. She'll send you the individual solution to your problem. In addition you'll receive FREE this 48 page full color Window Decorating Booklet.

It gives you a preview of Cameo's 2,487 custom styles and sizes along with dozens of ideas on decorating your windows with a custom-made look at ready-made prices. Fill in spaces below, and mail entire ad to Miss Marcia Dunn at Cameo Curtains, Inc.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

*City*_____ *Zone*___ *State*____

*Window width*_____ *Length*_____

I buy my curtains and draperies at the best dressed windows wear

CAMEO CURTAINS DRAPERIES
mfr. of famous Cameo Shir-Back® Curtains
260 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

shine off our first Christmas for me. Sundays now, if Fay gets her way, we visit her family. The whole gang, even her grandfather, collect around a table and, like Army brass, outline a plan of life for me. I just won't take it. I quit one job I might have otherwise kept just because I got tired of hearing all the reasons I was lucky to have it.

"My depressions are something I'd prefer to keep to myself. It's certainly no help to have my in-laws hold a state meeting every time I'm feeling low, hash over my sad case and then advise Fay to trot home to cheer me up. I know when she's consulted them because of all the phony sunshine. I know when she's talked things over with my mother because then she worries that I may be in the process of cracking up the same way my father did. At that point I am sunk.

"Fay and I look for quite different things in marriage. She expected marriage to bring her security—a house, furniture, children, standing in the community. Perhaps later on I'll want those things, too, but at the moment they seem nonessential to me. The security I expected to find in marriage was love itself.

"I expected to find understanding and moral support in marriage, real love. There is nothing solid between Fay and me. She isn't woman enough to make me feel like a man. I've proved I'm not man enough to make her feel like a woman. Our love-making is so frustrating that I've almost abandoned it. Although Fay is acquiescent and affectionate in a passive sort of way, she has never been genuinely moved. Not once.

"Our sexual relationship satisfies her, she says, but that's hard to believe. The moment we finish dinner in the evening she suggests we go out somewhere or else reminds me I should study, and then she flies to bed to avoid my company. When I go in later she pretends to be asleep. Many nights I've walked the floor hoping she would say something sweet to me, wishing she would open her eyes and give me a welcoming smile.

"If our sexual relationship could be put on a better basis, if I could just once feel that Fay had deep feeling for me, I'm sure our other problems would seem small. But that situation has become so bad from my point of view that this morning I moved out of our apartment to spare myself further humiliation."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Fay and Ira started out with a storybook picture of marriage and unrealistic hopes. Ira, who had received too little attention from his mother, wanted an exaggerated amount of attention and understanding from his wife. Few young women could have met his expectations. Fay married an insecure, restless young man, obviously reluctant to assume responsibility. Yet she wanted him to settle down at once and provide her with the stable background of her girlhood.

"Our first accomplishment in counseling was to end their brief separation. When Ira was convinced that with expert aid their sexual relationship could be improved, he returned to their apartment. Fay was sent to a well-known gynecologist who sometimes assists the American Institute of Family Relations in working out sexual problems. She was advised of ways she could be more co-operative in demonstrating her affection for Ira. In the meanwhile Ira, who was more inexperienced than he fancied, learned through consultation how to improve his love-making. A few weeks later he triumphantly reported that for the first time in their marriage he and Fay had shared an experience wholly satisfying to them both. Her report was the same; she said she had previously been ignorant of what sex could mean, the joy to be found in total surrender. Both declared they were ideally happy, that their differences had vanished, and they terminated the counseling.

"It is sometimes said that an unsatisfactory sexual relationship can make an otherwise good marriage ninety per cent a failure. On the other hand, contradictory as it sounds, a satisfactory sexual relationship probably counts only ten per cent in making marriage a success. Within three months Fay and Ira, now physically well adjusted, discovered their other problems were still unresolved. They resumed the counseling.

"This time Fay and I went to bat and analyzed her unrealistic expectations, explored her personality difficulties and Ira's personality difficulties. She had perceived Ira's insecurity very clearly while remaining unaware of her own. Fay was a very pretty girl whose self-confidence had been badly jolted in her teens. A severe case of acne, from which she had slowly but completely recovered, carried emotional side effects from which she had not recovered. She had been left doubtful of her ability to attract the opposite sex and to win a husband. This fearfulness may explain why she pushed Ira into an earlier marriage than he was prepared for and almost certainly explains her bossiness. To cloak her fears, Fay modeled her personality on the pattern laid out by her brisk, efficient mother.

"Actually, as Fay admitted when she thought the matter through, she wanted to own a home less than her mother wanted it for her. She admitted the injustice and futility of attempting to hold Ira to the conventional standards of her kinfolk. For his sake and for her own sake, she agreed to limit visits to her parents to twice a month. She needed the opportunity to develop her own adult personality unhampered by the influence of her mother.

"Fay's excessive talkativeness, also borrowed from her mother, served as a shield for her insecurity and nervousness but barred her from any real understanding of Ira. It was foolish of her to ask Ira if he kissed her out of pity; such questions invariably evoke an unwelcome answer. Fay tried to talk less and become more feeling and sensitive.

"Gradually, as she developed sensitivity and awareness, she learned to approach Ira on a feeling level. When he came home depressed from work or college, she bit back idle chatter and questions and allowed him an interval of quiet and privacy to relax. Instead of barging in on him while he shaved and showered, she picked up a magazine or busied herself in the kitchen. To her pleased surprise, Ira frequently began to join her there.

"Ira's reserve and remoteness, his dour silences of course had aggravated Fay's insecurity and increased her loquaciousness, if only to fill the vacuum in the apartment. It wasn't fair of him to make a guessing game of his feelings and plans, to subject her to selfish prolonged fits of the sulks. Grateful for Fay's concessions, he tried to talk more and tell her what he was thinking and feeling.

"Ira's insecurity was based on the haunting fear that he would have a marriage like his father's marriage and suffer his father's fate. Consequently when Fay told him truthfully that she had laid aside any immediate ambition to buy a house he was reassured on two scores. She proved to him that she was pulling away from her mother's influence and away from his mother's evaluation of his father as 'a roof over her head.'

"Any casual remark drawing a comparison between Ira and his father stirred up his most profound fears, cut cruelly. Fay dropped all such remarks. At her request, her family did the same. She broke off her close association with her mother-in-law and stopped urging visits there.

"Actually, according to medical author the mental ailment that Ira's father suffer not inheritable. Except for Ira's periodic pressions, from all I could gather, there only a slight similarity in the personaliti the two men. Indeed, as Ira suddenly rea in the course of a consultation, his perso was quite a bit like that of his mother. His of punishing Fay when she failed to rea mind or sense his feelings—the hours of silence, the refusal to tell her what wrong—was identical with the punishmer mother had inflicted on him in his boyh This piece of self-knowledge greatly sho Ira, who had no desire to resemble his m but was very effective in prodding him t swer Fay's questions and volunteer info tion.

"When he told her he needed to study f examination, she no longer suggested an dinner movie. When he told her she w clined to lead on the dance floor—as are girls who have done solo dancing—she le to follow. They now enjoy dancing with other.

Their social life and their life at together were both vastly improved b winning combination of Fay's heigh awareness and his increased ability to out. After she stopped dragging him into groups and began to let him pick his own versational gambits, they went to more ties. When he told her he preferred to the restaurant or theater, she gladly gave that privilege.

"When he came into the bedroom l night, she stopped pretending to be a She responded to her intuitive feeling th needed her.

"As they mastered the art of marital munication Fay and Ira learned to share of their pleasures, most worries. As w evitable, Ira's depressions (which still periodically) remain pretty much his in ual problem. About the only help Fa give is to repress overcheerful attem rally his spirits; instead she offers the sol silent sympathy. If Ira anticipates the on a period of black gloom, which he often he warns her to steer clear of him. He out the siege alone until his spirits rise a accountably as they sank. He hopes h pressions will decrease as he grows older

"I haven't seen Fay and Ira for the pas years, but occasionally I hear from the telephone or mail. Some of their pro were solved by the maturity acquired in four years. Ira has now finished colleg has now held a good job for eighteen m likes the job and his employers. Wh called me the other day he spoke pr about his future prospects with the org tion.

"Perhaps it is no coincidence that h Fay are now the parents of a year-old dau She has quit working. They are still r their old apartment, although it is crowd three. As soon as they locate a place kitchen that suits Fay and a big back yar suits the little girl, Ira told me, they int buy a home."

Editors' Note: This case history was compil condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

PLEASE USE YOUR POSTAL ZONE NUMBER!

To improve service and speed delivery of mail, the Post Office asks that you always include your postal zone number in your address.

We want to co-operate in every way we can—but we need your help. By giving us your zone number, you'll be assuring speedy delivery of your magazines.

Help yourself to better service. Use your Postal Zone Number—always!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

MASTERPIECE SALE of Prelude

how this to your Santa. If you've ever longed own major pieces in solid silver, here's fantastic saving on the loveliest. For the hristmas season, extraordinary values are fered on Prelude Tea and Coffee Services
d Candelabra... in International Sterling.
They are masterpieces of rare craftsman-ip and design... in one of the most beloved tterns of all time. The majestic Prelude rling service consists of tea and coffee pots, hot water kettle with a burner, cream and gar servers and a waste bowl. With them, u get a matching tray in heavy silverplate.

The delicately-wrought candelabra can be used 8 different ways. Perfect for all occasions —large dinners or just a twosome.

Prelude 6-piece solid silver service (plus a matching silverplate tray) only $595.00. Comparable services are priced at $920.00.

Prelude solid silver Candelabra only $112.50 a pair. Comparable 8-way candelabra are priced at $149.50 a pair.

Save on these masterpieces at favorite stores everywhere. Offer expires at last stroke of midnight, 1960. All prices plus Federal tax.

TO PRELUDE TEA SET OWNERS

If you are already the proud owner of a Prelude 5-piece service, you can now add the beautiful kettle for only $295.00. Comparable kettle $400.00 (prices plus Federal tax).

INTERNATIONAL STERLING... loveliest, by design

FAMOUS PARKER GAMES

Happiest Gift Ideas!

MONOPOLY*
Parker Brothers Real Estate Trading Game

The best-loved game of all! Always lively as you buy, sell, trade real estate, build a fabulous" empire". Belongs in every home! $4, $5.

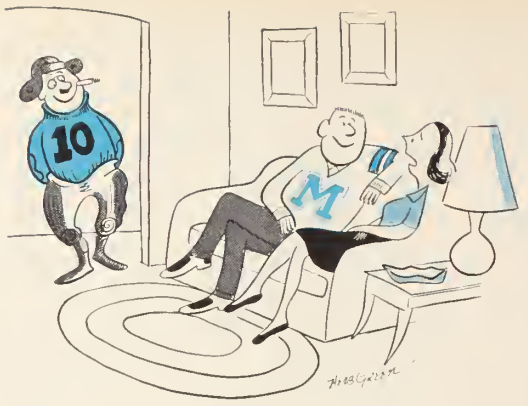
KIMBO
Parker Brothers Game of Fences

Unusual NEW game. Movable fences are used in a wide variety of offensive and defensive plays. Fast-paced fun for young and old! $3.00

CAMELOT*
Parker Brothers Battle Game

This unique battle game appeals greatly to men and boys with a zest for campaign strategy. Always interesting. Fine gift. $3.00

RISK*
Parker Brothers Continental Game



An original, dynamic game. An all-out contest full of suspense, for control of vast areas. Thrilling gift for teen-agers and adults! $7.50

WINNIE-THE-POOH
Entertains toddlers for hours with beloved Milne characters and scenes. No reading, no counting. Delightful gift! $2.00

Parker Brothers Registered Trademark for the Game Equipment*
PARKER BROTHERS, INC., Salem, Mass.
Also makers of SORRY, Slide Pursuit Game
Manufactured in Canada by Collett-Sproule Boxes, Ltd., Toronto

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"OH—NO!"

A wife shouldn't beat her husband at both golf and tennis. If she does, maybe they'd better take up chess or horseshoes.

Our town's champ cynic got scorched when he told his wife he'd go duck hunting on election day. Now he agrees to vote either way she coaxes him to.

Broad daylight, counsels a brave-new-world matron, that's the time for newlyweds to chat candidly about sex problems. "And don't ever think," she cautions, "that you're the only ones who have 'em."

"When I get really mad at Peter," confides Betty Comfort, trying on the football sweater a campus beau gave her, "I remind myself he's the same chosen guy I couldn't have lived without."

Even if your alma mater loses, at every football game you can run into old beaux of your wife who haven't weathered the slings and arrows any better than you.

You might whisper to your teenangel that teenage shyness is an ailment of childhood, like measles, but easier to cure: a few phone calls and a few dates and you recover.

When sudden visitors drop in and catch you barefoot and wearing shorts, you may get mildly provoked. But in the long run it's more fun than not if they drop in, even without a phone call.

Once we've got Son-in-Law Day established, I'll ask the new President (whoever he is) to proclaim also a Daughter-in-Law Day. But I think son-in-law should come first; nobody ever makes fun of a daughter-in-law.

I've discovered another clue to a first-rate restaurant: If it's really good it offers on its menu an excellent mixed grill; and I don't mean a bit of liver, a bit of sausage, a lamb chop and a slice of grilled tomato.

I scored a tiny triumph over my Dream Girl when our state's Beauty Queen (a great favorite of mine) graduated summa cum laude this year. "You knew all the time," I admonished my wife, "that I adored her for her brains."

Women are true devotees of literature: When a famous Pulitzer Prize novelist visits our town, they have black silk stockings on hand to wear for him, because he shyly reveals how much he admires a pretty leg in black.

Our most extravagant matron is indignant at her husband's criticism that she buys too many clothes she seldom wears. "If a girl phones me from the store and tells me a new dress reminded her of me," she protests, "it'd be rude of me not to buy it!"

Our town's most erudite banker yielded to pressure and public opinion and bought a Rolls-Royce. He keeps it in an immaculate white-plastered garage unmarred by anything but two enormous pots of flowers. (We're trying to raise a fund to buy it for our governor.)

"When my wife is utterly unreasonable," reflects Peter Comfort, tidying up his Dog House—what he calls his bomb shelter—"I remind myself she's the same flawless girl I took away from nine other men."

My wife is still gleeful because, of 200 high-school and prep-school editors I talked to recently, more than 180 were girls.

I've snapped pictures of our redhead's six-year-old Patrick atop every cannon on the state-capitol grounds. He tried to climb inside the muzzles, but found each of them filled with tourist trash.

By election day, I've no doubt, Jack Kennedy will seem the image of Thomas Jefferson and Dick Nixon will be a reasonable facsimile of Abe Lincoln. Remember how wonderful they made Coolidge seem eventually?

"What with all that brave-new-world machinery in a modern house," argues one of our richer eggheads at the bridge table, "it takes two wives to run a complex establishment. If a man can afford two he ought to have two!"

Our young collegian has invented a new diet dish for us two: cold jellied consommé topped with cottage cheese and 25 cents' worth of red U.S.A. caviar. Not bad, but not as good as ham and eggs with cottage-fried potatoes.

At our luncheon table of stubborn thinkers, several are baffled to find themselves forced to choose between Nixon and Kennedy. "Like being told to choose between two men from outer space!" says our ranking deep thinker.

A youngish widow here, still pretty and quite solvent, asks how to solve her loneliness. "Fill up your icebox! Get a different hairdo! Repaint your front door blond! You might lure me over!" advises our No. 1 semibachelor.

A solemn thought bothered me as I sat on a front lawn after dusk, watching color slides of rural Ethiopia shown by a missionary (an ex-fighter pilot) on a holiday: With 10,000 more pairs like him and his Polly, Africa might not have needed those U.N. troops.

My wife twits me about my expensive trips to two All-Star baseball games and two Rose Bowl football. "Were they so fascinating?" she asks. Under pressure, I confess I'd rather see the Davis Cup tennis matches or the National Open golf.

My dad made a sportsman out of me: He taught me to swim with water wings made of two corked jugs roped together, and to play tennis with old tin skillets. (He never let us kids notice we were poor.)

. . . When grandson Pat at six dives suddenly to impress a tiny five-year-old blond,
. . . And my daughter-in-law transforms an old kitchen table and chairs into brave-new-world gaiety,
. . . Or our youngest plunges into American Lit as if it were a banana split,
. . . And our son graciously accepts our four-year-old station wagon as if it were a limousine,
. . . Or Harlan III, debonair at three, wades breezily into the Atlantic Ocean's surf,
. . . And I watch my Dream Girl fly away in a shiny airplane that soars too fast,
It dawns on me that the chains of marriage are stronger than iron and softer than foam rubber.

99 squeezes in every new soapier Brillo soap pad

All the soap a pad can hold... all the shine a pan can handle... in new soapier Brillo

RESISTS RUST! As long as there's suds–there's no room for rust

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N. Y.

The wife involved with a younger man

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.

Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

My husband likes pets, I don't. Who decides?

If you are not allergic, accept his pets if he will assume the major responsibility for their care.

ASK YOURSELF:

Am I Career-Minded?

With more and more people of both sexes attending college, the world of work has increasing fascination for those young women who are not sure that marriage alone will be sufficient challenge to their interests and abilities. The questions below may help you think through whether a career or marriage should be your present objective. Answer "Yes" or "No."

Have you:

1. Attended college, or had special training?
2. Prepared yourself for a specific vocation?
3. Worked for three years or longer?
4. Earned as much as $300 a month?
5. Often wished you were a man?
6. Ever wanted a business of your own?
7. Felt that men take advantage of women?

Do You:

8. Prefer practical to frilly clothes?
9. Work as easily with women as with men?
10. Regard yourself as dominant or self-sufficient?
11. Take little interest in church activities?
12. Dislike housework, especially cooking or sewing?
13. Believe men have easier lives than women?
14. Feel women should defer marriage to age 25?

If you answered 10 or more of these questions "Yes," you are more career-minded than the average single woman. But with 10 or more "No" answers, marriage should bring you more satisfaction and happiness than any job could ever offer.

HE'S 26, SHE'S 38 AND OUGHT TO KNOW BETTER

"I've read a lot about older men becoming infatuated with young girls, but nothing about older wives becoming involved with younger men. Yet I know of three cases right in my own group, all of them women who have good husbands, nice homes and lovely children. My own sister, Letty, who is thirty-eight and ought to know better, seems to be wrapped up in Al, a budding lawyer who is single and only twenty-six. Letty has two teenage children, a devoted, hard-working husband who gives her just about anything she wants. Warren isn't a glamorous charmer, but everybody likes him and he and Letty have always got along well. I don't really think Letty and Al are having an out-and-out affair, and I'm sure she doesn't want to give up her marriage. But these infatuations get out of hand, and if Warren ever finds out, there'll be trouble. Why do some sensible, high-principled women act this way? Is it because they're neurotic, because they have too much free time or does something of the sort happen to most older women?"

Many community situations and activities—fund-raising projects, the country club, the theater group—bring married people together in an atmosphere of informal companionship. Very often, because younger wives are tied down by small children, and older husbands are engrossed in business, it is young men and wives nearing middle age who are thrown together.

Single or married, the young male is seldom romantically attracted to a woman ten or more years his senior. But if she is dissatisfied in her marriage or is aggressive, she may unintentionally become infatuated with the younger man. If he finds her appealing or is exploitive, their casual association may get out of hand. The result may be unfortunate or even disastrous, particularly for the wife. She is more vulnerable than he, since her feelings are more likely to involve guilt and at least the illusion of love.

The mature male sometimes becomes involved with a much younger woman because he is consciously or unconsciously seeking reassurance that his sexual prowess is undiminished. Typically, the mature woman does not experience any comparable specifically sexual fear. Nevertheless, since in this country we tend to equate feminine attractiveness with youth, she does want to feel that she is still young in appearance and charm. For this reason, she finds piquant satisfaction in the admiration of a younger man.

In addition, particular circumstances, attitudes or personality traits may heighten a mature woman's susceptibility to the attentions of a younger man.

She may be bored. When the youngest child enters school, and as the older ones grow increasingly self-sufficient, a mother often finds that the demands on her time and attention abruptly diminish, and that she suddenly has too much of the leisure she has longed for. Unless she has made purposeful plans to keep herself occupied, she is likely to become restless and dissatisfied, and worse still, to feel useless. In this state of mind, she may welcome a romantic diversion that a few years earlier would have seemed absurd.

She may feel neglected. Unfortunately, her family's routine demands on her may slacken at the very time when her husband's work load is the heaviest. If he is absorbed in his business to the point of having little leisure time for her, or little mental energy to consider her emotional needs, her feeling of aimlessness may be intensified. The attentions of a young man may be welcome simply because they restore her self-confidence and bolster her faltering ego. Her husband and children may no longer need her, but at least this young man finds her attractive and desirable.

Sentimental observances and attentions are generally more important to women than to men. Husbands could do much to relieve their wives' wistfulness, their feeling that romance is over for them, if they would occasionally bring flowers or make some other small gesture of spontaneous affection. The younger, single man is more likely to remember such pleasantries than the contented—and perhaps complacent—mature married man.

The sex relationship between husband and wife may be less satisfactory to her than to him. This may unconsciously predispose her to accept the attentions of another man.

Pleasant companionship with a person of the opposite sex can be inviting and rewarding at any age. A wife might shy away from the attentions of a man her own age because she would realize that continued association with him would be suspect, or even dangerous. But she might be disarmed if the man were considerably younger than she, because it would not occur to her that she could fall in love with him or that anyone would view the relationship suspiciously.

Every wife, young or old, should be friendly and enjoy social contacts with people her own age and younger, including men. But any dissatisfaction within herself should warn her that she must avoid temptations. Even if she is secure and well adjusted in marriage, she should be on the alert lest she be caught by the powerful appeal of youth.

"WHY IS MY HUSBAND IMPERTINENT TO MY MOTHER?"

"I'm much in love with Dick, but he treats my mother shabbily, especially when my father is away on business trips. Dick is so domineering, sure of himself, and too highhanded, as though he were head of my parents' house.

"Dick and I were married in June, but the trouble really started when we became engaged at Christmas. Mother and I wrote the announcement for the papers. Dick didn't like it so rewrote it to suit himself. Mother had a right to be annoyed, but she didn't protest. That weekend he had all three meals with us on Sunday. At breakfast his eggs didn't suit him, so he went into the kitchen and cooked more for himself. He behaved himself at lunch, except to tell me he liked his coffee stronger, but at dinner he said he didn't see why a roast should be cooked until the flavor was gone. Since my mother had prepared the meal, I don't see why she didn't lose her temper. At Easter when we went home to make wedding plans, he practically spoiled the visit with personal questions and downright impertinent comments on matters which were not his affair. You would have thought his parents were paying for the wedding. I can't understand it, since he comes from a good family.

"He has never thanked my mother for her hospitality, and his attitude hasn't changed a bit since the wedding. He isn't mean or vicious, but his airy disregard of my mother's opinions, his blunt statements of his own, and his way of acting as though he is always right and everybody else wrong gets me down. I'm afraid my mother will blow up one of these days, and I couldn't blame her, but I want to head it off if possible. I love them both and don't want to have bad feeling with either."

It's hard to believe that Virginia isn't overstating the case, but since brides in love are more apt to make excuses for their husbands' faults than to exaggerate, we have to assume that she has described the situation accurately. If so, she has a difficult problem on her hands, the more trying because it is largely unnecessary. With a little tact, understanding, and simple courtesy on her husband's part, the situation would rapidly right itself. As it is, Virginia must find some way of maintaining her affectionate relationship with her mother, without provoking her husband into still less acceptable behavior.

Probably the first step is to talk matters over with her mother, who seems to be a tolerant and well-controlled person. Without making feeble excuses for Dick's behavior, Virginia should apologize for him, and assure her mother of her confidence that he will improve in the future. In the next few months she should arrange casual and informal gatherings between her parents and her husband, under circumstances that will enable them to become better acquainted with a minimum of strain. But she should not force too frequent or too close association; to do so is asking too much of her mother, and is risking further rousing Dick's aggressiveness and putting him on the defensive.

For there is no doubt that his behavior is somehow rooted in a defensive attitude. His rudeness, his arrogance, his attempts to dominate and dictate, all suggest some inner insecurity. He may be uncertain of Virginia's love, and be unconsciously trying to assert his claims on her by being possessive and masterful.

The reasons for his actions are undoubtedly subtle, complex, and quite possibly have their origins in his childhood. But whatever their nature, it is Virginia who will have to bear their consequences. She hopes that matters will improve with time. If they do not, Virginia herself will find her husband's behavior increasingly hard to bear. Then she will need her mother's love and support even more than now. For her own sake, as well as for the sake of harmony between her husband and her mother, Virginia must find a way to keep the peace until her husband grows up.

Make it in minutes without baking...and without eggs

Royal Custard Flavor Dessert!

Tastes like Old-Fashioned Homemade Custard!

Royal

It's New . . . and Only Royal Makes It!

Whether you serve it in an old-fashioned custard cup or a modern dessert dish, new Royal Custard Flavor Dessert tastes just like Grandma's homemade custard. Every serving has that same unforgettable flavor of old-fashioned baked custard. But now you can make it in just minutes and without eggs.

For a deliciously different dessert, try the Caramel Dessert recipe on the back of the package . . . serves 4 to 5.

For Exciting Flavors Switch to Royal

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

Sauce-pot Meat Balls

All in one pot, and such fun to fix
...with Hunt's Tomato Sauce and onion-soup mix!

Get the pot of sauce bubbling, drop in the herb-seasoned meat balls, and let them soak up wonderful flavor—while they cook!

That's how easy it is—with Hunt's Tomato Sauce and onion-soup mix to give you a head start. You save time, you save pots and pans. And out come the tastiest meat balls you ever ate, with plenty of savory sauce to pour over potatoes, rice or noodles.

In this dish, the flavor of the sauce really counts. And that's where Hunt's Tomato Sauce makes the big difference! Because Hunt's has more flavor to start with.

Hunt's Tomato Sauce is all tomato. No fillers. We add just the right spices and seasonings to bring out its goodness.

Then it's kettle-simmered until it's rich, thick, and ready to use. It's such fun cooking with Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Try it soon. With old favorites like pot roast and meat loaf, or with this new favorite, Sauce-pot Meat Balls.

1 package dry onion-soup mix
1¼ cups water
2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce
1 lb. ground beef
½ teasp. garlic salt
½ teasp. thyme ¼ teasp. pepper
1 tablesp. chopped parsley

In deep, thick saucepan, bring to a boil quickly onion-soup mix, water and 1½ cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Simmer, covered, for 10 minutes. Mix ground beef, seasonings, parsley and remaining Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Shape into 16 meat balls and place them in sauce. Simmer gently, uncovered, for 25 minutes, turning occasionally. Serve over hot noodles, spaghetti or rice. Makes about 4 servings.

Hunt...for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "21 New Ways to Serve Hamburger." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-11, P.O. Box 5, Fullerton, Calif. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ont.

journal about town

what we do...
where we go...
whom we meet

ABBOT MILLS

Camera-whiz Di Pietro: nor rain, nor sleet, nor hail . . .

50 years ago in the Journal

You could buy dolls with real hair eyebrows and eyelashes in November, 1910, when Woodrow Wilson, recently president of Princeton, was elected governor of New Jersey. Cotton prints for house dresses cost six cents a yard, and ice a cent a pound. Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., was leaping from balconies on Broadway, and* Down by the Old Mill Stream *was first sung.

In November, 1910, the Journal was a twice-monthly magazine celebrating its twenty-eighth birthday with a circulation of 1,500,000 (largest of all standard magazines). The two November issues showed 300 Christmas presents to make and ten pages of the latest Paris fashions, including the new fur stoles, ten and twelve feet long, of sable, ermine and chinchilla.

Scolds the fashion editor: "The woman willing to cover unclean underwear with a new gown will be equally untruthful in other details of her life."

Hair Styles Without False Puffs or Rats was a feature in this issue, and The Ideal Kitchen: "A refrigerator ought always to be of hardwood—either oak or maple. The door should open only from the top, to prevent cold air from rushing out, but side-opening doors are convenient and popular."

Asks Uncertain: "Which is better: for a man to tuck the corner of his napkin under his chin or between buttons of his vest?"

Correct Speaking and Writing: "The word 'chauffeur' is so new that it is found only in the latest dictionaries. A woman who drives an automobile is not called a chauffeur but a chauffeuse, pronounced showfuzz."

"Cutting down the butcher's bill: A good housekeeper makes two excellent dishes for a family of five out of a knuckle of veal for which she pays thirty cents."

"A cloth wrapper for parcels of unbleached muslin is better than paper when the package is to go a long distance," advises Fiji Islander.

Asks Harry: "When a boy joins a girl in the street and she is carrying a lot of bundles, what should he do?" Reply: "Offer to carry them for her."

Journal photographer Joe Di Pietro, an expert on people, has photographed everyone: Untouchables in India . . . How America Lives . . . royalty. Joe makes people relax so they photograph "natural." ("I try to get acquainted before I even take out my camera.") Result: lifelike photographs without tricks or phony props. He's quick as a flash; his actual shooting time for our cover of Jacqueline Kennedy was 15 minutes; Patricia Nixon, 25 minutes. Example of the way Joe works: "I always carry an autograph book for my daughter, so I have a lot of signatures. When I asked the Vice President to sign it, he looked puzzled. There wasn't an empty page in the book. He finally signed on the inside cover! It was a good laugh."

Wilhela Cushman recalls the Nixons and Kennedys too. She first photographed the entire Kennedy family in 1938, when Jack's father was ambassador to the Court of St. James's. Then Jacqueline Kennedy in 1957. "She has a lovely shyness, and a piquant, delightful voice," says Wilhela (pronounced Willa). In 1953, '56 she did fashion stories on the Nixons. "Mr. N. was meticulously well groomed," she remembers. "I'm sure even the soles of his shoes were polished." At the time the Nixons lived in a small house "with such shallow closets Pat had to hang her long evening dresses in the attic." No problem today, though (walk-in closets).

Did you know that the average human gives off heat equal to that of a 100-watt bulb? And that women have almost twice as much protection against cold as men, require higher temperatures before they perspire? Most comfortable range: 73°–77°; relative humidity, 25–60 per cent. (Arguments are more apt to flourish above 80°, so cool off.)

PICTORIAL PARADE

The real Danny Kaye . . . and our Peter Briggs.

Judging by present dress sizes, archaeologists of the future may think we were a race of midgets! When Nora O'Leary visited June Allyson at a fitting recently, June confided she wears a petite size 5 (some manufacturers now make 3!). Nora tells us the smallest pattern size thirty years ago was 14. Statistics show that American women are getting taller and bigger. "Despite statistics," says Nora, "we still want to remain 'the little woman.'"

PICTORIAL PARADE

Theater's Russell . . . Journal's Page.

UPI

Pat Nixon (left) . . . with "understudy" Kelly.

Have you ever been mistaken for a celebrity, as have many of our staff? JOURNAL editors, we found, have "look-alikes." Joe Di Pietro has been taken for Adlai Stevenson; Biffie Page for Rosalind Russell; Peter Briggs for Danny Kaye; Ruth Packard, Helen Hayes; Janet Boe, Joan Caulfield. Secretary Kay Kelly is constantly asked if she's Pat Nixon. "The other day someone said, 'Hi, Pat. Haven't seen you since Washington.' Then he did a double-take, realized his mistake, and apologized!" (In the photos here we've substituted our editors' faces under their "look-alike's" hair and hat.) Dawn Norman says people think they've seen her before, but can't remember where or when. "I'm not even mistaken for me! Very discouraging."

No girl in the bunch would have fallen in love with Tony on purpose—especially not Beth, who remembered what it was like to be unwanted.

By VICTORIA LINCOLN

I shall never know what made me turn my head that morning in math class and see Tony as if I were seeing him for the first time. I saw his face, lifted in the shaft of light that fell through the window, saw his dark blue eyes, his mouth, his hands: I saw him.

I was in love, and I was sixteen, and nothing could have been more grossly, cruelly inconvenient.

"That dope," I whispered. "That drip."

But it was no use.

It was in September of 1922. I had not been popular with boys before that year. But I had spent the summer visiting my Cousin Peg at the lake, and it changed everything. Peg was a vamp, and her friends just assumed that any cousin of hers would be jazzy and cute. I rolled my stockings down like hers, and ratted my hair out like hers in big cootie garages, and copied the way she talked; and waited to be found out.

But I wasn't found out. I was Beth Collins, a popular girl. And the miracle lasted. I came home saying that South Alton was neat, that the boys there were whizzes, very snaky, but I was glad to be back with my own bunch. And at once my own bunch became real.

Any bunch would have satisfied me, but this was the best. It was Dick's and Daisy's bunch, and their approval was the absolute criterion of success. Looking back, I wonder why. Daisy was overbearing, and Dick,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 154

This was the meeting Beth had planned in her dreams. But it was turning into a nightmare.*

If you were granted one wish, what would it be? Beauty? Love? A golden voice?

By KATE McNAIR ILLUSTRATED BY GRETA ELGAARD

HER FIRST APPEARANCE IN ANY MAGAZINE For a long time I've wanted to tell someone what happened to me last winter, on a perfectly ordinary day of wet boots across the floor and peanut-butter sandwiches for lunch.

I have friends I talk to. We discuss the children's teachers and what to have for dinner, and other people's peculiarities. But this particular thing I can't tell them about. If I tried, they'd think I was out of my mind and offer to keep the three children while I went to the city for a change of scene.

I don't need a psychiatrist's couch; I just need a listener. But women are not above suspicion of being a little odd when they haven't had a day off in weeks. Say what you will about the hard life our grandmothers lived, today's mother has an awful lot to do. Grandfather didn't expect grandmother to be a glamour girl all the time she was doing her work either. Even on Sunday she just slicked her hair back and put on a clean dress.

I do not look high-style and leisurely, as though I spent most of my time at the country club. My family love me, so when I ask them if I look all right, they say yes every time.

I'm not very bright either. I always figured that I.Q. test they gave me when I entered college was graded by a no-expert type. I got in and I got through, but that is about it.

This particular day was cold and snowy and bright. The living room looked pretty and I felt happy. I had served a peanut-butter-sandwich lunch, but I had also concocted an elaborate parfait for the children that got an enthusiastic reception and yesterday's leftover fruit into their stomachs.

I was polishing the brass andirons and humming a little because I love those andirons. We found them in an antique shop in New England and the cherubs on the posts do something for my soul. When I polish them I always think about the man who made them and how proud he must have been, all those years ago.

Somebody behind me said, "Light that fire. I'm cold."

Obediently I picked up the lighter and lit the kindling under the log. Then I did a double take. No one was behind me. You see already how unreasonable it sounds.

"Over here," said the voice, and it seemed to come from the hassock there by the fire.

There she sat. I didn't just dream her up because I had inner tensions. She was about six inches tall and she sat on the very edge of the hassock, swinging legs that were beautifully covered with sheer hose and feet shod in high-heeled blue pumps. She had a compact in her hand and she was powdering the smallest nose you ever saw.

"You've never seen anything like me before," she said complacently. "Move over here closer and sit down on the floor. I can't crane my head up to talk to the top of a great big woman like you. Sit down."

I sat down. What else? I felt like a giant. One smack from my heavy paw would have sent her off her perch and into the fireplace. Not that I had any inclination to touch her. I was completely awed, and speechless. I thought about Alice in Wonderland and an old comic strip called The Teenie Weenies.

"I'm real," she said, and she reached over and gave me a poke with the tip of a tiny red umbrella.

I felt the touch. She laughed then and suddenly looked so sweet and cute that I had to be friendly even if this did turn out to be a high-powered dream.

"I'll bet you haven't thought about fairies since you were in the third grade." She smiled as she drew out the smallest lipstick you can imagine and used it as a pointer to emphasize her remarks, before she worked on her lips. "It is quite probable, even, that you don't believe in fairies. If that is true, we will have difficulty getting through to each other."

"Fairies surely don't wear blue wool suits and a hat that is the most beautiful shape I ever saw," I ventured.

She looked pleased and patted her hat in a way women have. "Designed by a darling Frenchman, a real artist in cloth. Then he found this perfectly wonderful leather man who made the shoes and bag. Isn't the work exquisite? Look at the gloves too."

"How in the world?" I asked.

"Oh, he does them in full scale and then I reduce them in size," she said. When I looked blank, she explained: "It's a little like the way you people enlarge or reduce pictures. You don't lose any detail or take anything away, do you?"

Bill's business is taking wonderful pictures of people and things and I know all about enlargements and reductions. So I began to feel on more solid ground.

"I always thought fairies wore gauzy wings and pastel cobwebs," I said.

"You are an expert on what fairies wear, I suppose," she snapped sarcastically.

She pulled off her trig little hat and laid it down beside her. My Ann would have loved it for a doll. She ran her fingers through her hair—it was slightly curly and quite short—the sort of hairdo I would give anything to achieve instead of the "casual" effect I get with mine.

I looked away from her. I stared at the dusteloth I had so recently wielded in this room. My container of brass polish was still there and the beautiful little cherubs were still metal, still cold, still unmoving. Surely if I were off my rocker they would have come to life, as many times as I had cleaned their little faces and polished up their wings. I looked back at her and she seemed relaxed and sweet again. She had found a flaw in a fingernail and was working away with her file. Such a file!

"Look, toots," she said, pointing it at me to emphasize her point, "you are the most fabulously lucky woman in the world."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 125

"Big deal," she said. "You make a wish and I make it come

POLI
Greta Elgaard

OUR THANKSGIVING –

Patricia Nixon tells their Thanksgiving plans for this year and the traditional ways the Nixons celebrate.*

Thanksgiving is a special day with us, a family day when we take time out to review the blessings that have come not only to us but to the millions of other American families.

On Thanksgiving morning we have family prayers. This is a tradition, Dick tells us, that goes back for generations in his family.

First we give thanks for our form of government, conceived by men of many faiths, all placing their trust in God. We are thankful for the freedom these men of deep conviction placed in our basic charter—freedom to worship, speak or write as we please, for families to live and work and plan together, and freedom to share in and pursue the happiness of our loved ones.

Dick and I have been in Iron Curtain countries where people do not have these freedoms that seem so natural to us and which we sometimes take for granted. While we give thanks for our own blessings we also pray that one day they will come to people all over the world.

Thanksgiving is a simple celebration at our house, built around our daughters, Tricia and Julie, and we have tried to give the day a special meaning for them.

The girls like to hear about the first Thanksgiving when the Pilgrim Fathers feasted and offered thanks to God following their first harvest, and it always impresses them that these devout colonists invited their Indian friends. We review the Thanksgiving proclamations by the Continental Congress during the Revolution, and, of course, President Lincoln's proclamation of a national Thanksgiving Day in 1863.

Tricia and Julie like to help with preparations for Thanksgiving dinner. They make the place cards, nut cups and candy baskets and help arrange the table. Place cards may have a verse and a drawing, and some have been quite amusing. Julie made one two years ago that had a sketch of a gobbler tangled in a maze, with a jingle: "Try to find the turkey."

Tricia often decorates the nut cups and candy baskets with drawings and cutouts of Pilgrims and turkeys. The girls are not artists, but they are handy and imaginative and we encourage this. I like doing things like that myself. When I was their age we couldn't afford special decorations in our home, and I learned to make many pretty and useful items.

The girls make all their holiday and birthday cards, and even the fancy wrappings for gifts to their pets.

For our Thanksgiving centerpiece I use a china horn of plenty which Tricia and Julie fill with a fruit arrangement of oranges, apples, grapes, bananas; perhaps several juicy pears. I think a good dinner should be a visual treat too.

We don't dress up much for our family dinners. This Thanksgiving the girls perhaps will wear their little dark cotton dresses—not fussy but neat and nice. I like to wear a shirtwaist dress of some pretty fabric and color. This year I have one in turquoise-blue silk. I like all colors, but the green blues are my favorites.

Our Thanksgiving menus are simple; no preliminary courses. The silver tray to my tea set is just the right size for serving the rather small, plump turkey we like, so I use it. Tricia and Julie always have a lot of fun watching the turkey, roasted to a rich brown, being brought in. Quite a transformation from the cold, pale bird they helped me shop for at the market. We have sage-and-celery dressing and cranberry sauce with the turkey. The girls always want fruit salad, so we often serve that. The vegetables usually are peas in butter sauce, and whipped mashed potatoes.

Our dinner begins with saying grace, at which we all take turns. The last few years the girls have offered theirs in the form of reverent little verses they have written. Last year Julie's began:

On Thanksgiving Day
We gather to pray.
We give Thee thanks and praise.
Please bless us all our days!

After grace is said Dick carves the turkey. He is quite good at it, too, after all his years of experience. He doesn't have to be told which part each one of us prefers. Julie and I are the drumstick people, and Julie wants the thigh with hers. Dick and Tricia like the white meat.

For dessert we have both mince and pumpkin pie. The girls like pumpkin, and about twice a year—at Thanksgiving and Christmas—I get hungry for mince pie. Dick is fond of both pumpkin and mince and he takes a small piece of each.

Checkers, our dog, and the cats, Nicky, Puff and Donna, enjoy holidays, too, because the girls feed them titbits all day long. Donna will come in for extra attention this Thanksgiving because she has just added six little kittens to our household.

After dinner we traditionally have a songfest with Dick at the piano. Sometimes Tricia and Julie present a little play which carries out the Thanksgiving theme.

Another of the day's activities is a telephone call t "Nana," Dick's mother in California, if she can't be wit us. The whole family shares in this long-distance visi

Dick and I have been far away on a few Thanksgivin days. Those years the family dinner had to be postponed but always on our return, however late, we have had Thanksgiving celebration with the girls.

We were in Burma in 1953, where we gave a Thanks giving dinner with turkey and all the trimmings for th president of Burma and government officials. They love it and we were happy to bring them this bit of America Wherever we go we like to take examples of our tradi tions. For the Burma dinner we took the turkey and th cranberries right along with us.

Year before last we were in London on Thanksgivin Day, and again we gave a typical American dinner, thi time for Queen Elizabeth, at the American embassy. The queen seemed to enjoy the dinner as much as we did an stayed with us until after midnight.

My loneliest Thanksgiving was in 1944 when my hus band was with the Navy in the Pacific. I was working i San Francisco. Overseas mail was often delayed durin the war and I had not received any word from Dick fo weeks. Several of the girls at the office invited me to thei family dinners, but somehow I didn't feel like bein around people that day. I stayed home in my one-roon apartment and fixed a sandwich and a cup of coffee on m one gas burner. I really did not want even that. Late in th afternoon, just to get out in the air, I took a ride on th cable car and then came home and wrote Dick a letter. I was a long day.

This year we expect to be home on Thanksgiving fo our usual happy day and family dinner. The girls and I will be thankful for the high honor that has come to Dick. We will be thankful that here in our country the Amer ican dream can still come true, that regardless of growin up in humble circumstances one can still aspire to th highest office of his country. May that never change!

Next year? I always live for the present. But wherever we are, or in whatever capacity Dick is serving, I would earnestly hope to keep our Thanksgiving the same special day it always has been for us, a day on which we give thanks not only for the blessings we have as a family, but also for the freedoms that bless all Americans. Added to this will be our prayers for peace and freedom throughout the world.

As told to Hazel Markel

WHAT IT MEANS TO US

Te Richard M. Nixons spend as many holidays as they can with daughters Tricia (ally Patricia, after her mother) and Julie at home in Washington, D. C.

Democratic candidate John F. Kennedy, three-year-old daughter Caroline and wife Jacqueline join eighteen Kennedy relatives in a family Thanksgiving.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Jacqueline Kennedy tells how all the Kennedys celebrate Thanksgiving as a family.*

Jack and I think Thanksgiving is for your parents, Christmas for your own children," Jacqueline Kennedy said. As they have since they were children, the Kennedy family, as many as can, come home for Thanksgiving to Hyannis Port, Massachusetts, to the big frame house Jack's father built in the 20's. "I don't know when or how we'll get there this year," she continued, "but I'm sure we'll be there if we possibly can."

Their own four-bedroom cottage is a stone's throw from the bay, its sweeping back lawn connecting with the senior Kennedys' garden and also with brother Bob's.

As well as Jack and Jacqueline, Bob and his wife, Jean Kennedy Smith and her husband and Edward "Teddy" Kennedy and his wife are expected. The three other daughters are too far away to make the trip.

Jean and Teddy and their families will stay at the senior Kennedys' ten-bedroom, sprawling house. The broad veranda faces the Sound, a flag flies in the front yard, the basement contains a small motion-picture theater, the back yard a baseball and football field for children. It is casual, comfortable and luxurious all at once.

On Thursday, the 24th of November, the mahogany table in the ivory-and-gold dining room will be set for the ten adults. Jack's daughter Caroline, Bob's seven children, Jean's two and Teddy's one eat at Bob's house.

"We eat at one that day," Jacqueline said. "In ancient sweaters and skirts and heavy walking shoes. And though we're all adults, we're not formal—we sit where we please." However, no one usurps Mr. Kennedy's chair at the head of the table or Mrs. Kennedy's opposite. Four straight silver candlesticks frame the centerpiece of gourds, fruit, autumn leaves and a baby pumpkin. Linen is heavy white damask. The service is Victorian sterling. China is Lenox, ivory edged with gold, bought by Mrs. Kennedy when Mr. Kennedy was ambassador to the Court of St. James's. Beside each sparkling crystal water goblet stands a crystal tumbler for the milk the Kennedy men drink in vast quantities.

There are no drinks first, no champagne, no wines and no ash trays at the table. The senior Kennedys neither drink nor smoke. Their children like an occasional cocktail, cigarette or cigar, but they keep Thanksgiving dinner their parents' way.

As they come in, the first course is awaiting them at their places. If the day is cold, it is hot clam broth; if warm, chilled tomato juice.

There is a moment of bowed heads while Mr. Kennedy says the customary Catholic Thanksgiving grace: "Bless us O Lord and these Thy gifts which we are about to receive from Thy bounty through Christ our Lord. Amen."

Then, as they drink their clam broth or tomato juice the parlormaid circles the table with the big, butter-browned turkey, garnished with parsley, riding on a silver platter. She stops now and again so all may see it and then takes it out. After removing the used plates, replacing them with dinner plates, she brings back its twin, pre-carved in the kitchen, and passes it. "They all like the same thing—the white meat," Mrs. Ziptha Anderson, the Kennedys' cook for twenty-one years, explains. "So we have two twenty-two-pound birds each year."

After the turkey is served, gravy follows bread stuffing, homemade cranberry sauce, mashed sweet potatoes with marshmallow topping, creamed onions, buttered string beans. Side dishes of celery and raw, crisped carrots are placed on the table, corn muffins are available on request and there are mugs of cider on a tray on the sideboard.

Mr. Kennedy leads the conversation, peppering his sons with questions, mostly about politics, and arguing cheerfully when he disagrees. "It is fascinating talk," Jacqueline commented. "Always full of fresh news. Although we eight all live in Washington we have our own friends and don't see each other often. And Mother and Father Kennedy are away during the summer on the Riviera."

After the main course, come apple pie, pumpkin pie, vanilla or chocolate ice cream, chocolate or butterscotch sauce. Jack likes both kinds of ice cream with plenty of chocolate sauce; Jacqueline likes pumpkin pie—it was added to the menu six years ago after she said that it was her favorite Thanksgiving dessert. Coffee is served in large cups, at the table, but soon the family begins to drift away. The women gather on the sun porch. The men move toward the television room where the shades are drawn and the fire blazing, and tune in on a football game until three-thirty or four, when the children begin to stroll in.

"Father Kennedy can't go on watching the game when they arrive. He takes such an interest in each one of them," Jacqueline says. "So often now we go for a walk along the beach or start to play games."

Some days it has been calm enough to take out the old, battered sailboat that once was Jack's, and give the bigger children a ride. Sometimes little Bob organizes a game of baseball that includes anyone who wants to play, with grandfather umpiring, coaching, cheerleading and, from time to time, fielding. Once the older Kennedys played touch football after dinner, but those days have passed.

It has been an early day for all, but no one shows it. "We are a sturdy lot," Jacqueline says. Caroline has roused her that morning, and by nine she has cooked Jack his favorite holiday breakfast: bacon, eggs, waffles with Vermont maple syrup. The others have gone to early Mass, but the Jack Kennedys prefer this day to go at ten or eleven in leisurely fashion. Because they take their main meals at the big house, they bring no servants with them on Thanksgiving visits. This year they may hire a girl to baby-sit and wash up during their short stay.

"Every year it is a little different," Jacqueline says. "But somehow, always wonderfully the same."

About five in the afternoon, the children are fed at the big house on cold turkey, salad, leftover ice cream and pie. Mrs. Anderson has gone home by now, but she has left behind her a buffet in the pantry. When Caroline has eaten, her parents coax her home to bed.

"She always tells Jack a story when he puts her to bed; then he tells her one. But I still have to read to her, it's part of her ritual. Right now she likes the same book, over and over: Madeleine. She gets indignant when I try anything else or forget one word of it."

After she is asleep and the sitter in charge, they walk back to the big house. "We squash awful old rain hats on our heads if it's raining." It is now about eight.

Jacqueline is expecting her second baby soon. "I suppose the doctor might tell me that there must be no traveling, but I can't believe he will keep us away from the place Jack and I both love most to come back to."

The big family eats supper that night sitting around the fire in the library or the living room, still arguing, discussing. At eleven they tune in the news and then, unless something surprising has happened to start them talking again, they get ready to go. Jack bends to kiss his mother and his father rises and follows them to the door.

There will, of course, be changes if Sen. Jack Kennedy becomes President-elect. There will be Secret Service men accompanying him and his wife—even on Thanksgiving Day some sight-seers will be poking through Hyannis Port. It is possible, although not probable, that his family may treat him differently if he is their elected leader. But neither Jack nor his wife can imagine the changes now, no matter how hard they are striving for them. This is their traditional Thanksgiving Day, the day they hope to keep a warmly private, family day.

As told to Joan Younger

Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson

Mrs. Johnson likes beige both summer and winter. It will go with almost any other color and is especially pretty with her bright red coat from last season.

She depends on this black-and-white jacket dress constantly—especially when she has had to travel. "A wide skirt for getting on and off planes."

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

This long white satin gown was bought at one of Mrs. Johnson's favorite post-Christmas sales. "My long red satin dress was a sale dress too."

Fashion is not only new clothes

"I like clothes I can depend on. They should be few in number, easy to care for, and take well to lots of travel. I don't like clothes that must be 'babied.'" Mrs. Lyndon Johnson follows this philosophy when choosing her clothes and defeats the usual problem of "what to wear" with pre-season planning. Early in the fall she sets aside one day "which sometimes runs into a day and a half" and decides exactly what she needs to add to her wardrobe. Then, "The last week in December I always attend the sales and round out my wardrobe with perhaps two more costumes when ordinarily I would feel I should buy only one."

For this fall, Mrs. Johnson added a beige jersey dress and a black silk jacket dress "so easy to change around. I can wear the costume to a luncheon and through the day, take off the jacket for evening wear." She counted on the following already in her wardrobe: two suits—black and charcoal-gray wool; a lightweight jacket dress in black-and-white plaid; beige silk daytime dress; three short costumes for evening—green silk jacket dress, white chiffon and a black crepe dress; two long gowns—a white satin and a red satin; a red wool coat and a small white fur piece for an evening cover-up.

The contrast and balance between black and bright color are typical of Mrs. Johnson's wardrobe choices. "Black is almost inescapable, it's so dependable." But her real love, and what has turned out to be just as "dependable," is color. At the convention, she depended on a bright red silk suit and a yellow one for daytime, two colors of which she is especially fond. In the winter season one of her CONTINUED ON PAGE 162

Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge

Mrs. Lodge added this vibrant pink wool suit to her wardrobe last year. "I like to accessorize it with black." The large inexpensive fur hat was new this fall.

One of her favorite evening dresses, a sea-green silk; Mrs. Lodge likes to add a pink or a white stole. "I always add flowers to the neckline."

The black-and-white tweed suit is one of Mrs. Lodge's favorites and is four years old. "I usually wear a white scarf or blouse, add a red flower."

i's the way you wear the ones you have.

By BET HART

"Just because a costume is several years old, it doesn't mean it's out of style. A good classic will go on for years." And Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge feels this way about many dresses now in her wardrobe. Because of them she could say, "I really don't need anything more this fall," even though she knew it would be a busy one.

Mrs. Lodge already had three suits ranging from one to four years old: a black-and-white tweed, a black wool, and a bright pink wool. These with three basic dresses in beige jersey, black jersey and gray flannel she counted on for daytime wear. For evening, Mrs. Lodge had a black crepe and a patterned silk as well as two long gowns: a white silk jersey and a pale green silk. In coats she had a red wool bought four years ago, a black fur and a short fake fur jacket that "I wear with everything day and evening."

Mrs. Lodge did succumb to one new suit: a taupe knit that would be good for her constant traveling. This costume and most of her others are moderately priced clothes she has bought in the stores. "In this country there are so many good-looking clothes to choose from that are well made and not expensive." To fill out her wardrobe, Mrs. Lodge does have a costume made from time to time. One of her most loved is a short dress for evenings made from fabric given to her by a friend. "It was a length of lovely black Indian silk with a woven design." She had it made into the simplest of sheaths and has depended upon it so often "I am afraid it will be completely worn out too soon."

Mrs. Lodge is tall—5′ 10″—and slim. She favors narrow skirts for her well-loved casual clothes and for dressy CONTINUED ON PAGE 162

Operation Terror

SYNOPSIS • FBI agent John Ripley now knows the identity of the killer who has threatened Kelly Sherwood, attractive twenty-six-year-old bank teller, and her sister Toby, seventeen. He is Red Dillon, convicted rapist and wanted murderer.

Dillon is a suspect in the recent murder of his sister, call girl Nancy Ashton, who was about to give information to the FBI. One of his runners has also killed Popcorn, the derelict informer co-operating with the authorities. The FBI's only real lead is a Japanese-American, Sheri Kimura, who admits that Dillon has paid hospital bills for her crippled son, Joey, six. A toy tiger that Dillon gave the boy is being traced.

Disguised as a woman, Dillon accosts Kelly in the rest room of a restaurant and instructs her to put $100,000 of the bank's money in her purse at closing time Friday. Only Mr. Burkhardt, bank manager, knows of the plan. Kelly has been warned against telling Pete Morrow, the man in the escrow department whom she dates.

Ripley, with the devoted assistance of Peg, FBI receptionist, is keeping close reins on the bizarre case.

After school Friday, Toby and her high-school beau, Jack, are at the Hangout, where she receives a telephone call. It is the killer telling Toby that her sister has been shot accidentally. "Somebody's got to get her to a hospital," he says, and gives her the location of his car.

By THE GORDONS

CONCLUSION • Stunned, Toby clung a moment to the receiver, gripping it hard, because she must hold on to something. The man continued quickly:

"You come by yourself. If you bring the cops here, she's going to get it right away. You hang up, walk out the back door, turn right and head down the street until you come to Cedros. I'm telling you again, if any cops follow you, or your boy friend or anyone, you won't be seeing your sister alive again. Just remember I'm watching you, everything you do in there. If you dial a number or say a word to anybody—anybody at all—I'm giving it to your sister right through the heart with a shotgun, or don't you know what happens when a shotgun hits you?"

He hung up abruptly.

Where her mind had been there were only bombed-out walls and rubble. Sis was dying somewhere. . . .

She burst out the door, hitting it with her body. Heads turned, and the waitress called for her not to tear the place down. Frantically she glanced around for Jack, saw the two Cokes on the table, and then saw Jack briefly up front with three other students . . . barely caught a glimpse of him before two tall fellows coming her way screened her off.

If you say anything to anyone . . . to anyone ——

She swung about so suddenly she collided with the fry cook, going out the back door. He swore at her CONTINUED ON PAGE 85

Kelly was alone in the long, murky tunnel. Midway through, steps tapped behind her. She sent a glance backward over her shoulder.

Copyright © 1960 by Mildred and Gordon Gordon.
The complete book is soon to be published by Doubleday & Co., Inc.

LET'S MAKE IT SAFE TO SEND OUR CHILDREN TO BIG CITY SCHOOLS

By Ruth Anne Carew

Bad conditions exist in many of our big city schools because the public does not know about them. Many city school administrators seek the easy way of concealing their problems from the public. Read this article by an experienced teacher and resolve to take action!

Each time little Renata comes up to my desk to have her work checked she strokes my cheek, fixes her liquid black eyes on me and murmurs, "I love you—you're gorgeous!" A strange attitude for a nine-year-old to have toward her teacher? Not if you knew Renata. For that child hungers for love to a degree that has to be seen to be believed.

Renata's skin is a honey brown, her black eyes big and sparkling. Her mother, a white woman, is currently married to a white man with whom she has had two white children. Where does Renata fit into this picture? She doesn't. Renata, literally the black sheep, is the product of an earlier liaison, according to her mother. Renata doesn't bear the same surname as her sisters and knows their father is not hers. Since she was very curious to know who her real father was, her mother, a rather harsh and insensitive person, once handed her a picture of a Mexica Indian. "There," she said. "That's your father."

Since her marriage and the birth of her later children, Renata's mother woul like nothing so much as to get rid of Renata. She forces her to do the heavies household work. For the slightest disobedience she cruelly threatens to "send he away." This threat colors Renata's whole life.

Because of her dark skin she neither is nor feels accepted by her immedia family. As a matter of fact, she senses quite correctly that the whole block is pointin a finger at her, the colored child in a white family. She is also, of course, not accepte by the white children in school. Yet, because of her "Indian" blood, she openl snubs the three Negro girls in the class, who regularly beat her up after schoo

Belonging nowhere, Renata has two avenues of escape. She regales us with tal boastful tales of her life among the Indians. She recounts, with a wealth of vivi detail, stories of a trip she had made by donkey across the desert from Mexico t California. Her father, an expert jewelry maker who also served as tourist guid made many trips up and down the Grand Canyon by donkey. On one of these trip the animal fell. She had tears in her eyes as she relived her father's death. He true Indian name, we were informed, was "Little Firefly." Even I partially believed her until her mother told me that Renata had never met her father and had never been out of the state. The story was one she had read.

"As class size increases th teacher spends more tim controlling and less in teach ing." —District Principa

Renata's other method of escape is through dancing. I was delighted to let h dance at our talent show because she so obviously needed approval. Her dan turned out to be somewhat orgiastic, if such a thing can be imagined of a nin year-old. Her mother paid me a prompt call after the dance. On no account, and n matter how much Renata pleaded, was I ever to allow Renata to dance again. Sh was using dancing, I was told, for exhibitionistic purposes, to attract sexual a gression. The mother was quite certain that Renata was sexually precocious.

Recently, following the sound of her giggles, she had tracked her down to th dark boiler room with the furnace man. Another time it was the electrician. Eve at her seat in school Renata, I began to notice, frequently raises her skirts an rolls her eyes suggestively. The boy she invariably attracts is Dan, whom you w meet in a few minutes. Dan, after several minutes of teasing, beats her. Yet th following week she is at it again.

Renata's future looks bleak. Yet I know that if she could have at least one co structive relationship with an adult who loves her she could still be saved. I ach to give her some of this love. But with 38 other children in the room, how can Lately it seems I rarely pick up a newspaper or magazine that doesn't mentio either the teacher shortage or an impending teachers' strike. For this reason thought parents might like to know why I, after nine years of teaching, felt com pelled to leave a big-city school system.

The answer is Renata. Dozens of Renatas. Hundreds of them. Classes of children, many with severe emotional disturbances, each child requiring all m love, all my undivided attention, all of them tearing me apart.

Renata is just one fairly typical pupil in one of my typical fourth grades. Wou you like to meet another? There is Mark, sitting in the back row. He is that sort lopsided boy with the blond, shaggy hair falling into his eyes. His head is held one side and he walks with a unique, springy shuffle, never lifting his feet from t ground. His shoulders are hunched forward; his long arms hang to his knees.

Mark almost never speaks, so it is very difficult to discover what is botheri him. His most disturbing symptom is that he invariably holds small hard objects his mouth. These may be paper clips, thumbtacks or other articles. Since a coup of the boys are likely to punch anyone at any time without warning, I live constant dread that Mark will be punched one day and swallow his thumbtac

In desperation, I finally found a solution. Here is a scene from my former classroom:

ME: I'd like to hang up that poster. Does anyone have any thumbtacks? Mark, do you?

MARK: (Nods.)

ME (brightly): Wonderful. Will you give them to me?

MARK: (Shakes his head.)

ME: But Mark, I need them. (With bright idea.) Will you sell them to me? I'll give you a penny for each tack.

MARK: (Reluctantly takes one tack out of his mouth.)

ME: Fine. Here's another penny. Give me another tack.

MARK: (Slowly takes a second one out.)

ME (estimating how many more he can possibly have): Now I need two more. Here are the two pennies.

MARK: (Takes out only one.)

ME: Oh, is that all you have? (It seems to me he still has something in his mouth.)

MARK: (Shakes his head.)

ME: Oh, I see. You want more money for the last one. Here are two pennies.

MARK: (Takes out the last thumbtack.)

ME: Now open up your mouth. (I am finally satisfied he has no more.)

When I gave Mark an Unsatisfactory in "Getting along with other children," an illogical mark since he had never taken yet to any of them, it provoked a super tantrum that lasted over an hour. "I do so get along with other children!" he sobbed, brushing all his books from his desk in a desperate gesture.

"I asked one of my graduate students if he believed in the criminality of some of the emotionally disturbed children. He told me a friend of his had a boy in one of his classes who drew a switchblade knife on him. The juvenile court placed the boy under treatment—whatever that may mean. The boy then entered a city school and in a short time shot two instructors. One of them, the athletic coach, was killed."

From the report of a special reader

Kelly is another illegitimate child whose mother never accepted him. She eventually married, had other children who treated Kelly as a stepchild. However, Kelly is very different from Renata. Where she openly seeks love, Kelly hates the whole world. What Kelly wants desperately is a substitute for mother love, which in his case is my personal undivided classroom attention. I have to ask questions to which Kelly knows the answers, and I have to ask them of Kelly. If I ever try to ask a question of another child, Kelly quickly reminds me of my first duty by banging on his desk with a ruler at ten-second intervals. If, on the other hand, Kelly is first asked a question and misses, woe to the pupil who answers correctly. Kelly, a big boy for his age, makes short shrift of him after school.

No amount of attention and praise suffices. Once when I was giving out stars for good behavior, Kelly, having banged on his desk, did not get one. In a vindictive rage he tore up the notebooks and spattered paint on the desks of the four children who did. (He sneaked back into the school at 3:15 to do this.) In addition, he threw a rock that broke the lunchroom window.

As a sociometric device, I once asked my class to complete the following sentence: "If I could do anything I wanted I would ——" This is how Patricia completed it: "If I could do anything I wanted, I'd kill myself." This girl was by far my most brilliant pupil (she had an I.Q. of 140 and read on an eighth-grade level.) I looked more deeply into her history and uncovered a sad and poignant story.

Patricia's father is Catholic, her mother Jewish. Patricia, nine, has a brother fifteen and a sister of seventeen. When her mother married, she agreed to raise the children in the Catholic faith. As a result, the older brother and sister are

PAUL WING

"Dan stands just as close to me as he can at the board. 'I dare yah to try and make me,' he says. 'I dare yah to hit me.'"

Catholic. However, when Pat was seven the father deserted the family. Now able to follow her own inclinations, the mother determined to turn Pat into a Jewess. Thus, after attending church for the first seven years of her life, and immediately after her confirmation, Pat was suddenly given a Jewish star and sent to classes at a Hebrew school and synagogue.

In addition to the usual conflicts and divided loyalties in any broken home, Pat faces other problems. Her brother and sister scoff at her "Jewishness" and call her "Dirty Jew." Should she conform to their religion to be accepted by them? Or should she conform to her mother's religion? But then hadn't her mother also betrayed her faith? Does she love her mother or hate her? What of her father? What kind of friends should she make? What is she?

Pat's aggression shows itself in sophisticated ways. She writes poison-pen epigrams about her classmates, or draws devastating caricatures of them. Early in the year CONTINUED ON PAGE 137

Miss Happiness & Miss Flower

By RUMER GODDEN

© 1960 by Rumer Godden
Miss Happiness and Miss Flower is soon to be published in book form by Viking Press

The Journal's complete novella

They were two little Japanese dolls, only about five inches hig Their faces and hands were made of white plaster, their bodies of rag, whi meant they could bow most beautifully—and Japanese people bow a gre deal. Their eyes were slits of black glass and they had delicate plaster nos and red painted mouths. Their hair was real, black and straight and cut a fringe. They were exactly alike except that Miss Flower was a little t taller and thinner, Miss Happiness's cheeks were fatter and her red mou was painted in a smile.

They wore thin silk kimonos—a kimono is like a dressing gow with wide-cut sleeves—and they each had a wide sash high up under h arms and folded over into a heavy pad at the back.

Miss Happiness had a red kimono patterned with chrysanthemum Miss Flower's was blue with a pattern of cherry blossom; both their sash were pink and on their feet they had painted white socks and painted sanda with a V-shaped strap across the toes.

They were not new; Miss Flower had a chip out of one ear, h pretty kimono was torn, and the paint had come off one of Miss Happiness shoes. I do not know where they had been all their lives, but when th story begins they had been wrapped in cotton wool and tissue paper, packe in a wooden box tied with red and white strings, wrapped again in brow paper, labeled and stamped and sent all the way from San Francisco i America to England. I do not think they had been asked if they wanted t come—dolls are not asked.

"Where are we now?" asked Miss Flower. "Is it another country?

"I think it is," said Miss Happiness.

"It's strange and cold. I can feel it through the box," said Mi Flower, and she cried, "No one will understand us or know what we wan Oh, no one will ever understand us again!" but Miss Happiness was mo hopeful and more brave.

"I think they will," she said.

"How will they?"

"Because there will be some little girl who is clever and kind."

"Will there be?" asked Miss Flower longingly.

"Yes."

"Why will there be?"

"Because there always has been," said Miss Happiness.

All the same, Miss Flower gave a doll shiver, which means she fe as if she shivered though it could not be seen. Miss Flower was alway frightened; perhaps the child who made the chip in her ear had bee rough. "I wish we had not come," said Miss Flower.

Miss Happiness sighed and said, "We were not asked."

Children are not asked either. No one had asked Nona Fell if sh wanted to be sent from India to live with her uncle and aunt in Englan Everyone had told her she would like it, but, "I don't like it at all," said Non

"Nona is a good name for her," said her youngest cousin, Belind "All she does is to say 'No, no, no' all the time."

With her dark hair and eyes, her thinness, and her skin that wa pale and yellow from living so long in the heat, Nona looked a strange among her pink-checked, fair-haired cousins. There were three of them

Anne, who was fourteen, slim and tall; Tom who was eleven, wit freckles; and Belinda, who was a rough, tough little girl of seven.

Nona was eight. Her mother had died when she was a baby and sh had been brought up by an old ayah—an ayah is an Indian nurse—on h father's tea garden, Coimbatore in Southern India. It had been hot i Coimbatore, the sun had shone almost every day; there had been brigh flowers and fruit, kind brown people and lots of animals. Here it was winte and Nona was always cold. Her cousins laughed at her clothes; it was n wonder, for they had been chosen by old Ayah, who had no idea wha English children wore in England, and Nona had a stiff red velvet dres white socks, black strap shoes and silver bangles. They laughed at the wa she spoke English—which was no wonder, either, for she talked in singsong voice like Ayah. She did not like the food; living in a hot country does not make one hungry and she had not seen porridge, or puddings, or sausages, or buns before, and "No thank you," said Nona. She said "No thank you," too, when anyone asked her to go out, for she had never seen so many buses and cars, vans and bicycles; they went so fast it made her dizzy. She said "No thank you" when her cousins asked her to play; there had been no other English boys and girls in Coimbatore and she had never ridden a bicycle, or roller skated, or played table tennis or rounders, or hide-and-seek, or even card games like snap or beggar-my-neighbor. All she did was to sit and read in a corner or stand by the window and shiver. "And cry," said Belinda. "Crybaby. Cry."

PAINTING BY GLADYS ROCKMORE DAVIS

"Belinda, be kind," said Nona's aunt, who was Belinda's mother. Nona called her Mother too. "Be kind. We must all help her to settle down."

"I don't want her to settle down," said Belinda.

All through Christmas Nona was unhappy and when Christmas was over it was no better. She stood by the window and ran her bangles up and down her wrist, up and down and round and round. They were thin and of Indian silver; she had had them since she was almost a baby and to feel them made her seem closer to Coimbatore.

"Come to the park, Nona. We're going to skate."

"No thank you."

"I'm going to the shops, Nona. Come along."

"No thank you."

"Have some of this nice hot toast."

"No thank you."

At last Mother spoke to her seriously. "You really must try to be happier, Nona. You're not the only small person to come from far away."

"I'm the only one here," said Nona.

The house was a magic house. Love built it and left no room for loneliness.

At that moment the bell pinged and the postman's rat-tat sounded at the door and, "You go," said Mother to Nona.

When Nona opened the front door the postman gave her a brown paper parcel. It had American stamps, it felt like a box and was very light. I wonder if you can guess what it was.

Nona took the parcel and brought it to Mother. Written on it was "The Misses Fell."

"It's for Anne and Belinda," said Nona.

"It might be for you as well," said Mother. "You are a Miss Fell."

"Am I?" asked Nona in surprise.

"Don't you know your own name, stupid?" asked Belinda.

Nona shook her head. Ayah used to call her Little Missy, but no one in Coimbatore had called her Miss Fell.

"It's from Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson," said Mother, looking at the writing. "It must be a late Christmas present."

"A late Christmas present! A late Christmas present!" shouted Belinda and she shouted for Anne to come.

"Undo it, Nona," said Tom.

"Why should Nona ——" began Belinda.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

Once you start being brave you have to go on, thought Nona.

"Immortal simplicity" is always good fashion, says—

GIVENCHY

From Givenchy's world-famous Boutique in Paris, Wilhela Cushman has chosen for Journal readers these simple wearable clothes whose adaptations will be available in the U.S.A. Here in his own word is Hubert de Givenchy's fashion philosophy

"My boutique customers all have one thing i common: a sort of self-assurance and a fee ing of security which has nothing to do with fam or fortune, rather with an inner conviction whic transcends 'seasonal' fashions. From the boutiqu they expect to have a kind of immortal simplicity a pureness of line and silhouette, almost witho fashion whatsoever.

"Some of them depend on their natural beaut to set off their clothes (this is especially true American women with their fine figures, wonde ful natural complexions and beautiful hair) others count on their own jewels, or fabulou 'fake' jewelry, and gay hats to add 'dash' or 'zip But all of them are unhesitant in their selectio and very true to their own particular type.

"Some of the customers are the richest wome in the world, while others, especially the youn ones, might save money for months to make carefully planned purchase of a basic wool-jerse dress. It is this latter customer for whom I hav

The seasonless ¾ coat in neutral gray, a matching skirt, white jersey overblouse, white kidskin hat.

Beautiful featherweight sleeveless red wool with a wra around belt — dress-up, dress-down, day-to-night fashio

PHOTOGRAPHS BY KUBLIN

l-around, year-around gray jacket dress with gold buttons, merican classic.

At home anywhere in the world: damask ankle-length hostess dress.

Paris pink, party pink—short dance dress of silk faille with a ribbon waistline.

Five-o'clock black—a two-piece silk ribbon knit with satin half belt. Right: Ponyskin jacket over daytime jersey.

Two-piece beige jersey with a hand-knit waistline—city-wise, travel-wise. Matching beret to wear half a dozen ways.

DRAWING BY CHAVARRI

reatest admiration. I am
's surprised at her restraint ow carefully she plans her wardrobe.
customer takes her veñdeuse into her lence, explains she is buying a bright dress company the coat she bought last
n. I enjoy tremendously this contact our habitual clients. Their point of view beral education as to how a woman s, and a couturier needs this contact.
cause of this, my boutique has become very
' in concept. I try to make no fashion point.
k of my customer, her life, her needs.
any of my boutique customers often need a n which will take them from morning to without ostentation.
suppose it sounds silly to say, but my ue customers perhaps give less time to n, but a lot more thought."

These Givenchy Boutique fashions are available in American versions in American stores.

Christmas Boutique

Here is a potpourri of ideas designed to stimulate your imagination for Christmas giving. This year you will find fur fabrics galore that lend themselves to the most amusing gifts. And they are surprisingly easy to sew. A leopard jacket lined in a bright color is very chic. A zebra print skirt, Vogue Design No. 9925, can be a warm cozy conversation piece. Think how gay a fur collar for a cashmere sweater would be, or a hat, Vogue Design No. 5094, in a pastel fur fabric. Bags are effective and easy to make. Either cover a frame or make a soft pouch. Pillows covered in fake fur are nice for the fireside — three different sizes in the same fur fabric would be a fun idea. Delight your family and friends by giving something you have made yourself. The girl's jacket is Vogue Design No. 5150. Her skirt, No. 9786. Wear with a black sweater.

Ticking is a durable, inexpensive (79 cents per yard, comes in six color combinations) fabric that has a style of its own. It lends itself to fashion as well as decorating, and there are all sorts of ways of using it for Christmas presents. We think one of the most amusing ideas is to use it as a background for brilliant felt or fabric appliqués (for a skirt, a wall hanging or a pillow). Trimmed with black braid, it lends itself just as well to an "at home" jacket lined in a bright red or to a wastebasket or a book cover. Place mats appliquéd with Christmas trees are very easy to make and one yard will make four . . . fringed cocktail napkins are even easier and you can make six from just a quarter of a yard. The girl's black jersey culottes and matching top are Vogue Design No. 5123. Her jacket, Design No. 5150.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

views and further information about ticking ideas, turn to page 93.

tterns copyright © 1960 by the Condé blications, Inc. All rights reserved.

Christmas Boutique for Children

Every Christmas list has its share of children's names. An evening of your sewing time would take care of several last-minute ideas. For a little girl, a cloth doll with yarn hair, a saucy rosebud pussy cat, a Christmas nightgown and one for her doll, gay appliquéd aprons, or a snug little hood in fur cloth or felt. For a little boy, a cuddly Humpty Dumpty, a cozy pair of pajamas or a giant-sized fur-cloth ball that serves as a pillow. Most are Vogue patterns, and for back views, and further information about those that are not, turn to page 108. By NORA O'LEARY Pattern Editor

Copyright © 1959, 1960 by The Condé Nast Publications, Inc. All rights reserved.

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

Holiday Separates

Last month we introduced Martha Wolford as our Barbara Journal. For her first fall investment she chose a black-and-white wool jacket dress. Martha already had a black winter coat which she planned to wear another fall-and-winter season. With these two good basics in her wardrobe, she wanted to add glamour for holiday parties and entertaining at home. The solution she found in separates: and by making them all, she had an unlimited number of pretty looks without spending too many fashion $'s at all. Barbara J., fashionwise, always gets the most out of everything, and her two extra dividends now are: her new wool skirt to double for office wear . . . her sweater and shirt, perfect to duplicate for Christmas giving. By BET HART

COPYRIGHT © 1959, 1960 BY THE CONDE NAST PUBLICATIONS, INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

Martha chose one quick-in-the-making skirt pattern and made it twice. This version for a dressed-up look is in heavy white faille and has two deep inverted pleats front and back. The top is black jersey and has a low scooped back. Martha accessorizes with bright pink. Skirt is Vogue's "Very Easy to Make" Design No. 9925 and costs $5.80 to make. Blouse is Vogue Design No. 9810* and is $4.60 to make.*

*For other views, sizes and prices, see page 120.

Another evening, not so formal, Martha wears the skirt with a trimmed sweater. This one, shortened to a pretty jacket length, has narrow white braid and frogs. Braid. 15 cents a yard; frogs, 59 cents each.

Same skirt pattern, different version with soft gathers at the waistline. This time Martha chose mauve wool and added more color with her turquoise cardigan with a wide collar. Sweater to make is Journal Design No. 2916†. Martha might splurge once and make it in mohair. $13.00; make it again in wool, $8.00. Skirt costs her $7.80.

†Order from Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Phila. 5, Pa., 25 cents. Penna. residents add 4% Penna. sales tax.

A still brighter addition, Vogue's "Easy to Make" shirt, Design No. 9485 in bright pink cotton and rayon. Martha can wear it with this skirt or her white one. Price to make, $2.75.*

Martha wears the sweater buttoned, the neckline closed. To add more glamour, she might use a gold or jeweled pin to accent pretty collar detail.

Celebrity Slim-down

Slender, shapely feminine figures—firm, muscular masculine physiques; they don't just "come naturally." By the nature of their profession, glamorous stars of stage and screen often find it necessary to work harder than most people to perfect their measurements and maintain their best weights. Here are six celebrities who tell how they stay young and attractive as the children come along and the years roll by!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

"I dieted and lost 35 pounds in three months." says dancer-actress Mitzi Gaynor. "and the first thing I noticed when I got down to my present 115 pounds was that I have eyes! At 150 I was a fat-face. My hips measured 40", my clothes were dowdy, my outlook dismal. An actress, say nothing of a dancer, who weighs 150 pounds is not much of a beauty bargain.

"I started gaining weight at a time when I was out of work and bored. But of course the more I ate the less chance I had of having anyone wave a glamorous movie contract in front of me. It was a vicious circle which I never started to unwind and straighten out until one July day when I was looking longingly at some fashion pictures of slinky bathing suits. 'How I wish I could wear one of those.' I sighed wistfully in the presence of my husband, Jack Bean, who was then my fiancé. 'Lose some weight and you will.' he suggested hopefully. In that instant the thought thundered through my head that I was not only a bulgy disappointment to myself but to my family and fiancé as well. I started dieting that very day and by September (still swimming weather in California) I was wearing my pretty bathing suit with Jack beaming as proudly as I.

Mitzi after diet: bust, 37"; waist, 21"; hips, 36".

"My diet, which consisted of 850 calories a day, was supplemented with prescribed amounts of vitamins and minerals, and heartily approved by my weight-minded doctor. The first week I thought I'd die of hunger, but from then on was easy and I never once went off the diet."

Here is one of Mitzi's typical diet days: Brea fast: ½ grapefruit or 4 ounces orange juice; soft-cooked eggs; coffee, black, with a sug substitute. Lunch: ½ small broiled chicken

Jane Powell, slender as ever, after her three childr

2 small lamb chops or broiled chopped steak steak); fresh green or yellow vegetable; ½ h lettuce with diet dressing: low-fat milk; t plain. Dinner provided the same selections lunch, with the exception that Mitzi allow herself a dessert—usually a small portion dietetic applesauce or fruit. When she ate restaurants and meat portions were larger th those she allowed herself at home, practi Mitzi had the waiter wrap up half her porti which she took with her to eat the next day.

"I'll never forget going to my studio for first time after having reduced," Mitzi says. wore a knit suit—the fat girl's dream fashion and I had had my hair cut and more fashiona styled. My fingernails were a pretty length (I them as a fatty) and on them I wore a smash pink polish. I was a sensation, if you will forg me for saying so! People who had known me years didn't recognize me. Movie parts w quickly forthcoming.

"Nowadays I maintain my weight by eat small portions of just about anything I want. my present 115 pounds, I am not only a happ but a better person. Being able to forget mys I find that I am more vitally interested in work, my family and my friends. The bigg thrill, of course, is knowing of the pride wh my husband has in me and my accomplishmen ave to diet to stay slim," says movie star Jane vell, "and the easiest way for me to do it is lan ahead, and budget my calories." As a lt, Jane maintains her 21" waistline and l weight (she's tiny) of 100 pounds. "I'm 5'1¼" tall," adds Jane, who in private life Irs. Pat Nerney, mother of the three children ured with her on opposite page. "If I go over pounds I look like a chipmunk."

ne's stay-slender system is to limit herself 000 calories a day during the week so that can, if she wants, splurge on weekends. If knows she is going to a party on a Friday, instance, she cuts down on preceding at- e meals in order to enjoy, but not subse- ntly lament, eating whatever goodies her ess offers. "I don't believe dieting needs to torturous," Jane says, "and I prove it to elf by always having one dessert a day." It be fruit, stewed or fresh, gelatin or a simple ard, but if it is something rich—"chocolate is my weakness"—then she delights in ng a small portion. "Just a sliver of some- g wonderful satisfies my sweet tooth."

Theodore Bikel lost 30 pounds the hard way—dieting!

typical day's menu for this successful figure her consists of: Breakfast: fruit or juice, hot ttered protein toast, tea with lemon. Lunch: ge cheese with fruit (canned dietetic). hopped-steak patties with tossed salad and calorie dressing, nonfat milk and plain toasted kers. Dinners at home are varied family-type ers, "sometimes exotic" because Jane loves ok and try unusual recipes. "But even these 't fattening for me," she explains, "because I simply limit myself to small portions so that my day's calorie count won't exceed 1000."

Jane's prettily proportioned figure (bust, 33"; waist, 21"; hips, 34") is kept firm with daily exercises. "I'd have to be sick not to exercise each morning," she says. Stretches, pulls, bends, rolls, kicks are all included. She does them for 15 minutes at a time to the tune of radio music which, she says, "makes exercising more pleasant as well as more rhythmical and beneficial."

For the overweight man in the house who takes a dim view of dieting, we present the following interview. With it, you may find reason to continue to indulge your belief—but not your appetite.

"What was the most amusing incident connected with your diet to lose 30 pounds?" we asked Theodore Bikel, who plays opposite Mary Martin in the Broadway musical, The Sound of Music.

"There is nothing amusing about dieting," the 6'1½"-tall Mr. Bikel answered glumly.

"How did you have the will power to stick to a mere 1000 calories a day for 40 days?"

Postnatal exercises keep Ursula Thiess Taylor lovely.

"It wasn't all will power," he assured us, "it was with the specific help of an appetite deterrent prescribed by my doctor."

"Now that you have reduced from 230 pounds to 200 pounds, how do you feel?" we persisted, determined to get something upbeat on diet from this handsome leading man.

"The same as I did when I weighed 230," he replied, "only hungrier."

"What did you eat during your diet?"

"Mostly broiled meats, vegetables and fruit for lunch and dinner, with fruit juice, eggs, skim milk and plain coffee for breakfast."

"Did you ever cheat?"

"Sometimes, but only to increase portions of the diet foods, not to indulge in forbidden foods such as breads, fats, sweets and so on."

"What is your biggest reward for dieting?"

"Keep physically active" says Ginger Rogers.

"I can buy ready-made clothes. Before, I had to have them made to order, which was expensive and time-consuming."

"How do you maintain your reduced weight?"

"After one spends weeks living on less, the old fat-making foods are not as tempting as they used to be."

"Did you exercise during your diet?"

"I'd rather stop eating altogether than do exercises ——"

We hastily interrupted with, "What reaction have your family and friends had about your new appearance?"

"Some think I look better now," he told us. As our diet-hearted spirits soared he added, "But others think I looked better before."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

GRAPH OF THEODORE BIKEL BY ROGER PRIGENT.
H PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOHN ENGSTEAD.

rah's ancestors had been,
y likely, hunters and robbers
he Highlands,
l possibly pirates on the Red Sea.

By ISAK DINESEN

In turn-of-the-century Africa,
European settlers believed a house without a Somali was like a house without a lamp.

FARAH

A master storyteller pays tribute to her trusted servant.

YRIGHT © 1960 BY ISAK DINESEN
STORY WILL APPEAR IN THE NEW COLLECTION
SAK DINESEN STORIES, "SHADOWS ON THE GRASS," TO BE PUBLISHED BY RANDOM HOUSE, INC.

As here, after twenty-five years, I again take up episodes of my life in Africa, one figure, straight, candid and very fine to look at, stands as doorkeeper to all of them: my Somali servant, Farah Aden.

Farah came to meet me in Aden in 1913, before the First World War. For almost eighteen years he ran my house, my stables and safaris. I talked to him about my worries as about my successes, and he knew of all that I did or thought. Farah, by the time I had had to give up the farm and was leaving Africa, saw me off in Mombasa. And as I watched his dark, immovable figure on the quay growing smaller and at last disappear, I felt as if I were losing a part of myself, as if I were having my right hand cut off, and from now on would never again ride a horse or shoot with a rifle, nor be able to write otherwise than with my left hand. Neither have I since then ridden or shot.

In order to form and make up a unity, in particular a creative unity, the individual components must needs be of different nature; they should even be in a sense contrasts. Man and woman become one, a physically and spiritually creative unity, by virtue of their dissimilarity. A hook and an eye are a unity, a fastening; but with two hooks you can do nothing. A right-hand glove with its contrast the left-hand glove makes up a whole, a pair of gloves; but two right-hand gloves you throw away. A number of perfectly similar objects do not make up a whole—a couple of cigarettes may just as well be three or nine. A quartet is a unity because it is made up of dissimilar instruments. An orchestra is a unity, and may be perfect as such, but twenty double basses striking up the same tune are chaos.

Within the literature of the ages one particular unity, made up of essentially different parts, makes its appearance: that of master and servant. We have met the two in rhyme, blank verse and prose, and in the varying costumes of the centuries. Here wanders the prophet Elisha with his servant Gehazi—between whom one would

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

Television critic John Crosby believes that television programs will improve only when the producers stop aiming "at the lowest instincts of the greatest numbers."

DAVID PLOWDEN

What you can do to by John Crosby Network television has steadily got worse and will steadily go downhill like radio. What should be done about it?

Television is a great natural resource, belonging to all the people—potentially a vivid form of travel, a medium of information, an opportunity for wide, deep, artistic communication. Its potentials for human expression and development are so great that it cannot be allowed to become merely a source of profit for a few.

Five years ago was television's golden age. Network television then boasted eleven hour-long live dramatic programs a week. These were producing TV plays of such quality they were being made into hit Broadway plays.

Pat Weaver, then president of the National Broadcasting Company, could boast: "We are not like the movies—merchants of dreams, salesmen of escape. We primarily deal with reality. We are communicators, like newspaper and radio at its best." The other day I talked to a bitter Pat Weaver, who now heads the international division of an advertising agency, about the present state of TV. "Television," he remarked sadly, "has gone from about a dozen forms to just two—news shows and the Hollywood stories. The blame lies on the management of N.B.C., C.B.S. and A.B.C. Management doesn't give the people what they deserve. I don't see any hope for the system as it is."

The system, as it is, is commercial television, paid for and largely dictated by its advertising sponsors. To understand just how that operates, let me illustrate by something that happened in the golden year of 1955. One of the hit TV dramas of that year was Gore Vidal's Visit to a Small Planet, which has since been made into a successful Broadway play and a motion picture.

"Visit to a Small Planet was the most successful of my television plays," wrote Vidal. "I had great trouble getting this play accepted by a network. The producers of three shows were willing to do it, but only Philco Playhouse was able to get its sponsor to agree to the production.

"It is my dream that one day advertisers will buy only time on the air as they buy space in magazines; that they will exercise no more control over the programing of a network than at present they do over a magazine's editorial policy." That should mean, and usually does mean, no control at all.

Vidal voices the dream of many men, including me. Television today is a popularity contest that isn't very popular. It is almost impossible to find any individual or group, apart from paid propagandists, who likes television. Everybody watches, but who admires it? Try to find a cab driver with a decent opinion of it! Theoretically, television is run to suit the people. Actually, it is run to suit the sponsors. Now there are many sincere, capable, even idealistic men in advertising, but many have fought against intelligence, taste, innovation in television. Why did advertisers, any advertisers, embrace crooked quiz shows, back shoddy Westerns?

The best answer I ever heard to this came from Walter Lippmann, who said to me once, "Those people's motives are all wrong." "Those people" are the advertising industry and their aim is not to amuse or instruct or inform you; it is to sell soap and that aim gets in the way of everything else.

I recall an anecdote told me by the late Robert E. Sherwood, the playwright. He was chatting with one of the most powerful advertising men in New York about the appearance of the late Oscar Hammerstein on the Ed Sullivan Show.

"It was a good show," said the adman. "That's the trouble—it was too good."

Sherwood, a perfectionist who had won four Pulitzer prizes, was taken aback. "How," he asked, "can a show be too good?"

"For our purposes a show can be too good," said the adman. "The audience got so wrapped up in Hammerstein's life and Hammerstein's songs that when the commercial came along the people were in no mood to pay attention to it."

That statement sums up clearly why the advertising industry should not be permitted to dictate program content. The advertising message should not come first. The drama, the jokes, the performer, the production should not come second.

If newspapers were operated the same way as television, the advertising agency would pick out not simply the newspaper it wanted its message in, but the particular feature it wanted to sponsor. Naturally, it would want a popular feature. Well, if reader surveys are to be trusted, the most popular feature in the newspaper today is the comic strip.

Soon the comics might start forcing right out of the paper the more thoughtful columnists—the Walter Lippmanns, the James Restons, the Marquis Childses, the Roscoe Drummonds, the Arthur Krocks.

The television comics are the Westerns, the quizzes, the adventure strips, the situation comedies. These TV comics have forced off the air serious drama like Philco Playhouse, or Matinee Theater; travelogues like Wide Wide World; news documentaries like See It Now; experi-

Television is a great natural resource belonging to all the people—a medium of information, an opportunity for wide, deep, artistic communication. Its potentials for human development are so great it cannot be merely a source of profit for a few. What is it doing for the minds and hearts and dignity and honor of our entire nation?

make poor TV better mental programs like Omnibus; educational shows like The Search and Adventure; history shows like You Are There; good musical programs like the Firestone Hour—all gone.

TV's roof fell in when the quiz and payola scandals erupted. "Television," wrote Walter Lippmann, "has been caught perpetrating a fraud which is so gigantic that it calls into question the foundations of the industry. . . . There has been an enormous conspiracy to deceive the public in order to sell profitable advertising to the sponsors. It involves not merely this individual or that, but the industry as a whole."

I think television's ills are deeply embedded in the present system of commercial sponsorship. The cure: drastic but thoroughly workable revisions in the system. First, I think sponsorship, per se, should be outlawed as it is in Britain, where advertisers insert advertisements on television as they do in magazines and are forbidden by law from trying to exert any influence on program content. Second, having dumped program responsibility completely into the laps of the networks, the networks should be genuinely accountable to the public through a Program Advisory Board, of the Federal Communications Commission, which would be empowered to insist on balanced programing and prevent from ever arising such monstrosities as the schedule one network offers. Third, I think this country is rich enough to afford its own B.B.C., designed genuinely to inform and educate, to uplift our tastes, rather than to debase them.

Let's take these things up in order. Four years ago Britain, which had never had commercial radio, embarked with great success on commercial television. The British law, which keeps the hands of both agency and sponsor (the very word is unknown in England) out of programing, was adopted only after long study of our experience in both commercial radio and commercial television. The British decided that the sponsor did far more harm than good and banned him from program control altogether.

In Britain, the advertising dollar is spread over the whole schedule and helps support cultural features as well as the quizzes and vaudeville. Sidney Bernstein, chairman of the board of Granada Ltd., which is the closest British equivalent to our own C.B.S., wrote me about how the system is working.

"Very well indeed. Certainly my early fears were ill founded. Do the advertisers truly keep their hands off program content? Advertisers do not, directly or indirectly, have their hands anywhere near program content. Can a television network without undue strain provide programs without help from the agencies? Yes, yes, yes. We've had our fourth anniversary and we've had no help from the agencies. Would we have it any other way? No!"

British commercial television makes more sense than ours because it is planned by one editorial board and is free of the constant pressure of sponsors. The British have—as we once had—lots of live adult drama, much more live coverage of special events, much more sports, plenty of discussion and many services telling the people how to grow roses or how to keep house. British TV also, I'm afraid, has its share of quizzes, American Westerns and poor vaudeville. Our system has more opulence because we have more money. Their system has the better balance between the important and the trivial. With our money and their system, television could genuinely explore heights now forbidden by the incessant pressure to appeal to the lowest instincts of the most people all the time.

At the annual meeting of the National Association of Advertisers, in Hot Springs, Virginia, last winter, I invited the advertisers to get out of programing altogether. They reacted as if stung by bees. One said, "Our top executives are vitally interested in seeing that nothing in bad taste gets on a program we sponsor and I am on hand at the network to see that necessary changes are made before the show goes on the air."

Thank God the same system doesn't operate in the newspaper business. I would hate the thought of an adman sitting at my desk, going over my copy, deleting what he considered in bad taste. For one thing, I consider my taste much better than his. For another, the thought of a sponsor's looking over my prose would be so inhibiting it would seriously affect my style, my thinking, my output.

This happens all the time in television. Producers, writers, directors, performers—including the top stars—have ad-agency men and sponsors breathing down their necks in a way that wouldn't be tolerated in the newspaper or magazine business, and shouldn't be tolerated in television. The agency's role is to modify, to soften, to render inoffensive. The ad agency strives to make everything as mild as it claims the cigarettes are.

That leads to my second point: accountability to the public. Television works so hard appealing to everyone that it doesn't appeal very much to anyone.

The Oren Harris committee has recommended a bill licensing networks as stations are now licensed. It ought CONTINUED ON PAGE 135

PAUL WING

where are all the men?

Are fifteen air cadets more promising than three accountants? Which would you choose—seven eighths of a lawyer or two and two thirds geologists?

We are speaking, of course, of marriage prospects. Statistics reassure that there are still almost 2,000,000 more American bachelors between the ages of 20 and 40 than there are girls to marry them. But bachelors have a way of congregating in certain areas, which makes it difficult for all of them to find wives. We know where these places are!

Cambridge, Massachusetts: Single men make up over 40 per cent of the population of the Boston area. Many are students at Harvard, M.I.T. and other nearby schools.

New York, New York: More bachelors live in Manhattan than anywhere else in the world. Of course many single women come to the city too.

Washington, D.C.: Like New York in that it abounds in young men—and in unattached career girls.

Norfolk, Virginia: The naval base in Norfolk boards many sailors. A large number of them marry their home-town sweethearts, but the local marriage rate is still very cheering.

Columbus, Georgia: Local belles are lovely, but outnumbered, for this is the site of Fort Benning and of Lawson Air Force Base.

Tampa, Florida: Here we find the spring training ground of several major-league baseball clubs—a fact that should prove interesting to the sports-minded.

Findlay, Ohio: Industries moving into this small city have brought prosperity. To accommodate the influx of new residents, Findlay is on a building boom, and wedding bells start ringing before the paint is dry.

Champaign, Illinois: Bridal magazines sell extremely well in Champaign, though this may only indicate that Illinois spinsters—like many other girls—lead an active dream life.

Denver, Colorado: Superb trout fishing here in a dizzying mile-high atmosphere, suitable location for the United States Air Force Academy.

Tulsa, Oklahoma: Tulsa has the highest proportion of technicians and scientists, per capita, in the United States. Fast-booming, it has been called a "young man's" town.

Albuquerque, New Mexico: The average age of men in this city is five years younger than that of the male population as a whole. Kirtland Air Force Base is partly accountable for this.

San Diego, California: Home of the nation's second-largest increase in marriages; the license bureau of San Diego has had to double its staff.

Sacramento, California: Men go where the jobs are, and they're both plentiful here. The last four years have produced a 25 per cent increase in Sacramento's marriage rate.

New Hampshire: The most marrying state in New England. When New Hampshire men do talk, they say the loveliest things!

North Dakota: Plenty of unmarried men here; but the country is rough, with a stern lack of urban softness, and the men appear to like it that way. A career girl venturing into the badlands would probably be asked to settle down right there.

Utah: A fine state. In the 20–24 age group, bachelors outnumber spinsters two to one.

Texas: Twenty-five Air Force bases star this state. It's a big place. Fort Worth claims the world's wealthiest bachelors. El Paso leads the nation in marriage increases—71 per cent in the last four years, as compared with the national average of 1½ per cent. Mexican marriage laws may have something to do with this. In Lubbock, the average age of single men is 25 (nationally it's 30). Amarillo and Odessa have recently zoomed in population. In Austin, home of the University of Texas, 34 per cent of the men are unplighted.

Tacoma, Washington: With Mount Rainier in its back yard and Puget Sound at its doorstep, Tacoma attracts rugged men. A whopping 36.5 per cent of them are single and, most probably, athletic; for skiing, hunting and fishing are favored pastimes.

Alaska: Thirty thousand more men than women brave the el[e]ments here, most of them of pioneer caliber. The averag[e] Alaskan is young (27), independent, but grateful for the help mnte so necessary to a frontier way of life. Though only 87 o[f] of every 1000 girls in the nation at large marry each year, i[n] Alaska the rate jumps to 204.

Hawaii: Our newest state has 50,000 surplus men. So far th[e] marriage rate is low, in spite of the lush climate and lullin[g] scenery.

Does a girl really better her chance for marriag[e] by transplanting herself to a place where men ar[e] more plentiful? Perhaps. Marriage counselor[s] point out that new surroundings demand adjust[-] ment; it takes time to develop social contacts in [a] strange city. A girl might be better off on hom[e] ground, where she knows what's expected of he[r] and what to expect of the men she meets and date[s]. A city miss might find little in common with [a] county of country boys, regardless of ratios. Possi[-] bly Susie Q. Jones, employed at a girls' scho[ol] where the men are outnumbered ten to one, migh[t] prefer her one-tenth chance at Sam Smith, wh[o] teaches philosophy there, to a whole corralful [of] Wyoming ranch hands.

At any rate, if prospects appear too discouragin[g] at home, single girls might very well investigat[e] United States Government installations abroa[d]. A recent count of armed-forces personnel station[ed] overseas showed that eligible men outnumbere[d] women 13 to 1.

But when all is said and done, what does a gi[rl] want with 13 bachelors—or 13,000,000, for tha[t] matter? It takes only one of them to get marrie[d]

Delicious with Turkey

To most of us, Thanksgiving dinner means turkey on the table. In most families the vegetables that go with it are traditional too. But when it comes to the trimmings we can inject a note of excitement. To make this year's dinner the best ever, we offer you a choice of two new appetizers to serve in the living room; a different twist to the ubiquitous cranberry sauce; a mouth-watering new stuffing for the turkey itself; and a glamorous pie that might well become a tradition in your house.

By LOUELLA G. SHOUER

STUART

To begin with, two delectable appetizers: a subtly flavored chicken-and-cheese pâté under a shimmering cloak of aspic to spread on toast; and hot, savory, silver-dollar-size onion canapés.

CHEESE-PÂTÉ ASPIC

1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin
1 cup consommé
1 can (4½-ounce) chicken pâté
1 package (3-ounce) cream cheese
Melba toast

Add gelatin to consommé. Heat, stirring constantly, until gelatin is dissolved. Cool. Pour ¼ cup of the consommé into a small 5″ x 2″ x 2½″ loaf pan. Chill until set. Do not let remaining consommé set. Meanwhile, mix the pâté thoroughly with the cream cheese until fluffy and well blended. Spoon into mold on top of firm consommé. Pour remaining consommé over it. Chill for several hours or overnight. Unmold and serve with spreaders and Melba toast.

SAVORY HOT ONION CANAPÉS

Sliced bread (¼″ thick)
½ pound onions, peeled 1½ tablespoons butter or margarine
1½ tablespoons flour
½ cup milk
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon natmeg
Dash pepper
¾ cup grated Cheddar cheese
2 unbeaten egg yolks

With a biscuit cutter cut out 36 rounds from the bread. Toast until golden. Cook the onions in boiling salted water until tender. Put through food mill or buzz in blender. While the onions are cooking, make a smooth cream sauce with butter or margarine, flour and milk. Season with salt, nutmeg and pepper, then stir the sauce into the purée. Add the cheese and stir until melted. Just before serving, stir in the egg yolks. Drop by spoonfuls onto toast rounds. Toast in moderate oven, 350° F., 8–10 minutes. Serve hot. Makes 36 canapés. Note: Sauce, except for egg yolks, may be made ahead, then reheated and egg yolks stirred in. Bake after the turkey is out of the oven. Bread may be toasted ahead too.

When it comes to the turkey—the stuffing's the thing. This stuffing will do honor to the noblest birds. The news is in the tangy flavor of smoked oysters blended with ham and herbs. Once you've tasted, you'll choose it again and again.

HAM-AND-SMOKED-OYSTER STUFFING

2 quarts dried crumbled bread
1 cup chopped onion
1 cup chopped celery
½ poand mashrooms, sliced
½ poand butter or margarine
1 cap chopped smoked oysters (two 3¼-ounce cans)
2 cups diced cooked or canned ham
1 tablespoon poaltry herbs
2 teaspoons salt
½ teaspoon pepper
2 tablespoons parsley
½ tenspoon monosodium glutamate

The day before serving, prepare the bread. Cut off the end crusts from 3 unsliced loaves of stale, firm-type bread. Pull out bread and crumble fine. Spread out on trays to dry. You will need 2 quarts dried. Sauté the onion, celery and mushrooms a few minutes in the butter or margarine. Toss with the crumbs. Add the smoked oysters and the ham. Toss again well. Then add poultry herbs, salt, pepper, parsley and monosodium glutamate, tossing well after each addition. Stuff turkey in usual manner. Makes enough stuffing for large 16–18-pound turkey. Use less for smaller bird, or, if you like, freeze any extra stuffing from full recipe. Nice to have on hand for a roast chicken.

Cranberries complement the turkey as no other relish does, but this year our sauce has real excitement. Preserved ginger makes the flavor sing, and toasted slivered almonds give it crunchy texture.

GINGER-CRANBERRY-ALMOND RELISH

4 cups fresh cranberries
2 cups sugar
2 caps water
½ cup slivered, blanched toasted nlmonds
¼ cup slivered candied ginger

Combine cranberries, sugar and water in a saucepan. Cook, stirring constantly, until berries pop. Stir in almonds and candied ginger. Cool. Makes 1 quart sauce.

Our Thanksgiving pie has no relation to the pumpkin. It is completely different, yet it has all the attributes of a festive dessert—a delight to the eye when brought in at dessert time and sheer pleasure to eat.

Holidny Macaroon Pie
Recipe on Page 149

Dress Up or

As anyone who has ever been responsible for giving a dinner knows, the first and most important decision is the "what to have." To get around this, we in my household have taken to keeping certain menus floating around in our minds, all of them tried and true, so that, if we are suddenly called upon, we do not scratch our heads—we do what we call "plugging in No. 17."

The DRESS-UP DINNER sets a gala tone with a regal Roast Fillet of Beef, tender Gnocchi à la Romaine under a golden chee topping, Purée of Peas, Parker House Rolls and Baked Peach Dessert served warm with a fluffy mound of whipped crea

Another easy guide to successful entertaining—from John Prince and his wife, Catherine, who here set forth their approach to planning the superbly simple or elegant dinner. He uses the same rules in planning parties for Washington's most distinguished visitors.

By JOHN PRINCE

MENU 1 · ROAST FILLET OF BEEF. Here I mean a whole beef tenderloin, entire and untouche not sliced as for filet mignon, but served in all its soberly elegant length. This is not cheap—I shoul not advise you to bring it on for your husband's senior in the office if a raise in salary is in th wind—but there exists no more delicate meat, which so sets the gala tone. And it's easy to do. Indee you are forbidden to do very much. A French chef, clever as he is at disguising humble cuts of mea with sauces of one kind or another, would weep to see you do anything to this noble piece. Simpl have the butcher trim away all fat. Then season it with salt, pepper and a good rubbing of butte Roast in a hot oven, 400° F., 25–30 minutes, depending on the degree of rareness which you wis To make serving simpler, slice it in the kitchen and then arrange on the platter in a generous ri of water cress or young tips of parsley in lieu of a salad. Note that this type of roast is cut in slic ½″ to ¾″ thick. And neither this nor any other sort of roast should be carved immediately after comes out of the oven. It must stand in a warm place for 15 minutes—long enough to collect itsel

Dress Down—Two Dinners

Such a menu must work in all seasons; its items must be available in the nearest good store; and it must face up to two questions. The first concerns price: is this a meal on which we're willing to put what it would take to buy four seats in the orchestra or just a new hat? The second asks the proper tone: is this the kind of repast you'd offer for a first meeting with your daughter's fiancé's family, or is it the Charles Dickens "God-bless-us-every-one" sort of thing?

To solve this we take one menu of the same basic items—say beef with two accompanying dishes and a fruit dessert—and we interpret it on two levels, for a "dress-up" dinner, as we say, or a "dress-down" dinner. That takes care of price and tone at once.

STUART

With an eye to lower prices and informal atmosphere, the DRESS-DOWN DINNER features tender slices of French Pot Roast served with a savory sauce and colorful vegetables, Hominy Grits, the tiniest of Peas, Green Salad delicate with thyme—and the same Baked Peach Dessert. Both menus serve 6.

GNOCCHI À LA ROMAINE. I give the Frenchified Italian name because that's the way I learned it at the Cordon Bleu, and I give a recipe adapted from one I practiced there—but all that is something of a joke. The main ingredient of this dish is plain American grits. And once more, the method is bone-simple. The ingredients you will need are:

1 quart milk 1 teaspoon salt 1 cup grated Gruyère cheese
½ plus ⅓ cup butter ⅛ teaspoon pepper ⅓ cup grated Parmesan cheese
1 cup hominy grits

Bring the milk to a boil. Add ½ cup butter, cut into pieces so it will melt faster. Then gradually stir in the grits. Be sure and not use the quick-cooking sort. Resume the boil and continue cooking, stirring all the while, until the mixture takes on the appearance of cooked farina. Remove from the heat, season with the salt and pepper and then beat hard with an electric mixer for 5 minutes, until the grits take on a creamy appearance. Pour into a 13″x9″x2″ casserole, and allow to set. Cut into rectangular pieces. Place them one over another like rows of fallen dominoes, in a buttered shallow casserole which may be brought to the table. Over these pour ⅓ cup melted butter and sprinkle the grated cheeses. At serving time heat through in a hot oven, 400° F., for about 30–35 minutes and then, if you like, under the broiler just long enough to obtain a light brown crust.

PURÉE OF PEAS. This may seem at first to be a washday dish, but you will see that is not my idea.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

Mrs. Appleyard's tomato juice is tangy and superbly seasoned. It is served in well-chilled glasses with buttery cheese-corn-meal biscuits.

Pearly-white onions and jewel-green peas are bathed in a delicious golden mustard sauce. A green salad tossed with oil and vinegar, salt and pepper accompanies it.

Brussels sprouts and chestnuts play an important part in the feast, as do golden yams, candied with oranges. There's a dish of crunchy pickle slices too!

STUART-FOWLER

"Vermont has produced some of its loveliest weather for us; the hills are tawny and heather-colored."

A tender crown roast of pork, substantial and lavish, celebrates a succession of glorious, crisp fall days.

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

HARVEST FEAST AT

Crown roast of pork is a traditional fall delicacy in our family. No longer do we do our own butchering, and the enormous iron kettles in which we used to try out lard now hold bright clumps of petunias. Our roast of pork, though, is tender and rosy, rimmed with sweet snowy fat; after the long slow cooking favored by Mrs. Applevard, it melts in our mouths like the most delicate chicken.

We start our meal with goblets of very special tomato juice, spiced with onion, garlic, horse-radish and other seasonings which give it a pronounced zip. With this go cheese-corn-meal biscuits, light and tantalizing in flavor. The roast of pork, wreathed with crab apples and green grapes, is borne in by Cynthia, my oldest daughter. The deep golden brown of its crisp crackling fat makes a subtle contrast

A spectacular crown roast of pork is the main dish, stuffed with savory wheat pilaf, garnished with rosy crab apples and green grape clusters.

APPLEYARD CENTER

ith the light, nutty stuffing of wheat pilaf. Laura follows with a dish of small white onions and green eas in a mustardy sauce. There is a companion dish of deep jade-green Brussels sprouts, combined with ıe smoothness of chestnuts. Darkly golden yams have been candied with oranges to the color of rich ld mahogany. And the pie! "Pumpkin pie with a Southern accent," says Mrs. Appleyard, who invented the day before. A smooth pumpkin filling in which pecans and raisins play a prominent role. We ımple the results today with sighs of delighted repletion. Everything, in fact, is perfect, and Vermont as produced some of its loveliest weather for us. "In many ways this is the crown of the year," says Irs. Appleyard, "for the harvest is safe home."

MENU

Tomato Cocktail
Cheese-Corn-Meal Biscuits
Crown Roast of Pork with Wheat-Pilaf Stuffing
Brussels Sprouts with Chestnuts
Orange-Candied Yams
Pearl Onions and Peas in Mustard Sauce
Tossed Green Salad
Cavalier Pumpkin Pie
Coffee

RECIPES ON PAGE 82

STUART-POWELL

HARVEST FEAST AT APPLEYARD CENTER

CONTINUED

The smooth pumpkin-pie filling is studded with raisins and crunchy nuts.

Tomato Cocktail

4 cups tomato juice
1 medium cucumber, peeled and finely chopped (save a little for garnish)
2 tablespoons finely chopped scallions (include green stems)
1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
Juice of 1 lemon
½ teaspoon grated lemon rind
2 teaspoons prepared horse-radish
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
¼ teaspoon freshly ground pepper
3 drops liquid pepper seasoning
8 lemon wedges

Place all ingredients except lemon wedges in a large bowl. Mix well. Cover and refrigerate for 2–3 hours. Strain and taste for salt. Serve in individual chilled glasses and garnish the top with a little very finely chopped cucumber and a sprig of water cress if you like. Serve with lemon wedges. Makes 1 quart—8 servings.

Cheese-Corn-Meal Biscuits

¾ cup milk
½ cup yellow corn meal
1 cup flour
1 tablespoon baking powder
¾ teaspoon salt
3 tablespoons butter
¾ cup grated Cheddar cheese
1 egg yolk, slightly beaten

Scald the milk and add corn meal. Mix well and cool. Sift together twice the flour, baking powder and salt. Cut the butter into the flour mixture until it resembles fine bread crumbs. Add cheese to milk-corn-meal mixture. Mix thoroughly. Turn out onto a lightly floured board. Knead 2–3 minutes. Roll out ½″ thick. Cut with a 1¼″ cooky cutter. Place on lightly greased baking sheets. Brush tops with egg yolk. Bake in a very hot oven, 425° F., for about 15 minutes or until golden. Remove and cool on wire cake racks. Serve warm, split and buttered. Makes about 36 biscuits. Store extra biscuits in airtight container.

Crown Roast of Pork with Wheat-Pilaf Stuffing

20-rib crown roast of pork (7–8 lbs.)
Flour-and-water paste for thickening gravy
3 cups chicken broth

STUFFING
2½ cups finely chopped onion
2 cups finely chopped, peeled and cored tart green apple
¼ cup butter
½ pound ground veal
2 cups wheat pilaf or long-grain rice
2 cups chicken broth
1 tablespoon salt
½ teaspoon pepper
½ teaspoon marjoram
½ teaspoon thyme
½ teaspoon celery seed
¼ teaspoon powdered cardamom
2 teaspoons finely chopped parsley
1 eggs, slightly beaten

For the stuffing: Sauté onion and apple in butter in a large skillet until onion is golden. Add veal, cook and stir until lightly browned. Add wheat pilaf or rice, chicken broth, salt, pepper, marjoram, thyme, celery seed, cardamom and parsley. Mix well. Cover and simmer over low heat until all liquid is absorbed. Stir occasionally. Cool a little. Add eggs and mix thoroughly. Set aside.

Place pork on rack in roasting pan. Roast in moderate oven, 350° F., 30 to 40 minutes to the pound. After 1 hour roasting time, remove pork from pan. Fill center of pork with stuffing. Drain fat from pan, return meat (without rack) and continue roasting. If top of stuffing becomes too brown before end of roasting time, cover with aluminum foil. Put remaining stuffing in a lightly greased casserole. Cover and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 to 40 minutes. Add a little more chicken broth if stuffing appears dry. When pork is cooked, transfer to a platter and keep warm. Remove strings. Drain excess fat from roasting pan. Add 3 cups chicken broth to pan. Heat, scraping brown bits from bottom. Thicken slightly with a flour-and-water paste. Garnish crown roast with crab apples, green grapes and parsley. Makes 8 generous servings, about 8 cups stuffing, 3 cups gravy.

Brussels Sprouts With Chestnuts

3 pounds fresh Brussels sprouts washed and trimmed, or 3 packages (10-ounce) frozen Brussels sprouts
2 tablespoons butter
2 teaspoons flour
¾ cup chicken broth
¼ teaspoon salt
Pinch white pepper
¼ teaspoon basil
1½ cups sliced, peeled, cooked or canned chestnuts

Make a cream sauce in the top of a double boiler with the butter, flour and chicken broth. Season with salt, pepper and basil. Cook until slightly thickened. Keep warm over just-simmering water. Cook fresh Brussels sprouts in boiling salted water until crisp-tender. If using frozen sprouts, cook according to package directions until crisp-tender. Drain thoroughly. Place in serving dish. Add chestnuts to sauce. Pour sauce over sprouts. Makes 8 servings.

Orange-Candied Yams

8–10 medium-size yams
1 cup brown sugar
¼ cup butter
½ cup orange juice
2 teaspoons grated orange rind
Sections from 1 orange

Boil yams until just tender. Drain, cool, peel and cut in half. Put sugar, butter, orange juice and grated orange rind in a large heavy skillet. Heat slowly, stirring occasionally. Simmer the yams, a few at a time, in the mixture over low heat. Baste and turn the yams carefully until glazed all over. Remove to an ovenproof dish and keep warm while you glaze the remainder. Heat the orange sections for 2–3 minutes in the skillet at the end. Arrange yams in serving dish and garnish with the orange sections. Makes 8 servings.

Pearl Onions and Peas in Mustard Sauce

4 pounds white onions, peeled
½ cup butter
½ cup flour
3 cups heavy cream
1½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon white pepper
3 tablespoons white vinegar
3 tablespoons lemon juice
½ teaspoon dry mustard
Pinch powdered saffron
2 packages (10-ounce) frozen peas

Cook onions in boiling salted water until tender. Make a cream sauce in the top of a double boiler with the butter, flour and cream. Add salt, pepper and vinegar. Mix lemon juice, mustard and saffron. Add to sauce. Cook peas according to package directions. Drain peas and onions and place in serving dish. Pour sauce over vegetables. Mix very lightly. Makes 8 servings.

Cavalier Pumpkin Pie

Pastry for one 10″ pie shell
1 cup milk
⅔ cup seedless raisins
1 cup light brown sugar
2 cups canned pumpkin
½ teaspoon cinnamon
¼ teaspoon nutmeg
¼ teaspoon ginger
¼ teaspoon allspice
½ teaspoon salt
2 cups heavy cream
4 eggs, slightly beaten
1½ cups broken pecans

Line a 10″ pie plate with the pastry. Crimp the edges. Scald milk. Add raisins and sugar to milk and let stand. In a large bowl mix pumpkin, cinnamon, nutmeg, ginger, allspice, salt and 1 cup cream. Add raisin-sugar-milk mixture and mix well. Add eggs and mix again. Fold pecans into mixture. Fill pie shell. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 1 hour or until center is set. Cool. Whip 1 cup cream until thick. Decorate cold pie with whipped cream. Makes 8 servings.

HAM-ASPARAGUS SOUP SANDWICH. Put 4 slices buttered toast on cookie sheet; top each with sliced cooked ham and cooked asparagus spears. Blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup, ⅓ cup milk, ¼ cup mayonnaise, 2 tbsp. chopped pimiento; pour over open-face sandwiches. Broil till hot. Serves 4.

new idea!

BACON-TOMATO SOUP SANDWICH. Put 4 slices buttered toast on cookie sheet; top each with 2 slices tomato, 2 slices cooked bacon. Stir 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup till smooth; add ⅓ cup milk, 1 tsp. minced onion, ½ tsp. Worcestershire; pour over open-face sandwiches. Broil till hot and bubbly. Serves 4.

broiled soup sandwiches

BEAN-FRANK SOUP SANDWICH. Split and toast 6 frankfurter buns. Put on cookie sheet; top with 6 frankfurters, cut lengthwise. Mix 1 can Campbell's Bean with Bacon Soup, ⅓ cup water, ¼ cup ketchup, 2 tbsp. sweet pickle relish; spread over franks and buns completely. Broil till hot and bubbly. 6 servings.

GOOD THINGS
BEGIN TO HAPPEN
WHEN YOU COOK WITH Campbell's Soups

TUNA-EGG SOUP SANDWICH. Put 4 slices buttered toast on cookie sheet; spread with 7-oz. can tuna (drained, flaked); top with 4 slices onion, 2 sliced hard-cooked eggs. Mix 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup, ⅓ cup milk, 2 tbsp. chopped parsley, 2 tsp. lemon juice; pour on sandwiches. Broil. Serves 4.

LOOK FOR MORE RECIPES ON EVERY CAN OF CAMPBELL'S SOUP

vote

In recent national elections in some free countries, the following percentage of eligible persons cast their votes:

Australia	95.48%	voted (1958)
West Germany . . .	88.2%	voted (1957)
Israel	82.8%	voted (1959)
Canada	80%	voted (1958)
Great Britain . . .	78.7%	voted (1959)
Sweden	77.4%	voted (1958)
UNITED STATES .	60.4%	voted (1956)

It is no credit to our democracy when four out of every ten persons fail to express their convictions about the candidates and the issues of a national election.

Your vote counts! Victories in many elections are often determined by the barest of margins. For example, one prominent Senator won the post he now occupies by a margin of only 87 votes, with 988,295 cast. To vote is a right and a privilege. To vote intelligently is a duty.

See to it that you and every eligible member of your family vote on November 8th.

Metropolitan Life
INSURANCE COMPANY©
A MUTUAL COMPANY • 1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

DRESS UP OR DRESS DOWN— TWO DINNERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 79

First, the taste of fresh frozen peas so served is an oddly agreeable little novelty. Second, the dish offers an intense green color note.

Here I am minded to tell you an anecdote. A certain Miss Emma of my past was beautiful, rich, imperious and much loved, but not much of a housewife. On one occasion she telephoned her grocer to say that she was giving a dinner party. "Send me a standing rib roast and three vegetables." . . . "Yes, ma'am," he said. "Now, Miss Emma, what vegetables had you in mind?" . . . And she said, "One red, one white and one green," and put down the phone. Her method was rash, but you see she had an idea.

For the present dish use 6 packages frozen peas. Cook in very little salted water until they are approximately half done. This will take 3–5 minutes. Put them through a food mill or strainer, discarding skins. Set the pulp aside until wanted. At that time, season the pulp with ½ teaspoon salt, not quite ¼ teaspoon pepper and ¼ cup butter, and heat it up in the top of a double boiler. Taste for seasoning because the amount of salt will vary, depending on the amount you use when you cook the peas.

PARKER HOUSE ROLLS. At this point you will be pleased to note that you can buy tiny "half-size" rolls. The Parker House type is best. Spread a little butter in the pockets, heat and serve them—hot, hot, hot—without benefit of anything further.

BAKED PEACH DESSERT. This requires:

3 tablespoons butter
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 cup flour
⅛ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon baking powder
½ teaspoon vanilla
6 firm ripe sliced or 4 packages thawed and well-drained frozen peaches
1 cup heavy cream, whipped
⅛ teaspoon almond flavoring

To make the batter, cream the butter, add the sugar and then the eggs. This should not be beaten—just mixed until blended. Stir in the flour which has been sifted with the salt and baking powder, and then add the vanilla. Place the peach slices in the bottom of a buttered 1½-quart casserole. Pour the batter over them and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for an hour. Serve with the whipped cream scented with the almond flavoring.

Note that, of this dinner, the first stages of the gnocchi and the purée may be done well ahead of time, so also the dessert, which you may serve cold if you like, or reheat at the last moment.

Now, here is the same menu, at least a meal of the same items, adjusted with an eye to a lower price and a different atmosphere, to make what we call a "dress-down" dinner.

MENU II

FRENCH POT ROAST. This has come down the ladder a bit, but it is something new—or better, something very old and nice—in the way of pot roasts. I have the recipe from a lady whose family in Gascony, the western part of France just above Spain, has been at this sort of thing for ages. According to her, you just do this, but exactly this:

Dredge a 6-pound piece of bottom round in flour that has been seasoned with salt and pepper. Brown it quickly and thoroughly in about ½ cup bacon drippings. Use a weighty marmite or Dutch oven. Either pan should have a heavy lid. Remove from the heat and spoon off as much of the hot fat as you can. In another pan, sauté the following vegetables, all very finely chopped: ⅔ cup parsnip (if parsnips are to be had), ⅔ cup ca… ½ cup onion, ½ cup celery without h… leaves, 1 small clove garlic and 1 tables… parsley. To these add ¼ pound mushro… sliced, and place around the roast in t… Dutch oven. Add ½ cup tomato purée … 1 cup consommé. If you prefer, you ca… ½ cup water, ½ cup dry white wine ar… cup brandy instead. Cover tight. C… steadily and very slowly over very low h… turning the meat several times, for at … 5 hours. When the meat is quite tende… move it, without breaking it, to a ve… platter. Skim off as much fat as you … from the sauce and reseason if necess… Note that, except for the mushrooms, h… vegetables will have gone to pieces in … meat juice to make a fairly smooth s… Should the sauce seem too liquid, thick … cautiously by adding flour rubbed into th… balls of butter or by blending it into a l… sauce which you have cooled. (Remem… that flour will make lumps if not fed into … fat or cold liquid.) Now return the roa… the Dutch oven and put it aside to k… warm.

BAKED HOMINY GRITS. This time … grits have no reason not to appear u… their plain name, but they are done as fo… Gnocchi à la Romaine with this exceptio… when you have beaten them, simply u… them into a buttered 1½-quart baking s… and bake them in a moderate oven, 350°… for an hour, or until a golden crust app… You will find that these make a nice ch… from potatoes. They are foamy light, s… the sauce of the roast wonderfully and … ple will look up from their plates pl… and puzzled.

TINY GREEN PEAS. I have gone out o… way to say tiny peas, having in mind a th… very tiny sort of frozen peas which is … on the market. They are worth their s… extra price, and, as for cooking, need on… brief warming through. Unless you hap… to have a garden with fresh peas just fo… ing in the pods, I suspect that you'll … none better. Remember to salt and pe… them well and serve with a liberal pa… butter melting on top, or in mounds arou… the roast.

At this point you may wish to de… from the menu or add to it—either way … use what the garden or the market offer… the moment, or (with Miss Emma's te… phone call in mind) to gain color. Any v… table which would do what Mark Tw… calls "sluicing around" well with the … roast would be fine. Obvious choices … stead of, or in addition to, the peas) w… be very small carrots, tiny turnips or … potatoes or button onions. The carr… turnips and onions should be cooked s… rately, drained and then sautéed lightl… butter and go around the roast at the … last.

If you cannot find small, young veg… bles, you might like to hear what my c… professeur in Paris did when he couldn't … cut carrots, turnips, potatoes and the … into rectangles an inch to an inch and a … long and rounded them at the corners b… cooking. He called this making boats. B… or whatever, I must say they improved … appearance of the dish.

GREEN SALAD. This will be a plain … made from three different types of greens. … lect them for their textures—some roma… Boston lettuce and a little Belgian end… For 6 people, plan on 5 cups of greens. C… well before tearing them up (salad gre… should always be torn) and serve in a b… tossed at the last minute with ½ cup thy… flavored French dressing. If you can … some fresh thyme, chop it fine and add … the salad with the greens; otherwise, ju… little pinch of the dried can be added to … dressing.

BAKED PEACH DESSERT. This again … done in the same way as for the more e… orate dinner, with one laborsaving differe… Serve it with vanilla ice cream, if you pr…

OPERATION ERROR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

uick anger as the blow knocked him st the wall.

e hit the back screen, the catch snapped, it opened full as she rushed pell-mell ugh it. Her foot struck a can, sent it clat-g noisily. Gaining the asphalt alley, she inued running, half blinded by the slanting noon sun. She began to sob softly.

car manned by a youngster swirled into lley, its tires screeching and dual pipes ng. Barely in time, she stepped to one and pressed her body flat to the wall of a ling. It roared by, never slowing, the r yelling and laughing.

the street, she turned to the right and inued running, dodging shoppers who d to stare after her, sensing an impending dy in her flight and sobs. She side-stepped y on a tricycle, tore past a woman water-yard and paid no attention to a dog that l out to yap at her heels.

car roared down the street behind her swung alongside the curb. The brakes slammed on with a shriek of rubber. He not more than six feet from her. He yelled, me on, come on. We haven't got much ." He reached over, opened the door, and was sitting beside him. He looked nothing the picture of Red Dillon she had seen. was blond, neatly dressed, and wore es.

e gunned the car and her neck snapped. asked, "Where is she?"

Not far. Don't worry. I'll let you have the It's not mine anyway. And I'll put her in back seat and you can get her to the hos-. Anybody follow you?"

e was looking back. He had turned south an Nuys Boulevard and within minutes were through the busy shopping district. e said, "Because if anybody did, I'd have ll you. I've got a gun on you."

e scarcely heard him. "She's not going to '

Not if you get her to a hospital. Just sit e and don't say anything. I can't stand who talk all the time. So shut up."

e took the Hollywood freeway, and kept ast of the fastest moving traffic. But he careful not to speed. They passed a traffic er, and shortly afterward, at the cry of mbulance siren, he pulled over and waited it passed.

e couldn't hold the tears back.

e swung off the freeway at the Gower exit when they reached Hollywood Boulevard ed the car to the left. Soon they were away the Hollywood the tourists know, pass-mall shops in a down-at-the-heels neigh-borhood. He swung into a side street, then n an alley, pulling up before the back nce of a deserted store. She was out of ar ahead of him. He hurried after her and a key to the back-door lock and turned it e first try, as though he had turned it y times before.

e hurried into a dirty, musty back office. old roll-top desk, covered with a heavy of dust, stood in one corner, and a h made up into a bed in another. The l of a washroom lay heavy on the air.

ooking about, she felt his hand on her restraining her. "I was only kidding. r sister's O.K. I had to tell you something t you here."

e stood between her and the door. She angrily, "You told me she was dying. could you tell me she was dying?"

e fell into a coughing spell that racked his . As he doubled up, her glance found the that led to the store front. She made a k for it, and was opening it when the shot oded in the tight space. She swung about, g him, pressing against the door.

e held a small weapon on her. "I killed a once for trying that. Sit down." She ed to take the old beaten-up swivel chair he desk. "No, not there," he said. "Over e." He indicated the cot.

e thought, Someone should have heard the But no one would in a big city.

As the cot whined under her, he said, "I knew a girl with fire like you once. She died in a gun fight and took two coppers with her."

He cleared his throat with a hacking cough. "You've got nothing to get excited about. Like I told you, your sister and me's got a deal cooking, and you're the security that says it goes through. You'll be my guest here for a few hours, just in case your sister wants to change her mind; but when the deal's put through, you can be on your way. You don't have to do anything, just behave yourself, and in a way you may be saving your sister's life if she's thinking about getting other ideas."

She said evenly, "You're going to kill me if she doesn't do what you say."

He turned gruff. "Take off your shoes."

Slowly she removed her white oxfords. He lowered himself into the swivel chair, mumbling, "I'm a sick man. Someday the heart's going to give out when I get a spell."

He looked around the room. "Not a bad place for hiding out, huh? The stupid cops always look for me at hotels and apartment houses. Never think of empty store buildings."

He turned to her. "Get out of your dress."

She massaged her foot, stalling. A stack of books, gray with dust, rested on a table within reach of her hand. If she threw one through the blacked-out window ——

She blurted out, "Why should I?"

"Don't give me any jazz." He motioned with the gun. "Do you take it off or do you want me to?"

She took her time unzipping the dress and pulling it over her head. She stood in a white tricot slip that outlined her contours, and beneath it her body trembled.

"Give it to me." She tossed the dress to him, and sat as far as she could from him.

Keeping his eyes on her, he swung the swivel chair around, reached inside a desk drawer and took a phone out. He dialed, and said, "Miss Sherwood, please."

He placed his watch on the desk before him. "Damn it, what's keeping her?" he said and hung up. He dialed again. "I was calling Miss Sherwood and was cut off."

He counted to himself, "Ten . . . twenty . . . thirty . . . Kelly?"

He talked rapidly, breathing erratically. "Here's how we're working it. When you get off, you drive to the Hollywood Bowl and park. You walk to the phone booth at the entrance to the Bowl and wait there. I'll call you around eight and give you instructions where to go. O.K., you got it?

"Here's one more thing. I've got your sister here by the phone with me. Now don't get hysterics because she's O.K., and she's going to be O.K. unless you change your mind about meeting me or the money's not all there. I'll keep her locked up here until I get the money and count it and then I'll let her go. But if anything goes wrong, I'm killing her. And if I'm not around to do it, I've got a friend who's going to baby-sit with her and finish her off if I don't come back."

He turned to Toby. "Tell her you're O.K."

She took the receiver. "Sis, he told me you'd been shot and were dying."

"That's enough."

He seized the receiver and hung up. As she backed away toward a file cabinet, he sat looking her over. "You've got a nice shape," he said. He rose then and crossed to a third door, several inches thick, which opened into a small, empty, windowless room. "In here," he ordered, motioning with the weapon.

She stood her ground defiantly.

"It was an old fur-storage vault before the place went broke. You can scream or sing or do anything you want to. Come on, kid, or do I have to slug you?"

He pushed the swivel chair into the vault after her. "I'll be back in about an hour with your dinner." As the door closed she stood in total darkness. She heard no sound after the turning of the lock.

Shock possessed Kelly so utterly that she sat numbly long after she put down the receiver. He was breaking her to his will. He had reached her through Toby as he could have in no other way.

Then some old strength assumed command. She drew herself up straight, took a deep breath and dialed. By the time the switchboard girl's voice answered, the fog was clearing.

Ripley said, "I know. I heard a few minutes ago."

He reported that the agents running the loose surveillance had been blocked briefly from view of Toby, and in that scant second she had deliberately eluded them, something they never had anticipated she would do.

"They weren't tailing a criminal," he said in defense of them.

"No," she answered slowly. "A seventeen-year-old girl."

"I don't get it." He was angry and hurt. He seldom erred in sizing up a person. But he told himself that no one is a fortress, no one impregnable. Dillon, with his animal cunning, had sensed a soft spot.

"He told her I'd been shot and was dying. What would you have done at seventeen?"

He was silent a moment, then, "I guess it's that I don't want to understand—but I do." He added, "I can imagine the hell you're going through."

"I'll hold up. I've got to. I haven't any choice, have I?" She continued, "If you arrest him when I hand him the package ——"

"No, we can't do that, although I don't think he's got a friend with your sister. He's always played the lone wolf. But we can't and won't take a chance. We want you to continue following his instructions. Take the call at the Hollywood Bowl and do what he tells you. We'll be close by."

She returned to her window under Mr. Welk's unfavorable scrutiny. She forced each movement and each word. She saw the faces of old customers. They blurred, and came into focus, and went out again.

Thirty minutes before closing time, Mr. Burkhardt stepped up behind her. "Is everything all right, Miss Sherwood?"

He had been an executive for the five years she had worked here, sitting near the door, smiling, talking. She had thought it was all on the surface, that the man had no depth. Now his tone said how much he was feeling with her and for her.

"It won't go in my purse unless I get some bigger bills."

"I'll get them."

He returned shortly with twenty $1000 and forty $500 bills. She handed him in exchange bands of fives and tens.

When the guards locked the doors at six she experienced sudden, overwhelming panic. But it was short-lived as a hardness inside her, that was new to her, asserted itself.

Working swiftly, she banded the big bills together until she had a total of $96,000. She waited until she thought she was unobserved, then pushed them into her purse. She reached a quick balance, and handed her work sheet to the girl who ran the batches for all the tellers. The girl checked it out.

Afterward, she hurried with her cash drawer to the vault, passing Mr. Welk, who was working with the teller at Window 2 who had failed to reach a balance.

Returning to her window, she got her purse from the low shelf. She started to leave, then remembered she invariably checked her face. She must do the normal things.

As she passed Mr. Welk, he called to her. She turned, her heart pounding.

"Yes, Mr. Welk?"

"Did you forget to turn in your extra cash?"

"I didn't have any. I had a heavy run of checks this afternoon."

He glanced at her purse. "How much cash does your work sheet show?"

"Around two thousand dollars."

"I don't understand it."

She repeated, "I had a heavy run of checks. I've never had anything like it in the five years I've been here."

He knew the checks presented and the cash needed to pay them could not have deviated that much from the Friday norm. "Could you have made a mistake, Miss Sherwood?"

By now heads had turned as a scandal threatened to break. She asked sharply, "Do you wish to examine my purse, Mr. Welk? Is that what you want? Well, here, take it."

He backed away. "No, no, now, please, we mustn't become excited, Miss Sherwood. If you had an unusually large run of checks —— It was just that ——"

"Good night, Mr. Welk." She turned to leave, expecting him to call her back.

Ahead of her, Penny held open the exit gate into the main lobby. "I hope you got away with a million. Have a nice weekend."

Outside the overhead lights barely dispersed the darkness of the parking lot. Good nights were being said, and cars backing out, little foreign ones among the big ones, everyone hurrying with plans for the weekend.

Pete stole up alongside her, and put his arm in a quick squeeze about her. "Pick you up about six tomorrow night?"

"Yes, Pete."

"I wish I was going home with you. Think of all the gas we'd save if ——"

"Pete."

"Yes?"

"Nothing." She took a few steps, turned back. "Let's talk tomorrow about saving gas. O.K.?" Tomorrow.

The briefing was over and the weapons checked out of the gun room: Tommy guns, .30-.30 rifles, tear-gas guns, 12-gauge shotguns, mile-ray spots, and restraining devices—handcuffs and leg chains and "corsets."

Now only minutes remained. Rip felt the sweat in his armpits, the tautness in his body.

Taking quick, tapping steps, Peg [illegible] and handed him a memo, marked [illegible] Her eyes caught his briefly, and spoke [illegible] cern, then she was gone. He read:

SAs Robinson and Waite contacted 3[illegible] detective and credit agencies today to f[illegible] lead set forth 10-7-59. Each agency w[illegible] to check its records to determine if any i[illegible] tion had been undertaken in recent mon[illegible] victim, Kelly Sherwood.

John T. Rattlan, president, Rattlan[illegible] Services, advised that a party who gave t[illegible] Gar Delaton, and the address, State H[illegible] tained his agency 8-24-59 to run a bac[illegible] check on the following names.

Nine names, including that of Kel[illegible] wood, were set forth, and their addre[illegible] were identified as tellers at the Ho[illegible] First National Bank.

According to Mr. Rattlan, Mr. Del[illegible] vised he was a New York City broker [illegible] opening a Beverly Hills branch and he [illegible] templating employing one of the nine. M[illegible] lan said the agency completed and deli[illegible] reports, classified as their "C" type, w[illegible] cluded a credit and criminal, and thi[illegible] views each with neighbors or parties [illegible] them. Mr. Delaton paid $100 per report

When shown a photograph of the sub[illegible] Rattlan advised he bore a marked resem[illegible] Mr. Delaton. Mr. Rattlan stated that M[illegible] ton's request for reports was common[illegible] the agency had no reason to suspect hi[illegible] inal intent.

DID HE KNOW

He never said—and Ripsie [illegible] asked, dared not ask, though sh[illegible] always been able to say anythi[illegible] John Henry. Did he know? . . . [illegible] haps that was her punishment.

CHINA COURT

the new novel by Rumer Godd[illegible] the story of two brothers and R[illegible] the fascinating urchin who grew [illegible] beauty and to dominate the liv[illegible] both—as she, in turn, was domi[illegible] by conflicting forces in the great l[illegible] in Cornwall. Suspenseful, richl[illegible] mantic, it begins

IN THE

DECEMBER JOURN[illegible]

Special Agent Cronin came up t[illegible] Rip handed him the memo. "Looks [illegible] lon never had an accomplice in the b[illegible] got his rundown on the victim thro[illegible] fectly normal channels."

Cronin reported on the lead set r[illegible] determine the store that had sold [illegible] tiger to Dillon.

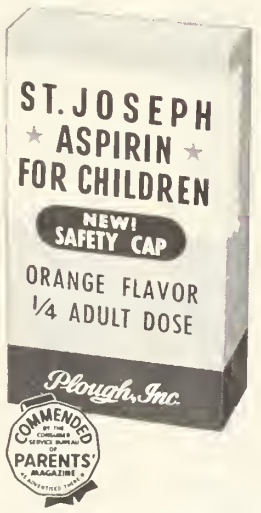
"We showed the subject's photo[illegible] clerks in all fourteen stores," Cro[illegible] "and none remembered him. But all [illegible] have held employees over tonight [illegible] their sales tickets for the past thirty [illegible]

Quietly the agents drifted down to [illegible] ment garage. As they paired up to c[illegible] the cars, Rip heard the quiet. . . . Th[illegible] would accept no excuses, not even [illegible] miscalculated in the confusion and st[illegible] gun battle. It had no place for men w[illegible] mistake-prone. Yet often there was [illegible] second to think in apprehending a k[illegible] Dillon. There was only the instantan[illegible] swer of muscles to an order from the [illegible] an order that had lain dormant a lo[illegible] perhaps based on some past experien[illegible] the training taken at the academy.

As Rip got behind the wheel and [illegible] climbed in beside him, and they [illegible] short rise up out of the garage into [illegible] Street, they discussed the advantage [illegible] Red Dillon. Dillon could choose hi[illegible]

CONTINUED ON [illegible]

Do you have trouble giving your child medicine?



When your child has fever of cold or flu, or a headache—do you have difficulty getting him to accept "aspirin"? You won't have this problem if you give the children's aspirin with the orange flavor children prefer!

Read why most thoughtful mothers give

the children's aspirin doctors recommend 4 to 1 OVER ANY OTHER BRAND

In a recent nation-wide survey more doctors—child specialists—recommended St. Joseph Aspirin For Children than any other . . . by far!

No need to have an emotional upset when you give your child aspirin . . . no need to worry whether he has actually swallowed the dose the doctor ordered!

Most mothers solve that problem by giving St. Joseph Aspirin For Children . . . the aspirin child specialists prefer 4 to 1 over any other brand.

You see, St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is the best aspirin, with the creamy texture and pure orange taste children prefer. It has the preferred child dosage, and the special safety cap doctors favor.

Is there any wonder more doctors specify St. Joseph Aspirin For Children? Any wonder more mothers trust it—more children accept it willingly . . . than all others combined?

Next time you're shopping . . . ask for St. Joseph Aspirin For Children. Your child may need it tonight!

FOR ADULTS (5-grain tablets)

READY TO GO TO WORK FASTER
than other leading pain relief tablets!

Why pay for costlier aspirin, expensive buffering, or "combination" pain relief drugs? Laboratory tests prove that St. Joseph Aspirin disintegrates faster, is ready to go to work faster than all three other leading pain relief tablets. Millions take it without stomach upset. Get the best for less—be sure that you get trusted St. Joseph Aspirin!

Girls' shirts and Spanky Pants, sizes 1-16 yrs., 69¢-$1.25. Boys' shirts, briefs, shorts and longs, sizes 1-12 yrs., 69¢-$1.75. 14-20 yrs., 79¢-$2.00.

Everybody on the toothbrush line wears Carter's knit underwear. We like the soft, friendly feeling. Mother likes the way they keep their shape, no matter how often they're washed or how hard they're worn. She says Carter's is a family tradition—because quality is a Carter's tradition.

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO. NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

It might be the Hollywood Bowl itself, the 20,000 seats empty since the end of the summer season, the dark and deserted stage and dressing rooms, or the wooded area above.

He possessed an even greater advantage. By his abduction of Toby, he had set up the situation so they dared not apprehend him. They were under instructions from Washington and the SAC to effect a policy of containment, which meant they would watch the rendezvous between him and Kelly Sherwood, and subsequently would run a surveillance in the expectation that he would lead them to the hideout where he was holding the sister.

Parking some distance from the Bowl, Rip left Bradley behind, and made his way on foot through underbrush to a statue overlooking the phone booth. He worked slowly and cautiously, knowing that if Dillon wanted to watch Kelly Sherwood, he might choose the same lookout.

KMPC's news helicopter droned overhead, and inside an agent sat scanning the Bowl beneath, carved out of a hillside. A short distance away, traffic roared over the Hollywood freeway, and running past the Bowl was Highland, a busy thoroughfare.

Rip had found it a difficult setup to diagram. Since no parking was permitted on Highland, and there was virtually no pedestrian traffic, Bureau cars and Bureau agents would be conspicuous if posted in the area. He had solved the problem by spotting the cars a half mile distant on various streets, and he himself taking over a concealed lookout here behind the statue, high up above the phone booth, and a short distance away.

Once in place, Rip said into the microphone, "Ripley here. All's quiet. Stand by."

It was 7:42. Kelly Sherwood walked below him very slowly and no doubt very fearfully. She walked from the parking lot. When she reached the phone booth, which stood alone, she stopped and faced the Highland traffic which was running heavy. The constant flow of cars kept her in a flood of light.

Rip drew in a deep breath. Someone might offer her a ride. She was conspicuous, a lone woman, the only pedestrian within sight.

The headlights came by twos around the curve. They stared at her briefly, blinding her, then averted their glance, and rushed straight ahead. They were disembodied creatures in the dark, and usually disinterested ones. Sometimes a pair would slow up, as if looking her over, and once she thought a pair would stop.

She escaped their hypnotic pull, and looked the other way down the street. Scarcely thirty yards distant, an emergency phone or power truck stood in the street's dead center, the traffic flowing around its warning red flares. Two big, robust fellows in rough work clothes were busily engaged around an open manhole.

Just praise is only a debt, but flattery is a present. SAMUEL JOHNSON

She held her watch up: 7:55.

Glancing up, she saw a brilliantly lighted cross high on the crest of a hill where the Pilgrimage Play was staged. Her fingers went unconsciously to the little silver cross about her throat. She dared not think about Toby, and wrenched her thoughts away.

She strained to catch sounds close to her. In spite of the lulling roar from the freeway, and the drone of a helicopter overhead, she could hear behind her the night quiet that enveloped the Bowl itself, and also the clumps of trees that edged it and were now silhouetted against a moonlit sky.

She clutched the purse so tightly inside one arm that the muscles ached. One hundred thousand dollars almost. One hundred thousand. She must get it back to the bank. Get it back somehow.

Eight o'clock straight up. He would call any minute. He had to call, or come. He wouldn't leave her here half the night waiting.

She glanced around idly. Van Cliburn looked down on her from a shredded poster left over from the summer season. She had wanted to hear him and Pete, who cared little for serious music, had taken her. He had been bored, but graciously so. He was a good sport.

Eight-fifteen. Her feet hurt from the long day.

Eight-twenty. She felt eyes on her from behind the red flares, but when she glanced that way both men were occupied. But they must wonder. I've been here almost forty minutes.

At 8:24 the telephone called her. It was a high, shrill, cutting ring. She stepped swiftly into the booth, closed the door behind her and, standing, steadied herself against the glass wall. "Yes?" she said.

"You got the money?"

"Yes," she answered tightly.

"No trouble?"

"No." She added hastily, "Let me talk with my sister."

"She's not here. But you can see her in a few minutes. There's an underpass on Highland near where you're standing. Walk through it and a car will be waiting on the other side."

"You'll be in the car?"

"Just do what I said." He hung up.

She left the booth, scarcely knowing what she was about. Her feet were a weight to carry.

She couldn't talk with Toby because something had happened to Toby.

As if guided by remote control, she went automatically to the underpass and down the wide steps that led into the deep cavern she had used many times when attending Bowl events. It was a long, murky tunnel that opened onto other streets and gave access to distant parking lots.

Always before she had been packed in by a mass of humanity, and suffered from a fear of being crushed. But tonight she was alone in a concrete chamber that was only dimly lit by an occasional overhead light.

She suppressed an urge to run, and paced slowly, listening intently and hearing nothing but her own movements, the brush of her clothing and her breathing.

Suddenly, as if a record player h[ad] been [set] on, steps tapped behind her, f[ol]lowed the same instant by their echo. So[me] the steps and echoes were twice as fast as he[rs] and bearing down so rapidly they became a confused blot of sound.

When they neared, she glanced backwa[rd] One of the workmen from the emergency tru[ck] was hurrying toward her, carrying two r[ed] street lanterns. The echoes hurtled from w[all] to wall and raced up and down the long tun[nel] as they looked for escape.

They were a few feet behind. They were ev[en] with her. They passed her, and left her in t[he] wash of their bedlam.

She forced herself to follow, and came [at] last to the turn in the tunnel, then to the sta[ir] way that led from the close, stale air back in[to] the crisp night.

At the top she looked about. A cab [had] parked a short distance away on a side stre[et] No other car was in sight and neither was t[he] workman with his lanterns. The cab driv[er] leaned low, peering at her, and honked.

Approaching uncertainly, she looked in t[he] back seat. The driver was alone. He sa[id] "You the lady the guy sent me for?"

She nodded, and he started around to he[lp] her in. "Never mind," she said, opening t[he] back door.

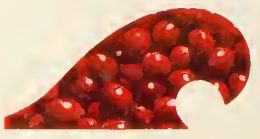
"He asked me to give you this." He hand[ed] her a newspaper-wrapped package and [an] envelope.

As he started the motor, she opened t[he] package and Toby's shoes and dress fell o[ut]

Bradley sat behind the driver's wheel, [his] grip easy but alert. Beside him, Rip spo[ke] quickly into the mike. "Victim entered yell[ow] cab, California license STX 49587, headi[ng] south on Highland. We're following six c[ar] lengths behind. Cab stopped now by traf[fic] lights, corner Highland and Franklin. App[ar]ently will continue on Highland. Units fo[ur] teen and eighteen take over surveillance [at] Highland and Sunset."

They would run the same pattern th[at] they had during the Angel's Flight cov[er]

New crop's in!



FRESH
OCEAN SPRAY
CRANBERRIES
IN YOUR STORE NOW

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Ready to make your traditional cranberry recipes, sauce or relish!

They've just been rushed fresh to your sto[re] . . . plump, wholesome red cranberries ju[st] picked from a brand-new crop . . . a[nd] tested for ripeness! Make them into delicio[us] relishes, sauces, cranberry salads, pies, tart[s] muffins, too . . . If you like your cranberri[es] fresh, you'll find these new-crop Ocea[n] Spray Cranberries the best you've ever ha[d] Fresh idea: Stock up your freezer with pac[k]ages of Ocean Spray fresh cranberries!

OCEAN SPRA
FRESH CRANBERRIE

: or two cars would take over the surlance for a few blocks with other cars ing in from side streets to relieve them.

t the control room in the field division, the and agents worked swiftly. Already they the intercepted phone call which offered leads, and had been too brief to trace.

low an agent was talking with a cab dispher. "I'm running an emergency check. u got a cab with license plates STX 495872"

Hold it," the dispatcher said. In the backund, the agent heard the cross talk of ny radios as drivers called in to report cups and their destinations.

he dispatcher came back on the line. eah, that's our cab. He made a pickup near Hollywood Bowl. A woman. We got it cked out for the Coliseum. Anything else want?"

Hold on will you?" The agent swung ut. "The cab's headed for the Coliseum."

he SAC said to the radioman, "Notify all s."

n the background the radioman was say-"Cab's destination reported Coliseum."

he agent said to the dispatcher, "We need rything you can get. Will you ask your er where he got the pickup order and, if asn't by phone, what the party looked like anything he can give us. Don't tell him wants to know. Just act like you're ous—and don't press him if he doesn't e through."

Sure, Mac, I gotcha. You can listen in."

s the dispatcher pulled a radio speaker lose to the phone, so the agent could hear, SAC said in the background, "Get the iseum police on the phone."

t the same moment, he picked up the e. "Unit ten, come in. Unit ten."

Ten in. Ripley."

Rip, I'm alerting the Coliseum police ——" he agent on the line to the dispatcher was ning in on the conversation between the patcher and the cab driver.

Simmons," the dispatcher said, "where'd get the order on the customer?"

Simmons spoke low. "Near the Hollywood Roosevelt. A man asked how much the run would be. Said he had a girl friend he wanted me to get. I gave him an estimate and he added a five spot."

"O.K., Simmons."

The dispatcher came back on the line to the agent. "Anything else we can do?"

"How well do you know the driver?"

"He's O.K. We used to push hacks together."

"Ask him to take it easy, will you?"

"Sure. I'll tell him to miss the stop signs."

As he hung up, he heard the SAC saying, "Dillon's going to get her into a jam-packed crowd where if we move in on him and he opens fire, a dozen persons might be killed." He added bitterly, "He knows we won't take that chance."

The radio overlapped. "Car ten in. We're on Vermont crossing Venice, still heading south."

Kelly held the dress a long time, staring vacantly ahead, unaware of oncoming cars or the stop signs. Her fingers worked absently as she rolled the dress back up in the newspaper, then remembered from far back she had seen a pair of shoes. She felt around, and located them on the floor.

She asked the driver, "Where're we going?"

He turned his head in surprise. "You don't know, miss?"

She didn't answer. She didn't care.

"Look in the envelope."

Now that he mentioned it, she remembered the envelope that she still held in her right hand. Opening it, a ticket dropped into her lap. She saw it was a reserved seat ticket, and then saw it was to the Los Angeles Rams football game.

The driver said, "You're going to miss most of the first half. Started at eight, you know, miss, but your friend didn't ask me to call for you until after that."

Her thoughts tumbled over themselves. She had anticipated and steeled herself for a meeting in a dark, isolated place. Instead she would meet him in a mob of 100,000 people in a glaringly lighted coliseum.

Special Agent Cronin sat taut and anxious in the back office of an exclusive Beverly Hills shop whose clientele was strictly upper-income.

A tall, poised woman said, "We don't sell many of these stuffed animals except at Christmastime."

She studied three sales tickets she had drawn from a stack of several hundred. "This is a charge, an old customer, a woman I know well. These other two are cash."

She studied both in an effort to match faces to them. "May I see the picture again?"

Cronin handed her the subject's mug shot.

For a moment she said nothing, and then, "I'm not sure, but this man"—she tapped a sales ticket—"looked something like him. It has been three weeks ago. I couldn't be positive, but there is a resemblance, like brothers might have."

"Did you talk with him any?" Cronin asked.

She nodded. "We always draw them out if we can—try to make the gift fit the recipient. It makes the purchase more personal, and with our prices, we feel we must offer something besides the product. He was buying the tiger for a child in a hospital. We talked quite a little about the boy. I remember something was wrong with his hip."

"You say it was cash. Does that mean he took the tiger with him?"

"No, not that day. When I was gift-wrapping it, I noticed the stitching had come apart. Scarcely noticeable, but I told him we'd get another the next day and deliver it. I was rather insistent since I didn't want to trouble him.

"He said something—I can't remember exactly, I wasn't paying much attention—something like, no, he'd prefer to pick it up himself; that he'd just sold his business in Hollywood—a fur shop, I believe it was—and didn't know what to do with himself."

It was only idle chatter that had meant nothing at the time, that had chinked up a gap in the silence. But chatter could point to a man.

Picking up the phone, Cronin dialed O and asked for the chief operator. He identified himself, said it was an emergency, and asked to be placed in touch with anyone who could check the files immediately for the names of fur shops in the Hollywood area that had discontinued telephone service during the last twelve months, and if any had had service restored.

He sat anxious minutes, toying with the cord, then he made notes. Two fur stores had canceled service on going out of business. Hurriedly, he took down their names and addresses.

"I told you something?" the saleswoman asked, puzzled.

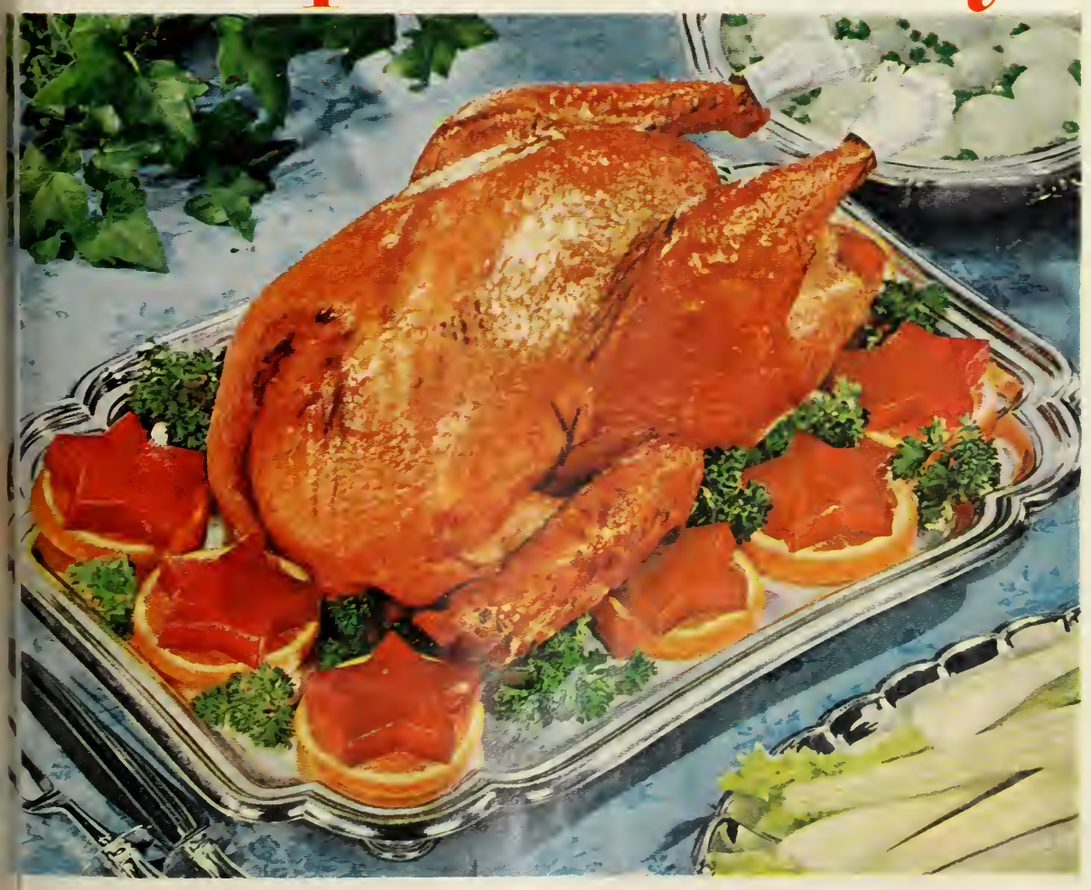
Hanging up, he dialed the SAC. "You told me something," he said.

The blocks swept by, some residential and fairly dark, some business and half as bright as midday. As the numbness left Kelly, she noted they were on Vermont, passing small shops and cafés and bars and occasionally a tired movie house. The driver turned left and the Coliseum loomed up a short distance away. It was a monstrous dark hulk in the night, except for a brilliantly lighted rim from which flew many flags.

An angry lion roar swelled suddenly from 100,000 throats and rolled across the land. "The referee's catching it," the driver said, pulling up to the curb.

As he opened the door, he asked, "What tunnel you got, miss?"

She checked the number under the street light. "Twenty-one."



"That'll be to your left."

No one was about except a ticket taker listening to the game on a portable. "Take the Escalator if you want to save some steps."

She passed a coffee-and-candy shack, a man selling programs for a quarter, and an officer strolling casually by. She rode the Escalator alone.

As she rose she looked ahead anxiously. But no one waited at the top. She looked to the ground, and no one followed. The crowd,

New pack's ready!

JELLIED
OCEAN SPRAY
CRANBERRY SAUCE AT YOUR GROCER'S, TOO!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Make your turkey taste better . . . better for you!

Wholesome, bright red Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce looks so good, and tastes so good with your holiday dinner! Whether it's turkey, or whatever else you serve these busy days, remember this: Cranberry sauce adds fresh fruit juiciness to dry meats; cuts the rich taste of fat meats; and leaves a clean, fresh taste in your mouth. 14 VITAMINS AND MINERALS, plus more natural fruit pectins than oranges, apples or any other fresh fruit!

OCEAN SPRAY
CRANBERRY SAUCE

The natural mate for turkey —and every meat!

which had been strangely quiet, suddenly burst into happy, deafening pandemonium.

As she stepped from the Escalator, she hesitated. She was now in a wide tunnel that encircled the Coliseum. A few people were here and there, some working at stands getting coffee, soft drinks and hot dogs ready for the pack who would besiege them at half time.

At Entrance 21 to the Coliseum proper, she took a deep breath, steadied herself, then walked into the floodlighted bowl. An attendant looked at the ticket stub, and began climbing. She followed, after one fleeting glance to the field below. The announcer's voice echoed over the loud-speakers: "First and ten on the Rams' forty-seven."

The crowd was 100,000 images in stone, tense and quiet as they waited for the Ram quarterback to pull back and throw a pass. They groaned then in agony.

She climbed into the blinding brilliance of a battery of floodlights, still pressing her purse tightly under her left arm. Step by slow step she climbed, her heart pounding from the unusual exertion, and at last, when the rows had run out, the attendant indicated an aisle seat, directly beneath the fluttering flags and a battery of lights. A graying woman and her son of eighteen looked up from adjoining seats, and two college-age girls sat in front.

Still delaying, she scanned faces as far as she could see without finding the one she sought. She glanced over the rim of the Coliseum, and down the sheer drop to the ground below where a man walked. A burly fellow yelled at her, "Don't jump, lady. We've still got a chance."

Everyone laughed and shouted, and she sat down quickly.

The announcer said, "The ball has been spotted on the Rams' forty. One minute and forty-five seconds left in the second quarter."

Rip directed the operations from a packed police squad room, near the peristyle, a command post in charge of 275 officers, drawn from the sheriff's office and the city police. He could hear the bands playing on the field, signifying the end of the first half and the start of the half-time activities. Dillon might choose this moment to move, when people would be crowding the stands for ice cream or soft drinks, heading for rest rooms, or roaming about to stretch their legs.

He was sweating as he posted agents, who would keep in radio touch, at strategic points about the Coliseum. Next he assigned four men to operate in Section 21 as candy and soft-drink vendors, to keep the victim under surveillance. They left immediately with a police officer who would arrange with the concessions manager to "hire" and outfit them.

As fast as they could be called in, the officers who regularly manned the Coliseum proper were shown Red Dillon's photograph, and dispatched to look over the crowds.

Over and over Rip said, "Don't attempt to apprehend him. We just want to locate him. You'll be jeopardizing a life if you arrest him."

Rip sent agents to pass out wanted notices to the attendants at each of the twenty-eight gates, again warning that the attendants were not to stop Dillon, or even delay him.

Two more agents left to reconnoiter the area where the dressing rooms were located. A policewoman was asked to wander through the women's rest rooms.

Rip said to Bradley, "He's got only two ways to go. He can make bodily contact with the victim or he can operate from a distance and send someone over to pick up the money, like a newsboy or one of the fellows selling programs."

He hesitated a beat in thought, then continued, "Here's what we'll do if he makes bodily contact ——"

When he finished mapping out the stategy for either of the two eventualities, he turned the control desk over to Bradley, and headed for Section 21.

As he emerged from the gloom of the tunnel and looked down on the field, a marching band was leaving, playing a John Philip Sousa number. A mighty roar went up from the crowd as the Los Angeles Rams came running back on the field.

Glancing upward, some fifteen or more rows, he saw Kelly Sherwood sitting very straight and taut. Her hands held tightly to the purse in her lap. Her eyes were not on the field but on the only aisle by which someone could approach.

A stocky man, puffing vigorously, climbed the aisle toward her. She swung her knees out to make room for him as he passed and took the eighth seat down.

The woman next to her said, "Care to use my glasses?" and handed her a pair of binoculars.

Kelly thanked her. Slowly she moved them over the crowd, seeing hundreds of backs, stooped and straight, thin and bulky, sloping and squared off. Reaching a familiar one, she held for a second, recognizing it as Ripley's. He was leaning casually against the bunker-like entry from the tunnel.

The announcer said, "Visiting team offside. Accepted by the Rams. Third and six on the Rams' forty."

The time on the peristyle clock was 10: The third quarter was almost over, and t there would be another fifteen minutes play. He was letting her sweat it out. He giving her time to go to pieces. As long as moved about, engaged in physical activ she found a certain release of tension, once she sat ——

A torturing thought took over. He mi not meet her. She might find the cab wait as she left, and be taken elsewhere.

So what? If he wants to play it that way, play it that way. He can't break me.

A young fellow selling ice-cream sandwic came up the steps, calling out. He stood rectly over her, searching the row for a c tomer. Then an ice-cream sandwich was be shoved into her hand, and he was sayi "Everything O.K.?"

She nodded. "Thanks," he said aloud, a pretended to pocket money. He dropped do a step, and called out, "Ice cream." A sm boy, the eighth seat in, held up his hand a waved frantically.

The vendor said to the two college gi "Pass it along, please." Someone a row do said irritably, "I thought you guys were allowed up here while the game's on."

"Sorry, sir." He sat down on the steps.

The announcer said, "Penalty marker do on the field. Personal foul. Clipping."

Toby. Toby. She prayed silently with familiar words from her childhood, alm forgotten. But was God a God to forget happy times, a God to call upon in desper ones?

A gun sounded, ending the third peri She had no idea when the play resumed. next she knew, the announcer was sayi "Point after being attempted. Kick is up— good. Rams trail, nineteen to twenty-o Seven minutes, fourteen seconds left in fou quarter."

Seven minutes, fourteen seconds.

Rip shifted his holster a little forward der his coat, which he left unbuttoned. clenched and unclenched his hand to loos the arm muscles.

His glance shifted every few seconds to enormous clock at the far end of the fie over the peristyle. Two minutes, elev seconds.

Ten seconds, nine, eight, seven.

It was third down and two to go with Rams in possession of the ball on their opp nent's 28-yard line. The crowd was on its fe all 100,000 of them, sensing a break if the R quarterback could engineer those two yar

One minute, fifty-two seconds.

The ball was snapped back, the quarterba hesitated, looking for a pass receiver down field. The din of 100,000 voices reverberat through the concrete.

Rip tensed, his eyes shifting rapidly fr spot to spot, face to face. With everyo standing, the aisle was now a canyon form by human bodies. None except Rip and woman above watched the aisle.

A groan went up. The ball was over receiver's head.

The announcer said, "The Rams' kicki team is coming in."

They would try for a field goal and, if s cessful, would add three vital points to score.

The throng grew quiet. It was as still a would be at midnight after everyone h gone, 100,000 beings neither moving whispering as the ball came back, the struck it, and it soared into the air.

The referee signaled it was good, and explosion of sound rolled in shock waves out of the bowl.

Fifty-seven seconds. Rip's fingers beg working. He drew the long deep breath he h been taught as an athlete to take before goi into a contest.

He heard the radio whisper, "Toby Sh wood found safe. Repeat. Toby Sherwo found safe. Plan B now in operation. Repe Plan B ——"

Thirty-four seconds. They could move to take Red Dillon now if they could isol him from the mob. But the order from Wa ington stood: No bystander's life must risked. If they could not "isolate" Red Dill they must "contain" him by surveillance.

Rice 'n Raisin Betty

New autumn dessert is 20-minute quick . . but only with Minute Rice and Sun-Maid Raisins.

Such good autumn flavors . . . blended into a sunny dessert by the magic of Minute Rice. Sun-Maid Raisins are the best of the crop . . . nuggets of sweetness . . . brimful of quick energy, minerals and vitamins. And because you don't wash, rinse or pre-cook Minute Rice, all its vitamins are there in the good eating, too

RICE 'N RAISIN BETTY

1 cup Minute Rice
⅛ teaspoon salt
⅔ cup brown sugar
1⅓ cups diced apples
1⅓ cups apple juice
¼ teaspoon cinnamon
½ cup seedless Sun-Maid Raisins
1 tablespoon butter

Combine all ingredients except butter in saucepan. Bring to a boil. Cover. Simmer 5 minutes, or until most of liquid is absorbed. Remove from heat; stir in butter. Serve warm (with cream, if desired). Makes 4 or 5 servings.

Minute is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

venty-four seconds. The visitors were at-ting a long pass, a desperate last-stand e.

ie pass missed the receiver, and people ed to leave, eager to reach their cars d of the others and escape the traffic con-on that would ensue. Soon they filled the s. The agents selling refreshments climbed v steps higher, moving in closer to main-their cover around the victim.

nen down on the playing field the gun ked, and the game was over. A mass of anity surged toward the tunnels, where packed themselves into hard cores before exit. Tenaciously, Rip stood his ground ne of these cores enveloped him.

e listened to the whispers coming from adio. "Victim leaving seat, looking about, ing down aisle toward Tunnel Twenty-taking steps slowly ——" he vendors above were reporting her ements.

apping his hands as though to light a ciga-, he whispered into the concealed mike, truct all agents move in on Twenty-one, maintain surveillance as victim leaves or es meet."

adley answered him, "O.K., Rip. All ts converge on Twenty-one."

ie pressed the purse tightly against her both hands fastened about it. She was hed so solidly within the mob that she the immovable pressure of hipbones nst hers and bodies molding into her back. other time she would have suffered from d phobia, and would have clawed her to the edge, panicked by the illusion that was being crushed to death.

All the reasonings of men are not worth one sentiment of women.
VOLTAIRE

aching along with the throng, and often ding for long periods, she searched the fa s about her, faces silent or smiling, ex-sionless or laughing, irritable and im-ent.

ne moment he was not there, and the next Dillon stood beside her. She was perhaps steps away from the level concrete area led to the exit. Before she saw him even, felt the gun pushed into her side from re his right hand held it in his pocket. He made himself up as a beatnik character, dark glasses, a goatee, hair askew and ken cheeks. But he couldn't change the cing, intent eyes.

Let's have it." He spoke so low no one could hear. His left hand reached for the se before her mind had flashed orders to fingers to yield it. They continued their p for a beat, then surrendered it.

It's all there?" he asked, and she nodded. e continued, "Make like you're my wife stay close to me."

he gun trembled in her side as he fought n a coughing seizure. His arm, touching s, hardened to control it.

lowly she grew aware of a disturbance ad. The crowd was angry with someone, he was shouting back, "You Californians all the same. Think you own the earth, can shove anybody around you want to. ll, you're nothing but a bunch of jerks. A ch of jerks. We don't treat visitors like that Arizona."

He was elbowing his way head-on into the wd, roughing up men and women alike he twisted his body and forced his way ough, not caring whom he hurt or how. was two steps ahead of her, heading ight for her, when she recognized him.

Rip yelled at a man, "Butt your big fat butt of my way, mister."

He took a step up, and was looking into her e. The crowd yelled back. "Hit him, some-ly. . . . Slug him. . . . What's the matter h you, Arizona? . . . Forget him—he's nk, can't you see?"

He crashed between her and Dillon, hitting h hard. "Let me out of this bunch of jerks. e me a little room, you lousy crumbums."

He turned his body violently, pushing her so hard she lost her balance and fell into the people ahead of her. Regaining her feet, she found herself three steps below Dillon.

Dillon screamed, "Get out of my way."

He struggled to reach Kelly, but the crowd was packed solidly and no one would give.

Rip shouted into his face, "Don't go push-ing me around, or I'll call the cops. Just be-cause I'm from Arizona —— You're all a bunch of first-class jerks."

Behind Dillon, agents were showing their badges and steering people to Tunnel 22. At the entry to 21, out of sight, other agents diverted the mob to Tunnel 20, sealing off 21.

Still yelling at him, Rip blocked Dillon. He was gambling that Dillon's trigger temper and finger wouldn't snap. Dillon had too much at stake to murder someone in an after-game ruckus with a drunk. He had the $96,000, and all he would be thinking about would be to get out with it.

Another place and time, he might have shot his way through in a paroxysm of anger. But the crowd that he had counted on for his safety would become his trap if he killed.

So Rip reasoned, though there was no telling about a criminal like Dillon.

Rip sobered abruptly, and as his left hand showed his credential, he said fast, "O.K., Dillon. We're the FBI. You're under arrest. Get your hand out of your pocket."

Dillon's eyes pivoted wildly as Rip held him at gun point. Dillon found himself suddenly alone except for this crazy fool in front of him and seven men coming up the steps behind the fool. He made a sudden, dodging move, and catapulted himself backward up three steps, firing as he did so. But already Rip and the others had fallen flat. They held their fire as behind Dillon, and higher up, an agent slipped in to move out a couple and three children. The agent steered them to Tunnel 22.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 93

Flavor-magic makes your turkey dressing...

and pumpkin pie twice as nice...

Use America's Finest Spices . . . McCormick-Schilling . . .
To Give Flavor-Magic to Holiday Meals!

Try the savory Turkey Dressing recipe given here. But whatever your recipe use McCormick or Schilling spices for that extra spark which makes your dressing amazingly zestful, tasty, satisfying . . . Note the convenience of McCormick Minced Onion. All the real onion flavor with none of the work! You'll also want to have on hand McCormick or Schilling Poultry Seasoning, Sage, Parsley Flakes and Paprika. Try them!

And for a "twice as nice" pumpkin pie use McCormick or Schilling Pumpkin Pie Spice, a happy blend, which really gives old-time flavor to your pie. Insist on McCormick or Schilling spices—two great brands known nationwide as the finest.

McCORMICK Schilling
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM—TWO GREAT BRANDS

McCormick Recipe of the month
SAVORY TURKEY DRESSING

For a 12 lb. bird prepare 12 cups (3 qts.) dry bread crumbs or cubes. Melt 1 cup shortening, use half butter for flavor, in large skillet. Add 1 cup McCormick Minced Onion, cook until yellow. Add crumbs gradually, stirring to prevent burning. Turn into deep bowl.

Mix into bowl 1½ cups chopped celery stalks and leaves, ½ teaspoon McCormick or Schilling Ground Sage, ½ teaspoon McCormick or Schilling Black Pepper, 3 teaspoons McCormick or Schilling Poultry Seasoning, 1½ teaspoons salt, ¼ cup hot water. Stuff turkey loosely.

©1960 McCormick & Co., Inc.

McCORMICK · The House of Flavor · SCHILLING
McCORMICK in the East • SCHILLING in the West • CLUB HOUSE in Canada

How to make these festive desserts

(All of the flavor—none of the fuss)

PEACHCAKE WHIP

Place firm, sweet Stokely's Finest Peaches—Cling or Freestone—over shortcake and top with luscious Lucky Whip for a fancy "hurry-up" dessert. Delicious!

PUMPKIN PIE SUPREME

Bake a pie with Stokely's Finest Pumpkin Pie Filling or Pumpkin (see easy recipe on cans). It's rich in the full natural flavor of vine-ripened pumpkin. Crown each piece with delicious Lucky Whip.

FRUITS ROYALE

A generous portion of tasty Lucky Whip (only 18 calories per average serving) over Stokely's Finest Fruit Cocktail—delightful combination of fruits folks like best, packed in syrup to enrich their natural flavor.

Desserts by Stokely-Van Camp...Topping by Lucky Whip

NTINUED FROM PAGE 91

s they left, Dillon heard their steps be- d him and whirled about. Seeing the agent, ired, but before the gun exploded the agent pped.

Dillon veered in the other direction as he tinued backing up the steps. He held a ght advantage over Rip and the agents were crawling on their bellies over the s. But he had a disadvantage in that he silhouetted by the battery of floodlights ctly above and behind him.

tep by step, Dillon continued backing up, ng.

Rip moved up slowly, keeping his head low, embering the obstacle ammo course he run during his training. He held his fire, ng time.

Dillon reached the last row, not far from re Kelly Sherwood had sat, and then he no choice but to follow it. He triggered last shot, and as he went for another pon, strapped to his leg, Rip moved in tly, rising and running. He dropped flat as Dillon palmed the leg weapon.

s Dillon fired point-blank, Rip got off a t. Slowly Dillon sank to the concrete and ed, still clutching the purse. His body jack- fed in pain, then lay still.

Fearing a trick, Rip approached warily, continuing to crawl. When he was a few feet away, he rose. Dillon still held the purse in the tight grasp of death.

An agent said, "I made two bucks forty, selling Cokes. What'll I do with it?"

And somebody retorted, "If General Accounting hears you held out on them ——"

And another said, "Wait till the Bureau finds out you're working on the side."

The long tension had broken.

Rip watched as Kelly got into the Bureau car that would take her home. She raised her hand to him as the car pulled away, and smiled, and in her smile was the kind of strength and gentleness he liked in a woman. She was America to him—she and Toby.

The man stretched out up there in the Coliseum, he was America, too, unfortunately.

"Well, it's over," Rip said to Bradley. Over for Kelly Sherwood, he thought, but tomorrow another criminal somewhere would reach out to use an innocent person in another Operation Terror.

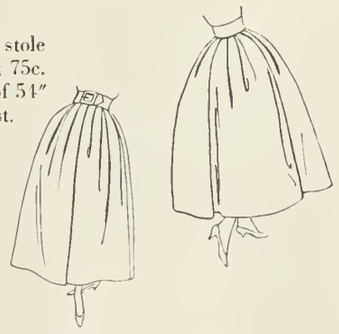
"I'll be with you in a minute," he said to Bradley and headed for a phone booth.

"Peg ——" he said. END

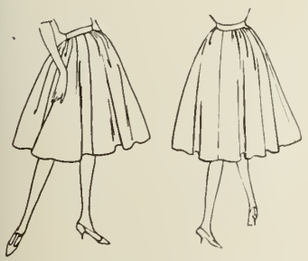
Christmas Boutique

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 66 AND 67

Vogue Design No. 5094. Hat; sizes 21½, 22, 23; 75c. Version shown requires ¾ yard of 54″ fabric with or without nap, size 22.



Vogue Design No. 5123. "Easy to Make" blouse, culotte and sash; 10–16 (31–36); 75c. Version shown requires 4⅛ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.



Vogue Design No. 5150. Jacket and blouse; 10–18 (31–38); 75c. Fake-fur jacket requires 1⅛ yards of 54″ fabric with nap for jacket and 1⅝ yards of 39″ fabric for lining. Ticking jacket requires 1½ yards of 35″ fabric without nap. Either jacket requires 3¼ yards of 1¼″ braid. Yardages are for size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9786. Skirt, stole and belt; 24–30 waist measure; 75c. Skirt and belt require 5 yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 26 waist.

Vogue Design No. 9925. "Very Easy to Make" skirts; 24–30 waist measure; 60c. Version shown requires 2⅝ yards of 54″ fabric with nap, size 26 waist.

Zebra bag and leopard collar, Journal Pattern No. 2949. Appliqué design Journal Pattern No. 2950. Order Journal Patterns, 25c each (Penna. residents please add 4% state sales tax), from Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Phila. 5, Pa.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spodina Ave., Taranta, Ont. Same prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Calif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered.

New! Deep Moisture Treatment Duet

Helena Rubinstein's Skin Dew Beauty Offer!

9.00 Value NOW 5.00

Now keep your skin looking younger, feeling softer, with the most luxurious moisture treatment ever! New French Formula Skin Dew and its perfect companion Herbessence Cleanser, with beneficial herbs. For a limited time, all this Helena Rubinstein luxury is yours for $5, price of Skin Dew alone.

WITH: SKIN DEW MOISTURIZER...a luscious pink liquid that gives your skin proteinized moisture for a young dewy bloom. Seeps in...deep in... your thirsty skin drinks up every greaseless drop! To restore precious moisture, use every time you cleanse your face, always under make-up, every night for a greaseless moisture treatment. Reg. 5.00

FREE! HERBESSENCE CLEANSER...pale green liquid cream with rare herbs of known benefit to beauty. Cleanses deep. Always use Herbessence™ before Skin Dew,® for a complexion pure as snow, fine to the touch. 4.00 Val.

YOU SAVE 4.00

at leading drug and department stores

Helena Rubinstein

©1960, HELENA RUBINSTEIN,® INC.

TELL ME, DOCTOR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 30

And that if I did have any menstrual troubles, they would get well after I marry and have a baby or two. Mother asked if he didn't want to examine me. He said no, that it wasn't wise or necessary."

"Phyllis has never been a whiner or complainer," Mrs. Maxwell remarked quietly. "On the contrary, she's a good deal of a stoic. Don't quite a few young girls go through a painful time when they start menstruating? I have certainly had that impression from friends with daughters. My feeling has been that Marjorie and I were unusually lucky."

"I think I can explain why Dr. Williams said what he did; and I believe this will interest you, Phyllis. It used to be taken for granted that a girl's first experiences with ovulation could be expected to be rather painful. Ovulation is really the background for menstruation, you know. Or do you?"

"Oh, yes. Mother explained the whole thing to me quite a while ago."

"Then you're aware that menstruation results when the ovary releases an egg but the egg passes out of the body without becoming fertilized, as happens most of the time. We know now that there is often bleeding before ovulation actually starts, and that it may occur more or less independently of ovulation."

"That's news to me!" exclaimed Mrs. Maxwell.

The doctor nodded, continuing, "It has altered our medical views about beginning menstruation somewhat. When bleeding or staining occurs before ovulation has begun, it is not apt to cause the same disturbances as true menstruation does when it first gets under way. If there is anything wrong in these non-ovulating cases, the unpleasant consequences are more likely to show up later on. Of course if a girl has been frightened about menstruation, made to think it is very painful, she may develop the imaginary pains that Dr. Williams spoke of. But it is different when a healthy-looking, sensible girl like Phyllis has severe pains before bleeding has actually begun."

"Then what do you think causes her trouble, Doctor?" Mrs. Maxwell asked.

"The most frequent cause of such pain is that the girl has started ovulating and menstruating, but there is an obstruction somewhere in the menstrual tract. It blocks the menstrual products, they can't get out. This kind of trouble occurs most often when there is no normal opening in the hymen." The doctor turned back to the girl. "The hymen is a thin little membrane, Phyllis, stretched across the lower end of the vagina. It often has a very small opening, but in any event is usually elastic enough so that the menstrual flow can get through all right."

Phyllis nodded that she understood.

"When it cannot, you can readily see what happens. At each period more of the menstrual wastes are backed up. The vagina may become distended as a result; the same thing may even be true of the uterus. That would account for the increasing pain each month. It also makes for painful elimination, in many cases. Have you had any trouble about that?"

"Everything in that part of me hurts," Phyllis said emphatically.

"Then it's a pretty good guess that your trouble is caused by what we call an imperforate hymen. There are, of course, other conditions that can cause pain in a young girl at beginning menstruation. Also, occasionally there is a stoppage higher up in the vagina or at the mouth of the uterus. That may be more serious. But we should be able to find all these things out without too much difficulty."

"What about tumors or infection, something of that kind?"

"There is very little chance of tumors, Mrs. Maxwell. They just don't happen very often in girls as young as Phyllis. However, girls of her age seem to be acquiring more infectious troubles than they used to. For that and other reasons, my feeling is that symptoms of the kind Phyllis has call for a complete examination of the internal organs."

"I am glad, Doctor. We felt definitely that something should be done."

The doctor's manner was very kindly and reassuring as he explained to the girl, "You perhaps ought to know, Phyllis, that there has been a rather strong taboo against examining a young girl's reproductive organs. For that reason a good many conditions have been permitted to become seriously troubling that could have been dealt with easily at your age. I know Dr. Williams has some scruples about vaginal examination of young girls—we've argued the matter more than once. And I admit that an ordinary examination here in my office may not tell us all we want to know. But I am confident that if you will co-operate, we can get some helpful information.

"There is really not much to it. I will show you everything I plan to use—applicators, instruments and what not—and explain what I am doing as we go along. Remember that under no circumstances will I actually hurt you. If it should be necessary to do something that will hurt, we'll attend to it later on, and use an anesthetic."

"I'm not afraid," Phyllis replied. "Mother said you might examine me, and that it's nothing to be scared about." . . .

"You came through that examination like a veteran," the doctor complimented Phyllis when it was over with. "My first guess ... seems to have been the right one. I can find ... opening whatsoever in the hymen, and ... is some bulging and blueness. It looks ... though we have a simple imperforate hym...

"That doesn't sound very bad," Phyllis ...

"It isn't, Phyllis, and it's simple to take ... of. But"—to Mrs. Maxwell—"I would ... Phyllis to go to the hospital and have a gen... anesthetic. Whatever is done surgically ... doubtless be very minor. It is just that ... general anesthetic will make it possible ... carry out a thorough examination of the p... organs. It's a great advantage to a girl ... age to have this assurance. And occasionally, in such a case, there are other minor difficulties. Once in a while we run into an obstruction, or obstructions, which require ... extended surgery. What I'm trying to say is that there is nothing here to worry us, but it is much better to attend to an imperforate hymen in the hospital."

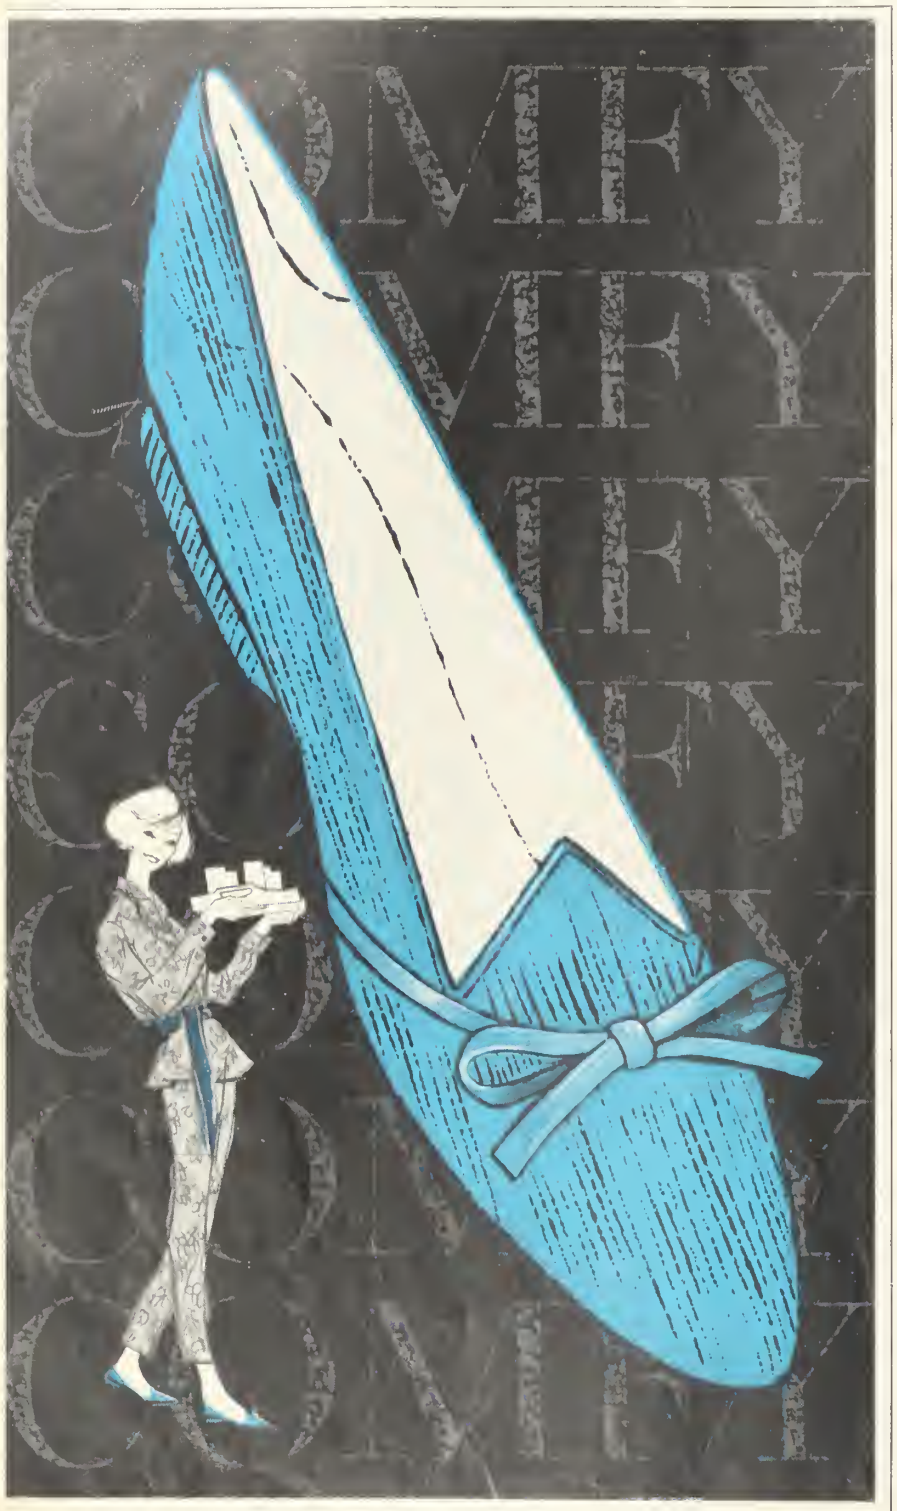
Phyllis remarked cheerfully, "I had a ... time in the hospital when they took my ... pendix out!"

Both the doctor and Mrs. Maxwell ... laughing heartily when mother and daughter left the consulting room. The doctor thought the atmosphere couldn't have been more wholesome.

The small incision required was made in the hymen two days later, under light intraven... anesthesia. When the doctor visited Phyllis that evening she was sitting up. Mrs. Maxwell was there, and Phyllis was talking animatedly as the doctor entered.

"That pain has gone already," she greeted him enthusiastically. "I feel just wonderful!"

"You have a right to feel better, young lady. There was considerable menstrual material backed up and under pressure. Everything will be back to normal in a few days. Next month you will undoubtedly start menstruating just like everybody else."



"Does that mean everything else is normal?" Mrs. Maxwell asked.

"Everything else about Phyllis is A number one." The doctor patted the girl's hand. "You are a first-rate prospect for marriage when the time comes, and for having children and nursing them. I wish you could know what a satisfaction it is to a physician to be able to give such good news as this. And what a fine thing it is when parents have got away from the taboos and superstitions about not examining young girls!"

"And when doctors, too, have got away from the old taboos?" Mrs. Maxwell, smiling, took him up. "What would have happened if this matter had not been taken care of? Would the wastes just have kept building up, causing Phyllis more and more pain? Or would the hymen finally have ruptured from the pressure?"

"In Phyllis's case, it might have ruptured spontaneously, but it probably wouldn't have. If not, we would have had to operate under much more difficult circumstances. I have known neglect of an obstruction like this ... to turn out to be desperately serious. You're a lucky girl, Phyllis—thanks to your mother's good sense, and your own."

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses the effect of the thyroid gland on pregnancy.

ELFIN . . . softest way to solid comfort around the house. Pinwale corduroy in ming blue, red, pink, gold, heaven blue, navy, black. AA and B widths. 5.00, slightly higher west of the Rockies.

DANIEL GREEN

IF YOU CANNOT FIND THIS COMFY® SLIPPER IN YOUR LOCAL STORE, WRITE: DANIEL GREEN COMPANY, DOLGEVILLE, NEW YORK

HOLY BIBLE WORLDWIDE BIBLE READING

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

JOIN IN WORLDWIDE BIBLE READING

Millions the world around join each year in reading Bible passages appropriate to the Thanksgiving-to-Christmas season. To secure a free bookmark listing these passages, day by day, write to American Bible Society, Dept. U, 450 Park Avenue, New York 22, New York, for their Daily Bible Readings 1960 (U-139).

Common sense about the common cold

You catch cold a lot quicker when you haven't been taking proper care of yourself; when your body's defenses are down.

So when you do catch cold—and few of us can avoid catching one now and then—give your body's defenses a chance to build up again. Otherwise, the cold can make you still weaker.

That's when other more serious infections often take hold: like sinusitis, ear infections, bronchitis, even pneumonia.

Follow these common sense rules when you first feel the troublesome symptoms of a common cold.

First, ease the aches and pains. For headache, bodily aches and the feverish feeling of a cold, Bufferin® brings incredibly fast relief. Bufferin's great benefit for millions is that its exclusive combination of anti-acids called Di-Alminate* speeds Bufferin's pain reliever into the bloodstream twice as fast as aspirin.

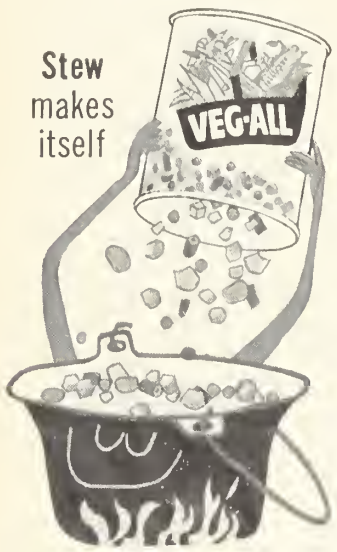
Second, take it easy. Pamper yourself. Let the housework slide for a couple of days. Stay in bed with your favorite magazines, and the radio for company. Sleep lots and keep warm.

Third, eat and drink sensibly. That means light meals with lots of citrus fruits and juices. Your body needs plenty of fluids when it's fighting the cold virus.

Remember, you can take Bufferin as long as your cold lasts; as often as every four hours or as your doctor recommends. Bufferin combines special anti-acids with aspirin to protect you against the stomach distress you can get from aspirin alone.

So, when you catch cold, follow the rules of common sense that are your body's best defense and take Bufferin.

*Bristol-Myers Registered Trademark for aluminum glycinate and magnesium carbonate.



No Danes need apply

but we'll pay 25¢ to anyone who hasn't tasted Danish Dessert, a Scandinavian delicacy with real fruit juice quite unlike ordinary gelatine desserts. Available almost everywhere! Just send the front of one package to: "Junket" Danish Dessert, Dept. L11, Woburn, Mass. We'll swiftly send you a quarter. This offer expires January 1, 1961.

"Junket" is a registered trademark of Salada-Shirriff-Horsey Inc. for Danish Dessert and other fine food products.

Stew makes itself with VEG-ALL®

7 garden mixed vegetables
Send label for FREE RECIPES:
The Larsen Company, Dept. C13, P.O. Box 728, Green Bay, Wis.

Campana
Italian Balm
Heals Detergent Hands Fast
Rough red chapped hands look younger and prettier...quick. Just a few applications of Italian Balm soothe and smooth dry skin away.

ASK FOR NAME BRAND
GRAVY MASTER

MISS HAPPINESS AND MISS FLOWER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

"Because I said so," said Tom in such a terrible voice that Belinda was quiet.

Nona took off the brown paper and found the wooden box with the red and white strings. "Cut them," said Belinda impatiently, but Nona's small fingers untied the bow and the knot and carefully smoothed out the strings. "Oh, you are slow!" said Belinda.

"She's not, she's careful," said Tom.

Nona lifted the lid and carefully, perhaps even more carefully than usual because Tom had praised her, she unrolled the cotton wool and tissue paper and there on the table, looking very small and cold and white, lay Miss Happiness and Miss Flower.

"What queer little dolls," said Belinda, disappointed, and Nona answered:

"They're not queer. They're Japanese."

You can imagine how frightened and lost Miss Happiness and Miss Flower felt when they found themselves on the big slippery table. They had to lie there looking up into the faces of Nona and Belinda. If Nona and Belinda had been Japanese children one of them, Miss Flower was sure, would have made her and Miss Happiness bow. "We can't even be polite," said Miss Flower in despair and she cried, "Can one of these be the kind and clever girl?"

"Wish that she may be," said Miss Happiness, "wish."

As I have often told you before, wishes are very powerful things, even dolls' wishes, and as Miss Happiness wished, Nona put out a finger and very gently stroked Miss Flower's hair. Her finger felt the chip and, "You poor little doll," said Nona.

"They're not even new," said Belinda in disgust. "Stupid old Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson," and in a temper she began to crumple up the wrappings. Then she stopped. She had found a piece of paper written on in spidery old-fashioned writing. Mother read it out. It was from Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson. "I send you with my love Miss Happiness, Miss Flower and Little Peach," she wrote.

"Happiness and Flower," said Mother. "What pretty names."

"Peach is the one I like best," said Belinda. "But where is Little Peach?"

"Was there no other doll?" asked Anne.

"No. There were only two, not three."

"Nothing in the wrappings?"

"No."

"In the cotton wool or tissue paper?"

"Nothing."

It was very odd. There was no sign of Little Peach—"and that is the one I would have liked best," mourned Belinda.

"Never mind," said Mother. "Anne is too big for dolls, so there is one each for you and Nona."

"They have been a long time getting here," said Anne, looking at the postmark on the brown paper. "Poor little things, spending Christmas in a parcel."

"They don't mind about Christmas," said Nona quickly. It was strange how Nona seemed to know about these little dolls.

"You have never been to Japan," said Belinda rudely.

That was true but, like Miss Happiness and Miss Flower, Nona had come from far away and could feel for them. "Perhaps," said Miss Flower, "she might be the kind and clever girl."

"Why shouldn't they mind about Christmas?" argued Belinda.

"They don't have Christmas in Japan."

"Don't be silly."

"I'm not silly. They don't."

"What do they have, then?"

Nona was not sure but, as you know, she was always reading and it seemed to her that in some story about Japanese children or in a geography book she had read —— What did I read? thought Nona, wrinkling up her forehead to try to remember. Then, "They have a Star Festival," she said.

"A Star Festival?"

"Yes," said Nona. They were all looking at her and she blushed and stammered though she remembered more clearly now. "S-something to do with the stars, t-two stars," she said. "I think they are the spirits of two people who loved each other long, long ago, a thousand years ago, and were separated. Now they are up in two stars each side of the M-milky Way and one special night each year—I d-don't know when it is—they can cross and meet."

"Across the Milky Way?" said Anne. "How pretty."

"Yes," said Nona again and now her eyes shone so that she, too, looked almost pretty. "And on earth that night, children—grown-up people as well, but mostly children—write wishes on pieces of colored paper and tie them outside on the bamboos, all over Japan."

They looked at her in surprise. "Why, Nona," said Mother, "you seem a different child when you tell a story like that."

"I didn't know you could," said Anne. "It's a beautiful story."

"Jolly clever to remember it like that," said Tom.

"It comes of reading," said Father. "That's what I'm always telling you children. Good girl, Nona."

He gave Nona a pat on the head and Nona felt so pleased that she smiled at him quite like a happy little girl, but Belinda was not pleased at all.

Belinda was the youngest and she had always been Father's pet, and Tom's and Anne's; she did not like it when they praised Nona. "You needn't think you're so clever," she said to Nona when everyone else had gone. "You can't do anything but read . . . and cry, ery-

> Of all the things you wear, your expression is the most important.
> JANET LANE

baby. They only say you're clever because you were so stupid before."

Nona did not answer, but the happy look faded from her face.

"Why did you come here?" asked Belinda. The more she talked the angrier she grew. "Why did you have to come? We don't want you. Why don't you go home? Why don't you have a house and family of your own?"

Nona still did not answer.

"Star Festival! Rubbish!" shouted Belinda.

"It isn't rubbish," said Nona in a hard little voice; now she was pale again and her eyes blazed, but Belinda did not see—she had flung out of the room.

When Nona was alone she went and stood by the window and presently a tear splashed down on the window sill, then another and another. A home and family of your own . . . Coimbatore, old Ayah, whispered Nona and her tears came thick and fast.

I do not know how long Nona stood there by the window, but the room, and then the garden, grew dark. She could hear the others talking in the playroom, Mother was singing in the kitchen, but she stood there in the dark room staring out the window.

I wish I could go home, thought Nona, I wish I could see my father, I wish I could see Ayah. I wish —— Now the wish was so big that it seemed to run out of her right up into the sky and . . . Why, the stars are out! said Nona.

Across the garden she could see the shapes of trees, bare against the sky, and above them and behind them were stars, bright because of the frosty winter dark. There was a glass door to the garden and Nona opened it and stepped outside. It was so cold that it made her catch her breath, but now she could see the whole night sky. There's the Milky Way, thought Nona—her own father had often shown it to her—and she wondered which of the stars were the two that held the people in love.

By the glass door there was a little tree. It was not a bamboo, of course, but as she looked at it Nona's face suddenly grew determined and she came in and shut the door.

She switched on the light and, taking a piece of paper and a pencil from Mother's desk—

"Without even asking," said Belinda afte ward—she tore the paper into narrow stri and began to write. "I wish I could go home wrote Nona through more tears. "I wish I h never come." . . . "I wish I was back in Coi batore." . . . "I wish I had a house of m own." . . . "I wish there wasn't a Belinda She took a piece of cotton from Mother workbasket, cut it into short bits and thread one through each of her papers and roll them up tightly so that no one could re them. There was a blazer belonging to Tom the basket, waiting to be mended; No slipped it on and went out and tied her wish on the tree.

It seemed to help her unhappiness to put th wishes on the tree and she went back to wri some more, but she had said all there was say. The Japanese dolls were lying close by h elbow and now she looked down at them. Th light caught their eyes so that they shone up her, and I believe they like tying wishes on th tree, thought Nona. Of course it's their Sta Festival.

"Our Star Festival!" said Miss Happine and Miss Flower.

It was not, of course, the right night, b that did not seem to matter. Nona took a other piece of paper and cut that up, then ra into the playroom and quietly fetched h paintbox and a cup of water; then she painte the new strips in colors, red and green an blue and yellow. When they were dry she b gan to write again.

"What is she doing?" whispered Mi Flower.

"Writing wishes."

"I wish she would write some for us."

Nona began to cut the strips into smalle narrower ones.

"What is she doing now?"

"Writing wishes."

"But such tiny ones. Do you suppose, asked Miss Flower—she hardly dared say it— "suppose they are for us?"

"They are for us," said Miss Happiness an Miss Flower cried, "Wishes for the River Heaven!" which is what Japanese people ca the Milky Way.

Next morning Anne was the first to loo out the window and see the little tree by th glass door, covered with wishes. How prett they looked with their colors! Nona had foun some tinsel left over from Christmas and pu that on, too, and had cut out some pape flowers. "Why, Nona," said Anne, "ho lovely!" Then she looked again and asked "Isn't it . . . yes, it is. Look," she called to th others, "oh, do come and see. Nona has mad a Star Festival all by herself."

"But not on bamboos," said Nona. "Yo haven't any."

"But lots of wishes," said Anne.

"Lots of wishes," whispered Miss Happi ness and Miss Flower. They knew what th wishes were.

"Rolled up like secrets," said Tom

"They are secrets," said Nona quickly. Sh was beginning to feel ashamed of some o them. "Secrets," she said again.

"Secrets!" sighed Miss Happiness and Mis Flower. They would have liked everyone t read them "because we do want to go home," they said, "we do want a house of our own We do wish Miss Nona could look after us an not Miss Belinda. It's a pity they have to b secrets," but the wishes were secret no longer Belinda had slipped out into the garden an was pulling them off the tree. When she ha read some she came in and slammed the door

"How dare you!" shouted Belinda at Nona "How dare you know what they wish! They're my dolls as much as yours," and she snatche them up. "Mother said so," shouted the furi ous Belinda.

Two days ago Nona would have let Belinda take the dolls; she would have gone away by herself and read or stood looking out the window, but she could not bear to see the way Miss Flower hung limply in Belinda's rough little hand and, "Don't! You're hurting them," she cried.

"They're only dolls," said Belinda, more angry than ever, and she cried, "All right They want a house. They can go in my dolls house."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 9

Now roast your big turkey in half the time!

OLDEN TURKEY RECIPE: 1. Spread turkey evenly w 1 to 1½ quarter-lb. bars (4-6 ounces) of softened N oa Margarine. Wrap bird completely in Heavy Duty R nolds Wrap—taking care not to puncture foil. Place in s low open pan and roast in hot 450° oven according to t Roasting Time Table.

2. Remove turkey from oven 20 minutes before done. Turn back foil and brush turkey with juices. Return to oven (with foil still turned back) to become an appetizing golden brown. Final test for doneness: when drumstick can be moved back and forth very easily, your turkey is tender and juicy—perfectly roasted.

pread with new NUCOA—roast in REYNOLDS WRAP

H day turkey ahead? No reason to face a fiery o n—roasting and basting for hours and hours. N v a simple recipe cuts average roasting ti e in half for big turkeys (over 17 pounds) — ves you precious time even with smaller- si turkeys. How? Spread with new Nucoa, r st in Reynolds Wrap. Spatter-free roasting r Reynolds Wrap seals in flavor, reduces s inkage, assures success. And Nucoa's de- i ous flavor secret provides the extra good- n s you need for an old-fashioned perfect t key every time. What's more, quick-roasting y r turkey frees oven space for fixings like candied yams or pumpkin pie—gives you more time to share the holiday with your family!

And if yours is a growing family—you'll be glad that Nucoa makes for an extra-wholesome turkey. Of all margarines, only Nucoa gives you all your Vitamin A in 3 pats a day—just 1.8 ounces. That's all your minimum daily requirements. In fact, we're so sure you'll make Nucoa a "menu-must" that we're offering one pound free. (See details on Nucoa package.)

This recipe was kitchen-tested for use only with Nucoa Margarine and oven-tempered, flexible strength Reynolds Wrap. For best results, please avoid substitutions.*

Roasting Time Table	Ready-to-Cook Weight†	Total Cooking Time (Hours—approximate)
FOR ROASTING TURKEY IN REYNOLDS WRAP WITH NUCOA	6 - 9 lbs.	2 to 2½
	10-13 lbs.	2¾ to 3
	14-17 lbs.	3 to 3¼
	18-21 lbs.	3¼ to 3½
	22-24 lbs.	3½ to 4
Oven Temperature 450°	† These cooking times are based on weight without stuffing. If turkey is stuffed, roast 20 to 30 minutes longer. Or if desired, stuffing can be baked in separate foil package for 45 minutes.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96

"House? Did she say house?" asked poor, squeezed Miss Flower.

"She said house," said Miss Happiness.

"Like in our wish?" but Miss Happiness was not at all sure this was like their wish.

"How wonderful," whispered Miss Flower. She would have liked to close her eyes and dream but, of course, dolls with fixed eyes cannot do this.

Belinda knelt down in front of her dolls' house and swung open the door. "It's a funny kind of house," said Miss Happiness. She had a frightened quaver in her voice.

The finest frostings plead for this delicate flavor

BURNETT'S

the true vanilla

Burnett's gives frosting, cakes and other desserts a special kind of deliciousness because it's made from the pure, natural vanilla bean with no artificial ingredients added.

MOCHA-CREAM FROSTING

1 cup (½ pint) heavy cream
¼ cup granulated sugar
¼ cup cocoa
1½ teaspoons instant coffee
1½ teaspoons Burnett's True Vanilla Extract • dash salt
2 tablespoons blanched, slivered almonds, toasted

In chilled bowl, combine all ingredients except almonds. Whip until stiff. Spread between and on top of two 8 or 9-inch layers. Sprinkle with almonds. Chill till ready to serve.

To us it would not have been a funny kind of house, but when a Japanese doll says "a house" she means something quite different. Belinda's dolls' house was white with gables and a red roof. The front opened and inside were two rooms downstairs and two rooms upstairs; it had flannel carpets, bits of lace for curtains, and was filled full of dolls'-house furniture and dolls'-house dolls, all belonging to Belinda.

I am afraid she was a careless child and everything was dusty, dirty and higgledy-piggledy. It looked very higgledy-piggledy to Miss Happiness and Miss Flower. "I don't want to stay here," said Miss Flower as Belinda sat her on a dusty chair on which was a large pin. "Ow!" cried poor Miss Flower.

"I don't want to either," said Miss Happiness.

Perhaps because Nona, too, had known quite other kinds of houses and felt so unhappy and strange in England, she could guess what Miss Happiness and Miss Flower were feeling and, "I don't think the dolls' house will do," said Nona.

"Why not?" said Belinda. She did not see anything wrong and, "I'll make room for them," she said and she swept the other dolls out of the dolls' house, helter-skelter, bumpety-bump; the other poor dolls were bumped and bruised, their legs twisted round. "No! No!" cried the Japanese dolls. "Oh, Honorable Miss, please no! Oh no, not for us! Oh, the poor dolls! No! No!" Miss Flower remembered how her chip had ached when it was done. She saw a little-boy doll with his wig half torn off, a girl doll with a twisted leg and, "Oh, I can't bear it!" cried Miss Flower and she fell off the chair onto the floor.

"Stupid thing," said Belinda.

When Belinda said that, Nona grew so angry and hot that she had to speak. "She's not stupid," she said. "You are. Japanese dolls don't sit on chairs."

"How do you know?"

"I once saw a picture of a Japanese girl serving tea and she was kneeling on the floor, like this," said Nona; she took Miss Happiness and made her kneel.

Miss Happiness had rather more stuffing in her body than Miss Flower; she stayed exactly where Nona had put her and very pretty she looked with her little black head and the big loop of her sash, far more comfortable than Miss Flower had looked on the chair. Then, very gently, Nona took up Miss Flower and straightened her kimono and put her to kneel beside Miss Happiness.

"That's better. That's better," sighed Miss Flower, and "Wish. Wish," Miss Happiness told her, "wish that Miss Nona could look after us."

"Bet they won't like kneeling there for long," said Belinda. "The floor's too hard."

"Cushions," said Nona, "flat sort of cushions." She said it quite certainly, for she seemed to see a heap of bright dolls'-house cushions and she pleaded, "Let me try to make them cushions, Belinda."

Belinda looked at the untidy, dirty dolls' house, then at the two little dolls kneeling on the floor as if they were . . . asking? thought Belinda. Indeed they were. Dolls cannot speak aloud, you know that, but now Miss Happiness and Miss Flower wished: "Please, Honorable Miss. We are your little nuisances, but please let us have the cushions." It was certainly the first time in her noisy, busy life that Belinda had felt a doll's wish and she was suddenly ashamed, but she was not going to let Nona know that. "You had better make them a whole Japanese house," she said mockingly.

"A Japanese dolls' house," said Anne.

"A Japanese dolls' house?" Nona looked startled. "I couldn't. How could I?" asked Nona.

At that moment Miss Flower slipped—you remember she had not as much stuffing as Miss Happiness. She slipped and the slip sounded like a sharp breath and her head sank even lower on the floor. She must have knocked Miss Happiness for Miss Happiness bent over, too, and they looked as if they were very much asking.

"But," said Nona, "I don't know how."

"You didn't know how to make a Star Festival, but you made it," said Tom.

"Not properly," said Nona, but she was pleased, for Tom was the one in the family who really made things. Anne was clever; she could embroider and paint and sew and weave on her loom, but Tom had a proper workbench in the playroom and was making a model galleon—which is a sailing-ship man-of-war. He was making it most beautifully with endless delicate pieces for masts and spars, decks and rails. Tom really knew and, "You could make a dolls' house," said Tom.

II

It was a week later. Every day Nona took Miss Happiness and Miss Flower out of their wooden box and dusted them and looked at them. "But where is our house?" asked Miss Flower every day, and every day they wished: "Little Honorable Miss. Oh, please, little Honorable Miss, where is our house?" but Nona could not think how to make a Japanese dolls' house.

She got a big cardboard box and cut out doors and windows, but that did not seem right, and the cutting hurt her fingers. She tried to arrange an empty drawer with the wooden box for a bed and some rolled-up handkerchiefs for cushions, but it did not look like anything at all. At last she came to Tom's worktable and stood at his elbow.

He had finished cutting the pieces for the hull of his galleon—the hull is the bottom part of a boat—and now was very busy gluing them together. He knew Nona would not talk as Belinda did and so he did not tell her to go away. She stood quite silently watching his clever, careful fingers and a feeling stirred in her own as if they could be clever and careful too. At last the hull sat up firm and neat between its blocks on the worktable, though the glue was still sticky. Then Nona did speak: "How did you know how to make it?" she asked very respectfully.

> Nine tenths of wisdom consists of being wise in time.
>
> THEODORE ROOSEVELT

"Learned," said Tom, rubbing the glue off his thumbs with a wet rag.

"How did you learn?"

"How did you learn about the Star Festival?"

"Oh!" said Nona. "You mean ——" and, as she said that, Tom flipped over the book that had the plan of the galleon in it; it was a paper book filled with patterns and designs, and called "100 Ways to Make a Fretsaw Model."

"Don't lose my place," said Tom.

"I didn't know you could learn to carpenter out of books."

"You can learn anything out of books."

"A book like this?"

Tom nodded.

"Oh!" said Nona. She stood by him a moment longer and then said, "Thank you, Tom."

Mother was very surprised when Nona appeared in front of her wearing her outdoor things, her coat, red cap, boots and gloves. "Do you want to go out?" said Mother.

"Oh, please," said Nona. She was in such a hurry that the words tumbled out. "I've got my Christmas money. I want to go to the bookshop."

"Run along then, dear," said Mother.

Run along! The excitement faded out of Nona's face. "By—by myself?" she asked.

"The bookshop is this side of the street. You won't have to cross the road."

"But ——" The street with its lorries and cars and bicycles, and all the people, thought Nona; the big boys and the dogs. She shivered.

"Or if you wait till this afternoon I'll come with you."

"I can't wait," said Nona.

As Nona opened the front door all the noise of the street came in: a lorry rumbled past, and a car; a gang of children on roller skates made a noise like thunder; a big boy whistled. Nona shut the front door and ran upstairs.

She had meant to take off her coat and c and throw herself on the bed in tears agai but then she caught sight of Miss Happine and Miss Flower.

They were standing one each side of h clock and . . . Did I take them out of their bo. thought Nona, staring. She must have dor but she had been so excited when she put her things to go out that she did not remember. Did I take them out of their box? She d not think she had, but there they were, stan ing by the clock, their feet together, their ar hanging down. It seemed to Nona that th were waiting.

I suppose Japanese people are very bra people, thought Nona, and after a minute s went downstairs and opened the front do again.

Just as she was going out Mother called h back. "Oh, Nona, if you are going to the boo shop be careful to be very polite to old W Twilfit. He's inclined to be cross."

"Cross? He's an absolute old dragon," sa Anne.

"He once nearly bit my head off," said To cheerfully.

Nona began to shake. "Oh, Anne, cor with me."

"Can't. I'm busy."

"Tom."

"I'm busy too."

Nona turned back to the door.

"He once chased me out of the shop," sa Belinda.

"If I know you, you were touching t books with your dirty hands," said Tom.

Nona thought and went back upstairs a washed her hands. Then, even paler than usu but with her head held high, she went out a shut the door behind her.

"She has gone," whispered Miss Flower.

"And for us," said Miss Happiness.

"Is it to do with the house, do you think

"I think so. We will wait for her to co back."

Tick, tick, tick went the clock as the m utes passed. It might have been two lit dolls' hearts beating.

Nona's heart was beating too, but . . . O you start being brave you have to go on, thoug Nona. She was shaking when she got to t bookshop. Perhaps she expected to meet a r dragon, but all she could see in the shop w books, stacks and racks of them, books shelves and laid on tables, books piled up the counter. The shop had W. TWILFIT, Boo SELLER, over the window but, though s peeped and peered, she could see no sign anyone at all.

The bell rang as she went in, which m her jump. Very carefully she walked betwe the tables and jumped again when she sa big old man looking at her. In the dark s he seemed very big, very alarming to No his gray hair stood up in a shock, making h seem even taller than he was, but the m frightening thing about him was his eyebro that were thick and shaggy as two furred g caterpillars. When she saw him looking at h Nona stayed as still as a mouse caught i trap.

"What do you want? Hey?" His voice w so big that it seemed to rumble round shop.

"Please"—Nona could hardly make a sound at all—"please, have you got a bo called 'A Hundred Ways to Make a Japan House'?"

"No such book." Besides being a rumble was cross. Nona held on to the edge o table.

"But Tom said ——"

"Tom's wrong."

The shameful tears were near again. No bent her head over a book and turned ove page.

"Don't touch!" shouted Mr. Twilfit.

This time Nona jumped so high that she her tongue and the pain and the fright m her speak before she could think. "I touch," she said. "I washed my hands befo came."

She did not know then that when Mr. T fit's eyebrows worked up and down, in way that looked so frightening, it meant t

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Olé! ®Wesson Chicken Molé

(MOLAY)

RECIPE FOR CHICKEN MOLÉ*
—made with poly-unsaturated Wesson, the pure vegetable oil

Coat pieces of a 2½ lb. fryer with Wesson, brown. Remove chicken. Add 1 each chopped onion, green pepper, minced garlic clove. Cook 3 min., add 2 cans (8-oz. size) tomato sauce, such as Hunt's, 1 to 2 teasp. chili powder, 1 teasp. salt, ¼ teasp. Tabasco, 2 cloves, ½ oz. unsweetened chocolate. Stir to melt chocolate, replace chicken. Cover, simmer 30 min. Garnish with small cooked onions. 4 servings, about 450 calories each.

Molé is the Spanish term for this flavorful sauce—a favorite with poultry in the Latin countries.*

Free recipes, "101 Glorious Ways to Cook Chicken." Write The Wesson People, New Orleans 12, La.

Wesson glorifies this Mexican dinner as only pure vegetable oil can Mexico says "Olé" (Olay)! You'll say "hurray"! This dish is more than delicious, because you cut down on saturated fat in your skillet every time you use Wesson instead of solid shortening. You see, such shortening is hydrogenated to make it solid fat. But Wesson is never hydrogenated and so it is poly-unsaturated as only pure vegetable oil can be. So clear, so fresh, so pretty as it pours, Wesson brightens all food flavors—never adds taste of its own as some oils do. How nice that Wesson costs so little, too.

When your physician recommends modifying your diet and specifies pure vegetable oil to replace solid fats, Wesson is unexcelled among all leading brands.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

he was pleased. They worked up and down now. "Washed them?" said Mr. Twilfit as if he did not believe her.

For answer Nona showed them to him palms upward. Mr. Twilfit bent and looked at them; then he took one and he could feel how Nona was trembling. "I didn't know there was a boy or girl in this town," he said, "who would wash their hands before they touched books. I beg your pardon, Little Missy."

The rumble was almost soft now. Ayah had called Nona Little Missy: it was too much for Nona; she burst into tears.

"Must it be a Japanese house?" asked Mr. Twilfit.

"They are Japanese dolls," said Nona.

"And you want to make them feel at home," said Mr. Twilfit and he looked out the window. Then he said, "When I was a little boy I knew what it was like to be a long way from home."

Mr. Twilfit had not chased Nona out of his shop; indeed, he had taken her into his room behind it and sat her down at his desk while she told him all about Miss Happiness and Miss Flower. His eyebrows worked up and down as she told from the beginning of the postman's bringing the parcel, right down to "100 Ways to Make a Japanese House."

"But I'm afraid I was right," he said. "There is no such book. There are others. Can you read?" he rapped out.

"Of course," said Nona.

"Really read?"

That was one thing Nona was quite sure she could do and she nodded.

Mr. Twilfit got up and went back into the shop; Nona could hear him rummaging and taking down books from the shelves. "This one is called 'Japanese Homes and Gardens,'" he said, bringing in a book. It was nearly half as big as Nona. She took a deep breath.

"I don't think I could pay for one as big as that," she said.

"It's nearly all pictures. Might be useful," said Mr. Twilfit as if she had not spoken. He went back to the shop. He found another book called "Customs of Old Japan"; then one on how the Japanese arrange flowers and a book of Japanese fairy tales with more pictures. "Useful," said Mr. Twilfit.

"I don't understand about the money here," said Nona, "Indian money is different," and she put all her Chistmas money, a ten-shilling note, some half crowns, shillings, sixpences and pennies, on the desk. "But would this be enough?"

"Can't buy these books," said Mr. Twilfit. "Out of the question. Cost a lot of money. Will you be careful if I lend them to you?"

"Very careful," said Nona and her brown eyes glowed.

"Then give me your name and address."

"Nona Fell," said Nona dreamily—she was thinking about reading those books—"Nona Fell. Coimbatore Tea Estate, near Travancore, South India."

"You are in England," said Mr. Twilfit very gently. "Your address here?"

Nona looked at him and the glow went out of her eyes. She could have fallen through the floor with shame; even small children, almost babies, know their address, but she had been taken into the house almost as if she had been a piece of luggage and had never bothered to notice or find out its address. "I don't know," she had to whisper.

"I see. You weren't interested," said Mr. Twilfit and Nona nodded with another rush of tears.

"Is it far?" asked Mr. Twilfit.

"Just down the road."

"Come along then," said Mr. Twilfit.

"Good gracious heavens!" said Belinda, who was looking out one of the front windows. "Look at Nona and Mr. Twilfit."

Everyone crowded to the window to see.

"He has a great bundle of books," said Anne.

"She's bringing him in," said Belinda.

"Well, I'll be darned!" said Tom.

It was Mother who really brought him in, for it was she who opened the door. "Nona, I was getting anxious ——" Then she broke off, "I see you have found a friend."

"Have I?" asked Nona. She had not thought of having a friend in England, but it seemed like that when Mr. Twilfit came in and sat down and had a cup of coffee.

"And we were fetched down to the room to meet the old and honorable gentleman," said Miss Happiness.

"She made us bow," said Miss Flower and her voice sounded as pleased as Miss Happiness'. "She is beginning to understand."

Now every day on the playroom window seat three heads could be seen: Nona's dark one, bent as she sat cross-legged, with one of Mr. Twilfit's books, and beside her two very small black ones, Miss Happiness and Miss Flower. She had made them two cushions from pieces of old hair ribbon; Miss Happiness had a red cushion, Miss Flower's was pale blue. "I like mine best," said Miss Flower; then she was worried in case Miss Happiness did not like her own but, "I like mine," said Miss Happiness.

Nona had no time to stand and look out the window; she spent all day over Mr. Twilfit's books or trotting up the road to see Mr. Twilfit. She was learning all she could about Japan: about Japanese houses and gardens and Japanese furniture—though it mostly isn't furniture, thought Nona; about quilts and cushions, bowls and scrolls; about the niche, like an alcove in the wall, that is in most Japanese rooms; about flowers—and the way the Japanese arrange them. She was learning about Japanese feasts—"And they do have a Star Festival," said Nona. "A New Year Festival and a Festival of Dolls."

"But not with dolls like us," said Miss Flower and she and Miss Happiness said together, "Honorable dolls." Nona learned Japanese names and about Japanese food; and Japanese fairy tales. Not only did she learn: "Everyone else has to learn too," said Anne, "willy-nilly," for Nona sometimes read the books aloud in her singsong voice. "Lil reading machine," said Tom.

"For goodness' sake!" said Belinda stuffed her fingers in her ears.

Though Belinda stuffed her fingers in ears, there was one story she always man to hear. It was in the fairy-tale book and about a boy called Peach . . . "We had a L Peach who should have been in the parcel was lost—and Mother still hasn't writte Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson," said Belind

The Peach Boy story began with a man a woman who longed for a child. No came until, one hot summer day, the wo found a big peach floating in the stream. took it home for her husband to eat, bu sooner had he touched it with his knife the top flew off. It opened in two halves there, in the peach, was a tiny baby boy.

"A Japanese baby boy," said Miss Ha ness and Miss Flower.

Belinda loved that story. "He grew up t naughty, just like me," she said, "and whe was big he went out into the world. I wo why our Little Peach didn't come," said linda.

III

Miss Flower could not help being anx about the house. "Will Miss Nona know a Japanese house should have walls that open like windows?"

"Paper windows," said Miss Happiness

"That it should have a little garden to at?" said Miss Flower. "Does she k about quilts, not beds? Chopsticks, not sp and forks? Cushions, not chairs?"

"You know she knows about cushio said Miss Happiness.

"But bowls, not cups?"

"Hush, she is studying."

Miss Flower tried to hush, but she coul help a small whisper: "It takes so lon study. If we could tell her ——"

"We can't."

"What can we do for Honorable Miss?

"We can wish," said Miss Happiness, they wished. Perhaps Belinda felt the wis

Lipton
CHICKEN NOODLE SOUP

HOME-COOKED TASTE THE NEW MIX WAY

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

Lipton does the mixin' you do the home-cooked fixin'!

Wonders! Is that Chicken Noodle Soup to be? Ye In just seven enticing minutes those goldeny bits simm into the chickeniest broth ever. Notice the noodles . . . th don't get soggy because you cook 'em!

ore than Nona, for, "Is she going on reading rever?" asked Belinda.

It really seemed as if Nona would go on ading forever, but one snowy afternoon Mr. vilfit knocked at the door. He had brought book. "Not another book!" said Belinda.

"Hush, Belinda," and Mother asked Mr. vilfit to come into the drawing room where ey all were, but Belinda would not hush.

"She has read and read," said Belinda, nd she still doesn't know how to make a panese house."

"I do know," said Nona and they all looked her.

"Well, how?"

"I don't exactly know how, but I know hat it should be like."

"Well?"

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower, who had en brought down on their cushions, held eir breaths.

"Japanese houses are up off the ground," gan Nona, "so that the house should stand n stilts—or up on a box, I thought, with tle wooden steps. Some of the walls should plain, but the other walls should slide like indows; they should be rather like picture ames but with plain paper crisscrossed with ood. Some of the inside walls should slide, o, but they are plain."

"Yes," breathed Miss Happiness and Miss lower.

"The roof should be tiles, dark blue or ay ——"

"Yes. Yes."

"Inside there should be a little hall for tak- g off shoes. Japanese people don't wear oes in the house. The room should be al- ost empty, with matting on the floor, if we uld get it fine enough," said Nona. "Lots of omes nowadays do have chairs and sofas and eds, but most still have cushions to sit on, nd they would have cupboards with sliding oors or else chests where they keep rolled-up uilts or mats for beds."

"Yes," said Miss Happiness and Miss lower.

"They would have a firebox—I don't know exactly yet what that is—and in the room there should always be a niche, an alcove for a scroll—that's a Japanese picture—and by it a vase of flowers, very few flowers," said Nona.

"Yes. Yes," cried Miss Happiness and Miss Flower, and "Bravo!" said Mr. Twilfit.

"Nothing else?" asked Belinda.

"A very little table just about a foot off the floor."

"It will look very bare."

"Japanese houses are bare."

"That is their beauty," said Mr. Twilfit and his eyebrows worked up and down as he looked at Nona. "You'll see," said Mr. Twilfit; "it will be all right once you have got the bones."

"Do houses have bones?" asked Nona and Belinda together.

"The foundations, the floors, walls and roofs are the bones. How will you get those, hey?" asked Mr. Twilfit.

"They could be carpentered," said Nona.

"You can't carpenter," said Belinda.

"No, but ——"

"But?" Once again they all looked at Nona.

"Tom can," said Nona with a rush.

"I don't make girls' things," said Tom.

"Of course they are more difficult and delicate," said Mr. Twilfit and he asked Mother, "Was it Sir Winston Churchill or the President of the United States who made that beautiful dolls' house for his sister?"

"I don't believe they did," growled Tom under his breath.

"And of course," said Mr. Twilfit—his eyebrows were busy—"you would need to be a really good carpenter."

"I'm making a model galleon," said Tom.

"And that's horribly difficult," said loyal Belinda, but Mr. Twilfit shook his head.

"That's a model from a plan," he said. "Quite, quite simple, you only have to follow it. A Japanese dolls' house wouldn't have a plan. I don't suppose anyone has made one—not in this country. The plan would have to come out of your own head. A boy could hardly be expected to do that."

"I don't see why not," said Tom, but Mr. Twilfit still shook his head.

"How would you raise it?"

"Make a plinth," said Tom. "Like a box upside down," he explained quickly to Belinda before she could ask him what a plinth was.

"Then the grooves for the sliding walls," Mr. Twilfit said, "they would have to be so very small ——"

"I could make them," growled Tom.

"And the frames to hold the paper screens. For a dolls' house they would have to be so very thin. How could you join them?"

"I shouldn't. I should cut them out."

But Mr. Twilfit still shook his head. "It would be very difficult"; and as he stood up to go he said to Nona, "You had better save up

> An exaggeration is a truth that has lost its temper. KAHLIL GIBRAN and we'll see if we can find a proper carpenter."

Tom scowled at Mr. Twilfit—a scowl is a face you make when you dislike someone—and spoke across him to Nona. "I'll make it for you," said Tom, and under his breath he said to Mr. Twilfit, "You'll see."

"Nona, would this box be big enough?"

"Nona, if I make this two feet long ——"

"Would this paper be thick enough for the screens?"

"Nona, I found this shell ——"

A strange thing had happened. Suddenly it was as if everyone in the house were helping to make the Japanese dolls' house. "Everyone except me," said Belinda. "I won't help."

Perhaps it was Nona's reading aloud, or Mr. Twilfit's interest, or the plan that Tom had drawn from the pictures in the books—"Or because of our wishing," said Miss Happiness and Miss Flower—but all the family seemed to be running backward and forward to Nona, asking Nona questions, bringing things to Nona, "Except me," said Belinda and kicked the table.

"Belinda, you're not jealous of Nona?"

"Of course I'm not jealous," said Belinda scornfully. "I'm not even interested in Japanese dolls." That was not quite true; she very often thought about Little Peach. He would have been a boy doll like Peach Boy in the story, thought Belinda. To think about him took away the feeling Belinda was beginning to have, a feeling of being left out. "I wish Little Peach had come," said Belinda.

IV

"Have you chosen the site?" asked Father.

"You see, even Father is joining in," said Belinda.

"What is a site?"

"The plot or place where you build."

"I'll build it on my worktable," said Tom.

"But it can't stay there," said Nona.

"No jolly fear," said Tom.

"Besides, it has to have a garden."

"If it has a garden, it should be near a window. Plants need light and air," said Mother.

"Plants?" Until that moment Nona had not thought of a garden with real plants. "Where should we find them?" she asked.

"In the fields and woods."

"Could we take them?"

"Of course. They're wild."

In Coimbatore flowers grew on trees or creepers or else in the gardens. "You mean little flowers growing around loose?" said Nona, amazed. She seemed to see a dolls'-house-size garden full of dolls'-house-size flowers. "Could we make it on my window sill?" she asked. "Could that be the site?"

"Well, I had thought of an old table," said Mother.

"Please."

"Oh, let her, Mother."

"Very well."

It seemed to Belinda that everyone was spoiling Nona. Belinda kicked the door as she went out.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 103

The soup that made plate-tipping polite. Zesty, chickeny broth seasoned as only Lipton knows how . . . laced with dancing parsley bits. Plump . . . biteable . . . golden egg noodles. You've got to "tip up" to get every last spoonful!

Refrigerator Round-up. "Clear the decks" before the weekly shopping. Add those precious leftovers to Chicken Noodle Soup. Makes Chicken Soup Deluxe. Be versatile with Lipton . . . home-cooked taste, the new mix way!

IT TASTES SO GOOD BECAUSE IT'S TRULY TOMATO-RICH.

You know how some brands of tomato juice just trickle out of the tin like water? And taste watery, too? But not Libby's—ever! Libby's flows out in a velvety stream. The RICHEST-POURING of them all! And it TASTES SO MUCH RICHER in ripe, tomato-y flavor than any other kind. Libby's is RICH IN VITAMINS, too—both vitamins A and C. Yet there are only 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass (lots less than in sweet or sweetened juices).

Look for the new 6-pak of single serving tins.

* Libby's is 44% richer in consistency, according to viscosity tests on 11 different brands. This figure is reported by the laboratories of a leading University. Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago 4, Ill.

Enjoy your Libby's every day...get your vitamins C plus A

NUED FROM PAGE 101

he cabinetmakers' Tom found an old
. It was dirty and chipped, "But it's rea od," said Tom, and when he had sand-d it smooth it was a deep soft rose-brown nd stood steadily on the sill, "Like a or," said Miss Happiness.
: what next?" asked Miss Flower; she ld not help feeling anxious.
: was a visit to the woodshop. "A op?" asked Nona. She had never f one.
u can buy pieces of wood, all lengths es, narrow bits and wide ones. I hope ve some money," said Tom.
a had the ten-shilling note, the half , shillings, sixpences and pennies she own to Mr. Twilfit. She had her nine--week pocket money saved up as well.
hat be enough?" she asked Tom.
me and see."
me? How?" Tom was getting his bicycle You mean on the back? With my legs g down?" said Nona in horror.
course not. That isn't allowed," said
'I'll ride very slowly and you can run
me."
In? In the street? I couldn't," said Nona.
K. then. No wood," said Tom. "I'll get n my galleon."
rosewood floor stood on Nona's win-ll, Miss Happiness and Miss Flower ear it.
ycles go so fast," said Nona.
Happiness and Miss Flower appeared ear. n whizzes in and out, between buses rs."
still seemed not to hear.

e's greatest tragedy is to lose d and not to miss Him.

F. W. NORWOOD

anese people are horribly brave," said did not contradict her and Nona came ood by Tom's table. "O.K., I'll come u," she said.

woodshop was a most wonderful place.
were big blocks and planks of wood, licate moldings, thin strips, narrow bits de ones; there were chair legs and stc l very kind of corner and grooving and s, from great front-door ones down to allest dolls'-house size. There were of wood of every kind, stains and screws and hinges.
t did Tom buy? "A terrific great lot of ' Nona told the others when she got She thought it wonderful that Tom what to ask for and that the shopman what he meant. "Because I didn't," said

s all packed up and Tom tied the long wood to the crossbar of his bicycle; the and nails he put in his pockets, "But have to carry the rest," he told Nona.
d run?" asked Nona faintly.
looked at her. "Belinda would."
K.," said Nona and picked up the n you build a real house there is the of bricks being piled, of the concrete of wood being sawn and hammered, of and shouts. The sound of a dolls' house made is different; there are a tap-tap-m a little hammer, the shirring of sand-the whirring noise of the fine drill as nade his drill holes; but the building made by Tom meant as much to Miss ness and Miss Flower as the sound of eal house being built could mean to ona had taken them and their cushions e playroom so that they could see.

hat is he doing now?" whispered Miss is making the corners."

d now?"
is making the hall."
d now?" asked Miss Flower.

"He is making the two side walls,"

And then one day Miss Happiness cried, "Oh, Flower ——"

"Yes?"

"He is making ——"

"Making?"

"A niche."

"A niche? For our scroll and flowers? Oh, Happiness!"

Tom and Nona had argued about that niche. "But I told you," said Nona. "It's a most important part of a Japanese room."

"Be darned if you did," said Tom.

"But I did. A niche like a little alcove. I did."

It took Tom four days to think out how to make that niche. At last, "Mother, have you an empty tin of soap powder?" asked Tom.

It was not a tin, but a cardboard cylinder. First Tom cut it lengthways in half, then cut one of the halves off, two thirds up its length. Then, with his fret saw, he cut a space in one of the side walls and filed the edges so that the halved cylinder fitted exactly. He smeared plastic wood between the edges and left it to set.

"We'll make it a separate little roof," said Tom, "and a low floor inside."

"Oh, Tom, you are clever," said Nona.

"Honorable, clever Mr. Tom," said Miss Happiness and Miss Flower.

Tom had made two pillars in the front of the house, one each side of the front door—only there was not a door, but an open space that led into the small hall—and filled in the spaces each side of the front door with panels cut out in a small paper window. The panels were on hinges and swung back so that Nona could open the front of the dolls' house when she wanted to play.

Now the front of the house was finished; the side walls and the niche were painted and fixed against the end pillars; soon, from pillar to pillar, Tom would fix the heavy slats that would hold the roof.

"But what about the screens?" asked Nona. "The sliding screen doors in the back wall and for the way into the hall?"

"I'll make them." Tom sounded tired.

"But when? When?"

"Christopher Columbus!" said Tom. "Can't I ever have a day off?"

To make the sliding screens was most difficult of all. "I need six hands," he said.

In Japan the sliding screens on the outside walls of a house are called "shojis." They are latticed with wood. The screens between the rooms are plain. For the outer ones, from thinnest sheets of plywood Tom cut four frames like photograph frames.

"Why four?" asked Nona.

"So that I can make them double; paste the paper on one and put the other over it so that the rough edges of the paper won't show."

Pasting the paper on the wood was a long and ticklish work. Everyone had to help, from Anne to Nona. Then the frames were stuck together with glue and put to dry under weights. While they dried, from corner to corner at the back of the dolls' house floor, with tiny tacks, Tom fastened down the narrow wood strips to make the grooves in which the screens would slide.

"Three strips?" asked Nona.

"The grooves need three strips and there must be two grooves for the walls to slide past each other," said Tom.

"Oh, Tom, you are most clever!"

It was ticklish work, fitting the frames in; if they bent too much they split—Nona broke one and two fresh frames had to be cut; if they did not bend enough they would not go in.

The latticework on the outer screens Tom painted in brown paint, using a pen instead of a brush and ruling the lines.

At last the screens were in and it was a wonderful moment when Tom and Nona could slide them all backward and forward, backward and forward. "Let Mr. Twilfit see that!" said Tom.

Now the walls were up, the house needed only the roof "to have all its bones," said Nona, remembering what Mr. Twilfit had said; but before the roof could be made,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 105

When the gleam is off the tile and grime soils Honeymoon Cottage—what then of the dainty hands, all softness and loveliness tossing the bridal bouquet? You know darned well what: They get busy and stay busy—cleaning!

Still, you needn't jeopardize their silky smoothness. Cleanse with ARM & HAMMER soda bicarbonate. This white, pure, wondrous powder works as a fast-acting cleanser. Add 3 tablespoons of soda per quart of warm water to sponge dirt and greasy film from tile, tub, mirrors, linoleum, windows—indeed, most anything with a hard finish. Best of all, ARM & HAMMER soda never, never roughens your hands. IN FACT,

...the same pure SODA pampers my baby in her bath

Doctors often recommend soda baths for babies and adults to soothe the torment of skin rashes, windburn or sunburn.

FREE!* HOW TO LIVE BETTER AND SAVE MONEY*

Booklet illustrates important health, baking and cleansing uses of soda bicarbonate. Mail coupon for your copy.

Church & Dwight Co., Inc. Dept.LH-11
P. O. Box 2266, Grand Central Station
New York 17, N. Y.

Please send free booklet How to Live Better and Save Money.

PRINT YOUR NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY .....ZONE.....STATE.....

*ARM & HAMMER (in Canada COW BRAND) soda bicarbonate meets all standards for purity of the U.S. Pharmacopoeia. It is sometimes called BAKING SODA.

The only convertible that gives you a sofa designed to look like a sofa, plus a bed that sleeps like a b Modern, traditional, contemporary styles, custom covered through your dealer Style shown, only $349.

Sleep here—beautifully!

in Simmons comfort on the one-and-onl

HIDE-A-BED

© 1960 by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

HIDE-A-BED® by SIMMONS... Maker of the World-Famous BEAUTYREST Mattress

NTINUED FROM PAGE 103

ething happened that Nona had forgotten out. The something was school.

"I can't go," said Nona.

"Anne goes, Tom goes, Belinda goes. Of rse you must go."

"No thank you," said Nona, but it was no saying "No thank you": this was one of times children were not asked; and one rning Nona had to take off her red velvet ss, her white socks and silver bangles and ss herself in a tunic and blouse like Anne's l Belinda's, a dark blue coat and a cap with adge. Then, carrying a case that held a new cil box, a ruler and her money for lunch, walked with Anne and Belinda to school. he came home in tears. "I knew she uld," said Belinda. "She cried all day."

"You mustn't cry here," the teacher, Miss ne, had told Nona.

"It's here I want to cry," said Nona and did.

Belinda was ashamed, but Belinda did not ow how terrifying the big, strange new lding seemed to Nona. There seemed to be ndreds of girls and so much noise and tle that it made her head swim. They, too, ghed at the way she spoke and the little she sat next to, a pretty little girl with g golden curls, would not speak to her. By time they reached home Nona was sick h crying and Belinda was so angry her eks were bright red.

Mother led Nona to the fire and took off coat and cap and gloves. She gave her e hot tea and brown bread and butter; inda had some, too, and by and by they h felt better.

When they had finished Mother took out sewing. The fire was warm, the sound of needle going in and out was quiet and n. Nona felt tired, but she did not cry any re. She sat on the rug and leaned against ther's knee, but, "You'll have to go again morrow," said Belinda. Then Mother said, hy not take Miss Happiness and Miss wer to school?"

"They wouldn't be allowed," said Belinda once, but, "How could I take them?" ed Nona. "In my pocket?"

"No, in your head," said Mother, and be- e they could argue she said, "If you took m in your pocket that would be breaking rules and you mustn't do that, but you uld take them in your head."

"How?" but a watery smile came on Nona's e.

"You say Japanese pictures are scrolls, with nting and writing?"

Nona nodded.

"In school you can learn to write beauti- ly and to paint."

"Can I?"

"You told us that in Japanese houses they e matting on the floors. You could learn weave mats on a loom."

"Like Anne?"

"Certainly. Anne learned to weave at ool. Then you can learn to sew. There are those quilts and cushions to make and the ls need new kimonos. Miss Lane teaches to sew nicely. Even Belinda is learning to ke tiny careful stitches."

"I'm not," said Belinda.

"Do you hear the honorable lady?" ispered Miss Flower.

"Kimonos, quilts, cushions," said Miss ppiness, her eyes shining.

"Tiny careful stitches!" and together they th sent a fresh wish to Nona. "Oh, honor- e little Miss Nona, please go to school. Oh, to school!" and Nona began to think that haps school might not be so very dreadful, rticularly as Tom said, "I'll work for you ery Saturday until the house is finished."

It took a long time. "Saturday after Satur- y," grumbled Tom. Half-term came and nt and still the house was not done.

"Children are so slow!" groaned Miss ower.

That was the first and only time Miss ppiness got cross. "Slow? They are won- fully quick," she cried, "quick and kind d clever. Don't you ever let me hear you say things like that again," cried Miss Happiness and her little glass eyes flashed.

"We must do the roof," said Tom one Saturday, and he said, "In a real house when that is done a bough is put in the chimney and the builders are given beer."

"Do you like beer?" asked Nona.

"Ginger beer," said Tom.

"When the roof is made," said Nona, "I'll buy you a bottle of ginger beer," but how was the roof to be made?

"It should be tiles," said Tom. He had drawn tiles in the plan, tiles like little scallops in rows; now he had to think how he could make them.

He had fixed a slat of wood across from one side wall to the other to make the ridgepole, and now, with his smallest hammer, he tacked on narrow rafters. The rafters made the dolls' house look so like a real house being built Nona was excited, but then, over them, Tom began to fasten a piece of ugly cardboard, back and front. On the underneath side he put a lining of white paper, but the outside he left plain. The cardboard was from a case that had once held packets of cereals and it was lettered in blue and red, "Corn Krispies."

"Oh!" cried Nona in dismay. "But ——"

"But what?" asked Tom as if he could not see anything wrong.

"It looks horrid!" said Nona. "Not a bit like tiles. And why have you put the lettering outside?"

"Why not?" asked Tom.

"It shows."

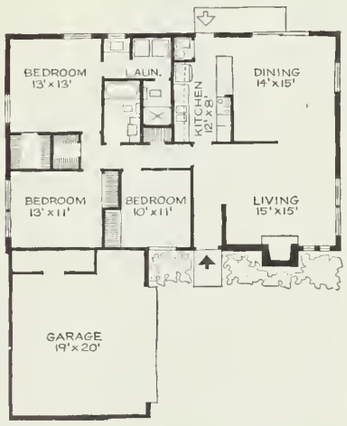
"It won't show," said Tom.

"But it does," said Nona almost tearfully.

"Wait and see," said Tom.

He sounded as if he knew exactly what he was doing, but Miss Flower could not help being anxious too.

"Will it be all right?" she whispered to Miss Happiness. "Will it?"



"I think it will," said Miss Happiness.

"Are you sure?"

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROBERT STAHMAN

Comfortable, low lines are inviting to the eye.

Traffic-free living room is good for entertaining.

TOP-VALUE HOUSE

By JOHN BRENNEMAN
Architectural Editor

This Texas house is one of the country's outstanding values offered by a tract developer. Produced in volume, it sells for just about $11.00 per square foot with land.

Its ingenious plan features generous storage, a compact, efficient kitchen accessible to indoor and outdoor dining, and an interesting combination bath and laundry.

The living room is well planned for furniture grouping around a handsome fireplace. A large separate dining room opens to the living room for entertaining.

The house is appealingly modern and its L shape makes the entry court very inviting.

DESIGNERS: ANTHONY PEREIRO AND PARKER FOLSE
AREA: 1 600 SQUARE FEET
COST: $18,000 WITH LAND

"Mr. Tom has made the house beautifully. He will make a beautiful roof as well. We should trust Mr. Tom," said Miss Happiness.

Miss Flower wanted to trust Tom, but she thought it wise to do some wishing as well. "I wish the house could have a pretty roof. I don't see how it can, but I wish it could."

"How much money have you left?" Tom asked Nona.

She had four shillings and Tom went with her to the bookshop, where they bought a large sheet of stiff drawing paper, then they bought a pot of dark blue poster paint. Mr. Twilfit did up the paper in a roll. "It's for the dolls' house," Nona told him.

"It's getting on, hey?" asked Mr. Twilfit.

"Very well, thank you," said Tom coldly and Mr. Twilfit's eyebrows went up and down as he watched Tom walk out of the shop.

When they got home Tom stretched the paper on his worktable and he and Nona painted it evenly in a deep blue. In the afternoon when it was dry he sat Nona down at the playroom table and told her to cut the paper into long strips, two inches wide. "Measure carefully"; and he said cheerfully, "You can manage it."

Nona looked at the beautiful paper and was not at all sure she could manage it. "W-won't you do it, Tom?" she asked.

"You must do some of the work," said Tom severely. "I have to bike down to the woodshop. I need a piece of wood." He took some more money from Nona and went off.

Nona sat and looked at the paper—she was afraid she would spoil it. Very carefully she measured off two inches at each side, making dots to mark the width. But how can I keep the cutting straight? Even more carefully, with the big scissors, she started to cut across from dot to dot, and sure enough, the strip was uneven and wandered up and down.

"Silly Billy! You'll never do it like that." Anne had come quietly into the playroom to practice.

"Then how?" asked Nona desperately, looking at the dreadful jagged strip she had made. "Oh, Tom will be so cross," and she looked as if she were going to cry.

"Look. Fold it," said Anne, putting down her music.

"Oh, Anne, please help me."

"You must measure," said Anne.

"But I did. Two inches."

"Right," said Anne. "But you need a knife, not scissors." She took a knife from Tom's worktable and cut off the uneven piece Nona had left, then measured two inches again, marking with dots as Nona had done, folded the paper, then slit along the fold and a smooth two-inch strip came off. "Now try."

"Oh, Anne, you do it."

"I haven't time."

"P-please, Anne. I don't want to make Tom cross."

"Well, I'll fold it. Then you try," said Anne. "Come on. It's easy."

It was easy—"When you know how," said Nona. With Anne folding the paper and holding it steady, Nona was able to cut off an even strip.

"And strip after strip," said Miss Happiness in pride.

"Anne, you have such clever, neat hands," Nona was saying.

"So have you, Miss Nona," said Miss Flower.

When Tom came back the strips were laid out on his table, even and smoothly cut, and he was pleased. "But now we have to scallop them," he said. "Anne, you're the neatest one. You do them." He did not beg Anne, he ordered her, and, I wish I were a boy, thought Nona.

"What about my piano practice?" Anne said it as if she would far rather make the scallops.

"Practice afterward," said Tom. "Get the scissors, Nona."

"They're here," said Nona, hoping Tom would not look in the wastepaper basket and see the strip she had spoiled.

Anne folded each strip four times and with the scissors cut one edge into even scallops. As soon as they were cut, Nona unfolded the strip and, with a deeper blue pencil, Tom marked a line between the scallops: scallop after scallop, strip after strip. It took longer to mark the lines than to cut the scallops, and when Anne went to the piano to practice, Tom with Nona to wait on him, was still at work.

After tea Anne helped again. Nona brushed the back of the strips with glue, making them really sticky, and Anne and Tom stuck them one at a time onto the cardboard roof; they began at the bottom and glued them each a little above the first so that the scallops overlapped. As one row of scallops rose above the other, they began to look very much like tiles and when the roof was covered bottom to top back and front, Nona and Anne clapped.

"That isn't all," said Tom with pride, and he showed them a long thin piece of molded wood, shaped so that it fitted over the ridge pole, finishing off the tiles. "That was what I went to the woodshop to get." It was exactly the right length. "I told you we could trust Mr. Tom," said Miss Happiness.

As Anne and Tom started to make a tiny tiled roof for the niche, Nona slipped out and all by herself went to the grocer. She had to cross the road but, holding her purse very tightly, she crossed it. She was not nearly as afraid now as she had been that first day when she set out for Mr. Twilfit's shop. At the grocer's she spent two of her last three nine pences on two bottles of ginger beer; the grocer gave her colored straws for nothing. On her way home, as she was not sure Anne liked ginger beer, she stopped at a flower bar row and bought a spray of white blossom she had no money to buy any more.

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower were puzzled when they saw Nona arranging the ginger beer on a tray. "We should have served tea," said Miss Flower and she said longingly "in the tea ceremony." "Ceremony" is a word Japanese dolls use a lot; it means doing something in a very respectful and special way.

"In England it is the ginger-beer ceremony," said Miss Happiness and she comforted Miss

Bruce Block Floor

Wood floor care can be oh·so·easy
...even with rock 'n' rollers!

Messy floor washing is for squares, Mom! And everyone knows water should never be used on wood floors.

Get hep to modern Bruce clean-as-you-wax floor care recommended by the world's largest maker of hardwood floors.

Here's how it works! Just pour this combination cleaner and liquid paste wax on your floor. As you wipe up the marks and dirt, Bruce leaves a new, clean coat of paste wax on the floor. It's that simple!

What's more, Bruce gets up stubborn spots and ingrained dirt that ordinary cleaners can't. And the paste wax buffs back to gleaming beauty time after time.

Try BRUCE CLEANING WAX for a heavy coat of wax. For lighter waxing on wood and linoleum use BRUCE FLOOR CLEANER. NEW! Try Bruce 5-Minute Wax Remover for all non-wood floors. It really works!

for floors use Bruce... Paste Wax... Self-Polishing Wax... Tile Cleaner

. "See, our Miss Nona knows how to flowers almost as we do; she does not many in the vase"—Miss Happiness know that there had been only one ce left.
A plum blossom means hope," said lower.
hope," said Miss Happiness. "Look, look!"
had put the dolls on the pretty tray ried to the playroom. She had stopped side the door, looking. Now Miss looked, too, and, "Aaah!" whispered lower.
om's workbench stood the little house tiled roof, its tiny hall, its screen walls d, its two side walls, and the niche.
vas, of course, no chimney, but where mney might have been Tom had put f green leaves for a bough.
w happy and gay they all are!" said
appiness.
person isn't happy," said Miss Flower ldenly she had a doll shiver. "Listen," iss Flower.
nda, have some ginger beer."
busy."
nda, come and see the Japanese house new roof."
very busy."
nda ——"
ve me alone!" shouted Belinda.
was still feeling left out. The next time nt into the playroom she gave Tom's ole a good shake, but Tom had made se so well that nothing moved or
"I wish Japan were at the bottom of !" said Belinda; but it was not Japan ide her miserable, for as soon as she

A man has generally the good or qualities which he attributes to mankind. SHENSTONE

e story of Peach Boy again or thought ittle Peach she felt warm and com-
; it was when she thought about the e dolls' house—"and Nona!" said
, gritting her teeth—she felt so jealous and hard that she might have been a on Belinda.

V

was still not very happy about going ool. "Why, Nona?" asked Mother.
a doesn't mind and she is younger u."
all right for Belinda," said Nona. "She of friends."
can have friends."
I can't," said Nona tearfully.
y not?"
ears overflowed. "There's only one girl
d she sits next to me," sobbed Nona.
ou like her, why should you mind?"
Mother, mystified, which means she ot understand at all; it certainly was to understand. "Why should you asked Mother. s too pretty and stuck-up to speak to means Melly," said Belinda; "Melanie

. You know, her mother keeps the
."
Melly's a nice little girl."
won't speak to me."
haps she's shy."
I'm the one who's shy," wept Nona.
t for Melly, school was not really so now. Nona was learning to write and d sew as Mother had said. When she ud now it was not in a singsong, and laughed at her English. Then one day, new page of her reading book, she cross a tiny poem. It was so small it ave been made for a dolls' house:

My two plum trees are
So gracious . . .
See, they flower
One now, one later.

eath was written: "Haiku. Japanese "Are all Japanese poems as little as that?" Nona asked Miss Lane. "Are they all as little?"

"Not all, but a great many," said Miss Lane.

"Could I copy it?" asked Nona and began to tell Miss Lane about Miss Happiness and Miss Flower.

"Is the house finished?" asked Miss Happiness. "Oh, no!" cried Miss Flower; and, "Now I have to make the steps," said Tom.

The steps were three pieces of wood, screwed and glued one on top of another. "You can put dolls'-house tubs of flowers each side," said Tom.

Then over the front door, between the pillars, he put a panel of wood cut out in patterns of flowers; he had to go back to the woodshop for that. "I'm not nearly clever enough to cut it," said Tom.

"Is the house finished now?" asked Miss Happiness, but no, it was not finished yet.

Tom stained the frames a beautiful dark brown. He had painted the side walls to match the ivory color of the tracing paper in the frames, but the niche, where the cardboard showed, he painted pale jade green. Last of all the house was dusted and cleaned, carried into Nona's room from the playroom, and put on the window sill.

"Now show that to Mr. Twilfit!" said Tom.

"First it must be furnished," said Nona.

Furnished, but with what?

"I need scraps of cotton and silk," said Nona.

"You haven't got any," said Belinda.

That was only too true. The pieces in Mother's scrap bag were bits of flannel and rag from old cotton dresses. There was some velveteen, but velveteen is thick and heavy for a small doll.

"I need thin bright silk in different colors," said Nona.

"Well, you can't have it."

An exciting new 'extra' room—just minutes away!

1. Rit lets your washer do the work!

2. Rit Kelly Green and Rit Royal Blue.

Just pop your 'washables' in the washer
...RIT COLOR will do the rest!

3. Rit Scarlet and Rit Charcoal Grey.

4. Rit Orange and Rit Cocoa Brown.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Rit is designed for washer dyeing. So safe, so sure, it's recommended by leading washer manufacturers!

Be a color magician! No need to buy anything new—just dye it "new" with Rit. America's most popular dye gives smooth, even, luscious color to anything you can wash—right in your washer. (Except for glass and mineral fibers.)

No boiling—no stirring. Your washer does the work. Pop in your washables—you get beautiful results in minutes! And only Rit gives you such rich tones of navy, black and other dark colors on so many fabrics.

For tinting in the sink. Dainty lingerie and items too small for the machine take on glowing color in your sink. So easy and safe, Rit tints beautifully in hot tap water.

35 heavenly shades to choose from—and dozens of combinations for any effect you want. Good news: Use Rit Color Remover and Nylon Whitener to change dark colors to light—nylon "grey" to white that's bright again! Now it's so easy to change almost any fabric into a brand-new color!

You're so Bright when you use
RIT® COLOR
America's largest selling home dye!

Nimble Fingers™
...barehand sheerness to make good grooming easier
Translucent lemon yellow "Pylox" reversible for non-slip grip 59c
From the 59¢ to $1.69
PIONEER
WARDROBE OF HOUSEHOLD GLOVES
The PIONEER RUBBER Company • Willard, Ohio

"I know I can't," said Nona mournfully. She had spent that week's ninepence on extra things for Tom. "And I need a lamp and a low table and the book says Japanese people keep their quilts in cupboards with sliding doors. How can I ——" Nona broke off and sat quite still. "A cupboard with sliding doors," she whispered.

"Nona, I am talking to you," said Mother. "I am asking you if you want any more pudding." These days Nona often had more pudding, but now she did not answer. "Nona. Are you dreaming?" and yes, Nona was dreaming—of Melly's pencil box.

It was a new pencil box of plain light wood. It had a compartment down the middle and, most fascinating of all, it had a roll top of slatted wood that rolled back as soon as you touched it. "It would make a perfect little cupboard," dreamed Nona, "empty and standing on its side. Perfect!" and then a daring thought came to her: I wonder if Melly would swap it? Nona had not been in school very long, but already she knew all about swapping. Swap, but for what? It would have to be something very beautiful. After lunch Nona went slowly upstairs and pulled out her drawer; next morning when she went to school she wore her silver bangles.

"Oh, how pretty!" said Melly.

Nona had seen Melly looking at the bangles and had pulled the cuff of her blouse back so that they showed more as she let her hand lie on the desk. They clinked gently against one another and their silver shone against the wood of the desk. "You like them?" whispered Nona.

Melly nodded so that her curls bobbed. Nona slid off the bangles and when Miss Lane was busy she passed them to Melly. "Very pretty," whispered Melly, looking at them.

"You can put them on if you like."

Now that they had spoken, Nona could not think why she and Melly had not spoken before.

Perhaps Mother had been right and Melly was shy; she blushed as she slid the bangles on. They looked beautiful on her pink-and-white wrist and "Very, very pretty," whispered Melly.

Nona felt an ache in her heart; she had had her bangles almost since she was a baby and they reminded her of Coimbatore, but she had the dolls to think of now, and "I'll swap them if you like," said Nona.

Melly's gray eyes widened. "But . . . they're silver!" she said.

"Yes, but I'll swap them."

"For what?"

"For your pencil box," said Nona lightly, but her heart was beating.

"Melly Ashton, Nona Fell, are you talking?" asked Miss Lane, but the two heads, Nona's dark one and Melly's with its golden curls, were bent over their desks and their pens scratched away; yet, if Miss Lane had noticed, she would have seen that Melly's pencil box was on Nona's desk and Nona's bangles were on Melly.

Standing on its side in the Japanese dolls' house, the pencil box did look like a real cupboard. "The quilts shall go in the bottom—when I have the quilts," said Nona. "The bowls in the top—when I have the bowls." The roll top slid backward and forward like a real cupboard.

"It might have come from Japan," said Miss Flower, and Miss Happiness said, "It has 'Made in Japan' stamped on it. I saw it," said Miss Happiness.

"Nona, you are to go into the drawing room. Mother wants you," said Anne.

"You have done something," said Belinda. "Mrs. Ashton is there."

"Who is Mrs. Ashton?" asked Nona.

"Melly's mother," said Anne.

"What have you done?" asked Belinda.

Mrs. Ashton was sitting on a chair by the fire when Nona came in. In her hand she held the bangles.

"They're quite valuable," she was saying to Mother. "Real silver. I'm sure you wouldn't want Nona to give them away and I couldn't possibly let Melly accept them."

"But I didn't give them," said Nona, "I swapped them."

"Swapped them?"

"For Melly's pencil box."

"A pencil box?" Both the mothers stared at Nona as if she were ill.

"But you could buy a pencil box for a shilling or two, you silly child."

"Not that one," cried poor Nona. "There isn't another one like that. Oh, don't you see? That's the only one that will do."

Mrs. Ashton was very like Melly, with the same golden hair and gray eyes, the same smile. Nona had spoken to Melly and now she found courage again. "If you would come upstairs," she said, "I could show you," and she slipped her hand into Mrs. Ashton's. It was the first time Nona had put her hand in anyone's since she had left Coimbatore.

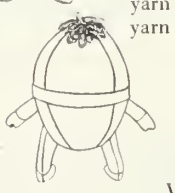
Mrs. Ashton looked at Mother, who nodded. "Show me," said Mrs. Ashton.

"But Mother will make you give it back," said Belinda. "You needn't think that she won't"; and sure enough, "You must give it back," said Mother.

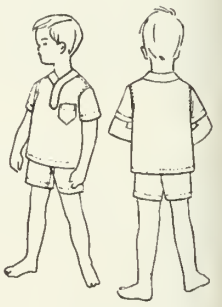
CONTINUED ON PAGE 1

Christmas Boutique for Children

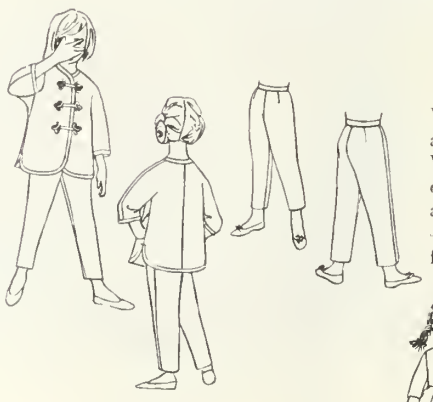
OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 68

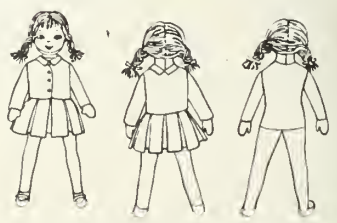


Vogue Design No. 2879. Nightgown and robe; 2–6 (21–24); 60c. Child's nightgown requires 2 yards of 35″ fabric without nap and 1⅛ yards of 1″ ribbon, size 4.



Vogue Design No. 2887. One-piece dress and apron; 2–6 (21–24); 60c. Apron requires 1⅜ yards of 35″ fabric without nap, size 4.





Vogue Design No. 2910. Stuffed toy; large size (20″ high) and small size (12″ high); 75c. Small size requires ½ yard of 35″ fabric without nap for upper half and hands, ⅝ yard of 35″ fabric with or without nap for lower half, arms and legs, ⅛ yard of dark felt for shoes and eyes, ⅛ yard of 72″ felt for collar, ¾ yard of 1¾″ ribbon for tie. Sock yarn used for nose, other features are embroidered. Rug yarn may be used for hair. Four 8-oz. bags of kapok to stuff.

Vogue Design No. 5099. Boys' pajamas; 4–14 (23–32); 75c. Version shown requires 2 yards of 35″ fabric without nap, size 8.

Vogue Design No. 5115. Robe and slacks; 4–8 (23–26); 75c. Version shown requires 3 yards of 35″ fabric with nap for robe and slacks, and ½ yard of 35″ or 45″ fabric with or without nap for binding and frogs, size 6.

Vogue Design No. 5125. Twin dolls and clothes; 19″–20″ tall; 75c. Doll requires ⅝ yard of 35″ fabric without nap for body, ¼ yard of 72″ felt for jacket, ⅜ yard of 35″ fabric without nap for skirt, ⅜ yard of 35″ fabric without nap for slip and panties, and ¼ yard of 35″ fabric without nap for blouse. Slip also requires ⅝ yard of 1½″ pregathered eyelet ruffle. Panties also require ⅝ yard of ½″ eyelet edging. Use knitting wool for hair. Use 5 ounces of kapok for stuffing.

Pussy cat and ball, Journal Pattern No. 2947. Child's Bonnet, Journal Pattern No. 2948. Snowman Apron available packaged (costs $2.50) with sewing instructions. Write and we will tell where to buy. Order Journal Patterns, 25c each (Penna. residents please add 4% sales tax) from Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Phila. 5, Pa.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Colif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered.

Because you like your fashion comfortable... you and millions of other smart American women ave made Red Cross Shoes the most famous brand of fine footwear in the world... for you have bought over 100 million airs of these wonderful, wearable shoes that fit your busy life and your busy feet so beautifully! To thank you for this remendous endorsement, your Red Cross Retailer is showing a special Red Cross Shoe Week collection of all the newest ashions . . . from high-heel pumps to supple casuals . . . in all the leathers and colors you love. Don't miss it! Styles rom 10.99 to 14.99

See your local paper for news of your Red Cross Shoe Retailer's special Red Cross Shoe Week celebration!

THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO • THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

"But Mrs. Ashton wasn't cross," said Nona.

"All the more reason," said Mother.

"And Melly didn't mind."

"You are not allowed to swap things at school, not expensive things," said Mother. "I'm sorry, Nona, but you must keep the rules."

Very slowly Nona took the pencil box out of the house.

"It is right and proper," said Miss Happiness with a sigh. "She must keep the rules."

Miss Flower was too sad to answer.

Indeed, it seemed that the dolls' house was not getting on at all. On the way to school Nona and Belinda passed a shop where, in the window, four dolls'-house tea sets in delicate flowered china were set out. "What about those?" asked Belinda.

"It's bowls, not cups, I need," said Nona.

"There's a sugar bowl."

"Only one."

Each set had two cups, a teapot, a milk jug and a sugar bowl.

"You could knock the handles off the cups," said Belinda cheerfully.

"And give them something chipped!" said Nona. She knew without being told that Miss Flower would not like that. "Anyway, they are four shillings and sixpence each," she said.

Another shop had table mats in fine, fine bamboo. "Like dolls'-house matting," said Nona, "and Japanese houses always have matting on the floor," but the mats were a shilling each, "and I should need two," said Nona. In the same shop as the tea sets was a round dolls'-house table in dark wood. "If Tom cut the legs shorter it would look Japanese. Oh, I don't know where to begin!" said Nona and pressed her face against the glass of one shop, then another. In the end she bought the table and Tom, with his smallest saw, cut the legs down for her so that the table was only an inch from the floor. It was just right for a Japanese table, but it looked bleak and plain in the empty room. "It will never be furnished," said Nona.

Miss Flower was terribly alarmed. "You heard what she said," cried Miss Flower and if she could have wrung her little plaster hands she would. "Never be furnished! Oh, we're only dolls. What can we do?"

"Wish," said Miss Happiness. She was still smiling. Perhaps that was because her smile was painted on her face, but it made Miss Flower angry.

"What is the good of wishing?"

"You never know," said Miss Happiness. You never know. Sometimes when things seem farthest off they are quite near. Next morning Melly came to school with a small bundle. She put it on Nona's desk. "Mother sent you this," she said.

The bundle was wrapped in a piece of soft paper. Inside were scraps and pieces and snippets of silk, satin and taffeta, in pink and scarlet, blue and lemon color, white, green, purple and mauve.

"But . . . but —— How did she get them?" asked Nona.

"Well, she does make hats," said Melly and laughed at Nona's face. "These are bits left over. And she says if your mother will let you come to tea she, my mother, will help you with the cushions and quilts. She's a very good sewer," said Melly.

Nona hardly knew if she were standing on her head or her heels. To go to tea with Melly; to make the quilts and cushions; to have this heap of soft and beautiful stuffs! "What is the matter with Nona?" asked Father, who happened to be looking out the window as Nona and Belinda came back from school. "She looks as if she were dancing on the pavement."

Then, at the beginning of the holidays, it was Easter.

Nona had not kept Easter before. She had never seen Easter eggs or Easter rabbits or chickens. "Your own father has sent me some money from Coimbatore," said Mother, "to buy you all Easter eggs. Ten shillings for each of the others," she told Nona, "a pound for you."

"A pound!" said Belinda, her eyes round.

"Is that twenty shillings?" asked Nona. She was trying to do a sum in her head.

"You could buy an enormous huge great Easter egg for that," said Belinda. "One of those huge chocolate ones with chocolate and chickens inside."

"Oh, no!" cried Nona.

"No?"

"Please, please no," In her agitation Nona could hardly speak. "I don't want an Easter egg."

"Not want an egg for Easter?"

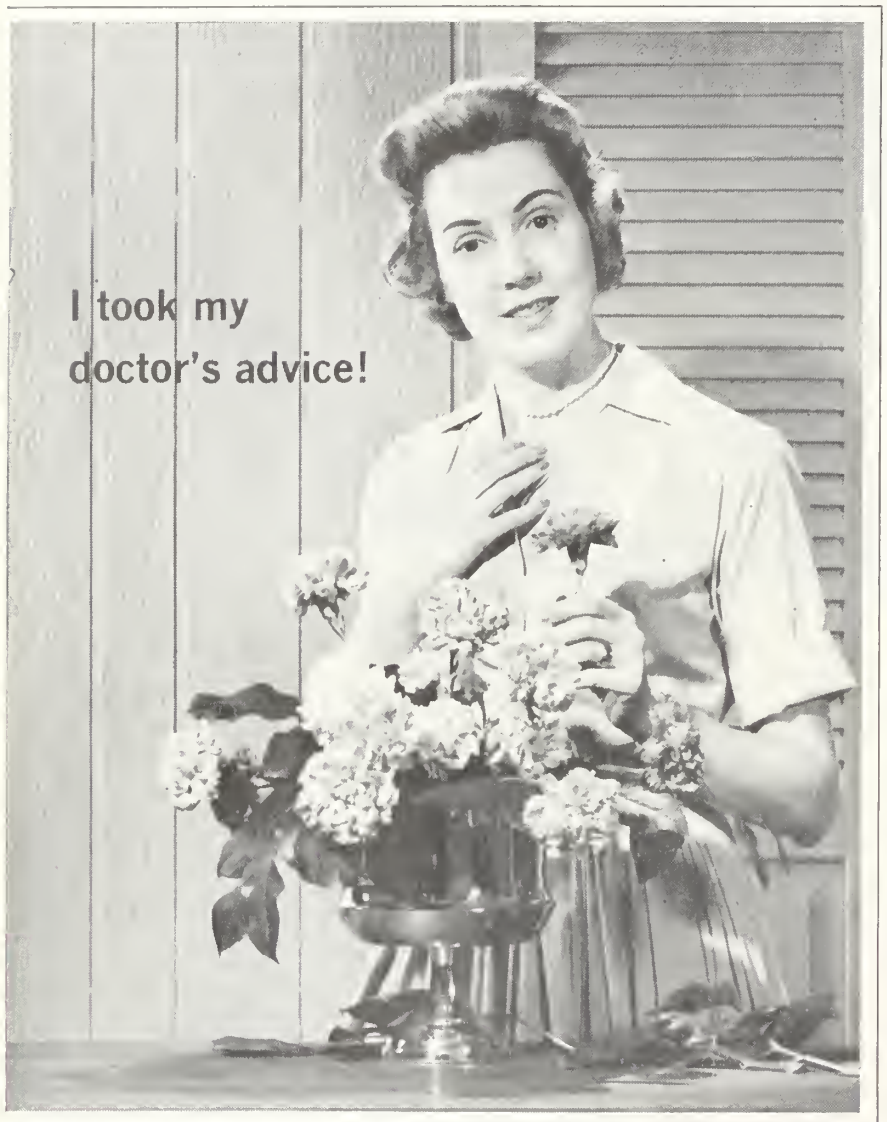
"No. At least, only a tiny one, about sixpence."

"Well, what is it you want?"



"Four tea sets," said Nona, "and two table mats."

"What extraordinary things to want."

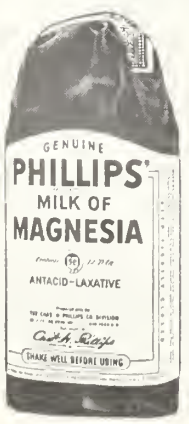
"I want them," said Nona certainly.

On Easter Sunday, as they were coming back from church, Melly came up the road to the gate. She was carrying a package tied with yellow ribbon. "Why, Nona! She has brought you another Easter egg!" but it was a queer shape for an Easter egg, for the package was long and thin.

Before Nona opened it she knew what it was and her fingers began to tremble. "It's your pencil box."

NOW MY CONSTIPATION WORRIES ARE OVER!

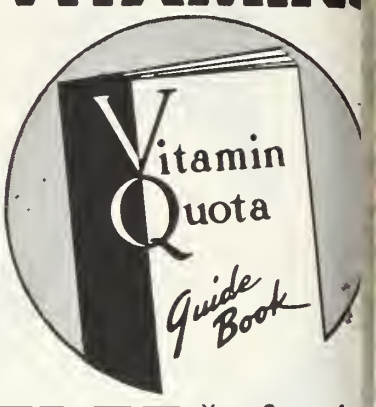
Doctors recommend Milk of Magnesia—the gentle laxative-antacid that gives complete but carefree relief



THOUSANDS of doctors – general practitioners, pediatricians, obstetricians and surgeons, coast to coast, were asked: "Do you ever recommend Milk of Magnesia for your patients?" The overwhelming majority replied: "Yes!"

Yes, doctors consider Milk of Magnesia effective and gentle enough even for infants, maternity and surgical patients. And no wonder!

As a laxative, Phillips' works leisurely, thoroughly but comfortably, never forces the system.



As an antacid, Phillips' settles your stomach, relieves acid distresses accompanying constipation.

No single-purpose laxative can give such complete, yet gentle relief! Ask your doctor! No home should be without Phillips' Milk of Magnesia!

REGULAR OR MINT-FLAVORED

Sensationally Startli FACTS ABOUT VITAMIN

FREE Your Copy of America's Mos Informative Bo

After 20 minutes' reading of this Guide Bo you will understand vitamins as you ne have before. How good is Vitamin C colds? Is there a difference between nat organic products and synthetic vitami What can vitamins really do for the ave person? You will learn the answers to th and hundreds of other perplexing vita questions. You will not be fooled again confusing, mysterious labels. You will able to pick up any vitamin product know if you are getting your money's wo You will learn how to cut costs up to on freshly-packed, guaranteed-potency v min products. For example, 100 capsule Vitamin A (25,000 units) need not cost $1.75, but only 59¢. 100 tablets Vitami (250 mg.) not $2.00, but only 80¢. 100 sules of Vitamin E (100 Int'l Units), retail for $4.65, need cost you only $2 This all-inclusive Vitamin Guide Book sent, without any obligation, as a FR Service by Vitamin-Quota, one of Ameri largest distributors of vitamins to doct nurses and over 2,500,000 families, coast coast. So stop buying blindly. Learn truth and be informed! Send for FR Catalog and Vitamin Guide Book to VITAMIN-QUOTA Dept. A-153, 880 Br way, New York 3, N. Y. or Dept. A-153, 1 S. Crenshaw Blvd., Los Angeles 19, C

MORE PEOPLE USE refreshing, calorie-free Sugarin
LIQUID SWEETENE
SWEETER THAN SUGA
YET NO FOOD VAL
Recommended by doctors f diabetics, overweights and lo-c orie diets. Use for beverage desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmle
USE-TESTED by McCalls
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.–
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHE

SCHULTZ-INSTANT
PLANT SHINE
safe, harmless, for hard-faced living
The original plant polish famous for "THE NATURAL LUSTRE OF THE NEW-BORN LEAF"
• Permanent Lustre
• Dust-Resistance for Life
• In One Application
50¢ Bottle with Applicator

"Schultz-Instant" LIQUID PLANT FOOD 10-15-10 for rapid, vigorous growth, profuse bl
JUST 7 DROPS TO A QUART OF WATER GROWS ALL PLANTS African Violets
Philodendron, etc.
50¢ Bottle with "easy-to-measure" dropper
"Starts and feeds" all plants. Just add a few drops to the water when feeding your plants. So pure, safe, you can feed your plants with every w ing, ends underfeeding and overfeeding, eliminates for having to remember when you last fed your pl
(If your dealer is not supplied, send 50¢ for each bottle postp PLANT SHINE CO., Div. of Schultz Co., 404 S. 4th St., St. Louis mine," said Melly. "It's the same as Mother bought it in London in the nop. Happy Easter," said Melly and y Easter!

Japan we have the New Year Festi-aid Miss Flower, "when fathers and s dress the children in their best clothes e them to visit the shrines and they are oney."
s of money," said Miss Happiness.
t is something like this," said Miss

I like Easter," said Miss Happiness said, "We have the Star Festival, of and the Boys' Festival when the boys per carp fish and play games."
I like Easter," said Miss Flower and l, "We have the Doll Festival when the dolls are brought out and the little it them up on steps covered with red ink this is a Doll Festival day," said appiness.

ed, it seemed to be, for the Japanese ouse was almost finished at last. The box stood against the wall; the quilts lled up on its bottom shelf. Nona had o tea with Melly on two or three sday afternoons when the hatshop was nd after tea they had sewed quilts and , pale pink for Miss Flower while Miss ess had blue.
he Tuesday after Easter Nona had hurer breakfast and run all the way to the n case the tea sets were sold, but they ill in the window and she had been buy all four.
r tea sets?" Belinda had asked.

ing good is the only certainly ppy action of a man's life.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

that I can get four bowls."
I waste all the cups?"
ave to," said Nona sadly.
istopher Columbus!" said Belinda, e Tom.
a put the cups, the jugs and all but one on one side, but the four sugar bowls l the plates and saucers and the one she arranged on the top shelf of the box; with its green leaves and pink
, the china looked Japanese.
nese people eat their food with polished alled chopsticks; Nona cut pine needles ch lengths to make some and they were side the china. From the table-mat e chose two mats in fine cream-colored o; they almost covered the floor when ere put down. On the matting were ns made from Mrs. Ashton's bright Nona set them round the low table.
"I must be ready now," said Belinda, but shook her head.
helped to make a lamp from an empty reel. He ran a flex up through it with electric bulb and Nona made a paper to fit it. She cut a strip of stiff paper, d it deep pink and joined it into a circle icky tape. "And I'm going to model a in clay, like the Japanese stone lan-for the garden," she said.
at garden?" asked Belinda. e garden I am going to make."
y Japanese house has a firebox called achi." They are laquered wood outside, nware-lined, and they glow with a few of charcoal in a bed of ashes. The doors pen and you can warm your hands or kettle for tea or rice. Nona made hers a matchbox, painted dark brown and with shining red paper from a Christmas
r. Tom put another of his tiny bulbs in joined the flex to the lamp. When it was firebox seemed to glow.
ow we need a scroll," said Nona; and,
st put flowers in the niche."
ell, put some," said Belinda, but Nona
I have to learn about them first."
arn about flowers? Pooh! What is there n? Oh, Nona, you are so slow!"

"Please leave honorable Miss Nona alone," wished Miss Happiness and Miss Flower. It was the first time they had sounded impatient. "Leave her. She is doing things in the Japanese way." Flowers, in Japan, can have meanings: pine branches are for strength; plum blossom means new hope; irises are used for ceremony, while the peony is the king of flowers.

"Iris and peonies are too big for a dolls' house," said Anne.

Of course they were too big, but now, in April and May, as Mother and Anne had told Nona, there were wild flowers everywhere, in the grass and along the hedges and in the fields and woods just outside the town. Nona had never seen anything as lovely and every day she discovered something else; wild violets did for irises and wood sorrel or anemones made white peonies, while eyebright looked like dolls'-house lilies. In front of the Japanese dolls' house she made a path of sand and bordered it with cowries, tiny shells she had brought from Coimbatore. At the foot of the steps she put two little blue china eggcups, the kind that are like tubs, and filled them with lady's-slipper. Then she begged a big old baking tin from Mother and put it on the window sill beside the house; she covered it with a layer of earth and moss. Following the pictures of Japanese gardens in Mr. Twilfit's big book, she arranged a path of flat stones and a little heap of pebbles to hold the shell that Anne had given her. The shell was filled with water and made a pool, and by it Nona planted some tufts of grass to look like bamboos, and tiny flowers to look like bushes. "Japanese gardens have to look natural, like hills and lakes and streams," she said and she made a stream of bits of broken looking glass set in the moss, and by it she set the clay lantern she had modeled. Miss Lane had let her bake it in the school kiln and it had a gloss on it like stone. It looked like a toadstool with a hole in the hood, and when a bit of birthday-cake candle was put in, it shone over the garden at night.

"And it's quite safe," said Nona. "The clay won't catch on fire." The garden was beautiful. "But I do wish I had some trees," said Nona.

"There aren't trees as small as that," said Belinda.

There was no scroll yet, but in the niche Nona put a vase of flowers; for the vase she used her ivory thimble, and for flowers she chose a scarlet pimpernel—"That's a peony, the king flower"—and with it were stalks of grass: "Dolls'-house bamboo," said Nona. "Bamboo means luck."

"Yes. Yes!" breathed Miss Flower.

It was finished. "They can move in tomorrow," said Nona.

"Tomorrow!" Miss Happiness felt as if all of her were warmed by the firebox, but Miss Flower felt as if she might crack. "I shan't close my eyes all night," she said. They could not close in any case, but she meant that she would not sleep.

"Our house!" said Miss Happiness. "Tomorrow we move into our house."

"Yes!" Then Miss Flower stopped. "We haven't moved in yet. Suppose—suppose something were to happen and prevent ——"

"But what could?" asked Miss Happiness.

Miss Flower did not know, but all at once she felt cold.

"Can I have a feast?" Nona was asking.

"You can ask some people to tea," said Mother.

"Can I ask Mr. Twilfit and Miss Lane and Mrs. Ashton and Melly?" Nona asked. "And you and Father and Anne and Tom—and Belinda, of course?"

"I'm not coming," said Belinda.

"Why should Nona have people to tea?" asked Belinda and kicked the corner of the table leg. "It's not her birthday."

"Now, Belinda ——"

Belinda kicked the corner of the table leg again.

"If you do that," said Mother, "you can go upstairs at once." Then she put her hand on Belinda's shoulder and said gently, "Belinda. Nona has worked so hard. Don't spoil it," but Belinda shook Mother's hand off, kicked the table leg harder than ever and ran upstairs.

It was no wonder that Miss Flower trembled.

VI

The dolls were to have a feast too. "A tea party," said Nona.

"A tea ceremony," said Miss Flower.

Belinda's dolls'-house food was a cardboard ham glued on a plate, some plaster fish glued on another and a plaster pink-and-white cake. "That won't do at all," said Nona and she went to see Mr. Twilfit to find out what Japanese people ate. In the end, a beautiful little feast was set out on the low table: a bowl of rice made of snipped-up white thread—nothing else was fine enough; a saucer of pink and white sugar cakes made from crumbs of meringue cut round; and some paint-water tea. "Green tea?" asked Belinda.

"Japanese people drink green tea."

"Huh! You know everything," said Belinda, who was in a very bad temper. "Everything!" she said. "But there's one thing you don't know."

"What is that?"

"Wait and see," said Belinda and she looked angry and pleased at the same time.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

My hair's gray— Now, I love it that way!

Happy Anniversary! How she loves the brilliant sparkle of her lovely new necklace and her radiant gray hair. You'll love your gray hair, too, when you use Come Alive Gray, Clairol's new miracle rinse. Takes just minutes to rinse in glowing gray color that adds youthful highlights, banishes yellow, without purple or blue... and stays true till your next shampoo. Your hair is silky-soft, easy to manage, in wonderful condition. So rinse in fashionable new beauty with Come Alive Gray®. You'll love it that way! At cosmetic counters and beauty salons.

Free offer! Send for new booklet—"Answers to 10 Most Common Gray Hair Problems." Write Dept. HJ-3, Clairol Incorporated, 666 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 19, N. Y.

Four Glamorous Shades—One Just For You!

White Sapphire® . . . adds a brilliant pearly glow to white and almost-white hair.

Silver Diamond* . . . polishes white and gray to gleaming silver.

Black Pearl® . . . adds sparkle as it evens tones of salt-and-pepper gray.

Midnight Opal® . . . adds lustre as it conceals gray with rich, smoky tones.

COME ALIVE GRAY

Made by CLAIROL, world leader in hair cosmetics

*TM © 1960 Clairol Incorporated, Stamford, Conn.

What have you heard about METRECAL*

the new concept of weight control?

Since Metrecal was introduced several months ago in powder form, and with its more recent introduction in liquid form, many people have learned of its effectiveness by word-of-mouth. This factual report provides accurate information on Metrecal—what it is, what it is not.

In September of 1959, Mead Johnson & Company introduced a new product to the medical profession under the brand name Metrecal. It was developed to provide physicians with a new technique for use in judicious weight reduction of overweight patients.

We wish to stress the importance of the physician in problems of weight loss and control. This is particularly the case for individuals who are tremendously overweight, patients with disease of the kidneys, and patients with various forms of heart and blood vessel disease.

In view of the broad public and medical interest in weight control, many persons have learned of Metrecal by word-of-mouth; hence, this factual statement.

What is Metrecal?

Metrecal, when properly used, is an effective agent for weight loss and control.

Metrecal is a complete food available in two forms: a powder which is mixed with water; and a liquid, ready to use. Metrecal is designed to provide a low caloric diet which contains all basic nutrients required by a person on a reducing program. Metrecal contains no drugs.

Metrecal can be used as the total diet for the period required to achieve the weight loss which is best for the individual. Thereafter, it can be used for one or two meals a day, or as the total diet on selected days to maintain desired weight.

In other words, the concept is measured calories according to the needs of the individual.

What does Metrecal do?

Overweight persons are able to lose weight through the use of Metrecal simply because they take in fewer calories than are required to maintain weight. In this manner they lose weight naturally, without resorting to fad diets, complex schedules, or artificial appetite depressants. And users of Metrecal are remarkably free from hunger —the appetite is satisfied normally.

What Metrecal cannot do

Metrecal is not a miracle cure for overweight. It cannot provide the will power required for weight reduction. It has to be used properly. It is imperative that the person who desires to lose weight stay on the diet of Metrecal. This is not difficult since little, if any, hunger occurs after a day or two.

Medical evidence of effectiveness

Extensive clinical studies, conducted under medical supervision, have shown an average weight loss by Metrecal users of approximately one-half pound per day for periods up to six weeks. Some lose even more.

Most patients in the studies report little, if any, hunger. Many report that they feel better than before. Almost all find it relatively easy t continue on Metrecal.

What is in Metrecal?

A frequently specified day's supply is one-ha pound of Metrecal powder mixed with water c four eight-ounce cans of Metrecal liquid. Th provides 900 calories or energy units, 70 gram protein, 110 grams carbohydrate, 20 grams f and all essential vitamins and minerals in quant ties that meet or exceed minimum daily requir ments established by the Food and Drug Admi istration.

In addition to the half-pound can, Metrec powder is now available in the 3½-poun economy-size can. The new Metrecal liquid packaged in eight-ounce cans—each provides convenient individual meal.

How to undertake a reducing program

Your physician is the best source of counsel an guidance in problems of weight loss and control.

*Metrecal is Mead Johnson & Company's brand of dietary for weight contr

Mead Johnson

Symbol of service in medicin

© Mead Johnson & Company • Nutritional and Pharmaceutical Products • Evansville 21, Indian

TINUED FROM PAGE 111

e dolls were dressed in new kimonos; er had given Nona an empty cigar box she kept their clothes in that. Mrs. Ash- ad made Miss Happiness a white kimono oidered with a tiny pattern of leaves, over nderdress of pale yellow silk with a sash ue. Miss Flower's was coral pink over an rdress of delicate violet color and her was pale green. Their hair was brushed heir socks and sandals had been painted. had carefully patched the chip on Miss er's ear with some white paint. "We look new," said Miss Happiness.

s it really going to happen?" asked Miss er. Even though she was dressed, she d not quite believe it.

t really is," said Miss Happiness.

the dolls' house, the garden lantern was d the house lamp and the firebox switched n the real house the front-door bell rang "It really is," said Miss Flower.

eryone brought presents. Melly had a et of water flowers, the Japanese paper ers that uncurl into brightly colored pat- when you drop them into water. "You ut one or two in the shell for water lilies," Melly.

NEXT MONTH

I came here to find Esmond," she told hem. "Haven't I a right to know?"

A figure glimpsed at the window, a ild, unreasoning hope were all she ad to go on. But Charlotte could not bandon her search for Esmond, her st twin, until she had fathomed the ecret within the walls of

THE SEA HOUSE

complete-in-one-issue condensed novel

By MARGARET SUMMERTON

rs. Ashton brought a tiny paper sunshade had once found in a cracker. "It's from Ja n," she said.

Quite right," said Miss Happiness and M s Flower.

iss Lane had brought her present in a m chbox; it was a length of paper three inches lo and an inch and a quarter wide—if you m sure it with your ruler you will see how bi t was. Top and bottom it was held on two m chsticks that Miss Lane had sandpapered sr oth and fine; the paper could roll up on th n, and on the paper, in fine, fine painting, w some white plum blossoms and a bird; th ird was no bigger than a pea. There was sc e writing, too, but so small that to read it yc needed a magnifying glass. When they had bi owed Father's, Nona cried, "It's my p n!

"My two plum trees are
So gracious . . .
See, they flower
One now, one later."

Who could have done it?" asked Belinda. t looks like a fairy, but I think it was Miss L e," said Nona.

A scroll! A right-size Japanese scroll!" sa Miss Happiness.

But shouldn't the writing have been Jap- a e?" asked Miss Flower doubtfully.

Not in England. That wouldn't have been p te," said Miss Happiness and Miss Flower w satisfied.

Nona hung the scroll in the niche. "Soon I m t make you a new one," said Miss Lane. "This one is for spring, but you should ch nge them with the seasons." Miss Happi- n and Miss Flower gave two dolls' nods, w ch means they nodded though you could n see them, and said, "Quite right."

Anne had made two pleated fans, no bigger than your fingernail. "It says they should wear fans for the tea ceremony," said Anne.

"Very right." And Miss Happiness and Miss Flower were glad when the fans were tucked into their sashes.

Tom with his fretsaw had cut out a hump-backed bridge to go over the looking-glass stream. It had railings of wood and the dolls could really walk over it.

All the presents were beautiful, but the best of all was Mr. Twilfit's. He had brought two trees. "Are those trees?" asked Belinda. "Real trees?"

"A pine and a willow," said Nona, looking at the labels. She sounded dizzy, as indeed she was, for how many people have heard of or seen a pine tree five inches high and a willow only three? "But . . . they're real, alive!" cried Nona.

"Quite real," said Mr. Twilfit, his eyebrows going up and down.

"I didn't know," said Miss Flower with great respect, "that there was anything like that in England," and Miss Happiness said, "England is a most honorable country."

"They are grown for people to make sink gardens," said Mr. Twilfit; "dwarf gardens in sinks or basins." Everyone was so enchanted that he was beginning to feel shy and his eyebrows grew still. "Better plant 'em," said Mr. Twilfit abruptly and he turned away to look at the house. As he looked he forgot to be shy and his eyebrows began to go up and down again. "The President couldn't have made it any better," he said to Tom.

The best of a dolls'-house garden is that it takes only five minutes to plant a tree; Nona planted the pine by the shell pool, the willow by the stream. They made the garden look exactly like the gardens in the book.

Then Nona turned to the dolls. She made them bow to the company—which means all the people there—and said, "Miss Happiness and Miss Flower, will you come into your home?" But before they could be made to walk up the path bordered with shells and past the tubs of lady's-slipper, Belinda spoke:

"Not Miss Flower. She's mine."

"Belinda! Belinda! You're not going to spoil it?"

"Yes, I am," said Belinda.

Mother had taken Belinda to the playroom to talk to her. Belinda stood hard and angry by the table; her cheeks were red and her eyes very blue and bright. She argued with Mother.

"On the parcel it said, 'The Misses Fell.' You said Anne was too old for dolls and we could have one each. You said so," argued Belinda.

"But that was long ago," said Mother.

"Miss Flower's mine," said Belinda. "You can't take her away from me."

"It's just that you don't want Nona to have her," said Mother sadly. "Oh, Belinda! Belinda!"

"I don't care," said Belinda.

"That's true," said Mother. "You never cared or thought about Miss Flower or wanted her."

"I want her now," said Belinda and she took Miss Flower and threw her into her own dolls' house and slammed the door.

Belinda ate her tea very quickly. Her cheeks were still red, her eyes even a brighter blue. She talked a great deal and said funny things to make everyone laugh, but it was an odd thing that nobody laughed at them except Belinda. No one else really talked and nobody ate very much. Nona ate nothing at all and her face looked white and sick with disappointment; Belinda saw Melly steal a hand into hers and, "Can I have another meringue?" asked Belinda, and when she put it into her mouth she laughed and blew the sugar crumbs all over the table.

"I think we will go into the drawing room," said Mother. "Belinda, you had better finish your tea alone."

In the dolls' house the lamp threw a soft light in the house where the front was open and the screens had been slid back to show the garden; the lantern made a reflection in the looking-glass stream and gave the tiny trees real shadows.

...she's wearing new

"Moisture Base" by Pond's

New greaseless foundation! Moisturizes for hours right under your make-up!

While you dine, while you dance, while you shop, greaseless new Pond's Moisture Base works invisibly right under your make-up! Creates a lasting "moisture reserve" that keeps the moisture level of your skin in perfect balance.

Protects against weather, the drying effects of make-up . . . keeps your skin soft, your make-up lovely all day.

Greaseless, so make-up never cakes. Transparent, to wear under any shade. Smooth on Pond's Moisture Base before you apply make-up. Use for overnight moisturizing, too. 60¢ and $1.00 plus tax.

THE MODERN GREASELESS UNDER-MAKE-UP MOISTURIZER

Miss Happiness knelt on her cushion in front of the table set ready for the tea ceremony, but Miss Happiness did not touch any of the tea; opposite her were the blue cushion, empty, and a little empty bowl.

"Oh, why couldn't Miss Belinda have taken me?" mourned Miss Happiness. That would have been dreadful enough, but she was stuffed fuller than Miss Flower and her plaster had not been chipped. "Miss Flower wanted the house even more than I did," mourned Miss Happiness. "She was always frightened." If dolls could have tears I am sure they would have rolled down Miss Happiness's plaster cheeks. "Oh, I'm afraid!" cried Miss Happiness. "I'm afraid that Flower will not be able to bear it. I'm afraid she will break."

There was certainly not a sound or a movement in Belinda's dolls' house; not the smallest doll rustle.

When tea was over the guests quietly went home. "Shan't we play any games?" asked Belinda, astonished.

"We'd rather not play with you," said Anne.

"Because you're a little rotter," said Tom.

Belinda put her tongue out at him, which was not at all pretty, for it still had crumbs of meringue sticking to it.

"You had better go upstairs," said Mother.

Nona put out the lantern, the lamp and the firebox. She washed the bowls and platters and put them away. Then she unrolled the blue quilts—the pink ones stayed in the pencil-box cupboard—and gently she laid Miss Happiness down and covered her up. Miss Happiness looked very small and lonely in the big room and when Nona slid the paper screens shut they made a s-s-s-sh like a sigh.

Belinda sang and danced all the time she was going to bed; it was odd, then, that the house should have felt so silent. Tom and Anne had gone to their rooms to do their homework; usually they did it with friendly calls from room to room, but now they sl their doors. Nona had got into bed withou word and lay with her face turned to the w Downstairs in the drawing room Father a Mother talked in low tones. "What a f about a doll," said Belinda.

No one answered. She half thought of go to the dolls' house and taking Miss Flower and throwing her at Nona, but, "I'll be dar if I will," said Belinda.

Saying "be darned" like Tom made her big and important and she shouted and g gled as she did her teeth.

The house still stayed quite silent.

Belinda always went to sleep as soon as head touched the pillow; only once, long a when she had had a cold, she had woken in the night with a sore throat and stu nose. She had not a cold now, but th seemed to be something the matter.

She tossed and turned and twisted. S heard Anne and Tom go to bed and t later—hours and hours, thought Belind Mother and Father came up.

"I can't go to slee-ep," called Belinda did not sound loud, it sounded like a bl but Mother did not come in nor give Beli a glass of hot milk as she had that other nig Mother went into her room and shut the do

Belinda was so surprised that she got ou bed and padded in her bare feet to Moth door and knocked. Mother opened it a cra "I can't go to slee-ep," wailed Belinda.

"I'm not surprised," said Mother and the door.

Then Belinda felt something queer in eyes and in her chest, as if something hot aching were gathering and coming up. Qui she went back to bed and burrowed under clothes, but up the aching came until it spil over; it was wet and splashed down on pillow. It was tears.

"It's no good crying." How often Beli had said that to Nona. But sometimes i good. As the tears soaked into Belinda's low the hard angry feeling seemed to n away and, "I'm sorry," sobbed Belin "sorry," but she did not cry herself to sle she cried herself awake, perhaps more aw than she had ever been in her life.

It is lonely for a little girl to lie awake in dark when everyone is sleeping and t Belinda remembered she was not the only who was alone.

Miss Happiness was alone in the Japar dolls' house, and what of Miss Flower? M Flower was worse than alone in Belind dolls' house. Belinda had thrown her in slammed the door. I threw her quite ha thought Belinda. Did she break? and sudde Belinda was more miserable than ever, miserable that she could not stay in bed longer; she had to see what had happened Miss Flower. What did I do to Miss Flow asked Belinda and more tears ran down face. She got out of bed and tiptoed into playroom.

When the dolls'-house door banged shut Miss Flower I think she fainted. That was as well, for when Belinda found her she lying on her back with one foot in the air, head under a broken chair and her hand the dolls'-house wastepaper basket in wh there was an earwig. Her kimono and h were covered with dust and the chip l opened again under the white paint int trickle of plaster, but Miss Flower kn nothing until she felt a gentle hand come and lift her. It was so gentle that she thou it was Nona's; she never dreamed it could Belinda's.

Very gently Belinda lifted Miss Flower, her leg straight, dusted her hair and clot and shook the earwig off onto the carp Then she stood holding Miss Flower in h hand and wondering what to do next. Su denly she tiptoed into Nona's room where Japanese dolls' house was shut and dark the window sill.

As Belinda slid the screen walls back tl did not make a s-s-s-sh like a sigh, bu s-s-s-sh as if there were a secret—as ind there was, for carefully, with two finge Belinda opened the pencil-box cupboard a took out the pink quilts; carefully she rolled them—and how clumsy her fingers we Fresh Cream Deodorant lasts and lasts and lasts!

No wilting with wonderful Fresh . . . the cream deodorant with a "Perfect Balance" of gentleness and effectiveness. Fresh Cream pampers your delicate skin, yet protects you because it's a deodorant and an anti-perspirant, too!

there's nothing fresher than Fresh gh she tried to be careful. She unrolled uilts beside Miss Happiness, and carefully Miss Flower in and covered her. Then she the screens shut and tiptoed back to bed. e was quite comfortable now and she to sleep at once.

VII

was a very strange thing. When Belinda gone to bed nobody had seemed to like Now in the morning everybody liked her much.

ona came running into her room. She ed a new Nona now with her eyes shining her hair flying, her cheeks pink. She ped on Belinda's bed and in a moment they hugging each other. "I never thought we ld do that!" said Belinda.

Mother came and gave her a kiss. Father ed her hair on his way to the bathroom at breakfast everyone seemed to take her .

had Miss Happiness and Miss Flower. It n't fair," said Nona.

We should have seen Belinda wasn't left ," said Anne.

I'll make you a Japanese dolls' house if like," said Tom, but as the days went on nda did not really want a Japanese dolls' se, though she liked playing now and then Nona's, but, "I wish there was some- g for me," said Belinda.

t was summer now. They all wore thin hes and sun hats, went bathing and ate ice m. The shops were full of cherries, then peaches; perhaps it was the peaches that e Nona her idea.

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower spent ch of their time in the garden and took it

If you pursue two hares, both will escape from you. GREEK PROVERB turns to carry the paper sunshade. Nona t clover for chrysanthemums in the flower se in the niche—chrysanthemums are Ja- n's own flower—and planted them in the cups by the steps. The tiny willow tree ossomed.

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower had sum- r kimonos of pale blue and Anne wove them o flat hats of yellow straw. Mr. Twilfit, Mrs. hton and Melly often came to visit them. iss Lane sent a scroll for summer, with a us flower and a butterfly. In the evenings the rden lantern shone pale in the dusk. "How autiful it is," said Miss Happiness, and Miss ower had a moment of being frightened; her ip had been painted over again, but she still uld not forget the night in the dusty dolls' ouse. "Miss Nona has opened our traveling ox again. Why? Why?" she asked, but Nona as only studying the piece of paper that id, "I send you Miss Happiness, Miss ower and Little Peach."

"Mother, did you ever write to Great-Aunt ucy Dickinson?" asked Nona.

"Why, I forgot!" said Mother.

"Could a letter get to America fast?"

"Of course it could, by air."

"If I write to Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson, ill you help me to buy the stamp? It's a cret," said Nona.

The stamp cost one shilling and threepence, early two whole ninepences. This is the letter lona sent:

ear Great-Aunt Lucy Dickinson:

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower are well. We ave made them a new house, but where is Little each? He wasn't in the box. Please send him.

From your loving niece,
NONA FELL.

.S. When you answer please put "Privit."

That is how she spelt "private"; as you now, she had not been at school very long. he wanted the answer marked "private" so hat no one else would open it. Then she added omething else:

P.S. Please send him quickly.

After Nona had posted the letter she began o look in shops to see how big peaches were.

It was three weeks later, a hot sunny morning, and they all had peaches on their plates for breakfast.

"Christopher Columbus!" said Tom. "Is it someone's birthday?"

"Yes," said Mother, and Nona giggled.

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower were at breakfast too. They had paint-water tea on their table, tomatoes which were berries, and white cotton rice; they ate with new pine-needle chopsticks. There were fresh trefoil flowers in the vase—trefoil looks like dolls'-house yellow chrysanthemums—and everything was extra fresh and tidy. "Is it a birthday?" asked Tom.

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower had their heads bent over their rice, but their glass eyes looked as if they were twinkling.

The biggest peach was Belinda's. It was so big that it looked as if it were spilling over her plate. "Hey, I ought to have that one!" said Father.

"It's Belinda's," said Mother, and Nona gave another giggle.

Mother showed Belinda how to slip her knife in to slit it, but as Belinda touched it the peach seemed to wobble, then came in half. Belinda's eyes grew rounder and rounder, for there, in the middle of the peach, was a boy doll baby.

"A Japanese boy doll baby," said Miss Happiness and Miss Flower.

He was little and fat, perhaps two inches high, wearing nothing at all but with black hair—there was a piece of paper over it to protect it from the peach juice, but Belinda snatched it off. His eyes were black glass slits and he had a smile just like Miss Happiness's.

Belinda stared and stared. Then, "How?" she said. "How?"

"Never mind how," said Mother and Nona said, "Who is it?"

With her eyes like bright blue saucers Belinda whispered, "It's . . . it's Little Peach."

END

SHOES YOU'LL REACH FOR INSTINCTIVELY—because they're right for almost every occasion.
The Air Step combination last will hold your foot gently, but snugly, as you walk in cushioned comfort on the famous MAGIC SOLE.
In suede or calf, high or mid heel.

Air Step®

1960... Twenty-fifth Anniversary of Air Step Shoes

AIR STEP DIVISION, BROWN SHOE COMPANY, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI. ALSO MANUFACTURED IN CANADA BY BROWN SHOE COMPANY OF CANADA LTD., PERTH, ONTARIO

FARAH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 73

have supposed the partnership to have come to an end after the affair with Naaman, but whom we meet in a later chapter apparently in the best of understanding. Here walk Terence's Davus and Simo, and Plautus's Calidorus and Pseudolus. Here Don Quixote rides forth, with Sancho Panza on his mule by the croup of Rosinante. Here the Fool follows King Lear across the heath in the storm and the black night, here Leporello waits in the street while inside the palazzo Don Giovanni "reaps his sweet reward." Phileas Fogg struts onto the stage with one single idea in his head and versatile Passepartout at his heels. In our own streets of old Copenhagen Jeronimus and Magdelone promenade arm in arm, while behind their broad and dignified backs Henrik and Pernille make signs to each other.

The servant may be the more fascinating of the two, still it holds true of him as of his master that his play of colors would fade and his timbre abate, were he to stand alone. He needs a master in order to be himself.

I had in Africa many servants, whom I shall always remember as part of my existence there. There was Ismael, my gunbearer, a mighty huntsman brought up and trained exclusively in the hunter's world, a great tracker and weather prophet, expressing himself in hunters' terminology and speaking of my "big" and my "young" rifle. It was Ismael who after his return to Somaliland addressed his letter to me "Lioness Blixen" and began it "Honourable Lioness." There was old Ismael, my cook and faithful companion on safaris, who was a kind of Mohammedan saint. And there was Kamante, a small figure to look at but great, even formidable, in his total isolation. But Farah was my servant by the grace of God.

Farah and I had all the dissimilarities required to make up a unity: difference of race, sex, religion, milieu and experience. In one thing only were we equal: we had agreed that we were the same age. We were not able to settle the matter exactly, since the Mohammedans reckon with lunar years.

In our day the word "gentleman" is taken less seriously than before, or seems to us to have once taken itself a bit too seriously. But so did Farah take himself seriously.

Farah was a Somali, which means that he was no native of Kenya but an immigrant to the country from Somaliland, farther north. In my day there were a large number of Somali in Kenya. They were greatly superior to the native population in intelligence and culture. They were of Arab blood and looked upon themselves as pureblood Arabs, in some cases even as descendants of the Prophet. On the whole they thought very highly of themselves. They were all fanatical Mohammedans. Most likely Farah's ancestors had been hunters and robbers in the Highlands, and possibly pirates on the Red Sea.

The Somali are very handsome people, slim and erect as all East African tribes, with somber, haughty eyes, straight legs and teeth like wolves'. They are vain and have knowledge of fine clothes. When not dressed as Europeans—for many of them would wear discarded suits of their masters' from the finest London tailors and would look very good in them—they had on long robes of raw silk, with black waistcoats elaborately embroidered in gold. They always wore the turbans of the orthodox Mohammedans in exquisite many-colored cashmeres; those who had made the pilgrimage to Mecca might wear a green turban.

The dark nations of Africa, strikingly precocious as young children, seemed to come to a standstill in their mental growth at different ages. The Kikuyu, Kavirondo and Wakamba, the people who worked for me on the farm, in early childhood were far ahead of white children of the same age, but they stopped quite suddenly at a stage corresponding to that of a European child of nine. The Somali had got further and had all the mentality of boys of our own race at the age of thirteen to seventeen. In such young Europeans, too, the code of honor, the deadly devotion to the grand phrase and the grand gesture, is the passion urging them on to heroic deeds and heroic self-sacrifice, and also at times sinking them into a dark melancholy and resentment unintelligible to grown-up people. The Somali woman seemed to have stolen a small march on her male, and from the time when she can first walk until venerable high age presents the picture of the classic jeune fille of Europe: coquettish, wily, covetous beyond belief, and sweetly merciful at the core.

I had read the old Nordic sagas as a child, and now in my intercourse with the Somali I was struck by their likeness to the ancient Icelanders. I was therefore pleased to find Professor Östrup, who is an authority on both nations, making use of a common term to characterize Arabs and Icelanders: he calls them "attitudinizers." The same ravenous ambition to distinguish themselves before all others, and at any cost to immortalize themselves through a word or gesture, lies deep in the hearts of the sons of the desert as it did in the hearts of the untamed, salty young seafarers of the northern seas.

Personally I have always had a predilection for boys, and have at times reflected that the strong sex reaches its highest point of lovableness at the age of twelve to seventeen—to get it back, in a second flowering, at the age of seventy to ninety. So were the Somali from the first day irresistible to me. With the later European settlers, however, they were not popular.

I myself came out to the protectorate of British East Africa before the First World War, while the Highlands were still in very truth the happy hunting grounds, and while the white pioneers lived in guileless harmony with the children of the land. Most of the immigrants had come to Africa, and had stayed on there, because they liked their African existence better than their existence at home, would rather ride a horse than go in a car and rather make up their own campfire than turn on the central heating. Like me, they wished to lay their bones in African soil. They were almost all themselves country-bred and open-air people; many of them were younger sons of old English families, schooled early in life by elderly, dignified keepers and stablemen, and were accustomed to proud servants. Themselves untamed, with fresh hearts, they were capable of forming a Hawkeye-Chingachgook fellowship with a dark, untamed nomad or hunter; they accepted and trusted the Somali, as the Somali accepted and trusted them.

During the war, and the first years after it, no new settlers landed. But in the following years an energetic advertising of the colony of Kenya as a country of unique economic possibilities was started in England, and "Closer Settlement" was made the catchword. It brought out a new class of settlers people who had grown up and lived in one town or one community in England, and who were strangely provincial compared with the African natives, who were at any time prepared for anything. Plots of land were also given out as rewards to British noncommissioned officers, most of whom were city people, who in the loneliness of the great landscapes felt that they had been promised more than they were given.

To these later arrivals to the country the Somali, her earliest immigrants, seemed haughty and unmanageable and were, I believe, on the whole as intolerable as to me and my friends they were indispensable. So it came about that our particular clan of early settlers—arrogantly looking upon ourselves as Mayflower people—might be characterized as those Europeans who kept Somali servants and to whom a house without a Somali would be like a house without a lamp. Here were Lord Delamere and Hassan, Berkeley Cole and Jama, Denys Finch-Hatton and Bilea, and I myself and Farah. We were the people who, wherever we met, were followed, at a distance of five feet, by those noble, vigilant and mysterious shadows.

Berkeley Cole and I, in a private jargon of ours, distinguished between respectability and decency, and divided up our acquaintances, human and animal, in accordance with the doctrine. We put down domestic animals as respectable and wild animals as decent, and held that, though the existence and prestige of the first were decided by their relation to the community, the others stood in direct contact with God. Pigs and poultry, we agreed, were worthy of our respect. We watched them in their sties and yards, perseveringly working at the return of investments made, pleasantly feeding, grunting and quacking. And leaving them there, to their own homely, cozy atmosphere, we turned our eyes to the unrespectable, destructive wild boar on his lonely wanderings, or to the wild geese and duck in their purposeful line of flight across the sky, and we felt their course to have been drawn up by the finger of God.

We registered ourselves with the wild animals, sadly admitting the inadequacy of our return to the community—and to our mortgages—but realizing that we could not possibly, not even in order to obtain the highest approval of our surroundings, give up that direct contact with God which we shared with the hippo and the flamingo. Nine thousand feet up we felt safe, and we laughed at the ambition of the new arrivals, of the missions, the business people and the government itself, to make the continent of Africa respectable. A time came when we began to feel uneasy about the matter. The Protestant missions gave much time, energy and money to make the natives put on trousers—in which they looked like giraffes in harness. The French fathers were in better understanding with the children of the land, but they did not have—as they ought to have had—Saint Francis of Assisi at their mission station. The government, turning the great wild plains into game reserves, seemed to succeed in making the lions themselves take on the look of kindly Ready money is Aladdin's lamp.

BYRON

patresfamilias—times might come when our old feline friends would have their regular meals served them from Game Department canteens. It was doubtful whether then the kongoni would still keep their lonely watcher silhouetted on top of a hill, the eland their silky skin swaying in the dewlap as they trotted along, and their moist eyes, the impala their flying leap. Must there then, even in Africa, be no live creature standing in direct contact with God?

Aye, but there will be, I consoled myself, as long as I have Farah with me. For Farah, although gravely posing as a highly respectable major-domo, Malvolio himself, was a wild animal, and nothing in the world would ever stand between him and God. Unfailingly loyal, he was still at heart a wild animal, a cheetah noiselessly following me about at a distance of five feet, or a falcon holding on to my finger with strong talons and turning his head right and left. The qualities with which he served me were cheetah or falcon qualities.

When Farah first took service in my house, or first took my house into possession—for from that day he spoke of "our house," "our horses," "our guests"—it was no common contract which was set up, but a covenant established between him and me ad majorem domus gloriam, to the ever-greater glory of the house. My well-being was not his concern, and was hardly of real importance to him, but for my good name and prestige he did, I believe, hold himself responsible before God.

Farah was a highly picturesque figure in my house as he stepped forth on its threshold. In his relations with my native servants he was unwaveringly fair and impartial, and he had a deeper knowledge of them and their course of thought than I could well account for, for I hardly ever saw him converse with them. Farah spoke English correctly, and French as well, for he had in his young days been cabin boy on a French man of war, but he had a few expressions of his own which I ought to have set him right about, but which instead in our talks together I took to using myself. He said "exactly" for "except": "All the cows have come home exactly the gray cow," and I still at times find myself making use of the word in the same way.

Farah had the typical Somali voice, recognizable among all voices of the world, low guttural, with a twofold ring to it, for it was friendly but lent itself excellently well to particular contempt or scorn. He said of an ambitious English friend of the house, "He never get Sir," meaning that he would never obtain the honor of being knighted. At the time when the locusts came upon us the natives roasted and ate them; I had a mind to try them myself, but, still somehow doubtful, asked Farah what they tasted like. "I know not, mem-sahib," he answered; "I eat not such small birds." He had a partiality for the demonstrative adjective: "This Arab horse dealer offers you this horse at this price," and rarely spoke about his fellow men but in the same way: "this Kamante," "this Prince of Wales." Thomas Mann in his book Joseph in Egypt tells us that the ancient Egyptians had the same usage, and that Joseph taught himself to speak according to their taste: "As we came to this fortress this good old man said to the officer." It may be a particular African inclination.

Farah strictly saw to it that our native servants groomed the horses and polished the silver of the house till they shone. He drove my old Ford car as if it had been a Rothschild's Rolls-Royce. He was a highly expensive functionary in the house, not only because his salary was disproportionately larger than that of my other servants, but because he demanded without mercy demand my house to be run in grand style.

Farah was my cashier; he had charge of the money I took home from the bank and of my keys. He never drew up any accounts for me and would hardly have been able to do so, nor would it ever have occurred to me to demand it from him. I never doubted but that he did to the best of his ability spend my money in the interest of my house. Only there always remained to me a strong exciting element of suspense as to his views of the interests of the house.

I once asked him, "Farah, can you give me five rupees?" and he asked me in return "What do you want them for, mem-sahib?" "I want to buy a new pair of slacks," I said. Farah shook his head. "We cannot afford that this month, mem-sahib," he said. He told me: "I pray to God that your old riding boots may last till your new ones arrive out from London." Farah had good knowledge of riding boots and felt it to be below my dignity to walk about in boots made by the Indians in Nairobi.

To make up for it he was liberal in other matters. He decreed: "We must have champagne for dinner tonight, mem-sahib." My English friends who in between their long safaris stayed in my house kept it in wine of very high standard, but when they were away for a long time I ran short. "We have got a little champagne left, Farah," I said. "We must have champagne," Farah said again. "Have you forgotten, mem-sahib, that there is a mem-sahib coming for dinner?" My guests as a rule were men.

When Prince Wilhelm of Sweden was coming for tea to the farm, in his honor I wanted to make a kind of Swedish cake called Klejn for which you need a little bit, what the cookery books call a pinch, of cardamom. As Farah was going to Nairobi I added the cardamom to his shopping list. "I do not know," I said, "whether the white grocers will have it. But if you cannot get it from them you must go to the Indians." The great Indian traders, Suleiman Virjee and Allidina Visram, were personal friends of Farah's and owned more than half of the native trade quarter which was called the Bazaar.

Farah came back late in the evening and reported: "This precious spice, mem-sahib, which other Europeans do not know, but which we must have, was very difficult to get. First I went to these white grocers, but they had not got it. Then I went to Suleiman Virjee and he had it. And then I bought for five hundred rupees." A rupee was two shillings. "You are crazy, Farah," I said. "I meant you to buy for ten cents." "You did not tell me so," said Farah. "No, I did not tell you so,"

the one shampoo that's really two NEW TANDEM

you suds twice—same as always—but what a difference!

For perfect cleaning twist cap to TANDEM GOLD

Cleans hair completely, the way no other leading shampoo can. Unlike other shampoos, TANDEM GOLD contains no conditioning agents to dilute its deep-down cleaning power. Nothing stops its richer, fluffier suds from getting hair clean. Perfectly clean because TANDEM GOLD is made to clean—and nothing else.

For perfect control twist cap to TANDEM GREEN

TANDEM GREEN shampoo lathers your hair into beautiful behavior—immediately. Controls so completely there's no need for cream rinses. Light suds cleanse gently; bring body and moisture to make hair alive and obedient. Your hair sets easily. Stays easy to set—you can even pass up a pin-up or two!

NEWEST BRISTOL-MYERS DISCOVERY

BRINGING UP BABY®, HINTS COLLECTED BY MRS. DAN GERBER, MOTHER OF 5

toddler talk

Talk tip. It's all right to indulge in a certain amount of gurgle and coo talk when baby is very young. It encourages baby to make sounds, the first step to real speech. But once he reaches the year mark, it's a good idea to use proper words, speak slowly and clearly, and point to objects as you talk.

Feeding findings. Most toddler feeding problems fall into two classes. One is that baby does not eat enough or what the mother thinks is enough. The other is a child's refusal to eat foods mother thinks he should have. Usually these foods are milk, meat and vegetables. It's important to remember a child's appetite is a good guide to how much he should eat and there is no one food he must eat.

Disguise tactics. Toddlers often go through an anti-milk stage. You can see that your tyke gets a fair share with these disguises:

Serve extra servings of Gerber Cereals. * Be surprised how much milk you can give baby this way. * Whip up a nog: 2 tbs. Gerber Egg Yolks— * 1 can Gerber Orange Juice—2 cups milk— * 2 tsp. sugar.

Success story that's sure to make a hit with toddlers. Gerber High Protein Cereal has a delicate, nut-like flavor that toddlers dote on. Nutritionally speaking, it has 35% protein, is enriched with B-vitamins and iron. (6 tablespoons provide more than 100% of the Recommended Daily Dietary allowance for toddlers.)

Your toddler's appetite will tune up at the first taste of the new Gerber Junior Beef and Spaghetti. This "gourmet" casserole teams tender, enriched spaghetti with flavor-y bits of beef and savory tomato sauce. It stars high vitamin-A value and lots of energy-giving calories.

FREMONT, MICHIGAN
5 CEREALS • OVER 100 STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS

BABIES ARE OUR BUSINESS...OUR ONLY BUSINESS!®

said. "I thought you had human intelligence. But in any case I have no use for five hundred rupees' worth of cardamom, and you will have to give it back to Suleiman Virjee where you got it." I at once realized that it would be impossible to make Farah carry out my order. It was not the inconvenience that he feared, for no kind of inconvenience means anything to a Somali. But he would not allow Suleiman Virjee to believe that a house like ours could do with less than five hundred rupees' worth of cardamom.

He thought the matter over and said, "No. No, that would not be good, mem-sahib. But I will tell you what we will do. I shall take over this lot." So we left it at that, and the Somali are such furious tradespeople that Farah at once got the hitherto unknown article introduced on the farm, so that soon every self-esteeming Kikuyu went about chewing cardamom and dashingly spitting out the capsules. I tried it myself and it was not bad. I feel that Farah made a handsome profit on the transaction.

Farah's knowledge of native mentality came in useful to me.

Once, at the end of a month, when I had been paying out their wages to my people on the farm, in going through my accounts I found that a hundred-rupee note was missing and must have been stolen. I passed on the sad news to Farah, and he at once very calmly declared that he would get me my money back. "But how?" I asked him. "There have been more than a thousand people up here, and we have no idea at all as to who may be the thief."

"Nay, but I will get you your money back," said Farah.

He walked away, and toward evening returned carrying with him a human skull. This may sound highly dramatic, but was in itself nothing out of the normal. For centuries the natives had not buried their dead but had laid them out on the plain where jackals and vultures would take care of them. One might at any time, riding or walking there, in the long grass knock against an amber-colored thighbone or a honey-brown skull.

Farah rammed down a pole outside my door and nailed the skull to the top of it. I stood by and watched him without enthusiasm. "What is the good of that, Farah?" I asked him. "The thief will already be far away. And must I now have that skull of yours set up just outside my door?" Farah did not answer, he took a step back to survey his work and laughed. But next morning by the foot of the pole a stone was lying, and underneath it a hundred-rupee note. By what dark, crooked paths it had got there I was not told, and now shall never know.

Farah, as already told, was a strict Mohammedan, burning in the spirit.

Of Mohammedan philosophy or theology I know nothing; all the same, I feel that you cannot live for a long time among Mohammedans without your own view of life being in some way influenced by theirs.

I have been told that the word "Islam" in itself means submission; the creed may be defined as the religion which ordains acceptance. And the follower of the Prophet does not accept with reluctance or with regret but with rapture. There is in his preaching, as I know it from his unlearned disciples, a tremendous erotic element.

"Sweet scents, incense and perfumes are dear to my heart," says the Prophet. "But the glory of women is dearer. The glory of women is dear to my heart. But the glory of prayer is dearer."

In contrast to many modern Christian ideologies, Islam does not occupy itself with justifying the ways of God to man; its Yes is universal and unconditional.

They rush forth, these warriors of the great fantasias, to meet the will of God—His adorable will—as the Jews rush forth to meet the Sabbath: "Get thee up, brethren, to welcome the bride!" Or David, King of Israel, in his Psalm 119: "O how love I thy law!" They are a communion of yes-sayers, they are in love with danger, with death and with God.

As Job's laments are not silenced by expositions of the justice and mercy of God, but it is before the revelation of God's greatness that the complainer surrenders and consents, the Prophet surrenders and consents: "God is great." In the same way did Farah cons when after three weeks' hard tracking we c up close to a herd of elephants and I shot missed, and the elephants marched awa that we never saw them again. In the s way did he consent when in a year of dro news was brought him from Somaliland half his camels had perished, and when I him of Denys Finch-Hatton's death: "G great."

It is a general notion among Christians
Mohammedanism is more intolerant t
Christianity, but such is not my own perience. There were three great prophe Nebbes—Farah told me: Mohammed, J and Moses. He would not recognize Chri the Son of God, for God could have no sc the flesh, but he would agree that He no human father. He named Him Isa Mariammo. About Mariammo he much, praising her beauty and virginity—had, he said, been walking in her moth garden when an angel had brushed her sh der with his wing; through this she had ceived. He smacked his own small son S because he repeated some words of a about the Virgin which naughty Kikuyu from the Scotch mission had taught him.

When in the 'thirties I was staying in south of England with the Earl of Winchi the painter John Philpot came down to p
the portrait of my hostess, who was very lo
He had traveled much in North Africa, on an afternoon when we were walking gether in the park he recounted to me a perience of his from there.

> Friendship is the highest degree of perfection in society. MONTAIGNE

In the First World War, he said, he had a shell shock or a nervous breakdown would never feel sure that he was doing he ought to do.

"When I was painting a picture," he plained, "I felt that I ought to make up bank account. When I was making up bank account, I felt that I ought to go f walk. And when, in a long walk, I had got miles away from home, I realized that I o to be, at this very moment, in front of easel. I was constantly in flight, an exile ev where.

"It happened that I and my African ser in our travels came to a small North Afr village. It stood in a flat plain, and was not but a number of mud-built huts with an broad mud-built wall round it. The only ticular thing that I remember about it great multitude of storks, a stork's nest o most every house. But at the moment wh had come through the gate in the wall I that this was a place of refuge. There c upon me a strange, blissful calm, a happi like what you feel when a high fever le
you. 'Here,' I thought, 'one can remain.'

"I stayed in the village for a fortnight the time in that same sweet peace of soul giving no thought to the past or the future a day when I was painting a picture, an man, a priest, came up and spoke to m hear from your servant,' he said, 'that have finished your wanderings and will with us, since here you have found
I answered him that it was as he said, that I could not explain to myself why it sh be so.

" 'Master,' said the old man, 'I shall exp it to you. There is something special a our village, things have happened here have happened nowhere else. It came ab not when I was a boy myself but when father was a boy of twelve, and he has rel it to me as it happened. Turn your eyes t gate in the wall behind us. Above it you see a ledge, where two men can sit, for in days watchmen were here looking out for that might approach across the plain. To very ledge above the gate came the Pro himself and your prophet, Jesus Christ.
met here to talk together of man's lot on e and of the means by which the people of

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Just like Mommy does

Little mothers, too, agree that milk will pour so easily.

From Pure-Pak with its handy spout no drips as milk flows smoothly out.

It's shatterproof; forget the mop should little fingers let it drop.

So fill the coupon out today,
take life easy the Pure-Pak way.

At your store or at your door

Pure-Pak
® EX-CELL-O CORP. DETROIT, MICH.
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER

PURE-PAK DIVISION, EX-CELL-O CORPORATION

CLIP THIS COUPON AND LEAVE IT FOR YOUR MILKMAN

Dear Milkman:

Please start delivering our milk in modern Pure-Pak cartons.

Signed _____

"IT POURS LIKE A PITCHER"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

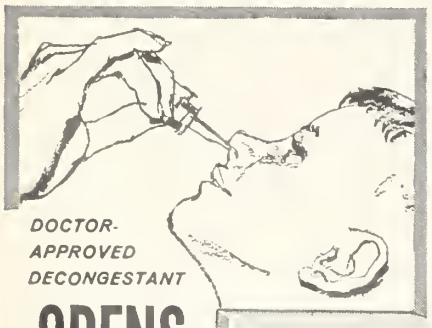
earth might be helped. Those standing down below could not hear what they said to each other. But they could see the Prophet, as he explained his thoughts, striking his hand against his knee, and thereupon Jesus Christ lifting His hand and answering him. They sat there, deep in talk, till night fell and the people could no longer see them. And it is from that time, master, that our village has got peace of heart to give away.'

"I wonder," said Mr. Philpot, "whether a clergyman of the Church of England would have told that tale."

NEW! SPECIAL FORMULA

Cherry Tasting ST. JOSEPH COUGH SYRUP FOR CHILDREN with amazing Supressin "breaks circuit" to "cough reflex center"—*

CONTROLS COUGHS



DUE TO COLDS

UP TO 6 FULL HOURS

Up to twice as effective as codeine! Safe, non-narcotic. St. Joseph Cough Syrup For Children with Supressin acts through blood stream to block cough impulses from the brain. Controls coughs in a new scientific way not possible with ordinary cough syrups.

Cools, soothes irritated throat, loosens sticky mucus for easy expectoration; helps to open breathing passages. Child gets sleep to speed quick recovery.

DOCTOR-APPROVED DECONGESTANT

OPENS STUFFY NOSE

ST. JOSEPH NOSE DROPS FOR CHILDREN with NEO-SYNEPHRINE AQUEOUS and ISOTONIC CONTAINS NO OIL Plough, Inc.

CHECKS SNIFFLES, SNEEZES

Physicians recommend St. Joseph Nose Drops For Children because they contain approved decongestant Neo-Synephrine,* plus other preferred medication.

Quickly shrinks swollen membranes, opens stuffy nose, checks sniffles and sneezes. Your child breathes easier, is more comfortable . . . right away!

Children welcome these specialized nose drops because they contain no oil—no sting. Pleasant to use.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER'S SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

*Reg. trademark of Winthrop-Stearns, Inc.

From the makers of St. Joseph Aspirin For Children

Like all Mohammedans, Farah was without fear. Europeans call the Islamitic view of life fatalism. I myself do not think that the Prophet's followers see the happenings of life as predestined and therefore inescapable. They are fearless because confident that what happens is the best thing.

Farah, in one of my first years in Africa, stood beside me when a wounded lion charged—"charged home," as hunters say, meaning that now only death will stop him. Farah had no rifle with him, and at that time, I believe, but slight faith in my marksmanship. But he did not move, I do not think that he winced. Good luck had it that with my second shot I hit the lion so that he rolled over like a hare, then Farah very quietly walked up to him and inspected him.

At a later time, though, to my surprise I heard Farah speak in deep admiration of my skill with a rifle. During one of our long safaris, when in the morning after a night's shooting I was still in bed in my tent, a young Englishman who had his camp some miles south of ours, and who had heard about us from the natives, came over to inquire about water and game and to have company. He and Farah were talking together outside the tent, and I could follow their conversation through the canvas. "What kind of bwana are you out with?" the Englishman asked. "Is he a good shot, and are you getting anything?" "I am with no bwana," Farah answered, "but with a mem-sahib from a distant country. And she never misses a thing."

On this occasion Farah seemed to enjoy talking about me. Generally the Somali will not discuss women and you cannot make them tell you of their wives and daughters.

It is a strange thing that I should have this taboo in me still. At times, when people speak or write about me, I feel that I am breaking my covenant with Farah.

When the Prince of Wales, the present Duke of Windsor, in 1928 came on his first visit to Kenya, I had been invited by my friend Joanie Grigg, the governor's wife, to stay for a week at Government House. I felt that this was an opportunity of bringing the cause of the natives, in the matter of their taxation, before the prince, and was happy about this chance of getting the ear of the future King of England. Only, I said to myself, it will have to be done in a pleasant manner. For if it does not amuse him he will do nothing about it.

As I sat beside the prince at dinner I cautiously tried to turn his interest the way I wanted. I had been describing the big ngomas on the farm, and as he said good night to me he added, "I should like to dine with you on Friday and to see such a ngoma." This was Tuesday night, and for the next two days the prince would be up at Nanyuky for the races.

When I came up to my rooms in Government House I found Farah there waiting for orders for the morrow, for you always bring your own servant with you when staying in the houses of your friends. I said to him, "Something terrible has happened to us, Farah. The prince is coming out on Friday to dine and to see our people dance. And you know that they will not dance at this time of the year." For these ngomas were ritual dances connected with the harvest, and all settlers knew well enough that in this matter the natives would rather die than break with a sacred law of a thousand years.

Farah was as deeply shaken by the news as I myself. For a few minutes he was struck dumb and turned into stone. In the end he spoke. "If it be indeed so, mem-sahib," he said, "to my mind there is only one thing for us to do. I shall take the car and go round to the big chiefs. I shall speak to them and tell them that now they must come to help you. I shall remind them that three months ago you helped them." I had had the luck to be able to assist the natives in a matter between them and the government concerning salt rocks to which they had formerly brought their cattle to lick salt. "But then," Farah added with some misgiving, "I can do nothing about this dinner. You will have to look after that, with Kamante, mem-sahib." There was some distance and hardly any roads between the manyattas of the great chiefs, and the old men would seize this opportunity to talk. I answered, "Nay, give no thought to that. I and Kamante will be able to look after it. For I think that you are right and that this is the best thing we can do."

I returned to the farm to make preparations for Friday with a somewhat heavy heart, and Farah drove out from it, an ambassador on a tricky mission. When on the morning of Friday he was not back, the entire household, preparing the lobster up from Mombasa, the spur fowl brought in by Masai Morani, and Kamante's Cumberland sauce for the ham, was dead silent. It would be a dark, eternal shame to our house and to all of us, were the prince to come out to see a ngoma, and we to have no ngoma to show him.

But already at eight or nine o'clock our own young men and girls of the farm began to hang round the house, in the mysterious way of the natives aware that great things were about to happen. During the next few hours dance-loving young people from farms farther away followed, coming up the long avenue in small groups. Kamante, for once taking an optimistic view of a situation, remarked to me that this was like the time when the locusts came: one by one, then a number together, then in the end more than we would be able to count. At eleven o'clock we heard the car coming up the drive asthmatically. She was all plastered in mud and dust and Farah himself as he stepped out of her seemed to have faded, in the way of dark people when thoroughly exhausted. I felt that all through these two nights he must have sat up in unceasing palaver with the old chiefs. Yet at the very first glance we all knew him to have come back victorious.

"Mem-sahib," he said in a voice almost as hoarse as that of the car, "they are coming. They are coming all of them, and they are bringing their young men and their virgins."

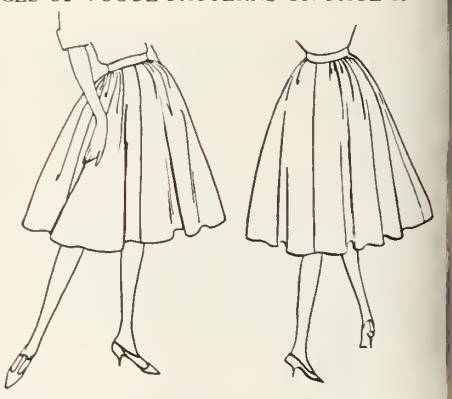
They did indeed follow close on the track of the car, swarming, as Kamante had predicted, locustlike, a stream of supple, fiery young people of both sexes, set on dancing, should ... cost them their lives. The small groups of ... old chief and his aged counselors, in ric... heavy monkeyskin cloaks, advanced in stat... isolated from the common crowd by ten fe... of empty space before and after them.

That night there were between two and thr... thousand dancers at the dancing place by ... house. The moon was full, and there was ... breath of wind; the circle of small fires blaz... and glowed a long way into the woods a... sent up thin columns of smoke toward the sk... It was a fine ngoma; I have seen no finer an... where.

The prince made the tour of the forest ba... room, stopping to speak to the old chiefs o... after the other. He spoke to them in Swahi... and they, hanging on to their sticks, gave h... their answers keenly from smiling, toothl... mouths, after which, for obvious reasons, ... conversation ceased. He made an impressi... on the ancients; afterward they liked to spe... about him. Africans laugh for reasons differe... from those of Europeans, most often fro... sheer spite but often also from mere content... for a long time they laughed when they spol... of the prince, as if we had been discussing ... very precious baby. I believe that the prin... himself was pleased with his ngoma.

A fortnight later I again sent for the Kiku... chiefs. I had, I said to them, on the day of t... ngoma found myself in a difficult position... had asked them to help me and they h... helped me, now I wanted to thank them. ... handed over a present to each of them, but ... now I do not remember whether of a p... ticularly fine rug or a goat.

A very old man, after they had had a f... minutes to let my message sink into the... came up and spoke to me. "Now you ha... told us, msabu," he said, "that on the day ... the great ngoma you found yourself in diffic... position, and you asked us to help you and ...



CONTINUED ON PAGE 1...

Holiday Separates

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 69

Vogue Design No. 9810. Blouse; 10–18 (31–38); 75c. Version shown requires ¾ yard of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9185. "Easy to Make" blouse; 10–20 (31–40); 60c. Version shown requires 1⅞ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9925. "Very Easy to Make" skirts; 24–30 waist measure; 60c. Either version shown requires 2⅝ yards of 45″ fabric without nap or 2 yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 26 waist.

"...to keep Ruthie going all morning long

I usually give her a good hot oatmeal breakfast... oatmeal's easy enough to fix and it seems to stay with her 'til lunch...I do think it makes us both feel better..."

(from a taped interview with a Buffalo, N.Y. housewife)

YOU KNOW YOU'VE DONE YOUR BEST_WITH HOT QUAKER OATS OR MOTHER'S OATS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

helped you. Now you wanted to thank us, so you have given each of us a present. May we now say something to you?" This is a common address with natives; you cannot well refuse the request, but after it you will have to be prepared for anything. I told the old man that he was free to say to me what he liked. "Msabu," he said with much weight and satisfaction, "I shall, then, like to tell you something of which among ourselves we have talked much, and about which we are happy. We think that on the night when the Toto a Soldani came here to see our young men and virgins dance, among the msabus present you had on the nicest frock. It pleased our hearts, msabu, it still pleases our hearts when we think about it. For we all think that here, every day on the farm, you are terribly badly dressed."

I did not contradict him. Generally on the farm I wore old khaki slacks stained with oil, mud and fouling. My people had dreaded, on a historical occasion on the farm and at a moment when I had called upon them to do their utmost, to see me let them down.

For the sake of my female readers I shall here insert that at the time of the prince's visit I had not been to Europe for four years and could have no real idea as to what fashions there were like. So I asked the house in Paris which had my measures and was to make my frock to follow their own notions about what would be truly chic. They had had the good sense to make me, in the heyday of the chemise frock, a so-called robe-de-style not likely to go out of fashion, with a hooped skirt of great fullness, in silver brocade. I think it pleased my people to see me, among the lank women of the dinner party, suddenly swell out to an unexpected voluminousness.

As now the old chiefs and I in our talk together had got on to that very pleasant theme of my frock, I wanted to hear more of what they thought about it. But at this moment Farah stepped onto the stage, followed by Kamante carrying a wooden bowl that contained tombacco—snuff—for my guests. He looked approving but stern. He was not insensitive to popularity, but he was resolved on keeping the Kikuyu in their place, and me in mine.

"Wait a little, Farah," I said. "I am talking with the old people, they are talking with me."

"No, mem-sahib," said Farah. "No. Now these Kikuyus have said enough about this frock. Now it is time that they have this tombacco."

Then came the hard times on the farm, and my certainty that I could not keep it. And then began my ever-repeated travels to Nairobi with such sorry aims as keeping my creditors quiet, obtaining a better price for the farm and, at the very end, after I had in reality lost the farm and become, so to say, a tenant in my own house, securing for my squatters the piece of land in the reserve where according to their wish they could remain together. It took a long time before I could make the government consent to my scheme. On these expeditions Farah was always with me.

And now it happened that he unlocked and opened chests of which till then I had not known, and displayed a truly royal splendor. He brought out silk robes, gold-embroidered waistcoats, and turbans in glowing and burning reds and blues, or all white—which is a rare thing to see and must be the real gala headdress of the Somali—heavy gold rings and knives in silver and ivory-mounted sheaths, with a riding whip of giraffe hide inlaid with gold, and in these things he looked like the Caliph Harun al-Rashid's own bodyguard. He followed me, very erect, at a distance of five feet, where I walked, in my old slacks and patched shoes, up and down Nairobi streets. There he and I became a true unity, as picturesque, I believe, as that of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. There he lifted up me and himself to a classic plane, such as that of which the Norwegian poet Wergeland speaks:

Death follows the happy man like a stern master,
The unfortunate like a servant,
Who is ever ready to receive his master's cloak and mask.

When I had sold all the contents of my house, my paneled rooms became sounding boards. If I sat down on one of the packing cases containing things to be sent off, now my only furniture, voices and tunes of old rang through the nobly bare room intensified, clear. When during these months a visitor came to the farm, Farah stood forth, holding open the door to the empty rooms as if he had been doorkeeper to an imperial palace.

No friend, brother or lover, no nabob suddenly presenting me with the amount of money needed to keep the farm, could have done for me what my servant Farah then did. Even if I had nothing else for which to be grateful to him—but that I have got, and more than I can set down here—I should still for the sake of these months, now, thirty years after, and as long as I live, be in debt to him. END

The best men in any profession are essentially teachers.
CURTIS BOK
I TOO NICODEMUS
(PUBLISHED BY ALFRED A. KNOPF, INC.)

Nylon Tricot pajama trimmed with embroidery, buttons, and bow... in pink or blue/Toddlers $4, Girls $5

Her Majesty

fashioned with flair...fashioned with care...fashioned for young girls everywhere

Slips • Petticoats • Panties • Sleepwear • Robes • Her Majesty Underwear Co., Mauldin, S.C.

FOR CUTS
AS WELL AS BURNS
UNGUENTINE
BOOSTS NATURE'S HEALING POWER

Stops pain fast, speeds healing a no plain antiseptic can!

1. Nature sends healing serum droplets wound surface. But tension often kee droplets apart; germs may get through cause infection, slow healing.

2. But, Unguentine instantly spreads n ture's serum, creates a protective blan to lock out germs and heal faster th nature alone.

UNGUENTINE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

BOYS AND GIRLS...
WANT A BIKE!

YOU can easily earn a deluxe bicycle just l this beauty . . . This exciting brilliantly finis bicycle is equipped with gleaming chrome rims headlight, whitewall tires, chain guard and r carrier—and the boy's and girl's models come three sizes—20", 24" and 26".

To earn YOUR bike, send us seven 4-y LADIES' HOME JOURNAL subscriptions at the full U. S. price of $11.00 each to persons o side your own home. Both new and renewals co but not your personal or personal gift subscripti Print the subscribers' names and addresses on p paper and mail with coupon. We'll arrange prompt shipment of your bicycle.

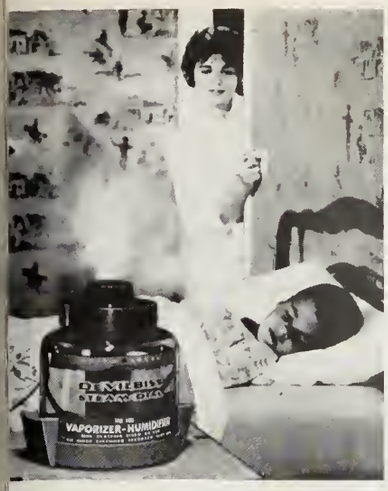
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
729 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

I have sold_____subscriptions to persons outsi my home. Enclosed are the orders and the f remittance of $_____.

Please send my bicycle to:

Name_____

Address_____

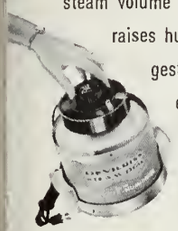


City_____Zone____State_____

Check model and size desired

☐ Boy's ☐ Girl's ☐ 20" ☐ 24" ☐ 2

This offer good in Continental U. S. only, un March 31, 1961.



Sorry, no bicycles may be sold for cash.

A NEW KIND OF STEAM VAPORIZER

when colds strike,

Your child will sleep and so will you . . . if you use Steam-Dial®. . . the new vaporizer that regulates steam volume for fast relief. Steam-Dial raises humidity . . . breaks up congestion . . . makes breathing easier. . . . Ask your local druggist. DeVilbiss Steam-Dial—$9.95. Steams 'round the clock.

THE DEVILBISS CO.
SOMERSET, PA. • BARRIE, ONT.

America's Most Popular Nurser

More mothers use evenflo than all other nurses combined . . . according to independent surveys

Smoother feeding
Sterile storage
Regulated speed
Easier handling

Exclusive Evenflo Sure Seal* Twin Air Valve Nipple-Nurser eliminates excessive air swallowing . . . prevents leakage and nipple pullout.
*Patent Pending

Complete Nursers
Glass . . . . only 25¢
Plastic . . . only 39¢

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

evenflo®
RAVENNA, OHIO

COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE

CELEBRITY SLIM-DOWN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

"Your health?" we asked in a last-ditch attempt to find the sunny side of calorie counting.

"Health? Oh, much, much better," he replied, "I can tell, and my doctor confirms my belief. But ——"

"Thank you very much," we said, concluding the interview in the knowledge we mustn't press our luck too far.

"The times I really have to watch my weight are after the babies are born," says beautiful Ursula Thiess, wife of Robert Taylor and mother of four children ranging in ages from 17 years to 1 year. Ursula, who is 5'7" tall, "big-boned," and who generally maintains a weight of 127 pounds, admits to postnatal hip and waist expansion. To counteract it, she immediately cuts down on calories after each baby, and within weeks after they are born she enrolls in a gym course. "I sign up for a two-month course," she says, "go three days a week for a 30-to-45-minute exercise session. And I really work out, doing exercises to cover the entire body with emphasis on my weak spots." For standing exercises (bends and stretches) Ursula accelerates their effectiveness by holding two-pound weights in each hand. (At home, two-pound salt boxes do the trick.) However, the two exercises Ursula has found to help her most are ones she can do lying down. They are:

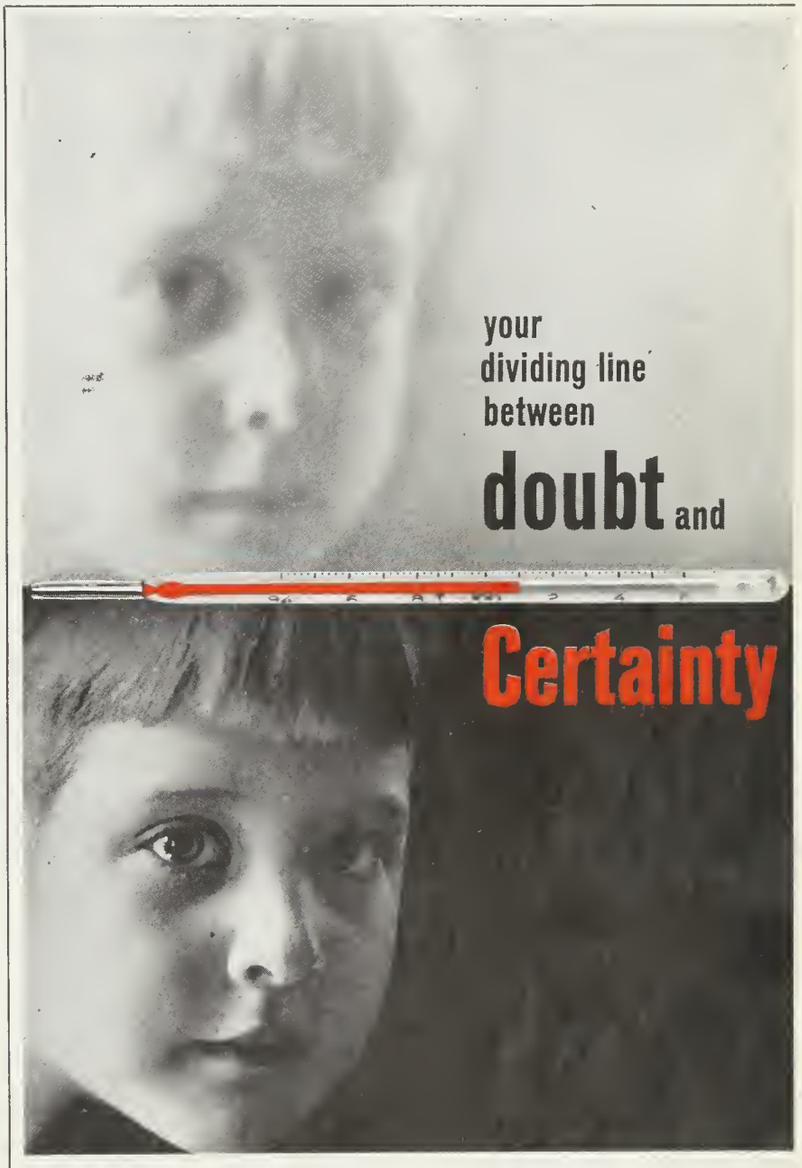
For a flatter, firmer abdomen: Lie flat on back, arms relaxed at sides, legs and feet together. Without using arms for support, s-l-o-w-l-y lift legs, knees straight, as high as possible (work up to a 90° angle to floor), then s-l-o-w-l-y lower legs to floor. Repeat 3 or 4 times in beginning, gradually work up to 10 or 15 or as many as you can do comfortably and without fatigue.

For tinier waist, trimmer hips and thighs: Lie flat on back, arms stretched overhead, hands grasping something (legs of chair or table) for help in holding upper body still. Knees flexed. Keeping shoulders and back as flat against floor as possible, swing flexed knees first over and down to touch right side of floor, then over and down to touch left side of floor. Repeat 3 times each side, gradually work up to as many "swings" as you can do comfortably and without fatigue.

"With all that exercising, Ursula gets so strong I have to stop her!" exclaims Robert Taylor, whose own weight-consciousness has kept him at a trim "175 pounds for the past twenty years." How does he do it? All husbands take note: "Ursula and I both love good food—and that includes rich food—but neither of us eats a lot. If we have mashed potatoes and gravy, or chili and beans, or pie or cake, we relish it, but in small amounts." In addition, the Taylors run two large ranches, one in California, one in Wyoming, each demanding quite strenuous physical activity on both their parts. "Monday through Friday we are up at 6:15 A.M. In addition to keeping our hands in the actual running of the ranches, we ride horseback regularly," says the man of the house, "while Ursula takes on the main charge of the children and gets plenty of gardening in to boot."

In other words, the Taylors practice what all knowledgeable figure experts preach: "Eat well, but in moderation, and get plenty of physical exercise."

"Keep physically active every day and you're bound to stay slim," says Ginger Rogers, whose fabulous figure is as pretty today as it was 20, even 30, years ago.



Ginger is 5'4½" tall, weighs 121 pounds—"117 when I'm working hard"—and has these measurements: bust, 37"; waist, 23¼"; hips, 37".

Her secret? "I'm a sports bum. I love tennis and play three times a week, even when I'm exhausted after a day's work. Physical activity refreshes me, and gives me new energy. I swim, I walk, I dance, I work. I have to keep busy to keep happy. Slowing down during the day is not in my nature, any more than eating is a hobby.

"To me, a leisurely lunch is the most boring meal in the world. I couldn't possibly be happy taking one or two hours to sit over a meal in the middle of the day when there are so many more interesting things to do—places to go, people to see. Of course I do eat lunch, but quickly. I pick up a bite from the refrigerator—cold meat, a lovely whole tomato, fresh fruit juice, skim milk."

In view of Ginger's emphasis on physical activity, she is able to eat heartily without gaining weight. For instance, for breakfast she might have orange juice, soft-cooked eggs, toast with jam, coffee with cream. Dinner, California style, is always prefaced with a "huge mixed salad tossed lightly with dressing." (Having a salad before a main course is an appetite appeaser for any figure-minded woman.) After the salad comes a steak or chops, calf's liver or brook trout, a fresh vegetable, and usually a light dessert. "But I adore ice cream and eat it often," Ginger says. "When I do eat the so-called 'fattening foods,' I more than make up for them with exercise. They never have a chance to work into fat for me.

"Maybe I was born to be busy. But I think all women can acquire a taste for physical activity. I know one thing: I'll never take time to sit down and become a vegetable!" END

All thermometers look alike—not all are accurate. A thermometer can lose accuracy with age due to unseen changes in the glass. But B-D thermometers are "seasoned" by a special process which assures retained accuracy. Each thermometer is subject to the same standards of exactness as all B-D surgical instruments. Be certain you have a B-D thermometer in your home.

Ask your pharmacist for the economical FAMILY TWIN-PAK—2 B-D thermometers at a special money-saving price—and ask for FREE new informative booklet, "FACTS ABOUT FEVER" (or write B-D, Dept. L).

B-D

FEVER THERMOMETERS

another B-D consumer product...Hostess rubber gloves—made with the traditional quality of B-D surgeons' gloves. BECTON, DICKINSON AND COMPANY • RUTHERFORD, NEW JERSEY

Hunt...for the best

Hunt's Heavenly Peaches

HER DEAREST WISH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 52

've known that for years," I told her. e got everything a woman wants."

he raised her tiny eyebrows and rolled her at me in exasperation. "Suppose I start all : You are today the most fabulously lucky an in the world. I am a fairy, blue suit and have appeared in ectoplasmic form so that can see me. Every hundred years I do this one person. Can you figure out what I am ing up to?"

he stopped and looked at me expectantly. 'm not sure," I said, sort of feeling my along. "But if there is anything I can do you, I'd be awfully glad to do it. I never a fairy around before, you know. Would like something to eat or drink? The coffee esh and hot—it always is around here."

he threw back her head and laughed, and sound was lovely, like those glass chimes her used to hang on the porch for the ze to tinkle.

People are not usually concerned with g a fairy a favor, young lady," she said. ked that "young lady.") "They are usually ty quick to figure the other way around. ay, this very hour—you are to have any granted." could only sit there and look stupid. (You understand by this time, can't you, why I hesitated to tell any of my friends what pened to me? I have sat with them through ral bridge sessions since and never said word. They probably think Bill and I found a new vitamin pill. I can't even Bill or the children. But I'm having a ball, mmy expresses it, just writing it all down.)

Take your time." She smiled patiently. n't rush at it and then perhaps later wish rently. Just remember, this is a big deal. nce-in-a-lifetime thing. You make a wish I make it come true."

couldn't stand that expectant look any er. "I wouldn't know what to wish for."

here are lots of things to want," she ted out. "Money, power, health—the abil- o paint, or sing, or dance like Pavlova? last woman I talked to wanted four chil- and felt she couldn't wait to have them at a time. I gave her two sets of twins. It seemed such a ridiculous thing to want that I never did go back to check on how she got along. She probably thought they were wonderful."

"You sent her twins? How? I mean, did you leave them on her doorstep in baskets?"

"Don't be ridiculous. The whole matter went through regular channels and looked perfectly normal to the public. Even her husband didn't know there was any hanky-panky. Nine months, and a double bundle from heaven. Ten months later, another double-header. Probably the woman herself thought I was just brought on by indigestion and that the cause of it all was in the other side of the bed. Oh, well, you'll probably rationalize me right out of existence too."

"Well, I wouldn't want four more children. I have three already and I'm awfully fond of them."

"How about money? Lots of money. Enough to buy anything in the world you want. An air-conditioned limousine, the biggest and best. Nassau or Jamaica in the winter. Maids to do your bidding. Fabulous furs."

She reached back on the hassock and picked up a tiny fur coat, so soft and smooth it might have been made of spun honey. She stroked it and held it to her chin. I itched to touch it, too, but I do not envy women who stroke furs and croon to them. I think how lucky are we who have held a baby's head up under our chin and crooned a little from pure happiness over its softness.

"I really don't want furs very much," I told her. "I couldn't go to Jamaica or Nassau in the winter, because the children have to be in school. A new car would be nice, but our old station wagon will haul a whole Scout troop with no worry about damage and when I scrape the white side walls on the curb as I park no one says anything because they aren't white any more anyway."

"What about jewels?"

"My engagement ring is a pearl, but it was Bill's mother's and it means more to me than a new diamond would."

"Far be it from me to talk you into anything," said the fairy, carefully considering her manicure. "Health?"

I crossed my fingers carefully, as I always do before I brag. "We're so healthy. Look," I hedged, "how about that coffee? We could drink it here by the fire. Maybe if I had a cup of coffee I could figure out what I want to wish for."

She gave me a sharp glance, and then she smiled and agreed that she would like a small amount, very hot and very black.

I flew to the kitchen, leaving her sitting there on the hassock, apparently getting ready to light a cigarette. I didn't stop to make sure, for I had had about all I could take for a little while. (If I were reading a story like this, right about here I would conclude that in the last paragraph the human would stretch her arms and find she had gone to sleep over her brass andirons. This time I'd be wrong. No one had been asleep.)

I looked around my kitchen, so calm and peaceful, and no fairies sitting around. I almost patted my silver cooky tray as I got it out for some brownies. I reached for two of my best cups and saucers, for it isn't every day you serve a fairy.

Then I remembered a few weeks before Ann had brought down the fragile china doll-size tea set which Bill, that long-ago Christmas, had said wasn't fair to give such a little girl but which I held out for because I wanted her to know what beautiful things were like even if some broke. So now I reached around and found a cup and saucer small enough and pretty enough for that very sophisticated fairy who was sitting on the edge of my red velvet hassock, smoking a cigarette.

I paused to wonder a moment if the cigarette had a filter tip, and the amusement I got out of the notion braced me up enough to pour the coffee, put it on a tray with the cookies, take a deep breath and one last look at that quiet, normal kitchen of mine, then push on through the swinging doors to the living room and my visitor.

There she sat, her hands clasped about the knee of one crossed leg and her foot swinging. She was obviously pleased with the tiny cup and saucer, and seemed to get real pleasure out of the coffee. She picked up a crumb of a cooky.

"This is the first time I ever tried mortal food. It always looked mortal dull to me. But people seem to get a great deal of pleasure out of consuming it. You must be considered a pretty good cook."

"Thank you. My family thinks so, but I'm not, really. If it weren't for those magic mixes ——"

"Magic?" asked the fairy.

"Well, not real magic like you have. They mix up stuff in great barrels and shovel it into little boxes, and when we put water with it and beat hard it turns out cakes and cookies like the ones mother used to wish she could make. It saves a lot of time."

"And what do you do with the time you save?" She really seemed to want to know. "Anything that really inspires you? What takes hold of your heart and mind and makes you feel that everything is worth the effort?"

You can't explain to someone like her that what really makes you happy is having your husband come in in the evening and act as if home is the mirage in the desert and you are the queen. Or how you felt yesterday having your daughter put on the aqua-blue dress you had designed just for her and, on her way to a fifth-grade party, stop long enough to say, "It will be the prettiest dress there." You can't tell her how you feel when the children are all asleep for the night and the dog settles down on your feet in such trust that you let numbness set in rather than disturb his sleep.

Said the fairy, "I'm sure you must be happy in your own way; it's just that I don't understand it. Let's get back to this wish business."

"I'd like to talk to Bill about it," I told her.

"Well, you can't," said the fairy. "This is strictly between us girls. Come on now. I've got to fade out of here very shortly. You surely aren't completely satisfied, are you?"

"It's not that I think I have it made," I explained. "It is just that what I lack is sort of basic, and fairy or no fairy, my problem is here to stay."

"Nonsense!" she replied briskly. "Come now. I can do anything. Let's have it."

"What I really want and have always wanted," I began, trying to think this through carefully so that I wouldn't make a mistake, "is hard to put into a single wish, unless you might say that what I wish for is Basic Improvement. Is that possible?"

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Adolescent: someone who doesn't mind being driven unless he's in the family car.

It's amazing how voluble a shy child becomes with potential buyers to whom his parents anticipate selling their house.

A wise young couple once resolved that when arguments arose they would pitch in and clean up the house before saying a word. Just as they had anticipated, working together eased their tempers and hastened their forgiveness. And they always lived happily . . . in the neighborhood's most immaculate house.

Experience: the alphabet for reading life.

In a well-managed house, some things should be allowed to wear out . . . unless you want to buy your cleaning cloths.

Overheard: "She thinks the stove won't work unless she's there to turn it on."

The clothes dryer has eliminated an important line of information on a new neighbor.

A mother's day is a constant mound of activity.

One thing that never can be replaced once it is lost: wonder.

The older one grows, the younger older people seem.

In family life, it isn't the dawn that comes up like thunder, but the children.

The brand-new parents in our neighborhood had indigestion the other day; their baby was off its diet.

You're an old-timer if you can remember when all colors of a flower came in one package.

"It is putting things back on things other people leave off that takes my time," opined one mother; "top off the tooth paste, top off the milk bottle, lid from the peanut-butter jar, lid from the ——"

Unless a wife places value upon herself, a husband will regard her casually as part of himself and his equipment.

HERE'S THE COOKBOOK WOMEN HAVE WANTED FOR 75 YEARS!

Ladies' Home JOURNAL
COOKBOOK
New and Basic Recipes
Edited by Carol Truax only $4.95 ($5.95 for the DeLuxe thumb-indexed edition)

Beginner or experienced cook, you'll love the all-new LADIES' HOME JOURNAL COOKBOOK. Here are some of the unique features of this first and only cookbook compiled by LADIES' HOME JOURNAL:

- More than 2,500 recipes
- Over 100 color photos
- Money-saving shopping tips
- More than 300 casserole dishes
- Bonus chapters on diets, entertaining, kitchen design
- Over 100 sauces
- Cross-indexing—charts—graphs
- 728 big pages

And it's only $4.95 for the regular edition, or $5.95 for the DeLuxe thumb-indexed edition. But hurry—prices will be going up when this special offer expires. To order your copy (and don't forget to include Christmas gifts), use the handy coupon below, see your favorite bookstore or call the number listed here for your area.

In and around . . . Call

Baltimore, Md.	Mulberry	5-3300
Boston, Mass.	Hancock	6-6666
Chicago, Ill.	Dearborn	2-5700
Cleveland, Ohio	Superior	1-7273
Detroit, Mich.	Woodward	3-4350
Houston, Texas	Fairfax	3-9381
Los Angeles, Cal.	Hollywood	9-3903
Milwaukee, Wisc.	Broadway	1-1101
New York, N. Y.	Plaza	9-7211
Philadelphia, Pa.	Locust	7-7860
Pittsburgh, Pa.	Atlantic	1-3302
St. Louis, Mo.	Chestnut	1-2222
San Francisco, Cal.	Yukon	2-3337
Washington, D. C.	Republic	7-2121

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
Dept. 4316, Independence Square
Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Please send me _____ copies of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL COOKBOOK
☐ Regular edition @ $4.95
☐ Thumb-indexed edition @ $5.95

Name_____

Street or R.D._____

Town_____

Zone_____State_____

☐ Payment enclosed (Pa. residents please add 4% state sales tax)
☐ Bill me the cost of the edition I've chosen, plus a few cents for postage and handling.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTEE: If you're not completely satisfied, return the book within 7 days and pay nothing—or receive a full refund if you've already paid.

"It is possible," she replied.

"Well then, I would like to be brighter but not enough so to offend anyone. Just bright enough so that the checkbook comes out right each month and I don't get panicky when they ask me for an opinion in a committee meeting. I don't want to rewrite Einstein's theory or know as much about making pictures as Bill does; I just want to be able to do more than be sympathetic and motherly when Jim gets into high school and brings home his schoolwork."

I was beginning to get warmed up to the subject and she looked so interested that I kept going.

"I would like to be more skillful. I'd like to be able to fix my ironing cord myself and drive a nail straight if the boys aren't home. I don't want to do gourmet cooking, but I do wish I could roast a beef without worrying and bake pies like the ones Bill's mother makes. And I wish I were a better mother. Bill says the children will have lots worse than an impatient mother to put up with, and they should learn early."

"Very interesting," said the fairy. "And not impossible at all. Is that all you had in mind?"

"No," I admitted. "I'm coming to the most important part of it all. I wish I were more nearly beautiful."

"Which kind of beauty do you favor?" she asked. "The classic madonna type, the fiery Latin, the doll-faced blonde, or—heaven forbid—do you have some multimeasured, open-mouthed, panting movie siren in mind?"

"Oh, no," I exclaimed quickly, for fear she might wave some sort of magic wand and make me over right then and there. I didn't want Bill coming home that night and taking Marilyn Monroe in his arms. I didn't want her hanging over Jim's bed to tuck in his covers either. Not at that in-between stage he is in. And goodness knows what a woman like that might do to Ann and Billy, even though it was really me in disguise. Probably none of the stuff they say about those sy movie stars is really true, but all the sam I am me. I surely couldn't still be me and l k that different, could I? You see my probl ?

The fairy seemed to sense my confus n. "Take your time," she said. "Now, just w beautiful would you like to be?"

"I still want to be me," I explained. o we can't go too far."

"Where shall we start?" she asked.

"At the top. With my hair," I said. "Le e it the color it is but make it do something o that when I wash it, it will lie the way yo s does and I won't look as if I just came in ou f a windstorm. Brighten up my eyes and ta e away these shadows that keep getting dar r. Pull my facial muscles tighter, but not b k to the way they were at eighteen. Bill says it I'd look pretty silly with the face of a gir f eighteen after all the living we've done. o you see what I mean?"

"I think so," said the fairy. "Go on."

"I'd like to be a couple of inches taller, it I can't ask for that—Bill would never get o r that much of a change. I think women l k so smart in their clothes when they are ab t five-six or five-eight, don't you?"

"I never thought about it that way," d the fairy, glancing down the full length of r six inches.

"If you were a woman, instead of a fairy ——"

"God forbid!" She shuddered.

"I'd expect you to be about that height d like to have arms a little fuller and ankl a

> It is often said by the heedless that we are a conservative species, impervious to new ideas. I have not found it so. I am often appalled at the avidity and credulity with which new ideas are snatched at and adapted without a scrap of sound evidence. People will believe anything that amuses them, gratifies them or promises them some sort of profit.
>
> G. B. SHAW

little smaller. I'd like to be just enough i proved to impress my husband and o enough to look really different."

"That is a fine point you are drawi there," she said. "How much does it take o impress your husband?"

What does impress Bill? We never go a party that he doesn't tell me I'm the prett one there. Every time he comes home he gu s me and tells me that I'm the best thing s seen all day. Even when other women te him aside or come to see him about pictu s, he conveys such pleasant-natured, impersol l interest that only a dope would think she is getting any place with him. Oh, I knew wh impressed Bill; it was just that I have alw s felt a photographer of his ability should l e married a gorgeous model with a real br l.

"It doesn't take much for me to imp s Bill," I tried to explain. "What I want i or offer him more. Last, but most of all, I w t my middle section improved."

"Something like thirty-six–twenty-fo thirty-six? I do get around this world, u know, and I have noticed this positive ob sion you people have for these central-a measurements."

"It's all mixed up with something we l sex appeal," I tried to explain. "A wo n who has those kinds of measurements is m h admired, especially by men."

"I see," said the fairy. "In fact, this bu y creature is about all I do see when I look at the billboards, magazines and newspap s that you people produce in such quan . Personally, I think she is repulsive."

"So do I," I told her. "Bill makes lo y pictures for all kinds of ads and his girls ne r turn out like that. He says a bathing suit s no business trying to sell a typewriter. Bi s a real artist. You should see some of e things he does."

"I'm beginning to think he is quite a ma ," she said, and laughed. I laughed too, tho h it's really the truth. He is quite a man I understand what you want," said the fa y

BORDEN'S VERY BIG ON FLAVOR

Shrimp Dip

Celery Olive Dip

Chutney Dip

Chipped Beef Dip

MAKE NOVEL PARTY DIPS
with the tang of Borden's Fresh Sour Cream

● Shrimp Dip—Blend chopped shrimp, Worcestershire sauce, catsup, salt, with creamy Borden's Sour Cream. ● Celery Olive Dip—Dice stuffed olives, chop celery—add Worcestershire sauce, horse-radish to sour cream. ● Chutney Dip—Simply wonderful. Just mix chutney, salt, curry powder with sour cream. ● Chipped Beef Dip—Chop chipped beef, pimiento, green pepper—add horse-radish and fold them all into luscious Borden's Sour Cream.

Available in Canada in Quebec and Ontario provinces

©1960 THE BORDEN CO

"It's only fair to tell you, though, that you aren't asking very much of a fairy who only comes into sight once a century. Ah, the wishes I have granted! I think I'll just add a diamond ring. You ought to have something to hold in your hand to remember me by."

"Goodness! What would Bill think if he came home and there I was with a great big diamond?"

"I don't operate that way any more," said the fairy. "It created too much shock. I learned better hundreds of years ago. Just remember the lady and her two sets of twins when you find yourself wearing a diamond." She flipped open a magazine on the table. "Here," she said. "If anyone asks, you can tell them you are following this do-it-yourself beauty plan. See—here it says you should brush your hair a hundred strokes a night, here it tells you how to bend to reduce your middle, here is an article on eye care and make-up."

"I've tried those things before," I protested. "I never can make it past two or three days."

"This time you can," said the fairy. "I will be producing the results. You will just be going through the motions to make it look reasonable. Now let's see—your mind. This has to look reasonable too."

I know she would rather just have waved her wand and finished the whole deal in one afternoon, rather than figure out how to accomplish my transformation unnoticed. Suddenly she arose and sort of floated over to the bookcase. About a dozen books appeared on the table beside me.

"There," she said. "If people know that this winter you have actually read all these books through, they will expect you to show signs of intellectual achievement."

"I don't get much time to read any more." I flipped open the books and every one of them I had meant to read but never had. "When the children came along and the ironing got heavy and the house needed dusting, I just about quit. Bill reads a great deal and I sort of depend on him. And then I've got to watching TV, because I'm tired in the evening."

"You'll find that tonight you are not tired. Your wish will start working as soon as I leave and you will read—and understand—all these."

She explained that if I felt the magic was dimming—in fact, she said, if the reading were not pure pleasure—I should rub the diamond ring I would be wearing and everything would be all right.

"One other thing," she said, her face screwed up thoughtfully, her finger to her forehead. "You are going to be a master of languages."

"All at once?"

"Oh, no. Let's see. H'm. Tomorrow morning in the paper you will find a story to the effect that a group of people are going to start learning French together as a social activity. You join them. Later on, you tackle another language, and I will be there too."

She rose, gathered up her little hat and adjusted it properly. She threw her fur about her shoulders in a most elegant way, drew on her gloves, and picked up her purse and umbrella. Every movement was graceful and I was fascinated.

She turned and saw the look on my face. She laughed.

"It's all pure swank. I don't really need a fur any more than I need an umbrella, but I like the total effect. I went through that gauzy-wing, pastel-cobweb period you were referring to, but I got no charge out of that. You should have seen my tunics during the Roman Empire ——"

Her mind came back to me across hundreds of years and thousands of miles. She came over quite close to where I sat on the floor and put her hands one on either side of my face.

"Are you quite sure," she said gently, "that you wouldn't like a lot of money? Or power? Or a golden voice?"

I shook my head no. I was too disturbed to give her my thanks.

"Be happy with your wish."

"I will," I said, but she was gone and I was alone in the living room.

I sat there quite a while, fingering our own books that she had laid at my side, and trying to decide whether I could still get a whiff of her perfume. My polish can was right there by me, so I finished the second cherub, then got to my feet and put my cleaning tools away. I remembered to gather up the cups and wash them and put them away. The children would think I had slipped a cog if they came in and found a doll cup with a drop of coffee still in the bottom.

They were late getting home, according to the arrangements they had made at noon. Billy came in first, and I couldn't help wondering if he would notice anything. Six isn't very old, but Billy is very perceptive. And what were his first words?

"Hey, good-lookin', what's cookin'?" And he gave me a big hug.

I could feel the fairy's magic at work and my heart pounded at my prospects. The years of knowing—and trying to keep secret—that I was really inadequate were all over. I could face my family and the whole world with confidence.

I was feeling mighty gay by the time my two others came in. Ann had a hug for me and Jimmy discussed a problem! I had been of the opinion that he thought eighth-grade arithmetic was not my field, but he asked me what I thought and I found myself telling him. Not only that; what I thought turned out to be exactly right.

"What a brain!" He whistled, and left me mixing my batter in a rosy cloud.

If you have stayed with me this long, you aren't going to be much surprised at anything I tell you at this point. I had just put the blueberry muffins in to bake when I heard the back door open and there was Bill. He is so big and tall and redheaded—so are all three of the children—that he almost fills the doorway, and that is as nice a doorway decoration as I ever hope to see.

He was holding something high above his head, and as I walked over to him he caught me with one arm and with a great, sweeping gesture handed me a ring that had obviously been on muddy ground.

"Jewels beyond compare!" he intoned in a dramatic spoof. "And all for my Beautiful Blond Bride!"

I knew right away what it was.

I took it over to the sink and cleaned it with my vegetable brush. "Bill, this is valuable."

"So are you. You are worth more to me than a king's ransom."

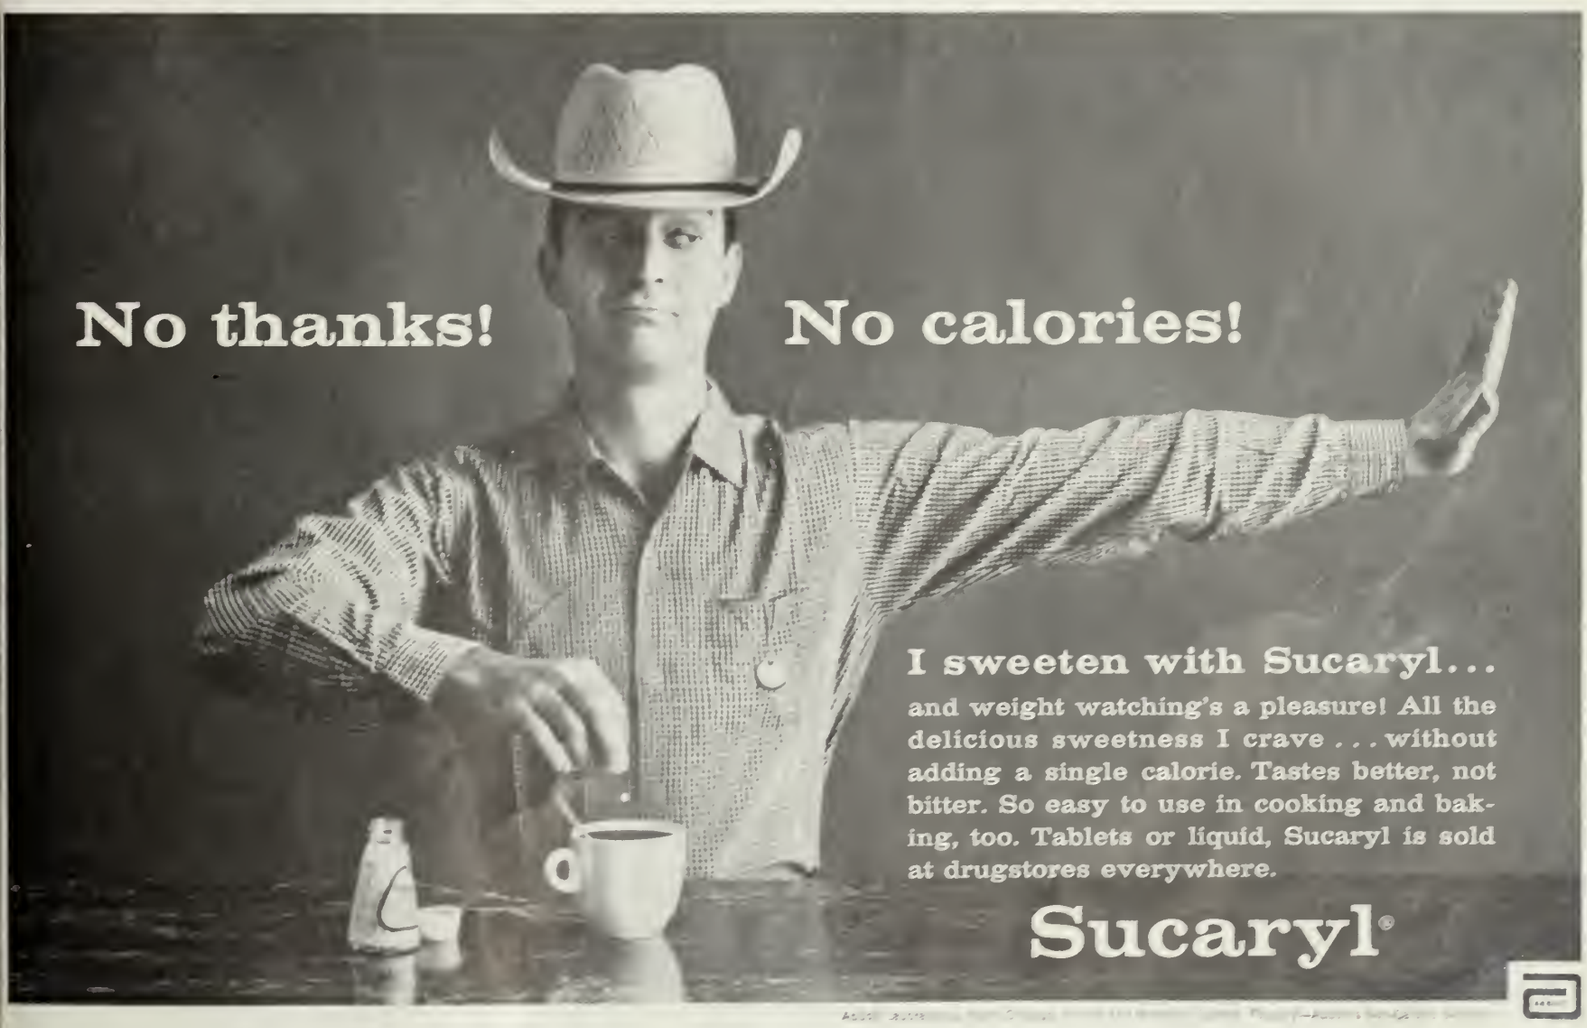
I love Bill's kidding, but I had to know. "Where did you get it?"

"Fact or fiction?" he asked. "Shall I tell you about the pirates I met on the way home? Or the good little fairy? Or shall I admit that I found it on the ground close to our sidewalk?"

The setting was lovely, the center stone huge, and there were two smaller ones on each side. Even Bill opened his eyes a little wider when I held it out for him to look at again.

"It is mighty gorgeous, doll," he said. "So don't get too attached to it. The owner will be looking for it. We will advertise and see what happens."

I knew nothing would. It was the ring the fairy meant me to have.



If we went somewhere and I felt that all the other women had more style, I had only to give my ring a turn and suddenly I knew I was all right. When my French lessons seemed a little difficult, I had only to glance at my finger.

Everything the fairy promised me came true. I made a great show of exercises, reading and such, and there never was a time when anyone seemed astonished or puzzled at the changes in me. It has worked out beautifully.

I often wondered if the fairy ever came back to check on me. I had a feeling she was around yesterday. Bill asked me to come down to the studio and let him start a series of pictures. First he just teased me and said beauty was only relative and that I was a relative of his by marriage. Then he got sort of solemn, and I felt a little prick on my arm that could have been from a small red umbrella.

He said, "I want an honest picture of you. My camera is my eye and beauty is in the eye of the beholder."

END

FIRE!
FIRE!

The Frank Perrons, of New Canaan, Connecticut, didn't know how much they had until they lost it.

Then they discovered the riches of what they had left—courage, friends, family strength.

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART • Photographs by ABBOT MILLS

HOW AMERICA LIVES

On the night of January 5, 1959, an old dog that lives in a house on a wooded country road on the outskirts of New Canaan, Connecticut, began walking uneasily about the living room, barking and behaving altogether oddly. Kimmy, half chow, half Husky, is battered from twelve years of dogfighting. But he has a wide acquaintance up and down Ponus Ridge Road because, as one resident put it, "He loves people." The grown married children of Kimmy's house happened to be at home visiting, nobody was in bed yet, and one of them opened the door to look out.

Across the road, in a big red converted barn that they had bought eight years before, the Frank Perron family were comfortably oblivious of the stir Kimmy was creating at their neighbor's. The four Perron children, all school age, were upstairs in bed. Their father, Frank, had just finished listening to the 11-o'clock news and gone to bed himself, which placed the time at not quite 11:30. His wife, Judy, was feeding her two aged Siamese cats in the kitchen, and in the living room her seventeen-year-old nephew, Andy Briggs, who was visiting the Perrons, was typing a high-school paper. The weather outside was vile. A hard, cold gale had been blowing for several days, with gusts of up to seventy-five miles an hour, and the temperature was five above zero. Suddenly, over the rattling of the windows, came a buffeting at the front door. The Perrons' own dog began to bark. Judy says, "It scared the wits out of me. I don't know why. I called Frank." While Frank emerged from the bedroom wearing only a pajama top, Judy opened the door. She recognized Bob Callanan, the son-in-law of the family across the road. "Your garage is on fire," he told them.

Judy says, "Everybody thought of the children first—their bedrooms were at the garage end. We all three charged up the stairs, getting in each other's way, and I said, 'I'll get them.' Frank went down to the cellar to get the fire extinguisher he kept there—he'd been worrying about our furnace being overworked in the cold weather that very evening—and I brought the children down. They were in their night clothes; the only one who had anything on his feet was Peter, who wore sleepers." The son of their neighbors, John McKernan, had stayed behind his brother-in-law to telephone New Canaan's volunteer fire company, but he arrived just as Judy was shepherding her children out the door. As they went by the coat closet she paused to put a coat on each one, then turned them over to John, who led them across to the safety of his mother's house.

Fire started outdoors during night of gale winds, left no evidence of cause. Probable explanation: a silent, deadly spark from a wind-broken wire.

Fire ate away third and most of second floors, sparing only unlived-in basement.

New two-story house has downstairs living area, back yard is much more accessible.

Judy's next thought was the cats, and while she persisted in looking vainly for her cat carrier (it was out on loan), and while Bob Callanan, who was standing by, urged her to concentrate on more valuable objects (they could hear a "tremendous crackling" by now), Frank and Andy were at the garage. The blaze was at the corner nearest the house, where a switch box was located. Frank turned his extinguisher on the flames, but forty-five-year-old walls burned merrily. (He later found his chemical extinguisher was a kind that doesn't work well out-of-doors anyway.) Car-conscious Andy slipped boldly past Frank and backed out the Perrons' '48 station wagon (the paint around the gas tank was later found to have blistered). When Andy reappeared Frank forbade him to rescue the jeep still in the garage (it exploded a few minutes later). Sick at heart, he saw the flames leap in the wind across four feet of space to the house. Andy ran next door to get a length of garden hose, but the outside water was turned off for the winter. Anyway, "no little hose was going to do the trick at all." Just as Frank was facing the fact that the fire was beyond him, the first fire truck rolled into the driveway. Together he and Andy ran back into the house to see what they could do.

The enormous structure that the Perrons lived in had been built as a carriage house on a large estate in 1913. A hundred feet by thirty-five, it had been converted into a dwelling by the New Canaan builder who had sold it to the Perrons. The old barn made a house of grand design, with a thirty-five-foot living room, great reaches of unusable space, and a fuel bill of over $1000 a year, but the Perrons loved it. Built on a bank, it had three levels. The lowest level faced backward, across three acres of meadowland to the Mill River. The second was at street level and contained most of the family rooms. The third story had two bedrooms and a bath that didn't even fill up one end. The rest of the third floor was great, drafty emptiness—what Judy called "my seventy-five-foot haymow."

When friend told Peter that he might have burned in his bed, Peter said, "Oh no, daddy wouldn't have let that happen to us." Frank still smelled of smoke two days after the fire.

It was this empty space—plus the weather—that proved decisive. The first firemen, working inside the house, hoped to control the fire on the second floor. But at a critical moment water pressure in their hose dropped away. Precious minutes went by before it was discovered a hose coupling had frozen. The flames rose to the dry third floor, went through the bedrooms from which the children had been removed, and swept into the storage area. From there they began to consume the house from the third floor down. This meant that for a while the second floor was safe. Judy stayed for about fifteen minutes, and Frank and a growing body of men were in and out for about half an hour. But it also meant there was no longer any hope of saving the house. It was a question of saving anything.

After Judy had finally stuffed her cats into a picnic hamper, she began to listen to Bob Callanan, who, being a lawyer, wanted her to rescue family papers. They emptied desk drawers, then she ran into her and Frank's bedroom, took out two armloads of clothes from the closet. She remembers seeing Bob throw loose objects into a sheet, and John McKernan (who had come back) cleverly sweep objects from dresser tops (including her perfume, Frank's wallet) into a drawer, which he used as a tray. He also rescued their silverware. Judy was taking another armload from a downstairs closet belonging to her daughter Lucy when Frank and Andy came in. She took a horrified look at Frank, still in his pajama top, and gasped, "Go get some clothes on!"

Frank had been totally oblivious of the cold, but he put on a cotton bathrobe and bedroom slippers. Firemen were now tramping through the house. All the lights went out. Judy brought him a pair of pants in the dark, but they turned out to be slender Andy's, which he could not fasten around his 34″ waist, and which kept sliding down. Frank ordered Judy out of the house, then he and Andy carried out the desk, which went apparently like thistledown, although weeks later, when they tried lifting it again, they found they could hardly budge it. Frank remembers Andy's asking brightly at his elbow "What next?" and he answered, "We have the desk and ourselves. Next, I don't want anybody hurt!"

Meanwhile, neighbors were arriving. Typical of the way they were aroused was the experience of Binel Kehm, the builder who had sold the Perrons the house, and his wife Rowena, now the Perrons' near neighbors and friends. Mrs. Kehm awakened with the explosion of the jeep's gas tank, saw a glow through the bedroom curtains, and thought, "Oh, the Russians are bombing us!" She wakened her husband, and when they looked out the window and saw the flames, Mr. Kehm started running into the frigid night in his pajamas, until his wife called him back. He says, "You don't stop to think, you want to do something." He, too, had loved that big red landmark of New Canaan's past.

Perrons are proud of pieces saved from original carriage house—old lamps and door.

A great many people wanted to do something. One woman walked into the now-dangerous living room, with the sounds of fire crackling overhead the entire length of the house, and removed all the family photographs she saw. The first group of men carried out the TV set, piano, freezer and refrigerator before the inferno closed in. Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Warnk, close friends, arrived, and while he stayed at the fire she went to the McKernans' and told stories to the four Perron children (who knew her as Aunt Irene) until another neighbor, Mrs. Brandes, took them off to her house for the night. Mrs. Warnk then walked the half mile home through the freezing night lugging the picnic basket full of heavy cats. Later her husband came home with the car and Andy, to whom she had offered a bed, and she sat up and let Andy talk for hours about his tremendous, nerve-racking experiences.

Judy, too, had run across to see her children; but once she knew they were in excellent hands, she returned to the fire. More fire engines kept roaring up. The efforts of the local firemen were Herculean, but they were handicapped by the howling, bitter weather. The sirens summoning volunteers hadn't carried far in the high wind, and many had had to be called by telephone. Water turned into sheets of ice. Before the night was done, four fire companies turned out from New Canaan and surrounding communities—at least a hundred men, almost all volunteers roused from warm beds.

The little road was choked with traffic. The police were there. Neighbors offered Judy a total of fifty beds. The Red Cross came with a mobile coffee canteen for firemen with icicles forming on their clothes. But Judy's main concern was Frank. When there was no longer anything he could do, she had suggested they go to the McKernans', but he had turned to her with a glittering eye and said, "No I will not." A little later she persuaded him to sit with her in a car with a heater. Someone handed him a coat, which turned out to be a woman's coat. His ridiculously thin bathrobe and slippers were soaking wet, and he was trembling. She said to him, "Don't worry. You've always provided for us before. All we've lost are just things." Frank says, "I've never forgotten those words."

It was half past one when they finally went to the McKernans', hospitable rallying point. There the family gave Frank a pair of dry pants (size-50 waist this time!), gave both stiff drinks and sedatives. They eventually went home with the Kehms, who were to be their hosts for the next five days. Talking helped, and they didn't go to bed until half past four. Judy says, "I don't think Frank ever did sleep that night." Back at the site the last of the firemen were also up, wetting down the ruins.

The house that had burned down was only one symbol of the happy and prosperous life that Frank and Judy had built in thirteen years of marriage. Judy has dimples, green eyes and a light brown pony tail. She is forty-two now, but her complexion is fresh, her devotion to causes such as good schools or the League of Women Voters is earnest, and her taste in clothes relaxed (shorts and sneakers, or tweed skirts). She looks, as she ferries her children to riding lessons or goes to a League meeting or bakes a cake, exactly like what she is—an appealing, intelligent, rather serious-minded suburban housewife.

Frank, of Italian parentage, is dark-haired, boyishly handsome, and on weekdays, by necessity, a beautiful dresser, for he is in the men's clothing business. A New York City boy, he had put himself through the University of Kansas (led there by an English teacher he admired) through the worst of the depression, took a "temporary" Christmas job at Macy's to help raise money to go back for his master's degree. Frank radiates an enthusiasm for people, and Macy's evidently knew a good man when they had one. They asked him to stay, and he was soon moving forward so fast that he gave up all thought of that degree.

Judy had lived several years abroad with her family, had considered becoming an actress but decided "I just didn't have the ego for it." Home with the outbreak of war in Europe, twenty-two years old, she, too had ended up at Macy's. It was several years before they became conscious of each other in the huge store. Frank tried twice to enlist, was prevented by an old football injury to his shoulders. But by then Judy was married to a young man overseas. The brief marriage was already in trouble, for he had refused to have children. It was annulled when he returned and in February of 1946 she and Frank were married. Judy stopped working that same year, for she and Frank were in perfect accord on the subject of children: they wanted six.

Judy says cheerfully now, "I'll settle for the four I've got." Lucy was born in 1948, Michael a year and a half later. They lived in a Manhattan apartment, and Judy wheeled the babies in a little patch of ground behind the Princeton Club, of which Frank was not a member. Frank, by now a full buyer, left Macy's to join a manufacturer of men's clothing. Soon Deborah was on the way, and they began to house-hunt. They moved into the New Canaan house in the spring of 1951, two months before Deborah was born. Like a proper new householder, Frank took out fire insurance at once. By the time of the fire he had upped his coverage to $35,000 on the house (a little less than the purchase price), $15,000 on the contents. He says now, "Like everybody else, I blissfully believed this would cover any loss we'd actually have."

They had put down roots quickly in the fast-growing residential community. Judy says, "I could never join a bridge club—I'm just not built that way. But the League and the Town Players helped me meet people with the same interests—both wonderful groups. I love them." Frank has taken precious evening time (his commuting day is "at least" twelve hours long) to become production manager of a Town Players' play. They were charter members of a group of young couples who founded the New Field Club, less expensive than New Canaan's one country club, and geared mainly for children's summer activities. By the time of the fire, Lucy, ten, wore a pony tail like her mother's; Deborah, seven, had dark curly hair and a face like a rose. Nine-year-old Michael, a picturesquely handsome boy with his father's black hair, had just received his first football helmet for Christmas, and large-eyed Peter, born in New Canaan in 1952, had just entered first grade. Judy says, of Peter's attaining school age, "This was heaven," but the Perrons are a close-knit family, and when Peter swarms on her lap her typical reaction is to tuck him under her arm and give him a kiss on the top of his head.

The morning after the fire, Frank called his insurance agent and his New York office. (He reached his office two days later in borrowed shoes four sizes too big for him.) Later that morning, he and Judy visited the site. A lone fireman stood guard over what Judy calls "a big black mess." The top floor was gone. The charred skeleton of the living-room floor stood under the open sky. The glittering fringe of ice on everything did not soften the scene for Here and there in the rubble was an odd s burned book (Judy had had a library of volumes), a blackened bathtub filled wit The big old trees on the down-wind side house were blasted. The cold north win still blowing.

But another wind was stirring too—a one, a healing, openhanded rush of neig liness. Frank and Judy are still shaken they speak of it. Judy says, "After a weren't destitute. We had our insu Frank still had his job. Yet this was a when the Perron family needed human ness, and that is certainly what we were Way, way beyond anything we ever dre of." Frank says, waving his hand and s ing excited, "Right over the hill there, over in Poundridge, lives one of these who writes best sellers about New Yo urban life—you know, infidelities, bore backbiting and so forth. I think he makes I don't believe a word of it. The only Judy and I know around here—and we a lot—are good, normal citizens who are ested in raising their children right, se minded about their community and lo their friends. The outpouring of real h spirit after our misfortune was simply ing. This is suburbia—the real heart of ica!" Even while Frank and Judy were ing around the ruins, a Mrs. Garrett Mo consulting by telephone with Mrs. Br who had the children. The subject of thei versation was shoes. By lunchtime Mrs. had produced something for the four F children to put on their feet. All over Canaan, similar telephone conversation making wires hum.

The Perrons needed almost everything had come out best in those armloads of snatched from the closet, and she ha rescued several of Frank's suits, but lo almost everything not on hangers, from to summer wardrobes. The children ha to nothing. Over the next few days neig brought some thirty boxes of clothing Kehms, where Frank and Judy were ho bly urged to stay. Mr. Kehm says, "We Red Cross collection depot!" and Judy "They came from all sides, from peop hardly knew." Word went out that the Perrons had lost all their Christmas pre and toys came too. Classmates took collections, neighbors brought more. says feelingly, "The little children who g

Goodheartedness did not stop there friend arranged a "clothes-altering party took care of the clothes that didn't fit. A went downtown and came back with supply of hairbrushes, toothbrushes and Still another called up and said, "I've p

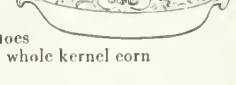
CONTINUED ON PAG

HOW THE PERRONS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Frank's regular monthly salary is $1300. Deductions (which do not cover all his income tax) take this down to $1140.50. At year's end Frank gets a bonus, varying in amount, out of which comes the rest of his income tax, annual property tax ($90) and large unbudgeted items—such as new furniture.

The Perrons' most extravagant routine expenses are laundry, dry cleaning and house cleaning. Frank's shirts are sent out, his suits must be impeccable. Judy has help twice a week for ironing and house cleaning, also pays firm $18 a week to keep picture windows, floors and woodwork spick-and-span.

Food (including milk)	$255.00	Commuting costs	37.50
Clothing	50.00	Laundry	34.00
Mortgage	165.00	Dry cleaning, shoe repair	15.00
Fuel	72.00	House cleaning	92.00
Electricity	25.00	Garbage removal	4.00
Telephone	11.00	Children's riding and dancing lessons	57.50
Insurance (hospital, life and fire)	110.00	Club dues	13.50
Medical and dental	15.00	Periodicals	12.00
Church (building fund, etc.; donations come from bonus)	10.00	Cigarettes	10.00
Cars (including insurance)	80.00	Miscellaneous	12.00
		Total	$1,140.50



Here's Your Chance To WIN $50 for FAVORITE RECIPE

...using 'all-purpose' G. WASHINGTON'S® SEASONING and BROTH

Send in your favorite recipe using G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth. We pay $50 for every recipe published. Every entrant receives a free recipe booklet containing delicious low-calorie recipes. This month's award goes to Jean P. Blair, Springfield, Mass., for her Potato-Corn Casserole.

★ ★

POTATO-CORN CASSEROLE

4 baking potatoes
1 (16 oz.) can whole kernel corn
2¾ cups milk
3 tablespoons flour
3 tablespoons butter or margarine
1 diced green pepper or 3 pimientos chopped fine Bread Crumbs
2 packets G. Washington's "Golden" Seasoning

Pare potatoes, cut into ¼" slices. Place about ⅓ potatoes into greased deep baking dish. Add half corn (drained) and pimiento or green pepper. Sprinkle layer with 1 tablespoon flour. Alternate layers until all ingredients are used. Top with bread crumbs. Heat milk, butter and G. Washington's until milk simmers. Pour over potato-corn mixture. Bake in moderate oven (350° F) about 1 hour.

★ ★

G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth gives a new taste-treat—a professional chef's touch to almost every food you prepare: casseroles, gravy, meat, fish, stews and salad dressings. And simply by adding a cup of hot water to one packet of G. Washington's, you can enjoy a cup of zestful, no-fat broth that contains only 6 calories. Buy G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth at any food store.

Here's How to Win $50 Every Entry Gets Free Recipe Booklet

Send your recipe using G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth, together with a box top, to American Home Foods, Dept. S, 22 E. 40th St., New York, N. Y. You may be the lucky winner next month! All recipes become property of American Home Foods. Every entry receives FREE New Recipe Booklet.

2 VARIETIES
- "Rich Brown" with beef-like flavor
- "Golden" with chicken-y

You never had it so gold...

New Quick-Cooked Cream style Corn from the Green Giant

The pallid look and the soupiness of cream style corn are gone forever.

The Green Giant people of Le Sueur, Minnesota, introduced quick-cooked corn to America with its famous Niblets Brand. Now they bring this new process to cream style corn to save all the fresh color and flavor.

The new Green Giant kind is so different it carries a United States patent.

You should see and taste the difference this makes. New Green Giant Brand Quick-Cooked Cream Style Corn!

GREEN GIANT®
Good things from the garden

GREEN GIANT CO., HDQRS., LE SUEUR, MINN., GREEN GIANT OF CANADA, LTD., TECUMSEH, ONT. "GREEN GIANT" BRAND REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. ©GGCO.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 132

my store bills. Won't you please use my charge accounts for anything you need?" Invitations to dinner poured in. One of the calls that touched them most came from a well-known television writer who called up Frank and said rather brusquely, "I don't know how you're fixed, and you don't need to tell me. But I can let you have five thousand dollars in cash immediately, to be paid back when you can." Frank, who turned down the offer with thanks, says, "We didn't know him awfully well, we'd just met him at parties. At that point he couldn't have known whether we had any insurance or not, or even whether we were people who paid our debts."

By sheer luck, a house right up Ponus Ridge Road had just become available for rent, although it was ten days before the former tenants could move out and the Perrons in. For the first five the Kehms, the Brandeses, and another near neighbor, Mrs. Fish, divided up the family. The children remember this as a time of extra-special breakfasts of pancakes and hot chocolate at Mrs. Fish's, of afternoons with their mother at the Kehms', where Mr. Kehm would "put them around this big seven-foot coffee table I have and set them to drawing pictures of houses they would like to live in. We wanted them to do something constructive about their loss." Then other friends called to say they would be in New York for a week. Could the Perrons use their empty house? The Perrons could and did gladly for the last five days. Judy says, "It wasn't until later that we found they had really stayed with relatives in Norwalk. They had moved out just for us. It was as though people thought of the nicest things they could do, and then did them—no matter how inconvenient."

Friends arrived with complete meals for six, others helped them move. One husband got together a working party armed with wrenches and drained all the pipes and radiators at the fire site. The rented house, which was to be their home for close to a year, was a large modern one, fully furnished, but Judy kept missing odd items. "Clocks! Scissors! Needle and thread!" She was given a beautiful sewing box, a linen shower. The Town Players started a collection of used books, League friends gave a party to which guests brought anything useful. Frank and Judy went home with a mattress, half an extension ladder, a brace and bit and other oddments that fill a normal home.

The fire had come just as Frank, now sales manager for a company making luxury sports shirts and ties, was about to leave for one of his three annual trips across the country visiting his salesmen. Before he left (two weeks late) he tried to be very practical about plans, had already got estimates of what he could sell his land for. His thought was to buy a new house for under $50,000, come close to staying within his insurance money.

But emotions were at work. Judy says, "I was trying not to be practical," and Mr. Kehm went quietly ahead with sketches to show Frank on his return. They couldn't have chosen an easier prey than Frank. Both he and Judy had been proud of their huge old house. Frank is a family man who says, "After all, a man's home is the most important investment of his life. We already loved the neighborhood. So we made an emotional decision." They decided to rebuild on the sturdy, outsize foundations of the old.

The year 1959, then, was the year of the Perrons' two headaches: the complications of being burned out and the complications of being homebuilders. No amount of personal kindnesses could alter the fact that the aftermath of their fire was expensive. So was building the kind of house they wanted.

If Frank ended the year a shaken man, this was partly because he had always taken pride in living within his income. His basic salary is $15,600 a year—not unlimited wealth for a man with four children and an old house of hundred-foot dimensions to maintain. If the family needed a new car or the house a coat of paint, he waited until his year-end bonus to get it. The house had always consumed quantities of money, and the Perrons had lived simply on what was left. The children go to public school. They stay home during Frank's summer vacation (he says, "A hotel room is no treat to me"), enjoying the New Field Club and local family trips. Both Judy and Frank fail miserably to live up to the reputation of hard-drinking New York suburbanites. They keep a liquor supply for guests, drink milk with the children by choice. Frank tells the sad outcome of the only time he broke his "cardinal rule" against buying anything on time. In a weak moment he had signed for an encyclopedia which burned in the fire. "Those payments kept coming for months afterward." But during the year of building, his careful habits had rough going. "I reached a point of being numb. If we needed anything I'd say 'Get it.'"

At the start, Frank's assets were $50,000 from the insurance company (negotiations sailed through; there was no question about the loss), and the unburnable parts of his property: foundations, old stone chimney, driveway, and water and septic tanks. He had another asset as well: a "dislocation of living" clause which meant the insurance company would pick up the tab for increased living expenses due to the fire—for a time considered reasonable for rebuilding or resettling. Thus it paid the rent of their temporary house for six and a half months, even paid for rented linen service. Before the "reasonable time" ran out, the company paid some $4000 in extra expenses. Frank says earnestly, "It a clause I recommend."

But out-of-pocket expenses began almo fast as Frank could reach for his checkb The wreckage had to be removed—prom because it was highly unsafe. Wrecking $1200. There were large items like piano freezer to haul away. But the two big th that melted his assets were the new house and the march of time.

Mr. Kehm had designed a house "to r the dignity of what was there," and this what the Perrons wanted too. They plann vastly more livable house, with only two fl instead of three, and turning the formerly used lower floor (the one looking back across open country) into dining room, kit and big playroom. Living room and bedro were at street level. But plans still include imposing roof line (Judy says, "Right of bat, Frank and I said we didn't want a roof"), three bathrooms, two dens (after they had a hundred feet of length to fill) a second-floor flagstone veranda overhangi back. Final bids amounted to $56,000. included a carport, but it left all the furn to put into the new house still to go.

Frank raised the money by increasing mortgage on the property by $12,000 (ne ating fee: $250) and adding $4000 of his savings. (He had had the mortgage on th down to $13,000 with eleven years to go; he is mortgaged for the next twenty-five ye By adding these sums to his insurance m he had $66,000. This would pay for the h and allow $10,000 for clothes and furnish As an indication of how far this $10,000 w stretch, insurance adjusters had estimate value of the family's burned possessions most $35,000. (Frank had been amazed says, "I would have underestimated their by fifty per cent." In all he could have coll over $100,000 worth of insurance.)

Frank didn't get back from his Weste until February. Mr. Kehm was busy. bids didn't go out until May. After that was a period of corner cutting to brin price down to its final figure, and bui didn't start until July. Rain delayed the ing. In mid-July the insurance compan Frank on his own financially, and he ha start paying $350 a month rent. Target slipped by—October, Thanksgiving Day Judy says, "It was fun too. It was the first for me really starting from scratch w house." Toward the end there was the e ment of selecting wallpapers, picking up rics that were just right.

The Perrons moved in officially on De ber 5, 1959—just eleven months to the after the fire. Eleven brand-new Holly beds (the children each have two in rooms) and eight mattresses had to b crated before they could go to bed. Th draped bedroom windows had to be s over if the family were not to appear like fish in a bowl from the road. Their dini ble was a huge piece of plywood on sawh Not a rug was in the great house.

Ahead of Judy were yards of mater sew, hours of refinishing, with Frank, t sic chairs, tables and dressers she had b secondhand, years of careful investme furniture before they would be back to they once had. But they had already put round sum for the "perfect" living-room c for handsome brass chandeliers for the hall. The massive old carriage-house do been refinished and rehung at the front and outside the two old carriage lamps it were polished.

The carriage lamps shone a special wel last Christmas Eve, for the Perrons wer to give their annual Christmas Eve par schedule. Somehow in those weeks be the 5th and the 24th of December Jud coped with the bustle of moving in, sh eyes to bare spaces and unpacked ca Christmas-shopped for the family, cut u or three thousand raisins for her s Christmas fruitcake (with everybody i family helping) and sent out 200 invitati friends and neighbors. It didn't matt there wouldn't be enough chairs to go ar or that soap was still on some of the win She and Frank wanted the world to kno they were home.

LIQUI COLOR BELONGS IN YOUR HAIR TO COMPLETE YOUR MAKE-UP

. . . to provide the freshness of beautiful natural-looking color above your hairline. Instantly, your hair will gain a younger look that sparks up your personality and complements your facial make-up and costume. Any woman can use it confidently, effectively, discreetly as every shade of hair responds beautifully. LIQUI COLOR really conditions the hair . . . gives extra sheen and body to dull, limp or damaged hair . . . keeps hair soft and pliable for easy molding of hair-dos that stay set in dry or humid weather. Use LIQUI COLOR to add just the right amount of natural-looking color to beautify all shades of hair . . . to blend-in gray . . . or as a toner for bleached, tinted and dyed hair. It's quick and easy to use. The color "takes" instantly. No waiting for color to develop. No messy patch or strand tests. You'll like its economy too, as little as 18¢ per application since you get 5 to 10 applications from each 6 oz. bottle. Only $1.75 plus tax. LIQUI COLOR is a safe, temporary rinse, not a bleach or permanent dye. It carries the Good Housekeeping Guaranty Seal. A color range of 8 shades at cosmetic counters everywhere. ©1960 • NOREEN DISTRS. • DENVER, COLORADO

LIQUI COLOR® BY Noreen

WHAT YOU CAN DO TO MAKE POOR TV BETTER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 75

to have been passed, but it wasn't. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, trumpeted that this was Government regulation and that the newspapers would come next. This is hogwash. Newspapers are private business. Television is a public utility. It has to be regulated just as the telephone, the telegraph, the electric companies and the railroads have to be regulated, because they are in a privileged position to affect the public or to service it. The question is not whether or not television will be regulated—of course it will be regulated—but whether it will be well or badly regulated.

The Federal Communications Commission, which theoretically regulates broadcasting, is an overburdened, largely passive body of lawyers and radio experts who have no experience with, liking for or knowledge of programs. What the FCC needs badly is an Advisory Board composed of respected citizens of unimpeachable virtue and a wide range of interests who would recommend changes to the FCC after reviewing the programing of the networks. Let's say the Board might be composed of Herbert Hoover, Harry Truman, Pearl Buck, Mrs. Vincent McIntosh, Mary Lord, Walter Lippmann, Arthur Schlesinger Jr., Nathan Pusey, president of Harvard University; Clare Booth Luce, ex-Senator William Benton, Leonard Bernstein, Adlai Stevenson and Harry Scherman, chairman of the board of the Book-of-the-Month Club.

The Advisory Board would review—as the FCC is supposed to review but rarely does—the promises of each station and, if networks get licensed, each network. After all, these stations operate on public frequencies, some of them valued at $20,000,000. To get the exclusive use of these valuable bits of public property, the operators made large promises, few of which they have kept.

The Advisory Board plan will be widely denounced as Government censorship. It is no such thing. When railroads don't provide decent service they are called on the carpet by the Interstate Commerce Commission, many times at the demand of a group of disgruntled passengers interested in service. Why not television? One of the promises all stations solemnly make before getting their licenses is to provide a balanced schedule of information, education for all tastes. It takes no great wisdom to point out that thirty-five Westerns in prime evening time are too many Westerns, that no education at all is too little education, that one adult library drama which appears only sporadically isn't enough.

This Advisory Board should have the power to have Oliver Treyz, president of A.B.C., called on the carpet and told his program schedule is a disgrace and to fix it. It would hardly require explanation. Treyz knows what's the matter with his schedule. Every network should be asked what it is doing for children, for scientists, for the church, for music, for drama, for education, for experiment. If a law were passed, preventing sponsors from influencing programing, Mr. Treyz could adjust his programing to a true conception of the public welfare.

It should take only two hours a year to check up on the performance of every network. Just the threat of such a review would make a tremendous difference in the planning of a program schedule. The motive—to use Mr. Lippmann's cogent word—would be: what are we doing for the minds and hearts and dignity and honor of our nation, rather than what are we doing to sell goods?

Of course the commercial networks are always going to strive for popularity, and rightly so. A few powerful voices have asked whether this is enough, whether a country as rich and powerful as ours cannot afford to have its own B.B.C. Walter Lippmann and William H. Stringer, Washington bureau chief of the Christian Science Monitor, two of the most conservative and respected newsmen in Washington, have both advanced the idea of a national, publicly supported network solely dedicated to the pursuit of excellence rather than profit.

"In seeking great mass audiences," Mr. Lippmann has written, "the industry has decided that the taste of a great mass audience is a low one, and that to succeed in the competition it must pander to this low taste. The alternative, which is practiced in one form or another in almost every civilized country, is competition—competition

RETARDED CHILDREN CAN BE HELPED

Welcome new freedom! Show's over, you're still ready for fun with longer, softer-than-ever Fems napkins!

New, and exclusive with Fems, is a dainty pink covering, softer than ever! Yet, though softer, this covering is stronger, with more give, more flexibility.

Both covering and pad are long enough to allow you to position Fems exactly right for you . . . long enough to fit securely without a worry about shifting or binding. Yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

You can forget about stains, because there's a protective safety-cushion in each Fems napkin to prevent accidents, whether you're sitting or moving about.

Now, a new economy size package

News! Fems are now available in large economy size packages of forty napkins as well as the familiar package of twelve. Buy either size package today. Try Fems and discover how freedom feels!

Fems
FEMININE NAPKINS

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP.

not for private profit but for public service. The best line for us to take, I am convinced, is to devise a way by which one network can be run as a public service, with the criterion not what is popular, but what is good. No doubt this network would not attract the largest mass audience. But if it enlisted the great talents which are available in the industry but are now throttled and frustrated by present policies, it might well attract an audience which would make up in influence what it lacked in numbers."

That is important. Television has already lost—as radio ahead of it lost—the nation's top 5 per cent on a cultural level. Though these folk are scorned by the advertiser as of small purchasing power, they are nevertheless the people who write all the books and plays that are worth while, publish and edit all the newspapers, own most of the banks and industry and largely run the country. Their loss is a terrible one.

We should not shrink from the idea of subsidizing the National Network, as the B.B.C. is subsidized. After all, the schools, the universities, medical research, libraries, even the churches are all subsidized. Why not this great means of communication?

It would take very little money. Today forty-seven educational TV stations are already built and operating on a nonprofit basis, and another six are being built. To tie this group together into a National Network where Don Giovanni could be heard, uninterrupted by please-to-send-flowers-on-Mother's-Day (as it was broadcast this year on N.B.C.) or some other commercial, would cost very little.

Think of it! A national network to help educate our children, to act as a communications link between our greatest minds, to air mankind's noblest aspirations, to propagate the latest in science and philosophy, to enrich our culture and widen our horizons, to give a forum to young dramatists and composers, to invent new dramatic forms, to revive interest in classics, to awaken the intellectual curiosity our young, and just possibly to shame the commercial networks out of their incessant preoccupation with sex, mayhem and triviality. could get all that for less than it costs to supp the Coast Guard.

I most emphatically do not want to leave impression that there are no good and dec people left in television. There are many no idealistic, terribly talented men like Edw R. Murrow and his producer and side-k Fred Friendly; producers like Fred C George Schaefer and David Susskind, v have fought hard to bring quality to tel sion. There are sponsors like Hallmark (wh has done nothing but great plays) and Be Howell cameras and Goodrich tires, wh support C.B.S. Reports. There are executi like Frank Stanton, who has fought har present balance and quality and to live up TV's responsibilities. There are many, m more.

But the system, as it is, penalizes—i doesn't drive out altogether—the men of h ideals, the men of vision. What remai Warner Brothers now has ten horse ope

DIANE

By GEORGE LIVINGSTONE

When Diane was five, we told her
Never open the door to strangers.
But we found that the innocent world of childhood is slow to distrust, and more than once overheard her asking a new milkman, mailman, or others who called: Are you a burglar?
A guileless directness that had us nonplused.

Now, at seven, she's still unshaken of wonderful trust, and we are usually undismayed at meeting people who know Diane—but don't know us.

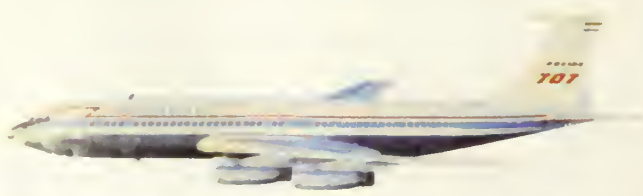
and shoot-'em-ups on the air, and a vice p dent of the company once said to me Warner Brothers was aiming at the twe year-old mentality which, he said, is "actu aiming over the heads of most of us."

Close behind are Four Star with ten sho all awful; Desilu with eight; and Gooc and Todman, the quiz kings, whose The H Is Right panders to greed as Warner Brot to sadism. Such shows aim at the lowest stincts of the greatest numbers. Such pro ers use this great public medium solely their own gain.



Edward R. Murrow, expressing alarm the direction television is taking, summe up very well: "If these devices [radio and vision] are used in an effort to entertain al people all the time, then we have come ilously close to discovering the real opiat the people. . . . It is not enough to entertain greatest numbers; there must also be full ap ciation of our historic heritage, wise un standing of our institutions and tradi familiarity with our classics in literature and arts, and persistent attention to our ethi principles."

That's a noble utterance. To bring it ab we have to bring pandering and looting un some sort of public control, supporting not controlling the editorial content of medium.

Above all, we have to reorient our thin about television. We have to stop thin of it as simply a box designed to dist us until it's time to turn the lights out. have to look on it as one of the greates struments ever devised for information education and the propagation of the l life, an instrument meant to civilize us, n debase us.

PICK A PLACE . . . on any continent . . . in any section of the U.S. You can be there in a few magically short hours by Boeing jetliner. You'll find the trip exhilarating . . . and so restful you'll arrive refreshed, looking your sparkling best. Fly Boeing—the world's most popular, most proved jetliners. More than 3,200,000 women passengers already have!

BOEING 707 and 720

AIR FRANCE • AIR INDIA • AMERICAN • B.O.A.C. • BRANIFF • CONTINENTAL • LUFTHANSA • PAN AMERICAN • QANTAS • SABENA • SOUTH AFRICAN • TWA UNITED • VARIG • WESTERN. and will go into service later with AVIANCA • CUBANA • EASTERN • IT AL • ETHIOPIAN and IRISH, NORTHEAST and PAKISTAN operate Boeing jetliners under lease

LET'S MAKE IT SAFE TO SEND OUR CHILDREN TO BIG CITY SCHOOLS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 61

Pa made some abortive attempts at friendships w several of the other girls. When all these er ed in failure (these girls now studiously av d her), she withdrew completely. Her life be inside and outside school appears to be ot of unbelievable loneliness.

In class she occupies the last seat in the last ro next to that other isolate, Mark. There, w ring her little smile, she reads voraciously, w es poetry and draws. Sometimes she cries. Sh never raises her hand or enters into the cla discussion. The only time I get a response fro her is when I make a statement such as, "Th e next person who calls out will be pun- ish d." Then Patricia immediately calls out.

Puzzled by this perversity, I tried keeping he n as punishment. I hoped I could draw her ou perhaps reach her and in some way give he a little guidance. As a friendly opening ga bit I ventured, "Your work is excellent, Pa icia. But somehow I don't think you really lik school. Tell me, isn't there something you lik about it?"

Her suspicious eyes studied me for a min- ut her real feelings carefully concealed be- ne h her Sphinxlike half-smile. Finally she dr vled, "Oh, yes. I like it when you pun- ish me."

Although principals frown on teachers' dis- cu ing psychological problems with parents, I fir ly decided to discuss Pat's problems with he mother. Pat's mother confirmed the bare fa of the girl's history, but could see no pr blem at all. Patricia was a beautifully ad- ju d child in every way, she informed me. Sh was a quiet, well-mannered, even-tem- pe d girl, always smiling, spent her spare time in braries. Where was the problem?

Children like Renata or Patricia, though pa etic, are only part of the reason so many te hers feel their lot is intolerable. The largest po ion of the fault lies with children who are tr menaces to themselves and others and do t belong in a normal classroom at all.

Take Dan, for instance. And to repeat an ol joke, I would gladly have paid someone ha my year's salary to do so.

In a school where we rated our children as or ulcer and two-ulcer types, Dan was in a ca gory by himself.

Dan had been the major factor in the nerv- ou breakdowns of both his second- and th l-grade teachers. One afternoon I saw his fo th-grade teacher, a normally poised and se te matron, chasing him down the corridor br dishing an umbrella. "So help me," she wa screaming, "if I ever catch you in my ro n again, I'll murder you!" Soon after this sh quit her job. The principal felt that the in- ex rienced substitute who took her place was no match for Dan, so he was added to my al- re y long list of problem children.

Dan is a husky, brawny Negro boy of eleven. He's about 5'5" and weighs 190 (80 pounds more than I). He has licked just about every boy in the school, and several of the girls. Psychologically, however, poor Dan feels he is really a girl. He minces around the room in earrings and bracelets. Once he came to school wearing high heels, another time his mother's hat with a veil.

Dan is obsessed with sex in all its forms. He uses lewd language, makes lascivious drawings in his notebook and, if I am momentarily out of the room, on the blackboard. His mildest epithet for me is "big white whore." The rest of his language is unprintable. Needless to say, he is a corrupting influence on the other children.

Several times Dan has attacked little girls in the hall (so far without harmful results), among them, of course, Renata. Possessed of an inquiring mind, Dan spends a good part of his time on the floor, face up, looking up into my dress or that of any girl who happens to pass by. On other occasions he sidles up to me at the blackboard and sort of rubs up against me when my back is turned. "Dan," I say, with the aplomb of a Supreme Court justice, "you're out of your seat. Please sit down."

Dan snickers, "I don' wanna siddown."

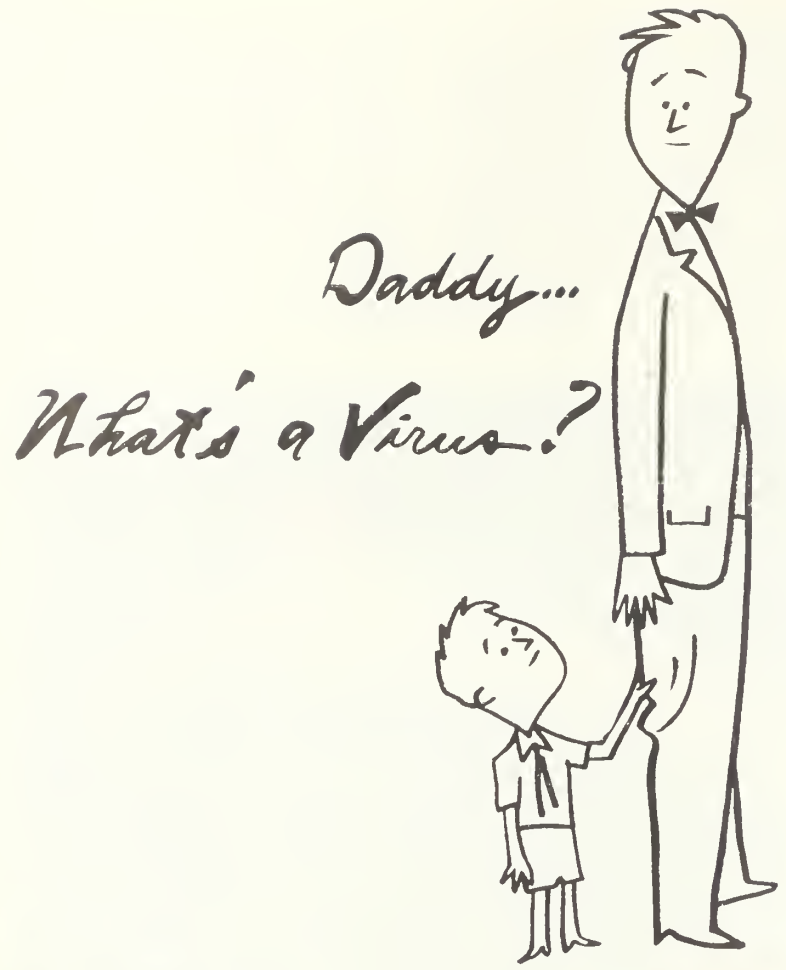
"Please sit down, Dan."

Dan gets as close to me as he can. "I dare yah try and make me. I dare yah to hit me!"

He then prances away, waving his hips.

Dan has wrecked at least temporarily and perhaps permanently the health of every teacher he has ever had. He has created a completely intolerable atmosphere in every classroom he has entered. Yet Dan is still in the school system and he will probably stay there until he is seventeen. The school psychologist does not consider him sufficiently delinquent to be suspended. "The boy has problems. We must be patient," is his verdict.

A boy I'll call Warner ran the school extortion racket. It was not just a child's-play

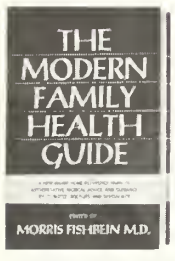


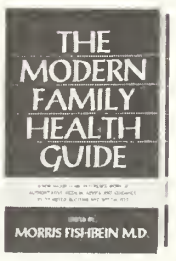
We believe that the purpose of education is to inform the mind and develop the intelligence. . . . Skimping academic subjects, lowering standards, confuses and retards the whole educational process. A democratic society cannot survive without an educated electorate and thoughtful, highly trained leaders.

From the Report of the San Francisco Curriculum Survey Committee

One of our senior medical students reports the situation in many of the school districts in his city is worse than this article says. He said he personally knew a number of teachers who were actually fearful of their lives.

From the report of a special reader.





There are times when you want to know . . . need to know . . . the answers to important questions about health and medical care. And now, with these fine medical books for the home, you can have those vital answers at your finger-tips. Well-illustrated and completely indexed, they'll be among the most valuable books in your home library. Use the handy coupon to order them today!

A. ILLUSTRATED MEDICAL AND HEALTH ENCYCLOPEDIA (4 volumes)

The complete family reference for health and hygiene—nearly 2,200 pages of information and illustrations. First aid, pre-natal and baby care, sick room advice and details on the workings of the marvelously intricate human body are all among the many subjects included. For better family health and a longer, happier life, you'll want this set. Yours now for the special low price of $19.50!

B. THE MODERN FAMILY HEALTH GUIDE (2 volumes)

These two authoritative books were written by a team of 27 experts specializing in every phase of personal and family health. The first volume contains chapters on basic aspects of health, while the second volume is an encyclopedia of medical terms, techniques and diseases. Completely indexed for instant reference, these two handsome books are only $4.95—reduced from the original $7.50 price.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY Dept. 1722, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Penno.

Please send me the books I have checked below:

☐ A. ILLUSTRATED MEDICAL AND HEALTH ENCYCLOPEDIA (4 volumes) @ $19.50

☐ B. THE MODERN FAMILY HEALTH GUIDE (2 volumes) @ $4.95

☐ Poyment enclosed (Penna. residents please add 4% state soles tax)

☐ Bill me for my order plus o few cents for postage and handling

NAME_____

STREET OR R.D. _____

TOWN_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

For foreign orders please include postage with payment for book.

GUARANTEE: If you are not completely satisfied with your purchase, return the books within 10 days for a full refund—or pay nothing if you've asked to be billed.

make-believe extortion racket, but an honest-to-goodness efficient businesslike enterprise.

When we uncovered it we found in Warner's possession a complete bookkeeping system which listed over 100 children and their estimated allowances. Under the heading for each week there were two columns with the names of children in each. Each child was expected to pay as much as he could afford each week for the privilege of not getting beaten up. A red star in the little book indicated the children due to "get it" this week.

With fascinated horror I helplessly watched Warner's followers increase during the year. He had started with just one henchman. By the end of the term he had several dozen. Like a magnet he attracted the opportunistic, the weak, the shallow in search of an idol, the hostile seeking a channel for their aggressions. About two years older than the other children in his class, he always looked poised, neat, dignified. Only when you got close did you see the brutal expression in his beady eyes.

The savage beatings took place after school and off school property. As the year wore on, more and more mothers took to picking up their children after school as protection. Children stopped playing in the street and were afraid to leave their homes. As with adult criminal gangs, the victims were so petrified that for months it was impossible to pinpoint the ringleader. Only in April, when one of them was about to move to Florida, did a victim appear in school, flanked by both parents, to tip us off. Although the principal did everything she could to break up this gang, and although Warner's parents co-operated as much as possible, it was still flourishing at the end of the year. Warner's parents were well-meaning, kindly Europeans who had pulled up stakes in the old country so their son could "have a better life in America." And now, as his father told me with tears in his eyes, they simply couldn't understand what had happened to the boy. For now that Warner had an independent income, they had lost control of him.

I have often read about the importance of spotting potential criminals when they are young. Why isn't there some plan or organization that can nip a Warner in the bud? Is it cheaper for society to allow him to grow into an adult extortioner? I have always been able to spot serious troublemakers and I know most experienced teachers can. Why is it that neither the school system nor any other city or state agency does anything to weed these children out of the schools? Lack of money can't be the answer. Jailing them as adults is far more expensive.

I think that by now every reader of this article will realize that there is no such thing as a good class with six or eight disturbed or seriously delinquent children in it. Nearly every child affects and is affected by every other child. The number of seriously disturbed children in any one classroom is small, but the danger is great. They infect at least half of the class with the virus of antisocial behavior. How can any teacher teach, or a child absorb anything, in this atmosphere?

In a typical class of mine, there were at le 20 well-adjusted children, eager for kno edge. They were perforce neglected becaus my mandatory preoccupation with the pr lem children. Although I did my utmost work with them, we could proceed only in brief interludes between interruptions. best, these children became bored and rest from the lack of continuity, or they beca minor behavior problems on their own. worst, they were exposed to most unsavory havior that was not only morally corrupti but brought out all their inner tensions t

Horace is an example of the type of c that in a more wholesome class climate mi have functioned fairly well. A talented boy, has a nervous blink, several twitches and a concerting way of nodding as he speaks.

"Horace, have you done your homewo I ask.

"No," nods Horace. "I forgot my book."

Horace is one of the children who are ing extortion money for "protection," an lies awake nights worrying about "the gan At the age of nine, he has become a confirm insomniac, a habitual user of doctor-p scribed tranquilizers.

Terribly worried that Horace might get glasses broken in a fight, his mother picks h up after school every day. "I can't imag why Horace is so nervous," she says shri "Both his father and I are so relaxed and home is such a happy one. It must be this t rible class."

Horace's basic anxieties, I'm sure, spr from sources closer to home, but I had to ag with her that a class of this sort was likely increase anyone's tensions.

There is no solution for the Horaces. Of seven fourth-grade classes in the school, o one, with a register of 42, was for super children. Five of the others were very m like mine. One was worse. One boy in t class, a constant menace to himself and eve one else, had been declared legally insane. a week later he was back in class. The board education declared it had no place to put h and could not let him roam the streets. So after his return the boy gave a little girl a "l foot" that kept her in bed for weeks.

In January of one year, a school psych ogist did put in an appearance. He said he h time for therapy for one child in each cl Did I have any problem children? I spent next twenty minutes enumerating them, a we made the decision that Dan most nee treatment. Dan began playing hooky on th apy days and in June the psychologist's rep was that he did not consider Dan sufficien delinquent to be suspended.

The next fall the board of education cided that our school did not have suffici problem children to warrant a school psych ogist. He was therefore transferred to a wo

CONTINUED ON PAGE

"You're afraid of the principal, the principal is afraid of the superintendent, the superintendent is afraid of the school board, the school board is afraid of the voters. I'm not afraid of anybody!"

This bedspread was washed in blue Cheer*

*When whites are this white, you know your whole laundry is perfect. Try Cheer with the Blue Magic Whitener. See the difference yourself.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 138

school. Since this was the school to which I was originally appointed (and left after my three-year probationary period), I am qualified to describe it. I will call it School B.

School B is in a slum. The parents are either unemployed or unemployable. Some are mentally or physically ill and unable to hold jobs. Many are on relief. Some are in jail.

In School A, which I've just described, 10 per cent of the pupils were seriously disturbed, 30 per cent mildly disturbed. In School B the figure for seriously disturbed children ran as high as 20 per cent. Many of these children had violent criminal tendencies and no concept of right and wrong. I have described how in School A, with perhaps 10 per cent aggressively delinquent children, these aggressively delinquent children can infect at least half the total enrollment. In School B the infection reached epidemic proportions. For mere survival, well-adjusted children were forced to appear as tough as the others and soon became indistinguishable from them.

When I taught in School B, nearly every boy had a switchblade knife. The hour teachers dreaded most here was the lunch hour. Three women teachers (there were no male teachers in this school) were placed in charge of about 1000 children, half of them boys with knives. The job was nothing more nor less than to keep them from murdering one another.

These children's only concept of play was fighting. All about you in the congested yard were clusters of boys in little piles wrestling. After yard duty, during which by superhuman alertness you succeeded in averting scores of catastrophes, your emotions were so utterly wrung out that your hands shook and your knees were limp. Yet without a moment's respite you were required to proceed directly to your regular classroom to face yet two more hours of frustration and tension.

You might have thought, conditions being what they were, that the principal would do everything he could to help the teachers. However, although I know there must be wide variations in the personality of principals, this is too rarely so. The principal of School B was a charming man, provided you never asked for help. If you even consulted him about a hard-to-handle child, you were labeled that worst of all things: "a teacher who cannot handle her class." It was, of course, impossible for him to fire an appointed teacher, but he could find ways of making you so unhappy that after teachers had "done" their three years in his school, they invariably left of their own accord.

When I started at School B, I was a novice with no real prior experience. In my first year there I had a second grade of 36 disturbed youngsters, among them a boy named Johnny. Johnny alone had more things wrong with him than any nonteacher can imagine. To begin with, he never sat in his seat. Wearing his hat, gloves and overshoes, he spent his days pacing up and down the room. Any request on my part that he sit down only reinforced this behavior. One day, after months of trial and error, I had an inspiration. I said, "Johnny, you keep walking until I tell you to stop." Johnny, stunned, sat down.

But pacing was the least of Johnny's difficulties. About once a day, for reasons I never could trace, he would start howling in a voice that could be heard at the state line. This crying jag went on for hours. Removing him from the room so the rest of the class could continue with their work was out of the question, for Johnny had still another problem—the worst one of all. He had a peculiar mulelike obstinacy about leaving the room for any reason during the day. Any attempt to coerce him brought on howls and tantrums. Fire drills were a crisis. I was forced to carry this screaming, struggling seven-year-old down three flights of stairs twice a month. When, after several months, my stomach began to sag I braced myself and consulted the principal. I explained what a disrupting influence Johnny's behavior was on the class and stressed the impossible fire-drill situation. I was met with only an unsympathetic stare.

In my third, and happily last, year at this school there was a boy in my class so retarded that he could not learn to read and he was hardly able to speak. In a well-organized school where the pupils were tested regularly, he would have been weeded out and sent to a class for retarded youngsters. Here he sat in a sort of stupor day after day, his mouth hanging open. The other children dubbed him Dopey Dicky. One afternoon I found a wildly hysterical woman waiting for me in the yard. She was Dicky's mother. Her boy, she informed me, was being beaten up by his classmates on the street outside her home after school. What was I going to do about it? I promised sympathetically that I would certainly speak to the children involved, but that much as I hated to know her boy was suffering, I had no jurisdiction about what went on after school off school property. I suggested she speak to the principal about having him transferred to another class.

At that Mrs. K. became even more violent. She accused me of inciting the beatings to get him out of my class, of refusing to protect him because he was Negro. I tried to hurry away from her by getting on my bus, but she followed me. In the bus she kept hurling imprecations at me all the way. She claimed she had a right to protection and if I did not give it to her son she would get her husband to kill me. Then she turned to her boy. "Dicky," she said, "you see how you can depend on no one. But don't worry. No one will ever beat you up again. Here's a knife. If anybody starts up with you, you just stick it in them. And don't you worry. Mommy will always back you up." The bus driver and many passengers offered to testify in my behalf, but I didn't want to get involved with the mother.

However, after a sleepless night, I found myself in the principal's office at 8 the next morning. This woman was dangerous and something must be done about her immediately, I felt. I hoped he would offer to speak to her and calm her down. At 8:40 the principal sauntered in. Smiling blandly, he listened to my story, shrugged his shoulders and suggested it was time I go up to my class. In this same school a mother tried to strangle a teacher. A substitute was knocked down by two sixth-grade boys while conducting a gym class in the basement. She suffered a severely bruised face and lost a front tooth. The principal refused to take any action.

Yet there are logical remedies for relieving many of the problems in both these schools.

In School A the relatively well-adjusted three fourths of my class should have been skimmed off to be taught at an accelerated rate. The emotionally maladjusted segment (numbering perhaps eight) could then have been divided into two categories, hard-core delinquents and children with lesser neuroses.

Since these hard-core delinquents (Dan, Kelly and Warner) were the chief source of destructive behavior in the class, their transfer to a school for delinquents would have caused most of the tensions among the rest of the class to evaporate.

The law permitting the transfer of pupils to such schools is surrounded by so many legal hurdles that principals and school psychologists discourage teachers' attempts to have any child, short of a rapist, committed. I would say it is imperative that we seriously reconsider our definition of "delinquency." A delinquent is not a child who has already committed murder. My definition of a delinquent would be any pupil who so seriously upsets a classroom and sabotages the efforts of the teacher and the other students that learning is at a standstill. If there are not enough schools to absorb all the children who fall into this category, then schools should be created. Their removal from regular classes would create for the first time a livable atmosphere for the other 90 per cent of the school population. By retaining these delinquent children in the class, we compel boys and girls of good potential to fritter away the most valuable learning years of their lives. Parents of normal and gifted children now have just one recourse. They remove their children from the city system.

As for the second category—"children with lesser neuroses"—I felt I could have reached and helped every one of them if the class were smaller. With a register of 12 to 15 I could have given them the individual attention they needed so badly and shown them the affection I felt for them. This came to me with startling impact when, following my resignation from the city system, I began to teach in a private school. There are maladjusted children in private schools. But with only 12 children to teach, I can build warm relationships with each individual. The results have been truly gratifying. For best results, however, these children should be taught by what I call a "teacher-psychologist," an experienced warm-hearted teacher who has had special psychological training.

The appalling playground situation in School B could have been vastly improved by the simple expedient of staggering the lunch hour, with the lower and upper grades using the yard in consecutive shifts. The yard would then be less congested, enabling each teacher to supervise more closely the smaller group, and younger pupils would thus be protected from attacks by the older.

However, to obtain his superintendent's permission to institute these "radical" changes (provided they occurred to him) the principal would be compelled to disclose the true state of affairs in his school. And past experience has taught him that this would permanently stigmatize him as an ineffectual principal.

But I have yet to describe my experiences in School C, a so-called "good" school, in a well-to-do neighborhood. Whenever I think of this school it brings to mind an experience I once had when I asked a class to use the words "possible" and "impossible" in a sentence. One little girl came up with, "My brother is impossible, but I am possible."

If the other school was "impossible," then this one was possible. Barely. That is, it would have been had it not been for the supervision. Not that there weren't problems here. There were. And serious ones. It's just that their over-all number was fewer.

Many of these so-called "good" schools are harder to work in than one might think. Why? Well, many principals who have "good" schools feel they have a right to ask you to "produce." Now people don't enter teaching to get rich. Most teachers feel a very strong calling for their work and are extremely conscientious. Their greatest satisfaction comes from "producing," if that means helping growing minds develop and turning their pupils into as constructive citizens as possible. But your principal doesn't want that kind of producing. He wants "show"—something to impress the superintendent.

Conditions in big-city schools are obviously deplorable. And they are so because no one will admit to them. The boards of education are too busy defending themselves ("We cannot possibly do any better until we have more money with which to pay more and better teachers") to have time for self-criticism. As they are finding it impossible to get "more and better teachers," they feel they are perfectly justified in making no further attempts to save the crumbling school systems. Not having answers, they want no complaints. They occupy their time sweeping problems under rugs and demand that superintendents and principals do the same.

The teacher who never draws her principal's attention to the behavior of children who are a potential menace is applauded as the best of all possible teachers. The principal who never attempts to get at the root of the chaos in his school, or in any way bring it to the attention of the superintendent, is hailed as the best of all possible principals. Teachers and principals never assemble in order to make an honest appraisal of pressing problems; to suggest constructive solutions; to profit by one another's experiences. It is taboo for a teacher to introduce a pertinent topic of her own for general discussion.

Many supervisors may have been idealists at the outset of their careers, but by the time they become principals these ideals have often ossified into opportunism. Principals are almost never people with maturity, insight, flexibility and courage. Their aim is not "How can I make mine a better school?" or "How can I help my teachers produce better-adjusted pupils?" but "How can I put up a good front?"

I am afraid it is also true that many teache seek to become supervisors because they a unsuccessful as teachers. A short time ago met a number of teachers who had taken t examination for assistant principal. I disco ered that most did it "to get out of the clas room—the discipline was killing me." I lea it to you to imagine how effective these peop will be as principals.

Almost any teacher will tell you th teacher-education courses are for the mo part taught by ivory-tower instructors who a parently have not set foot in an elementa school since graduation. These courses a useless in preparing the teacher for the actu day-by-day job of teaching in difficult schoo The qualifying exam is often an excellent or and in studying for it one does acquire a th ough grounding in teaching methods. But it usually out of touch with reality. These teaching methods that are applicable to t normal, bright class only; 95 per cent the teachers passing this exam are appoint to "difficult" schools where they never ag have the opportunity to practice these theori On the other hand, they have learned nothi of the kinds of difficulties they will be c countering daily for the rest of their liv Clearly, no matter how excellent the teach are, they will not stay in teaching long, un the conditions I have described, even if s aries are doubled.

This is, indeed, the case. That is the tragec Each fall the board of education announce has filled every teaching position. Each spri the board finds that teachers are leaving a has to admit, "There is a critical shortage teachers." I hope I have helped you to und stand why this will continue to be the c until something is done to meet the situati intelligently, and fully. E

The author of this article is a highly qualif and experienced teacher. She describes some the "emotionally disturbed" and seriously del quent children in her city-school classrooms. S tells why such troublesome pupils ruin the edu tion of others, often corrupt their morals. In dents similar to those she reports have been scribed by other devoted teachers, witnessed many observers, including Journal editors. As says, "There is no such thing as a good class w six or eight disturbed or seriously delinqu children in it. Nearly every child affects and affected by every other child. The number seriously disturbed children in any one classro is small, but the danger to the class is great."

Shocking as this fact is, it is hardly more than the efforts of certain school administrat to gloss over and conceal the problem. Ma principals fear they will be branded as failures their profession if they attempt to exclude a troublemakers. Teachers fear to complain principals lest they be told they "can't hand their pupils. A superintendent says, "Of cours know there are pupils in the schools who sho not be there, but there is no other place for ther Mentally ill, criminal and degenerate child are, therefore, to be found in many crowded c classrooms.

Immoral, irrational and often violent havior of such children forced to attend regu classes jeopardizes the character and educatior all normal children in those classes. In more t one city it has resulted also in physical inju even death, to pupils or teachers. Does the nothing attitude of teachers and principals lo the "moral climate" of our schools still furt by seeming to tolerate bad conditions?

Teachers do not feel free to speak until a they have resigned their positions, as this teac has done (to accept a position in a private scho Many principals have a distaste for disciplin problems and full power to penalize teachers w "fail to co-operate." Yet many corrective mc ures can be taken, some of which this writer s gests, by individual principals if they have necessary courage and intelligence. They can do this without the wholehearted support and derstanding of public opinion.

Since the Ladies' Home Journal printed novel, Blackboard Jungle, with its backgrounc the seamy side of city high schools, actual co terparts of its fictional incidents have been posed to the daily press. Drastic steps have b taken to improve conditions in New York scho which originally protested the Blackboard Jur exposé as unethical. Look into your pul schools yourself. Avoid taking only the word persons whose interest it might be to conceal facts. The public schools are open to the view all responsible adults, and the most successful ministrators solicit the interest and inquiries parents. We invite teachers and parents to w to us about their experiences.—The Editors

COOKIN' COUSINS

NESTLÉ'S® CHOCOLATE & DIAMOND WALNUTS

4 happy thoughts for the holidays with

NESTLÉ'S CHOCOLATE & DIAMOND WALNUTS

Only Nestlé's® fills your baking with the richer flavor of quality chocolate. Melt Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels smoothly and easily, or add them in Morsel form to stay whole and crunchy in baking!

And for the best walnuts, look for the Diamond brand. It's stamped on every shell—your assurance of fresh, sweet kernels. Or, get "Diamonds" already cracked for you—and packed to stay fresh in vacuum cans or clear bags.

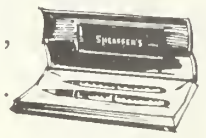
1. SKILLET SUNDAE SAUCE

In ¼ c. butter, lightly brown 1 c. coarsely chopped Diamond Walnuts. Remove from heat. Add one 6-oz. pkg. (1 c.) Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels. Stir till melted and smooth. Serve warm over ice cream or warm cake squares. Yield: 1¼ c.

2. MARSHMALLOW CREAM FUDGE

The quick directions are on both Nestlé's Chocolate and Diamond Walnut packages.

3. TOLL HOUSE® MARBLE SQUARES



Preheat oven to 375° F. Sift together 1 c. plus 2 tbs. sifted flour, ½ tsp. baking soda, ½ tsp. salt—set aside. Blend ½ c. soft butter (or shortening), 6 tbs. granulated sugar, 6 tbs. brown sugar, ½ tsp. vanilla, ¼ tsp. water. Beat in 1 egg. Add flour mixture—mix well. Stir in ½ c. coarsely chopped Diamond Walnuts. Spread in greased 13″x9″x2″ pan. Sprinkle one 6-oz. pkg. (1 c.) Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels over top of dough. Place in oven 1 min. Remove from oven and run knife through dough to marbleize. Return to oven and continue to bake. BAKE at: 375°F. TIME: 12-14 min. Cool. Cut in 2″ sqs. Yield: 2 doz.

4. CHOCO-WALNUT WHIZZERS

Preheat oven to 375° F. Melt two 6-oz. pkgs. or one 12-oz. Jumbo pkg. (2c.) Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels over hot (not boiling) water. Remove from water. Stir in ⅔ c. sweetened condensed milk, 1 tbs. water, 1 tsp. vanilla—DO NOT BEAT. Stir in 1 c. finely chopped Diamond Walnuts. Drop by rounded tablespoonfuls, 2″ apart, on ungreased cookie sheet. BAKE at: 375° F. TIME: 10 min. Remove from oven. Press 1 after-dinner mint into top of each. Top with Diamond Walnut half. Cool thoroughly. Remove from cookie sheet. Yield: 2 doz.

Give her the lady-like pen that never goes near an ink bottle

Give HER the exquisite Lady Sheaffer pen. The warmth and charm of a lady's handwriting can only be captured by a good fountain pen—and here's the most feminine one of all. The Lady Sheaffer pen shuns ink bottles, refills cleanly and easily with drop-in Skrip cartridges. Many models to choose from, each jewel-crafted with precious metals. Pens from $10, matching pen and pencil sets from $14.95. For a jewel of a gift, give her the Lady Sheaffer pen.

SHEAFFER'S

© 1960 W. A. SHEAFFER PEN CO., FORT MADISON, IOWA • SHEAFFER PENS • MAICO HEARING AIDS

MIRROR on the wall

Are you suffering from that tousled, straight-from-the-haystack look? Are you letting other women look chic and gorgeous, while you match your husband's beige raincoat? Aren't we all?

I'm tired of all this nonsense about beauty being only skin deep. That's deep enough. What do you want—an adorable pancreas? Personally, I find that it's work, work, work just trying to keep this top half inch in shape. And while I'm on the subject, the first rumor I want to scotch is that I don't care how I look. Care? Why, I haven't even read The House of Intellect, I've been so busy reading every single one of those articles which insist that I can be a younger, lovelier me this autumn. Actually, I intended to be a lovelier, younger me last winter, but what with one thing and another (we had to put in new linoleum around the kitchen sink, and the oil burner broke down), I never got around to it. But from now on there will be no more excuses. I am going to mend my fences and learn the trick of artful make-up.

I think I ought to make it clear that I am not primarily concerned with my social appearance. If I turn up at dinner parties with that tousled, straight-from-the-haystack look that is so unaccountably attractive in Italian movie actresses, I don't think it matters, because I happen to have this little trick which always endears me to hostesses. I invariably ask the young children who pass the stuffed celery what grade they are in. Of course one does have to look right at the children or, at the very least, keep in mind that they push on and age just like the rest of us. Last week I asked a young man who was urging a sixth deviled egg upon me, "And what grade are you in, dear?" only to learn that he was in Harvard Law.

Nevertheless, I feel I am rather sweet at dinner parties; let other women be chic and gorgeous. The one place I have simply got to look better is the department store, when I go in there to buy face powder. It has been my practice in the past to double-park the car and dash into the store with the air of one arriving at Radio City Music Hall two minutes before the prices change. (I always leave the motor running so the policeman can feel pretty sure I'm going to be right back.)

Now it's a curious fact that I can go into Housewares and stand among the pots for thirty-five minutes without attracting the attention of a single salesgirl, all of whom appear to be working out long-division problems on their little pads. But in Cosmetics I get attention, immediate attention. The salesgirls as far away as Perfume drop everything and gather about me making little clucking sounds. They really respond with the amiable ferocity and instinctive good will of a bevy of well-trained St. Bernards coming upon a stiffened form in an Alpine pass. At last—here is someone they can help.

May they suggest a blossom-pink make-up base? Do I need an herbal facial mask? What about a rich skin food for those fine lines? It is fruitless in these circumstances to explain that I already have enough cosmetics in my bathroom to make up every single extra in The Ten Commandments. They see what they see. And what they see is a pale beige face that blends, in a way that is almost uncanny, with the raincoat I'm wearing which happens to belong to my husband. As I can plainly see for myself in the large mirror on the counter, I look exactly like a peeled grape—a condition which is not really appetizing even in a grape.

Of course I need an herbal facial mask, and a cream to give new life and luxuriance to my eyelashes, and a lotion to remove those telltale signs of age. And it's nice that I'm going to have something for those signs of age, because I have definitely aged in the last five minutes and those fine lines are now becoming furrows as I realize—with mounting panic—that I have just spent $38 on assorted cosmetics when what I really need is a box of face powder, and a raincoat of my own.

As I tear myself away from these ministering maidens (I know they think I am returning to my coal barge) I keep wishing I could somehow convey to them that, all appearances to the contrary, I do have a conscience—style and beauty wise. If they but knew that before the discovery of the hydrogen bomb I used to spend all my time worrying about my dry skin. Anyway, the next time I go into that store I will be wearing three layers of make-up all exquisitely applied. And the salesgirl will no more think of urging an extra product upon me than an art-supply dealer would dream of pressing Picasso into trying a new burnt umber.

MIRROR

Unlike some women, I can tell if a cream is an absolute necessity merely by reading the advertising. I can also tell if it's intended for me. For instance, if the ad begins: "At last—an entirely new concept of skin care intended for you who are tired of trying every new skin cream that comes on the market," it has to mean me because I am tired of trying every new skin cream that comes on the market.

I don't want to hear

Now, fully alerted, I read on to discover that "After four years of careful laboratory experimentation, Mildred Rosnick announces 'Formula 22,' a cream made exclusively from the lungs of young goldfish."

There, don't you just know that will help? I mean, you have only to pause and consider how clear-eyed and spruce even middle-aged goldfish look to one Word out of realize Mildred Rosnick has stumbled onto something pretty important.

My husband has a different angle altogether. He is always trying to explain to me that dermatologists have proved that lard, or even bacon drippings, will do just as much or just as little to lubricate the human skin as any cosmetic ever invented. Now I ask you, if dermatologists had really proved anything as ridiculous as that, wouldn't we all know about it?

you

By Jean Kerr

Of course the thing about my husband is that he is not really on this planet. He's the kind of man who will come home from a cocktail party and tell you about the fascinating conversation he had with a new editor at Simon and Schuster who feels that all these new beat-generation authors are merely a reflection of the mass protest against the thermonuclear potential. I mean, that's his idea of a gossipy titbit. Later, I will hear that she was one of the guests, and I will fly at him accusingly: "Listen, Peggy says that Marilyn Monroe was at that party," and he will say, "That's right, I guess she was." And a man like that will presume to give advice.

I'm sure it would be a help in any program of beauty to set oneself a simple goal. Personally, I concentrate on keeping myself in a state of repair just sufficient to stop people asking me if I remember how charming Ethel Barrymore was on the opening night of Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines.

But one can set one's sights too high. Just last week, in the beauty parlor, I witnessed a poignant example of this very thing. A rather mousy matron handed the hairdresser a picture of Suzy Parker, her lovely profile glimmering beneath a mass of titian curls. "See," the lady explained rather ingenuously, "this is the way I want to look." Honey, we all do. But a mountaineer doesn't start with Everest.

I try to pick a model closer at hand, like any one of those young women who appear on the society pages handing each other checks for the Milk Fund. What an elegant crew they are—so svelte in black, so chaste in that solitary strand of pearls. "Lovely Mrs. Philip van Renssaeler Skylark III," I read, quite consumed with envy, "is celebrated for her candlelight suppers. Though Mrs. Skylark is the proud possessor of two young daughters, three whippets and a myna bird, she still finds time

CONTINUED ON PAGE 161

Give him the bold new pen designed exclusively for men

Give HIM Sheaffer's new PFM, Pen For Men. It looks, feels and writes the way a man's pen should! Men like the new large capacity and solid grip of the husky, broad-shouldered barrel. The PFM pen's unique point is hand-ground for smoother writing, then molded into the barrel so it can take man-sized pressure. Sheaffer's exclusive Snorkel Pen clean filling action, too! Pens $10 to $25, pen and pencil sets $14.95 to $35. Just say "PFM, Pen For Men."

SHEAFFER'S®

© 1960, W. A. SHEAFFER PEN CO., FORT MADISON, IOWA • SHEAFFER PENS • MAICO HEARING AIDS

CHAMBERLAIN

...the penetrating lotion that moisturizes, softens and helps check your

DRY SKIN

AFTER BATH

Cologne-clear Chamberlain Lotion leaves your body smooth and velvety... helps prevent skin dryness often caused by daily bathing. Penetrates and disappears quickly. Never sticky.

CHAPPING

Chamberlain contains more rich, healing-aid glycerols than any other leading lotion. Instantly moisturizes dry, chapped hands. Protects, softens and soothes detergent red hands.

LEG ROUGHNESS

Chamberlain Lotion is wonderful for keeping the skin on your legs soft, smooth, and velvety. Try it and see how roughness vanishes, how easily you can slip on your sheerest nylons.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

FREE DISPENSER with $1.10 size
Two other sizes, 55c and 33c
At all toiletry counters

CHAMBERLAIN
Golden Touch
LOTION
CHAMBERLAIN DISTRIBUTORS, DES MOINES 6, IOWA

LIBRARY ON A SHOESTRING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 33

higher than the station wagon, or in early summer when the slopes are alive with mountain laurel and wild columbine.

Next stop is a small country store and post office.

"My, how they do read in Rockoak!" says Ruth Baker proudly. "Emma Eckstein reads every book we bring, and so does twelve-year-old Kenny Miller."

A check of the 30 books left last month reveals that 75 persons read them; yet in driving by one sees only the store, a couple of isolated farms, and noisy Waterlick Run beside the narrow road. Many regular readers live back in the hills or in the sudden small lovely valleys that momentarily flash into view around sharp curves.

There are no librarians at Needmore, Frosty Hollow, Lost River, or any of the other rural areas served. From 20 to 40 books are left at each stop; during the next month readers will check out and return their own selections. They may also leave requests for specific books—at Mathias a woman asks for Mein Kampf.

Swinging back across the mountain by another road, the women exchange smiles as they pass the bend where once they were stopped by a wildcat in the road. They have driven almost 150 miles by the time they return to Moorefield. Ruth remarks, "Well, we couldn't have had a nicer day—but we say that every time! See you next Tuesday for the school run."

From its inception, the library has subsisted by volunteer effort. Started by the Moorefield Woman's Club nearly forty years ago, with three shelves of books, it expanded in a year to more than 1200 volumes. Finally able to stand on its own feet, it was incorporated in 1939 as the Hardy County Public Library, with both men and women on the board.

The library was for the whole county, and its sponsors realized that the more they could bring people to feel identification with it, the more books would be used—and the more donations might be forthcoming. They talked "library" at every opportunity, to everybody they met (they still do!); Margaret Allen, former newspaperwoman, found intriguing news stories (always with names) in every smallest library activity. The Moorefield Examiner has always been generous with news space and editorial drumbeating in the library's behalf.

Originally housed in the clubroom, later in rented upstairs space, the library (now with 6000 books available for readers) was overflowing its quarters; but a new building seemed at that time an impossible dream. Then a $5000 bequest from a long-time volunteer and another $2000 raised by community effort, plus hard work and careful planning, made the dream come true.

Plans were home-drawn, with, advice from the architect husband of a friendly librarian in another state; businessmen and school officials furnished supervision and supplies, many at cost; local labor built the 30′x60′ brick structure. And when the governor of West Virginia dedicated the library, in October, 1952, the handsome program gave credit to every person who had had a part, from board chairman Mrs. H. S. Pownall to laborer Tom Barnes.

Memorial gifts, such as the low, round oak table in the children's section, helped to furnish the library. The Woman's Club equipped a small kitchenette. The club now meets in the library, as do the 4-H Club and the Community Council. School exhibits are displayed there, and on election day the library is a polling place—$30 rent is garnered from that activity.

Library funds come from many sources: individual contributions; memorial gifts of books or money; donations from the Farm Women's Clubs, whose reading lists are consulted in selecting books; school children hold Library Tag Day; the Friends of the Library give solid support; and a House and Garden Tour of the several lovely old postcolonial homes in the valley nets from $200 to $300 annually.

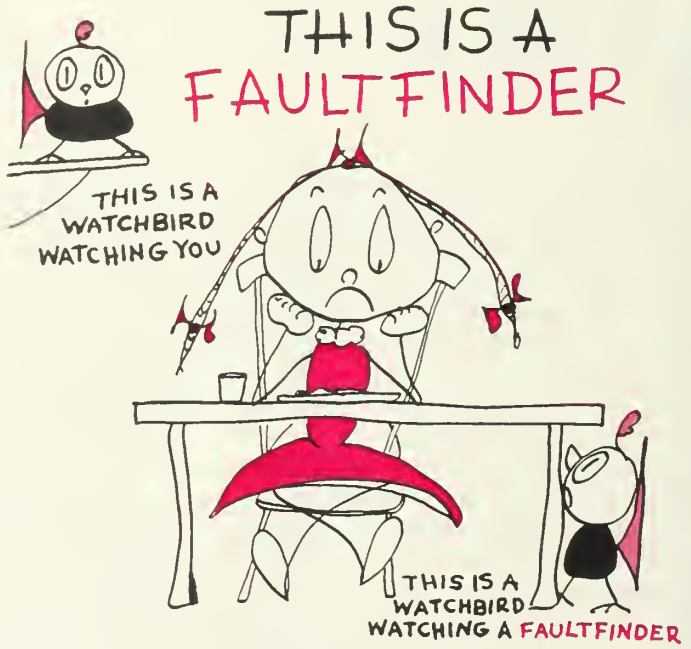
The library has no tax base, but the town, county court and the school board each votes allocations on a yearly contingency basis. (Last year: town, $300; county, $400; school district, $100.) Thus tax-supported, it qualifies for help under the Federal Library Service act.

But since West Virginia is unable fully to provide matching funds, the State Library Commission has never received all the Federal money it might—regional library service is now provided to only 10 of the state's 55 counties. Furthermore, state law stipulates that the commission may give help, books and guidance—but not money—to individual libraries; for financing, Hardy County must help itself. The library has received, on "permanent loan" from the state commission, a welcome $1300 worth of standard reference books; and a consultant drops by at intervals to help, when possible, on particular questions which have arisen.

One big problem seemed insoluble: making the library more easily accessible to people who live miles from town. "If we only had a bookmobile," they dreamed—but bookmobiles cost $6000 and up. Impossible.

Then the state commission declared surplus the old truck with which it had started regional demonstrations. Unlicensed, uninspected, bad rubber—and 240 miles away in the state capital. The board met hurriedly, voted, mailed a $100 check—and owned a bookmobile. The commission added a loan of 500 books, and three Hardy Countians volunteered to go to Charleston and bring the truck home the long way, avoiding mountains it couldn't negotiate.

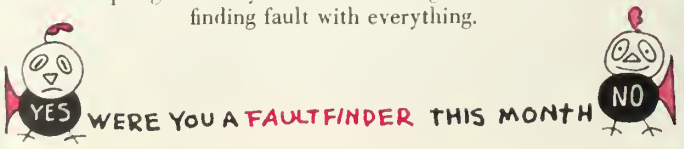
One Moorefield garageman repaired and inspected the vehicle as his library contribution; another garaged it for the winter; a third provided new tires at less than cost; and the county court appropriated its first $200 for county library service.



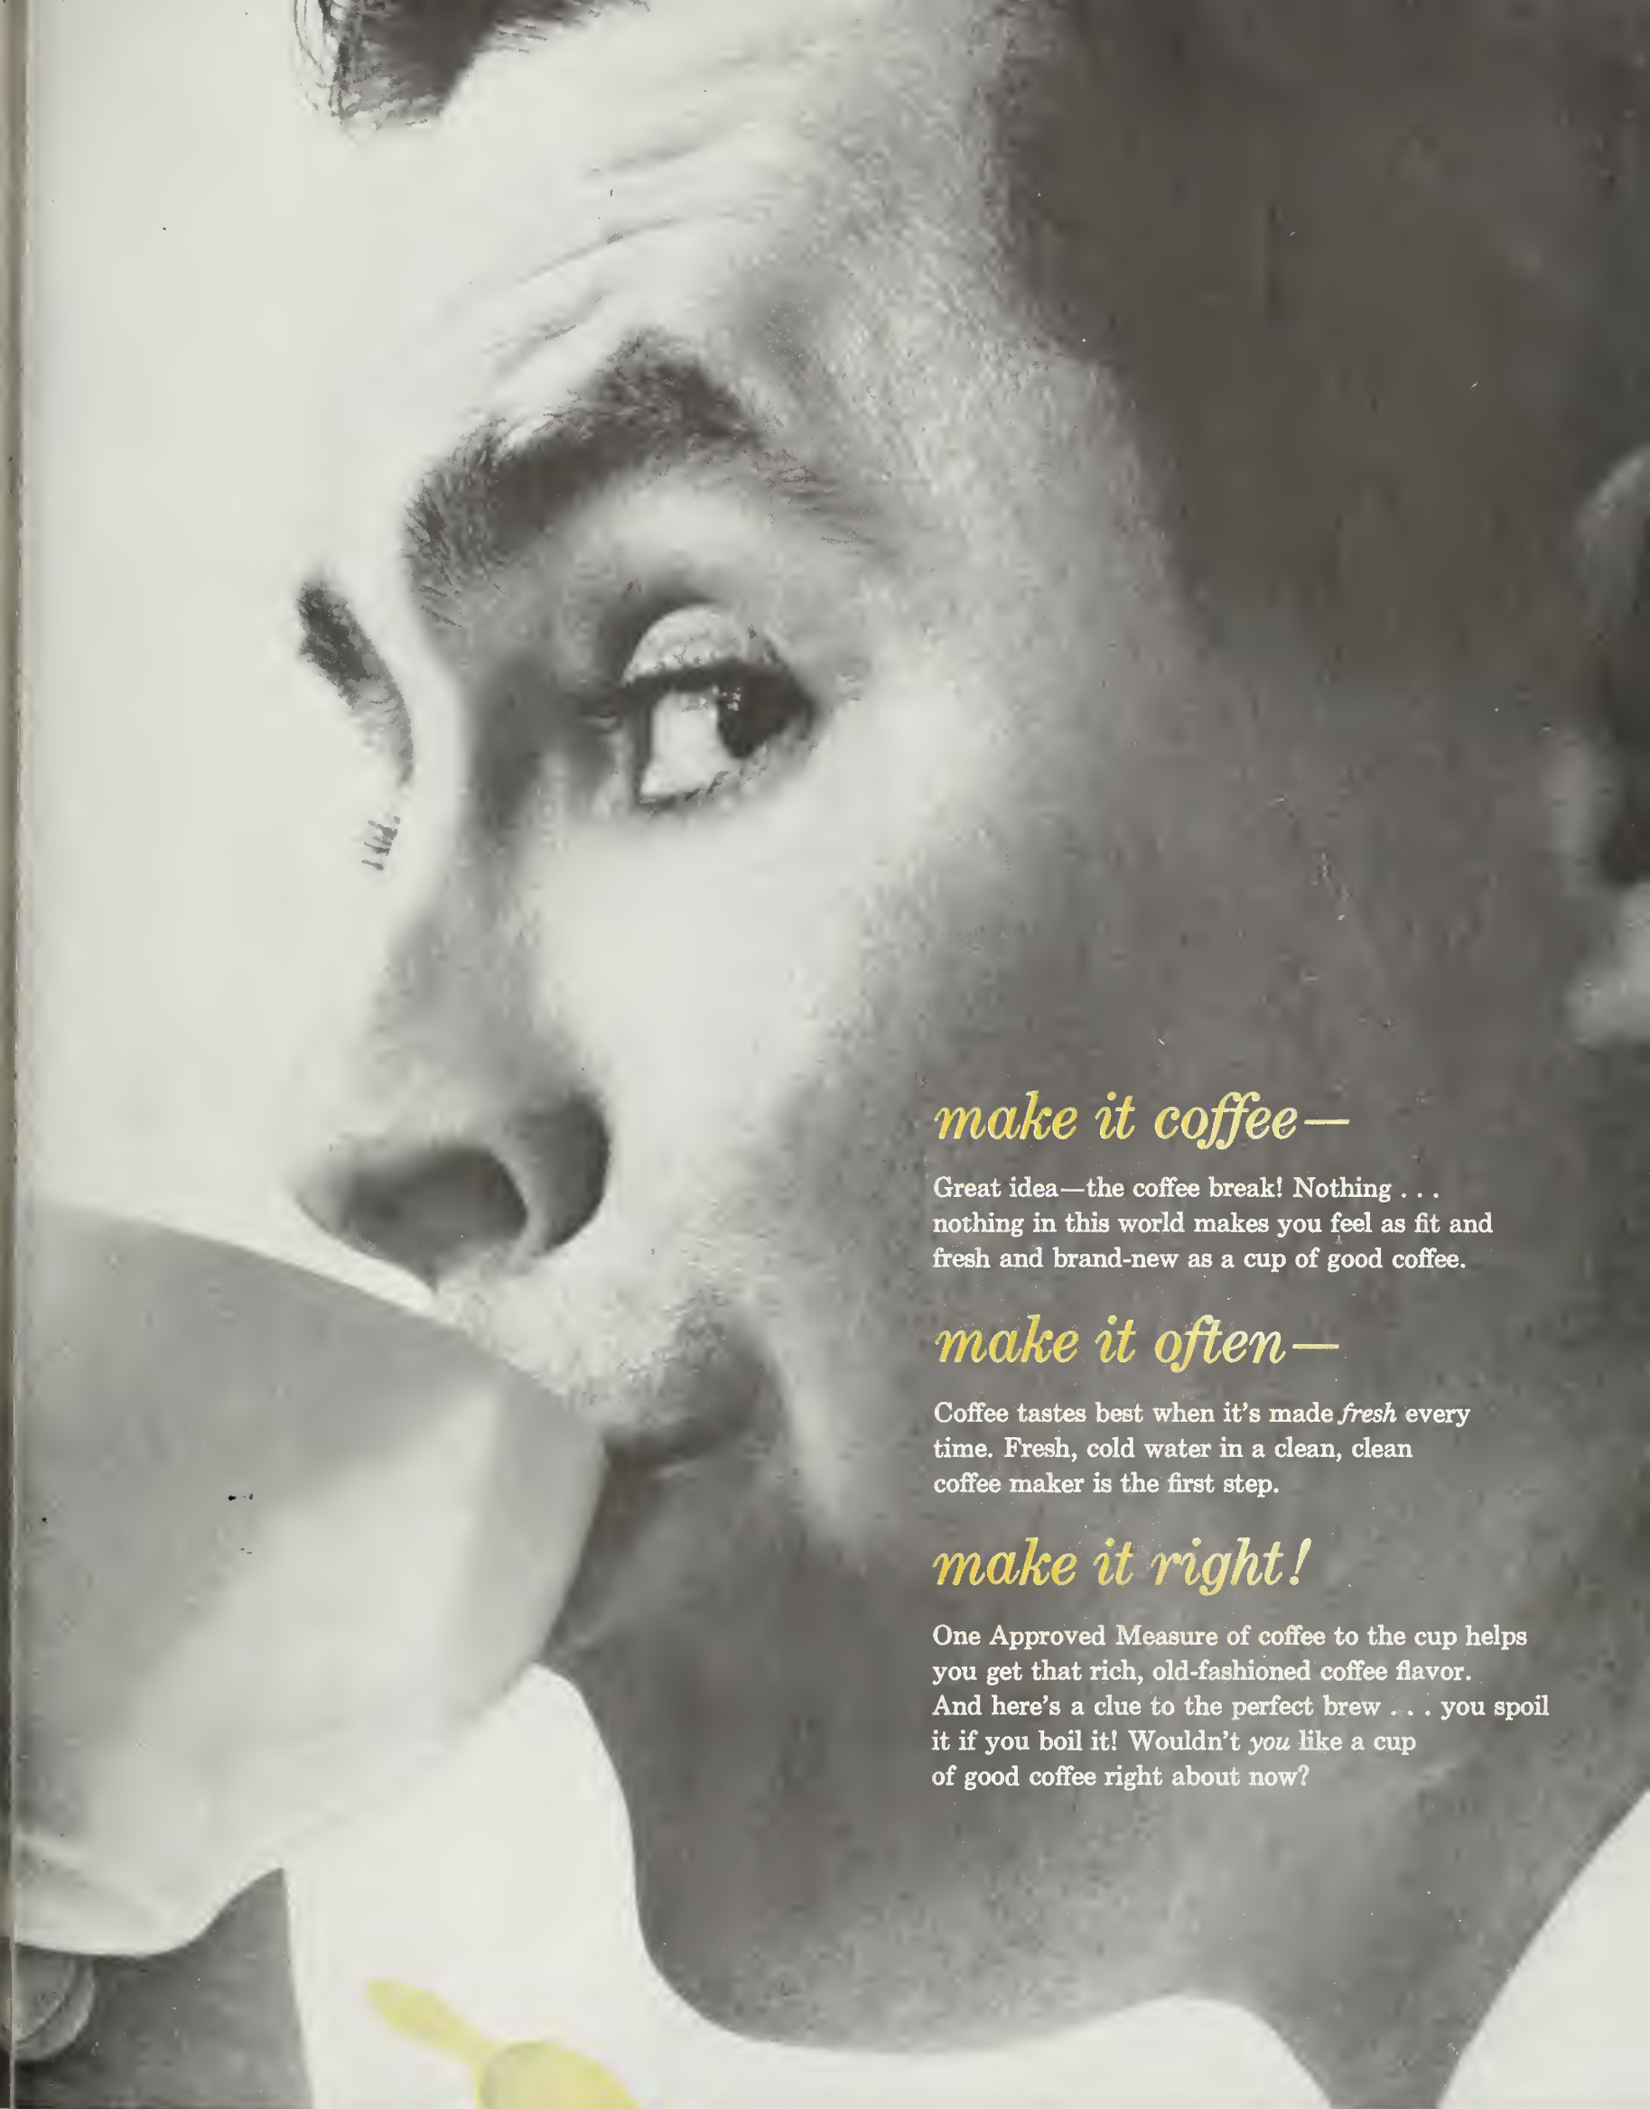
Pleasure in the "new" bookmobile was somewhat diluted by the fact that the balky, top-heavy vehicle, with its complicated gearshift, was almost impossible for a woman to handle. A high-school honor student "won" the privilege of driving; when Billy went on to college in the fall his place was taken by one of the school janitors—no reader, but a deft double clutcher and inordinately proud of "our book wagon."

The old truck gulped huge quantities of gas but still crept over the mountain roads so slowly that "everything passed us on the up grade—even heavily loaded coal trucks." Little time was left for checking books off the steel shelves at each stop, and many potential readers could not be there at the right moment. "If you could leave a few books, we'd clear off a shelf," offered a grocer's wife 40 miles across the mountain.

That was the beginning of the deposit stations. With the board's approval, Ruth and Margaret added more country stores. And they thought aloud: If we could do this exclusively, people could check out books for themselves . . . they wouldn't have to wait for us in the cold . . . they could get books any time . . . and maybe we could trade the bookmobile on something we could drive!



They worked and waited and talked about the need. Soon a dealer found a dairy farmer who had a secondhand station wagon and needed a delivery truck. They needed boxes in which to transport books for each station; the local hatchery gave sturdy cartons with covers and handholds, in which hatching eggs had been shipped—"just right for a couple of women to load and tote." Now they gaily pass the coal trucks and the drivers wave and smile because the station wagon has HARDY COUNTY PUBLIC LIBRARY lettered on its sides, and everybody knows its errand.



Current need is for a full-time, paid library worker, "Not a librarian with a degree but an intelligent girl who will learn simple library techniques and take over the increasing heavy job of running the library and bookmobile." This will raise the budget to around $4000, and will require more tax support and more community commitment. As yet they do not have the funds in hand, but they have already hopefully hired pretty Joyce William for the post. "We'll find the money somehow," cheerfully says Mrs. Vernon Welton, present board chairman. "We are working, as we always have, in the faith that if the distaff is ready, the Lord will provide the flax." E

By MUNRO LEAF

This very unpleasant creature is a painful thing to have in any house. It is a Faultfinder. No matter what its mother gives it to eat, it finds fault with it. It moans that things are too hot, too cold, too sour, too sweet, too hard, too soft—too, too anything at all. People get awfully tired of listening to Faultfinders finding fault with everything.

make it coffee—

Great idea—the coffee break! Nothing . . . nothing in this world makes you feel as fit and fresh and brand-new as a cup of good coffee.

make it often—

Coffee tastes best when it's made fresh every time. Fresh, cold water in a clean, clean coffee maker is the first step.

make it right!

One Approved Measure of coffee to the cup helps you get that rich, old-fashioned coffee flavor. And here's a clue to the perfect brew . . . you spoil it if you boil it! Wouldn't you like a cup of good coffee right about now?

For your Coffee Brewing Institute Approved Measure in bright red, yellow or blue plastic, with a folder of coffee-making suggestions, send ten cents to PAN-AMERICAN COFFEE BUREAU, P.O. Box 33, Old Chelsea Station, New York 11, N. Y.

Sun pours in the large window, complementing warmth of color scheme, based on orange, yellow and white printed cotton. "Big" purchases were sofa, rug, two chairs. Other pieces, such as Windsor chairs, lamp table and chest, are secondhand, either repainted or refinished. Flooring and fireplace remain from before the fire. The standard hibiscus, upper right in picture, is thirdhand, blooms almost continuously.

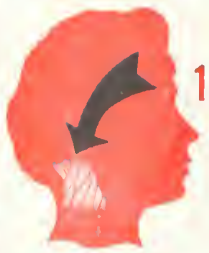
HOW AMERICA LIVES

A GRACIOUS ROOM FOR ADULT LIVING

Frank and Judy Perron's new living room, built on the remains of their burned-down house, is casual, roomy and very much for adults. Most of the big house is given over to the four children and their activities, but the living room is definitely to be for grown-up entertaining, relaxing, and enjoying together as a family. This decision, which was arrived at by the parents when they planned the new house, was strengthened the night the children toasted marshmallows over all the cigarette lighters.

A big room, thirty-five feet long, it lends itself to planned "areas." Informal groups of friends tend to gather around the huge, warming fireplace, bringing up lightweight ottomans for extra seating. In front of the sliding glass windows onto the deck, a small game table accommodates two or four for playing cards or just plain chatting. A perfect spot for reading or study is the long desk along the bookcase wall, and the re-covered studio couch at that end of the room just asks you to curl up on it to knit, read or listen to music. By H. T. WILLIAMS

PETER NYHOLM



Length of slab desk between bookcases allows ordered clutter and provides large work surface. The Siamese cats enjoy comfort of buttoned foam-rubber pad on old re-covered studio couch. Some of the pictures were salvaged from the fire, some collected since, as were the books, many of these given to them at their "shower."

WHAT DO DOCTORS DO FOR TENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES?

3 out of 4 recommend the ingredients in ANACIN® for headache pain

BETTER THAN ASPIRIN OR ASPIRIN WITH BUFFERING

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension

Nervous tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles.

2. Pressure

Tension puts painful pressure on nerves and tiny blood vessels in the head.

3. Pain

Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

When you suffer pain from headache, neuritis or neuralgia, why not take what most doctors recommend—the ingredients in Anacin! Here is why Anacin gives more complete pain-relief. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever. They have no special medication to relax your nervous tension. Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients, including special medication that not only relieves pain incredibly fast, but also relaxes tension and releases painful pressure on nerves. In this way Anacin assures a better 'total' effect in relieving pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not irritate or upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today!

FOR FAST--FAST--FAST RELIEF →

THE CANCER NOBODY TALKS ABOUT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 35

erations—removal of a diseased rectum, eation of a substitute opening in the abdo-n, called a colostomy—was forbidding. tients who survived the operation were her dreadfully handicapped.

Today all this is changed. Cancer of the lon and rectum is considered one of the sier cancers to cure—if caught in time. Re-ntly scientists in the departments of gastro-terology and surgery of the Graduate Hos-al, University of Pennsylvania, reported: he over-all cure rate of colonic cancer ex-eds that of cancer of any other site in the mentary canal. A large proportion of cancers the colon and rectum are curable if removed er the appearance of the first symptoms." far larger proportion would be curable if tected and removed before unmistakable mptoms have appeared

The methods employed today for cure of tal cancer no longer have the horrors of the rly ones. Surgeons now can operate so skill-ly, patients can be taught to care for the w waste arrangement so cleverly, that even noval of the rectum need no longer be a ndicap. A surprising number of men and omen are carrying on full business and social es after a colostomy.

It is still better news that surgeons more and ore are curing rectal cancer without having make a substitute opening. Unless the ease has progressed too far, in many cases ey can remove the diseased portion of the ctum, but leave the sphincter muscle and dy outlet intact. The severed parts of the tal tube are joined together; there is no dis-bance of natural function at all.

The same process can be carried out even ore easily with cancer higher up in the colon. ie diseased portion of the intestine is re-oved, the organ joined together; the colon rries on its work as though nothing had hap-ned. But to effect cures of this type, it is cessary to detect the cancer before it has read to adjacent organs; before its deadly ls have been carried to other body regions. Could Secretary Dulles' cancer have been ught at an earlier stage if the public had been structed about this cancer, its first symp-ms stressed, men and women without symp-ms examined for it routinely as they have ng been examined for the more socially ac-ptable forms of cancer?

Not all cancers of colon and rectum can be tected early enough for cure, even by the st diagnostic methods now available. But a very large percentage can be. Provided, that is, the silence that has protected this cancer up to now is done away with. Provided the public and the medical profession alike will face the facts about it as resolutely as they have faced unpleasant facts about cancers in other body sites.

The facts in themselves are not essentially different from those about cancers in general. What has put cancer of the colon and rectum in a different category heretofore is the peculiar nature of the organ in which it occurs and the body function this organ performs.

The colon and rectum together form the main conduit for removal of wastes from the digestive processes. The colon is around four and a half to five feet long in a woman of average size. The colon, also called the "large bowel" and "large intestine," rises clear over on the right-hand side of the body, out of the caecum, a pouchlike organ into which the appendix and small intestine, or ileum also open. The colon travels upward, crosses the abdomen, travels upward again a short distance then starts downward along the left side of the abdomen. In the lower left pelvis it veers over to the middle of the body, thence straight downward to the body opening. It is much wider than the small intestine and has a notable capacity for expanding and contracting. Its elastic, "accordion-pleated" sides also offer an ideal hiding place for growths of various kinds.

For the sake of convenience and more accurate description, anatomists have marked off this great canal into sections, giving each section a name: such as ascending, transverse and descending colon; sigmoid colon—the part of the tube which connects the descending colon, coming down on the left side of the abdomen, with the rectum; upper and lower rectum, and the like. But it is all part of the same system, and the system is the same in men and women. The two sexes are affected in the same way when cancer appears.

What causes cancer in the organ is not known. Theories attributing it to anything eaten or drunk have not been proved. There seems to be no connection with sex, for men and women get it in about equal measure. For some reason also unknown, women are more prone to cancer of the colon, men to cancer of the rectum. But both sexes can get either type. (Secretary Dulles' cancer, for instance, was reported as cancer of the colon.) As with most other cancer forms, much the highest incidence is in people over forty. But it can appear at any age.

It is not inherited, in the sense that parents transmit it to their children in the form of cancer. But a disease from which many cancers of colon and rectum arise does run in some families. Called "acquired intestinal polyposis," it is characterized by the formation of polyps in this part of the intestinal tract.

Ordinarily polyps are benign, and the great majority remain that way. Many persons have a few polyps or other type of harmless growth in the organ which never make any trouble at all. But the more polyps one harbors in the colon or rectum, the greater the likelihood that cancer cells will develop in one or more. The longer the polyps have been in the tract, the greater the chance of malignancy. Most cancers of the colon and rectum originate in polyps. Yet how many women know that polyps in this area should be searched for, and watched, as sedulously as lumps in the breast?

It is true that several symptoms of cancer of the colon and rectum have been included in the lists of cancer danger signals for years. But they have not been pinpointed as signs of a particularly horrid disease. Since the chance for cure depends primarily on the victim's alertness in seeking medical help at the first sign of something amiss, they must be pinpointed.

In rectal cancer, bleeding in the stool is often the first thing noticed. Second in order of significance may be a sensation of incomplete evacuation and a change in bowel habit. Stools may become more frequent or less frequent; looser or more constipated. At first the change is intermittent. If it is cancer, gradually the condition becomes worse and more persistent. Another symptom is pain in the rectum, with painful and often ineffectual straining.

When the cancer is situated higher up, change in bowel pattern may be the first significant symptom. Next comes a feeling of discomfort in the lower abdomen. Sometimes this takes the form of a sharp pain, as with rectal cancer. More usually it is a vague feeling of cramping, difficult for the victim to pin down. Vagueness, in fact, is characteristic of all the early symptoms of cancer of the colon. Often what brings the alert patient to the doctor is merely an awareness that something is wrong, rather than any pronounced and alarming manifestation.

As cancer of the colon progresses, the first vague symptoms become more definite. There is increasing discomfort from gas, perhaps to the point of actual ache. Next bleeding begins, as normal tissues are replaced by cancer cells—though the first bleeding may be very minor, perhaps nothing more than bloody mucus.

If the victim of colonic cancer is lucky, the malignancy will grow on the inside of the tube, causing bowel blockage. That will drive the sufferer to the doctor immediately. If unlucky, the cancer will grow into and along the wall of the bowel, destroying it over a wide area before any obstruction occurs. In such a case, bleeding may be the only warning sign given until the cancer is far advanced.

Moreover, in around one third of colonic-cancer cases, the bleeding is internal. There may be no evidence of it to the victim. But these persons do often develop anemia. Hence anemia may be a symptom of cancer of the colon and rectum. Sudden weight loss, for which there is no explanation, may be another.

Should these signs go unheeded, the cancer may spread into adjacent organs and loops of bowel. In a woman, it may move into the uterus or other female organs; in a man, into the prostate or bladder. In either sex the cancer may drop seedlets, which can be disseminated throughout the body.

The picture may easily become confused when a man or woman suffers from another bodily condition which produces some of these same symptoms. Hemorrhoids, to name a very common condition, also cause bleeding. There is no connection between cancer and hemorrhoids. But the two can exist together. The patient and even the doctor may be thrown off the track, unless the possibility of cancer is always kept in mind in any cases of bleeding, change in bowel pattern or persistent abdominal discomfort.

But there is a bright side to the picture too: the ease with which most malignancies in the tract can be discovered when diligent search for them is made. Though polyps and other types of abnormal growth can and do occur anywhere in the long meandering reaches of

BEST I EVER ATE

HOLIDAY MACAROON PIE

CRUST:

2 dozen macaroons
½ cup soft butter or margarine

FILLING:

½ cup milk
2 eggs, slightly beaten
⅓ cup sugar
Pinch salt
½ envelope unflavored gelatin
¼ cup cold water
1 cup heavy cream whipped
¼ cup finely chopped pecans
4 regular-size marshmallows cut small
1 slice canned pineapple, cut into small pieces
2 ounces candied cherries, chopped
Whipped cream (garnish)
Chopped candied cherries (garnish)

Crust:

Three or four days before you make the pie, buy the macaroons and let them dry out thoroughly. Then roll to fine crumbs. Mix the crumbs with soft butter or margarine. Press evenly into a 9" pie plate. Chill. Fill with fruit pudding and chill overnight. It is an advantage to get the dessert out of the way the day before Thanksgiving.

For the filling:

Make a custard in the double boiler of the milk, eggs, sugar and salt, cooking and stirring until custard coats the spoon. Remove from heat. Soften gelatin in cold water and stir into hot custard. Stir until dissolved. Chill. Fold in whipped cream, pecans, marshmallows, pineapple and candied cherries. If fruit sinks to bottom, put pudding in refrigerator—stir now and then until it is beginning to set. Pour into pie shell. Chill overnight. Garnish with fluffs of whipped cream and chopped candied cherries. Makes 6–8 servings.

5¢ this coupon worth 5¢ when you buy SCRUBBEE® POT CLEANER

STORE COUPON STORE COUPON

TO GROCER: We will redeem this coupon, plus 2¢ for handling, when terms of this offer have been complied with by you and the consumer. Any other application constitutes fraud. Get reimbursement from Scrubbee broker, or by mailing coupons to Scrubbee Products Corp., Newark, New Jersey. NOTE: Invoices proving purchase of sufficient stock to cover coupons presented for redemption must be shown upon request. Redeemable only by consumer to whom originally issued. We will not honor redemption through transferees, assignees, outside agencies, brokers, or others who are not retail distributors of our merchandise. Coupons will be void and subject to confiscation when presented contrary to terms of the arrangement. Any sales tax must be paid by customer. Void in places where its use is prohibited, licensed, taxed or restricted by law. Cash value 1/20 of 1¢.

SCRUBBEE PRODUCTS CORPORATION
63 Hoyt Street, Newark 3, N. J.
Offer expires January 31, 1961

5¢ 5¢ 5¢ 5¢

You have a use for KRYLON® SPRAY PAINT
No Muss! No Brush! No Fuss!
IF YOU PRIZE IT...KRYLON-IZE IT!

To make meat deliciously tender there's nothing like Adolph's
ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT FROM ADOLPH'S RESEARCH KITCHENS

PY-O-MY BROWNIE Mix?

Py-O-My is the original Brownie mix. Its old time flavor is unique. So is the handy aluminum pan it comes in. Makes chewy or cake-type brownies. Kids love eating and making them! Serve this week. Most grocers have Py-O-My.

Electrasol ends

FOAM CHOKE-UP

in your dishwasher

How new-formula discovery gives you spotless, film-free dishwashing!

New formula Electrasol frees your dishwasher from the sluggishness caused by foam choke-up! Releases torrents of water for all-out full spray action! Dishes come out spotless, your silver gleaming, your glasses sparkling . . . without a hint of dulling film . . . every single time! So let Electrasol restore full spray action to your dishwasher . . . whatever make you own!

Here is how foam choke-up builds up from food remains on dishes to strangle your dishwasher's cleaning power. Dishes come out muggy, glasses spotty, silver is streaked!

Here's how new Electrasol with its exclusive chemical formula frees your machine for full spray action. Dishes come out spot-free, glasses crystal-clear, silver dazzle-bright!

Does what no other dishwasher detergent can do . . . even in hardest water!

© 1960.

Another famous product of ECONOMICS LABORATORY, INC., St. Paul, Minn.

the colon, the great majority of malignancies grow rather close to the outer opening. One major cancer clinic reports that 90 per cent of the cancers of this organ were found within the last twenty-five centimeters (a little less than ten inches); 50 per cent in the last five inches. This is in contrast to benign growths, of which 34.5 per cent were located higher up.

According to the American Cancer Society, 60 per cent of the cancers of colon and reetum are within reach of the doctor's finger in a rectal digital examination; 70 per cent can be revealed by sigmoidoseopy. This word—accented on the next-to-the-last o—should become as familiar as "atherosclerosis" and "ileitis" became after President Eisenhower's two major illnesses. For it is today's best hope for detecting cancer of the colon and rectum in time for cure. The sigmoidoscope is a tube, with an electric light at its tip, which gently expands the sides of the rectum, and enables the doctor to see the inside of the rectum and colon as far up as twelve inches—well above the area where most cancers are found.

Many times the sigmoidoscope will also reveal a condition which indicates that there may be trouble higher up in the colon. The next step then is a barium enema, with X ray. The barium solution is opaque under the X ray. It shows up defects throughout the length of the colon, revealing deformities or abnormal growths if they are present. (The barium-enema-and-X-ray technique is used today only when there is cause to suspect an abnormal condition. Doctors are being chary of X ray except when it is definitely needed.)

Before long it is hoped that another potent technique may be available for early detection of cancer in remoter parts of the organ. A smear test, of the kind that has proved so lifesaving for women with unsuspected cancer of the cervix or uterus, has been worked out. But there are special difficulties in its use with rectal secretions. It is still so complicated that it is seldom employed except when there is reason to suspect cancer very high up in the colon. Scientists are engaged in an effort to perfect and simplify this technique. It would be invaluable in indicating persons who should have further, more searching examinations; perhaps reach the point where it can be used in mass screening, as is done now in some places for cancer of the cervix and uterus.

At time of writing, sigmoidoscopy at regular intervals remains the best protection against cancer of the colon and rectum. And it is particularly valuable for women, since women are more prone to malignancies in remoter parts of the organ.

Admittedly sigmoidoscopic examination has some features that set it apart from the routine examination techniques we are accustomed to. It must be prepared for in advance. The first time or two it may be something of an ordeal. (Though doctors say patients don't mind it when they get used to it.) There is no getting around the fact that sigmoidoscopy is more of a bother and discomfort than a routine examination for breast lumps; than a Papanicolaou smear for uterine cancer.

But let us go back now to the some 69,000 American men and women in whose colon or rectum, it has been authoritatively forecast, malignant cells will appear during 1960. Medical experience with this cancer indicates that around one fourth will be saved because, through either alertness or good luck, the cancer will be discovered in time. One half could be saved if they would go to their doctors as soon as they first realize that something is wrong. The cure rate could go as high as 75 per cent or higher if every adult would recognize the danger of cancer of colon and reetum; would submit to routine examination for it as for other types of cancer. Instead of 20,000 lives, 52,000 could be saved out of this year's new victims alone.

The first call to save these lives was issued on March 31, 1959, by Dr. I. S. Ravdin, director-at-large of the American Cancer Society, and surgical consultant to President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles. Addressing the American Cancer Society's second Cured Cancer Congress in Washington, he cited the cancer deaths of numerous senators, mentioning in particular Senators Vandenberg, Taft, McMahon, Neely, Wadsworth, Holt and Bilbo. He suggested that from now on members of Congress and other national leaders "accept the responsibility, as a condition of the office to which they were elected or appointed, of having regular physical checkups, including a sigmoidoscopic examination. I'd like senators and representatives to announce routinely, in any news letter to constituents, that they have just had such an examination."

Dr. Ravdin noted that Congress has not been indifferent to cancer. It has increased the Government's share in cancer-research funds from a few hundred thousand dollars, a decade ago, to $111,000,000 last year. What is needed now, Dr. Ravdin stressed, is the realization on the part of individuals that "it can happen to me." This applies to private citizens equally with Government officials.

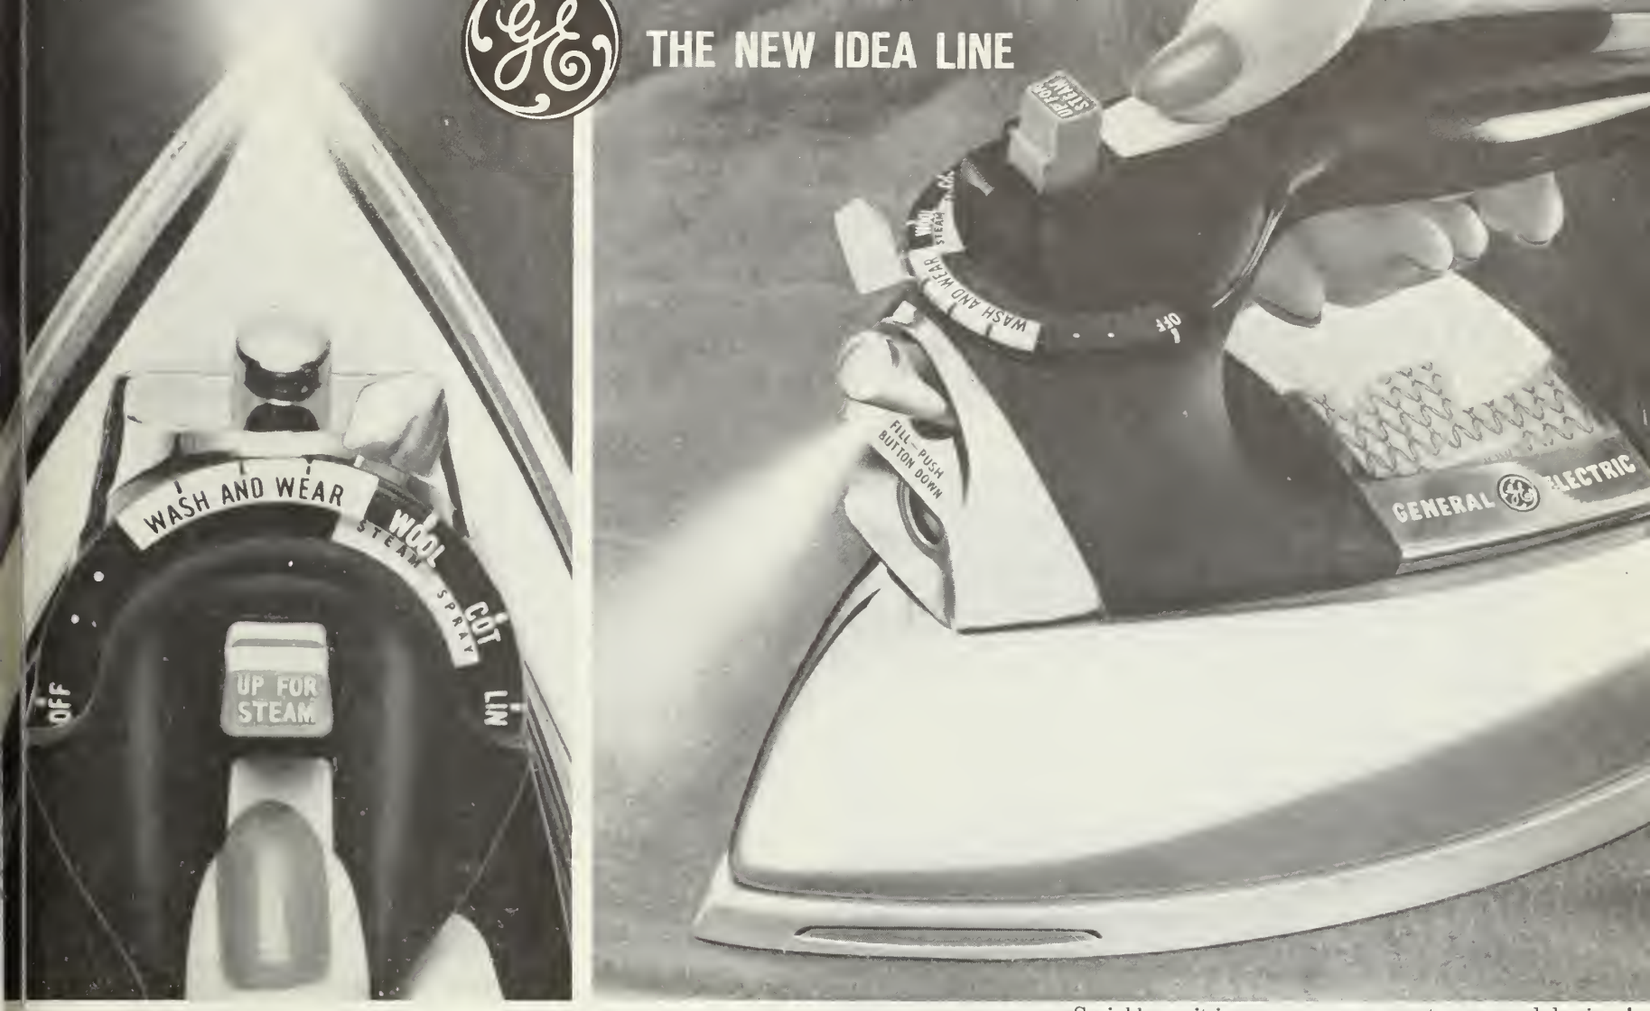
The American Cancer Society is planning a vigorous attack on cancer of the colon and rectum. The lifesaving effort will center upon a sigmoidoscopic examination as part of an annual thorough physical for American adults, an examination which will survey other cancer areas as well. This is considered adequate for persons who have had no symptoms of cancer and who have no polyps. As an extra cautionary measure, persons who have had polyps removed from the tract, whether or not the growths prove to be malignant, might well be examined more often than once a year; and have a barium-X-ray examination in addition to the sigmoidoscopy. This is to detect any new polyps that may have formed. Blood in the stool; change of bowel pattern that continues for more than a short time; any persistent pain in the abdomen—these call for immediate intensive investigation.

Persons who suffer from chronic ulcerative colitis are also in a special danger area. Like polyposis, this disease is often a precursor of cancer of the colon and rectum. A mild or moderate case of ulcerative colitis is less likely to turn into a malignancy. But anyone who has had severe, chronic ulcerative colitis for six years or more should be checked at once for cancer; and should be checked frequently thereafter.

Members of families which have a record of deaths from cancer of the colon and rectum should be examined for the presence of polyps beginning with early adulthood. For in these families, cancer is likely to occur at younger ages than in the general population. And polyps found should be either removed or watched carefully for the first signs of cancer.

The Cured Cancer Congress, recently instituted by the American Cancer Society, offers inspiring proof that awareness and alertness can defeat this most dreaded of diseases. Cancer of the colon and rectum can be defeated, too, in the great majority of cases. It will be, when the mistaken squeamishness which has protected it up to now is done away with.

EN



NEXT MONTH

Emily came home from school and, with scarcely time to unpack, plunged into two weeks of partying—eight luncheons, five dinner parties, eight dances, three receptions. For this is Emily Tyler's year—the year of her debut in Richmond, Virginia, society. She has spent most of her nineteen years anticipating it, and will remember it always.

DEBUTANTE IN THE STATELY TRADITION

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the December Journal

Sprinkles as it irons . . . new spray . . . steam . . . and dry iron!

New...three wash and wear settings!

Now . . . all of your ironing problems are solved by a single iron . . . The new General Electric Spray, Steam and Dry Iron.

It sprinkles as you iron. Press a button and even the heaviest wrinkles are sprayed damp—ironed flat in a shake.

A new sensitive even heat system solves ironing problems formerly left to guesswork. Even the most delicate new synthetics and wash and wear fabrics can be ironed with complete safety . . . In fact you can even steam iron many fabrics you wouldn't dare before!

We seriously doubt whether any dry, steam, 2-way or 10-way iron can match this one in versatility . . . See for yourself at your General Electric dealer's.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

General Electric Company, Portable Appliance Department, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.

*Trademark of General Electric Co.

A toaster and "oven", too! General Electric Toast-R-Oven* makes toast on top—makes melted cheese sandwiches in "oven" below.

Beats, whips, mixes drinks—now sharpens knives! New General Electric Portable Mixer has optional knife-sharpener accessory.

Reheats without reperking! Automatic Coffee Maker has special reheat setting. Easy-to-clean stainless steel protects flavor.

Built upon ashes, the Perrons' new kitchen is prettier, performs better than the old one.

Mother–Daughter KITCHEN

By MARGARET DAVIDSON Homemaking Editor

ABBOT MILLS

It's lunchtime and there is buzzing activity as Judy Perron tends hot dogs in the electric-range broiler. Daughter Lucy (twelve years old) sets out the dishes and son Michael (who is ten and hungry) reaches for a snack.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

It's an easy step across the long kitchen from sink to range to refrigerator—and fortunately passers-by do not interrupt any of the activity.

A yellow refrigerator, a stainless-steel sink, nine feet of counter, all smoke-smeared and water-drenched—these were salvaged from the charred ruins of the Perrons' kitchen after the fire. So much was lost, they considered these like gold at the end of a rainbow. Experts pronounced the counters and sink sound. With an $80 reconditioning, the refrigerator was ready for service.

The new kitchen was designed around these recoveries. But the Perrons saw to it that there was a practical approach to family fun and convenience for the cooks. Mrs. Perron looked at her schedule, full of notations about choir and play rehearsals and political meetings and such. She remembered that as the children grew older their interests would diversify. So flexibility was important. She listed her ideas—38 of them—for her dream kitchen. As is the way when turning dreams into reality, a few had to give way. But the kitchen is the result of down-to-earth planning.

"I'd rather not have an audience when I cook," Mrs. Perron said. On the other hand, daughters Lucy and Debbie are starting to cook. "I'm all for encouraging them, they learn best now. So we must have a place for the girls too."

A room that served mother and daughters was worked out by a plan that is rather long and narrow, with a basic cooking area at each end. The girls' end of the room has a lower counter (30″ high) where the girls can stir up their own concoctions without being in the way. There are outlets here for the electric cookers and fry pans in which most of their cooking is done.

The Perrons have planned so the youngsters can have their own brand of party, while the parents dine more quietly. A family room, with a big table for eating, leads from the children's end of the kitchen. The opposite end of the room opens into the dining room with a wide view of the terrace and patio. The influence of the old kitchen lingers, for the sunny scheme is planned around the yellow refrigerator and the white counter with aqua-and-green design that stood the test of fire. Against yellow walls are wood cabinets with a white, rubbed finish and great talent for storing things properly. Washable dress material makes curtains as gay as the good times the family has here.

"Most important are counters around the sink—on both sides if possible," Judy Perron said emphatically and truly. The plastic ones here, plus the stainless sink and yellow refrigerator, were all salvaged from the ruins after the fire and the new kitchen which you see here was shaped around them.

Via the pass-through, the family-room table is just an arm's reach away. The counter, table height, is handy for amateur cooks Lucy and Debbie (8). Their mother likes the low-height surface when using the electric frypan or griddle.

"I've always wanted a double oven, space for spices by the stove and a wastebasket you can get to without opening something." Mrs. Perron's new kitchen provides these—and more. The stainless electric cooktop fits between counters, has its own back panel with clock and timer. Her favorite blues and greens are in the vinyl-asbestos floor.

GUERRERO

"How I use Murine to soothe my eyes and so relax tension"

CARMEL QUINN
Radio, TV and Concert Star

"An entertainer learns to love bright spotlights, smoky rooms and excitement. But my eyes will never get used to the life. That's why I use Murine. Just a couple of drops soothe my eyes, and I feel refreshed, revived and relaxed completely." Try Murine yourself—to soothe your eyes and so relax tension. Keep a bottle handy—at home, in your office, in your car.

NEW!
SQUEEZE BOTTLE HANDY TO CARRY WITH YOU

Murine is also available in familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE for your eyes*

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U.S.A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

CROOKED THING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

as I remember him, remarkably stupid. However, that's how it was.

Tony was not part of my bunch or any bunch. As children we had teased him; later, we simply forgot him. A few girls giggled when he went out for football in our sophomore year, but he was underweight and he remained a sub, warming the beneh at games, and they forgot him again.

Tony's parents were dead. He lived next door to us with his uncle and aunt, a dim little man and a ponderous woman to whom my father referred, blasphemously, as Mrs. God. I shall never understand what made that woman tick. When Tony was small, she seemed to take downright pride in his isolation. "I make it a law," she would say, "that Anthony does not associate with boys who are rough."

Sometimes, back then, another boy would try to pick a fight with him in tentative friendship. But it never came to anything. He could dodge and run like the wind. He was a handsome, fair child, but we just put that down against him along with the way he got Excellent in deportment. Mostly, though, we had more important things to think about. In fact, I remember only one time in my childhood when I was sharply, vividly aware of him.

We were in the sixth grade, and the principal had come to our room on a prowl of inspection. Naturally, the teacher led with her ace. She shuffled through the arithmetic papers that had just been handed in, and passed one to him.

He examined it. He exhaled in admiration.

"Miss Ardley," he said, "your Anthony is a little gem."

I caught my breath in pity. I tried not to look, but in spite of myself my eyes turned to see how a child would bear such public shame. And Tony was smiling; smiling gently as he looked around the room in happiness, in trust.

Good glory, I thought, staggered, he thinks we're going to like him for it!

But after that, somehow, I never joined in when people said mean things about him, and once or twice I even defended him: "You'd be a nut, too, if you had his aunt for a mother. Believe you me, I live next door!"

And we got to the age where the outsider is no longer mocked or tormented, only forgotten. And then I had big, fluffy cootie garages and wore a butterfly locket, and I was Beth Collins, a vamp, part of the best bunch.

We were in math class. I was terrible at math, but I was also a spoiled only child. I took it cheerfully for granted that math was beneath me, the province of artistic and spiritual illiterates. Until that year, and Mr. McIntosh.

Mr. McIntosh was not, by my family's standards, a gentleman. He wore flashy clothes and a big garnet ring and he mispronounced words: "Y'arrange these roots in a colyoom, see?" He was new to the school, and on the first day I assumed that he taught math because he was too common to learn anything else but had to teach something so that he could coach football.

On the first day, no longer. For Mr. McIntosh had quality. As he stood before us, explaining, his features would kindle to light. The hand with the garnet ring would pull at the long chin, and the light would shine. "Y'see? Get it?"

And looking at that light, I made a discovery: math was not memorized mumbo-jumbo, it was reasoning. I had found out too late, but I knew what it was. After that, I would sit in his class like a deaf girl at a symphony concert, tantalized and oddly excited.

I was sitting there so one morning in late September: deaf, tantalized, watching the maestro. The windows were all open, though the air was cool. The sun shone through autumn haze with a diffused brilliance. A wide shaft of light came down from one of the windows, and dust motes wavered across it on the draft.

The lean, keen face was very much alive. The hand with the ring pulled at the long chin "Questions? Last chance."

The silence was, in effect, the swelling of his applause. Clearly he had made something evident to everybody but me. He dusted his hands together and smiled, the conductor taking his bow.

"Go ahead, then." And then, abruptly, "No, all but Abbott."

Beneath the first line he set down another, shorter.

"Crack that, Abbott. Present from the management."

I turned and looked at Tony.

The swath of light fell full upon his desk. His dark blue eyes were not upon the board. Rather, they appeared to examine something that an invisible hand held close for his inspection: something elegant, fine. His chin was squared out, but his lips curved as if in response to a subtle joke. He sat so, unmoving, for about ten seconds.

And in those seconds my heart started and slowed. A strange, melting softness went all through me. I saw his face, which I had seen so often and never seen before. I saw the clean hair fallen over his forehead. I saw his smile, beautiful, lost in its alien, masculine world of abstract thought.

Tony. Tony Abbott. Tony. As if it had been a stranger's name, my mind said it over. Tony.

He lifted his hand, pushed back the loose hair and began to write. I began to copy down the incomprehensible symbols from the board. It must have been a hard problem, for Dave Rogers uttered a comedy groan. By one of our articles of faith, Dave was a sketch. A few dutiful giggles rose. The sounds made me startle, flush; as if it were a gesture of concealment, I added my giggle to the rest.

> Success comes in cans. Failure comes in can't's. FRED SEELEY

Mr. McIntosh tapped the bell. Then he took a stride down the aisle and covered Tony's paper with his hand. He swiveled it about, and bent his head to read it where it lay.

"Yep. Yep. Wanna keep it?"

They were alone in the world. I thought, They don't know we're alive.

Then I saw Tony's hands. They rested on the desk, neither beautiful nor ugly; only squarish, ordinary hands. Yet as I looked at them the strange, sweet, faint feeling went through my body again. I tried to push it away.

Phyllis was whispering to Ellie, Daisy was sneaking a glance in the mirror of her compact, Dick was whistling under his breath, Dave was stretching. They were the bunch, the real world, a world where Tony Abbott had no place.

"That dope," I whispered. "That drip. Tony Abbott. I'm nuts."

I was the loudest of the bunch, laughing and jostling, when we got out into the hall.

Emotions for which we are unprepared do not simply walk in and take their place. Before that day I had entertained strong phantasies about men in the Foreign Legion, actors, aviators: "Beth . . . Elisabeth . . . do you know how beautiful you are?" But actual boys I cared about as one cares about money; they were vastly to be desired, yes, but as means, as security. When school let out, I had almost forgotten that new, strange amazement of the heart.

Phyllis walked home with me. She was one of the bunch, but she was also my oldest friend.

"You'll die," she said, "when you see me at Ellie's tonight."

"Spare me! I'm too young!"

"Wait! I forced mother to buy me that black chenille, the one she said would look out of place."

We had both brooded over it in the window of Rogers' Department Store. Her triumph was mine, shared without jealousy.

"Out of place!" I exclaimed. "Aren't they incredible?"

"This time of year you never know. I nearly froze in math. Those windows!"

I started as if a torn dress had fallen apart. She did not notice.

"They say he's a swell coach," she said, "but isn't it peculiar, anybody so sort of uneducated, teaching in high? And I thought it was awful, him and Wonder Boy, this morning."

"What—what do you mean?"

"Well, of course a drip like Tony Abbott, it didn't matter. But how was a new teacher to know that? It was so underbred, making a kid conspicuous that way!"

"I didn't notice," I said. "Listen, what records should I bring tonight?"

She laughed. "You and math! Do you just pass out at the door, coming in? Bring 'em all, why don't you? Except Whispering. Everybody'll bring that."

"Boy, won't they!"

And I was safe until I could leave her at our corner. But I knew now, and I knew hopelessly. I did love Tony, and he didn't know I was alive. And if he did, what could it mean but outer darkness?

It was, of course, a wholly dated problem. In these days the issue would have been simple: could I make him notice me, want to go steady? But in the 'twenties, nobody went steady until she was old enough to be formally engaged. The phrase itself was used only by the kind of people my mother called "common." A crush, a beau, yes—but within the bunch.

But members of a bunch conformed; beaux were to be accepted by no rash individual standards. I had forgotten, quickly and joyfully, what it was like not to be part of the bunch. But when I left Phyllis that afternoon I remembered. I remembered the empty feeling of being a ghost on the periphery of all that was real, alive.

My mother was out. I went into our kitchen and opened a root beer and took it into the wisteria arbor. The sun had gone behind the clouds just as I got home, the air felt unfriendly; but I sat there, hidden by the dusty, drying, still unfallen leaves. I sat and looked at Tony Abbott's house.

The root beer was gone and I was cold and telling myself that I was acting like a drip when his back door opened and he came out into the yard, with a football in his hands.

His hair had fallen over his forehead again and I remember how I suddenly thought, He knew it looked wrong and sissy when he was little and had to keep it slicked down; and now everybody's trying to look snaky like Valentino, he's got it wrong again.

He did not glance toward our house. He walked to the far corner of his yard and began to practice drop kicks. Secretly, I was bored by football; I scarcely knew a goal post from a left end. But so far as I could tell, he was good. His motions were awkward, but the ball traveled. Only his face was tense as if—yes, that was it—as if people were watching him waiting for him to miss. They were watching, waiting.

After a few minutes his aunt came around the corner of the house. She was a large, flat-faced woman who never went out without a hat and gloves, even to mail a letter. She had got nearly to the door when she saw him.

She spoke in a large, cold voice. "Since you are set on making yourself a laughing stock, Anthony, with this game to which you are wholly unsuited, I cannot stop you. But I still ask you to practice"—she made the word sound foolish—"practice elsewhere and not flaunt your defiance here."

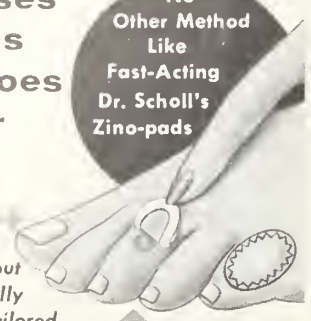
I wished that I had not seen his face as he heard her. It was not beautiful then, shut into its sullen, icy mask of hate. She waited for him to go into the house, and then she followed him. As soon as the door closed on them, I rushed out of my hiding place and ran to my room and shut myself in.

I told myself that I was crazy, wasting my time even thinking about that drip and his dopey aunt. Yet all the time my hands were moving as if they touched his face, as if the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 1

NEW
BETTY CROCKER
MILK CHOCOLATE CAKE MIX

There's real milk chocolate in it!



"We've put wonderful candy bar milk chocolate right in this mix. And you'll taste that chocolatey goodness in every tender bite. It's a high cake, a light cake, a meltingly rich cake—fragrant with mouth-watering milk chocolate. M'mm! M'mm! M'mm! Bake your Betty Crocker Milk Chocolate Cake today!" Betty Crocker

Ends Pain of Corns

Callouses
Bunions
Sore Toes
Tender Spots

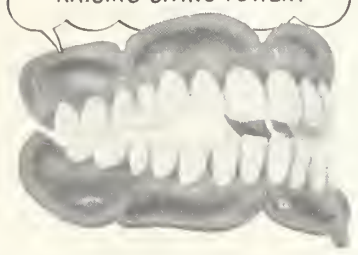
No Other Method Like Fast-Acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads



Not just a plain pad, but a scientifically designed, tailored, soothing, thin, softly cushioned application.

WATER-REPELLENT
Stays on in bath.

Multiple-acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads do more for you by far than any other method. Zino-pads not only stop pain of these foot troubles in a jiffy . . . not only stop corns, callouses before they can develop . . . not only remove them one of the quickest ways known to medical science—but also ease new or tight shoes! Get this wonderful relief of Dr. Scholl's today. At Drug, Department, Shoe and 5-10¢ Stores.

NOW! EAT BETTER, FASTER, MORE COMFORTABLY WITH FALSE TEETH BY RAISING BITING POWER!

When false teeth get on your nerves many dentists give special FASTEETH powder. It helps hold teeth in place—helps keep them from slipping or dropping down when you talk—makes you feel more secure. FASTEETH cushions tender gums so you can bite harder and eat easier, faster with greater comfort. FASTEETH helps you laugh and speak more clearly without embarrassment. FASTEETH is alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). At drug counters everywhere.

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAIN

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all – results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a world-famous research institute.

This substance is now available in suppository or ointment form under the name Preparation H®. Ask for it at all drug counters – money back guarantee.

melted away that icy mask of hate and made it again the way it had been that morning.

After a while, I tried to think about Ellie's party. But the right feelings wouldn't come back. It was as if everything I felt about Tony made me like him, an unwanted one and an outsider again, the girl I had been before I became the popular Beth Collins, the vamp.

It frightened me; I was frightened all through supper, and all the time I was getting dressed and waiting for Dave.

"I can't make my hair go right," I kept whispering. "I hate this dress."

But as soon as he had come, and I stood facing him in our hall, with mother smiling at us both, the automatic right words began. And they kept on, all the way to Ellie's and when we joined the bunch.

"Oh, Dave, you're ter-rible! Isn't he terrible? . . . Oh, Jim, what a line!"

It was all right, it was still all right. I was Beth the popular girl, the popular member of the best bunch.

We danced, we drank grape juice and Moxie, we ate Eskimo Pies. It was nearly eleven, and I was standing by the phonograph with Jim Hunt when Dick Whiteside came up.

"Listen, powerhouse, what about Crockett's bum knee?"

"Real bad," Jim told him. "Guess he's out for the season."

"Gollies. A quarterback like that. Who's the replacement?"

"Search me. It could even be Abbott."

"Aw, you're kidding."

"I am not. Mr. Mac's new, all he sees is how fast Squirrels can run home to mamma. I told Mr. Mac a real tackle could finish him with one arm and he just said, 'Listen, to be murdered you gotta be there.'"

"Well, he could have a point. There's been some real scrawny little backs in history."

"Not scrawny and screwy. No wonder they call him Squirrels. He gets ideas, like it was checkers, like you could tell ahead where people are going to be."

A group had formed around us. Daisy, the only one of the girls who really knew about football, not just faking, said, "Listen, Jimmy boy, ideas is what they call strategy."

"Listen yourself, bright girl, there ain't no one-man strategy."

"I missed the start of this. Who are we talking about?"

"Squirrels. Abbott."

She screamed and covered her face. "Excuse me!"

Everyone laughed very hard. I threw back my head and started to laugh with them, and I felt my throat harden. The laughter shouted, breaking over me like surf. I tried once more to join in and be noisy and merciless and part of their unquestionable rightness. And instead I heard my voice shrill up, high and sudden over all the noise of the room:

"You're all a bunch of dopes! I think ——"

They stared at me, almost as if I had materialized in their midst out of nothing.

Then Jim said, "She can think! Lookit who's thinkin'!"

They laughed again, but the laughter was not quite certain, and Dave looked distinctly unfriendly. After all, he'd brought me. Anything I did reflected on him.

"What do you mean, dopes?" he said. "What's so dopey?"

"Yeah," said Daisy, "did you ever look at Abbott?"

And what could I do?

"Abbott?" I said. "I just meant, I think Mr. Mac is swell. He's a swell teacher and a swell coach."

Their laughter was a shout of relief. I had not been out of line. I had only been absurd in an acceptable, cute way.

Jim waved his Moxie bottle above my head. "Ladies and gentlemen, our football strategist and mathematical brain!"

Somebody began to play Whispering. I put my right hand in Dave's thick, hot hand, I laid my left on his shoulder and rested my cheek against it in the style that our mothers most disapproved of. I made myself forget, as they had, that I so nearly stepped out of line.

and Dave and I took a long walk up Highland Road. Whenever I started to think of Tony, I would snap it off like a light.

The break-through did not come until late Sunday afternoon. I was in my room doing homework when, without warning, the physical sensation of melting, fainting, stinging sweetness ran through my body again.

I closed my eyes, to feel it better, as if it had nothing to do with anything but itself, pure bodily sensation and nothing more. At once, with hallucinatory sharpness, I saw Tony's hands on his desk. One of them lay in the full shaft of the sunlight, the other, the fingers curled slightly under, rested just outside of it.

I got up and went down to the sunroom. It was on the other side of the house, the side that faced Tony's. I stood there, staring out at the house he lived in.

Suddenly, more than anything else, I longed for sympathy; not for the false, false facts as the world would see them, but for my truth, Tony's truth. I went back upstairs and took the telephone into my room on its long cord.

"Phyl? I'm so blue. Are you alone, can you talk?"

"Why, Beth, darling, you sound awful."

"Do I?" I shut my eyes, feeling the first dim shape of the necessary lie. "Phyl, I never meant to tell anybody. But I . . . last summer I fell in love. It's—well—it's hopeless. We're both just trying to forget it."

Her voice was low, awed. "Oh, Beth." And then, hushed, "Is he married?"

"No. I can't talk about it, Phyl, it's better if we never speak of it again. I just needed to

"Oh, Beth. I'll never speak of it again. Oh, Beth."

"Thank you, Phyl. It—it helped Thank you. I guess I'd better just hang up now."

"Yes." Every drippy movie, every cheap novel we'd ever shared squeezed into that whispered, ecstatic—oh, and envious—syllable. "Yes."

I slammed the phone down on the floor and ran to the bureau. I pulled out my hairpins.

Sickening, sickening. I hated her, I hated the world.

I yanked the brush fiercely through the ratted-out sides of my hair.

Math class was the first hour. I let myself look at him only twice. He was everything that I had remembered, but the strange bodily response did not come back.

I was glad of that. I looked at him quietly and the moment was sufficient to itself. That morning, that one morning, I did not look ahead. I was even glad in an odd way of the world's blindness: perhaps because it is the essence of romantic love to believe that it knows a secret too rare for the world's understanding.

I thought that now I had made my full admission to myself, now that my heart was open, I would find ways to begin to know him. But a fortnight went by and nothing happened. He went to school and came back on his bicycle. I walked, and I had seldom gone more than a block or two before I was part of the bunch once more.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 158

NEXT MONTH

We Couldn't Give You Anything Better!

Best loved, most praised novel of 1961—that's what we prophesy for Rumer Godden's heart-enriching "China Court." It's the story of an English country house and the generations whose voices still echo within its walls. "No one goes in or out of China Court who isn't seen—seen and talked about," Cecily once said, thinking of all the gaudy and pitiful, tragic and strange, lovely, lovely life there. And Mrs. Quin mused happily, "He invited me in. I never went away again." Neither will you, so be sure to save your next four Journals.

Sweetest Christmas Ever Tasted

If visions of sugarplum strawberries dance through your head, we can supply the recipe. Delectable morsels, crimson and plump, they are made with almond paste and Journal know-how. Your family will be delighted, too, with your Holly Tree Cake or (even more impressive and just as easy) a chestnut-mocha roll shaped like ye olde yule log. Add our festive cookies, candies for long-lasting pleasure, and this Christmas will be most sweetly remembered.

Richmond Debutante—Admission to Her Home: $1.00

England is not the only country where aristocrats stop up the chinks in ancestral walls with tourist dollars. When clear-eyed Emily Tyler, direct descendant of John Tyler, tenth President of the United States, made her bow to Virginia society this summer, many more well-wishers than the 200 invited guests were familiar with "Sherwood Forest." These were people who at one time or another had paid to enter the family estate. But what of the private life lived there? Next month's "How America Lives" takes you directly into the whirl of parties, clothes, hair-dos, dances and delights that make the debutante season what it is for Emily—the prettiest year in a girl's life.

What's in a Handclasp?

Twenty-six-year-old Mrs. Foster's hand was pudgy, with the flesh bulging around her rings. It felt limp and lethargic. The doctor also noted a heavier than usual growth of fine hair on her upper lip and forearms. Even before she spoke, he had a pretty good idea of what her trouble was. "Tell Me, Doctor" is a regular Journal public service.

Also, beauty and fashion views to give any girl that debutante lift; a leave-you-breathless suspense condensed novel by Margaret Summerton; Christmas stories by Elizabeth Goudge and Neal Gilkyson Stuart; recipes for a Tidewater-style Christmas dinner, your old friend Dr. Spock; "Making Marriage Work"; and more besides in the December Journal

There's no other dog in the world like yours:

For 8" x 10" print of picture alone, send 25¢ in coin to Dog Picture 10, Box 7366, Chicago 77, Ill.

There's no other dog food like Ken-L-Ration with Lean Red Meat*

Here's what Ken-L-Ration does for your dog. It provides the kind of quality meat he is known to need most—Lean Red Meat—*steaks, chops and roasts of Gov't. Inspected Horsemeat. This high-protein diet plus other essential ingredients helps to keep your dog fit, not fat . . . in continued good health and good spirits. It's so wholesome the Dept. of Agriculture Seal appears on every can. So good that it's America's largest selling dog food. PUT YOUR TRUST IN KEN-L-RATION...MORE PEOPLE DO!

Packed Under Continuous Inspection of U.S. Dept. of Agr.

And every day he looked more beautiful to me; and every day I knew more and more surely that he and the bunch would never mix.

On the Friday of the second week I walked home with Phyllis "They've started asking," she said. "Dick asked Daisy."

I knew, of course, that she was speaking of the dance after the first game. A year ago we would have avoided the subject painfully. Now I said, "I guess Jim will ask you."

"Let's pray. Now you've got Dave really sewed up."

She said it with respect. She took this year's Beth for granted; but Dave was luck beyond luck. Yet my voice was dull as I answered, "I guess so."

She took my hand. She pressed it softly. "I know you don't care, dear. But try to care."

For an instant I was baffled. Then I remembered my senseless lie. An unjust fury shook me. "Skip it, will you!"

And she bowed her head, ashamed of her forgotten promise, humble before my suffering and my courage.

When I got into the house I ran up to my room before my mother could get at me and flung myself on my bed, face down. I whispered, "Tony. Tony."

It was perhaps half an hour later when I sprung up in a senseless frenzy of desire to go out, to go anywhere. I ran down the stairs. My mother was reading by the living-room fire. She glanced up, startled.

"What is it, dear?" she asked. "Where are you going?"

"To walk! For heaven's sake, do I have to account for every breath I draw in this house?"

I covered the first block almost at a run. And at the corner I met Tony. He had just come around it; we bumped together, shoulder to shoulder.

He jerked back: "Excuse me. Guess I wasn't looking."

He looked blank. "I don't smoke."

I said, "It's an advertisement. People say it when somebody spills something, or something."

"I see." It was clear that he did not.

He was standing badly, in his embarrassment. The dark blue eyes avoided my face. His clothes were wrong; he did not understand the necessary language of the bunch. I stared at him. He was beautiful, beautiful; but I could still close my heart to him and run away.

The silence between us grew awkward.

"Well," he said, "I mustn't keep you." And without having given one direct look into my face, he started to walk on.

I hesitated. I looked after his retreating figure and the balance still hung poised. Then I called out, "Tony! Wait!" and I ran and caught up with him.

I began to talk very fast.

"I'm dippy. What do you know? I ran out to mail a letter and left it behind me in the hall."

"Anybody can be absent-minded."

I had expected him at least to laugh. But he didn't laugh, or say, "Wouldn't you just!" or "Well, what's on your mind?" or anything I could respond to, in the way a girl is supposed to respond to a boy. It left me at a loss, but I labored on.

"But I'm the limit! I leave all my things all over the school."

"I've noticed that."

I wrinkled my nose, the way Dave thought was cute. "Oh, you've never noticed a thing about me!"

"I—I'm sorry to have made that impression."

It was a dead end. Oh, Tony, what a line, you're a sketch. Still, I snatched at words, any words at all.

"Isn't it funny, us living next door and hardly knowing each other at all?"

"Yes. I've often wished that we . . . were better acquainted."

"Oh, I bet! I guess you noticed how bright I am in math."

"No. But I admire your themes in English."

He was beautiful, beautiful. And everything that he said was wrong, stuffy. And everything I said came out sounding cheap and silly.

Suddenly my disappointment, my frustration turned to a pointless anger. I wanted to hurt him.

"You wouldn't be so bad in English if you could talk like people."

"I know. That's just the skill I can't acquire."

"Get!" I shouted the word. "Not acquire, for Pete's sake. Get!"

And I saw his face freeze to an icy mask. I was frightened.

"I beg your pardon, Tony."

"You were quite right. I got your point."

It was clear that he had, and that he hated me. I would have known him a long time before I understood how much he feared the angry hypersensitivity that came from a childhood of much blame and little praise. But strangely and suddenly, even as I looked at that icy mask and was sick with my own fright, I knew what I must do.

The thing had not happened, that was all. He did not want an apology that he could not force himself to accept. For both of us, it must simply never have happened.

"I was kidding about my math," I said, "but Mr. Mac is a wonderful teacher, isn't he?"

"Yes"—gravely—"he's a very remarkable person."

And it had not happened. I had not wanted to hurt him, he had not wanted to hate me, and it had not happened. We walked along quietly, side by side.

"He's going to put me on the squad," he said suddenly. "To replace Crockett. He told me today."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" And then, blushing, "I mean, it's fine for the school."

I looked as knowing as I could. "Well weight has its place. But somctimes speed counts more, speed and brains."

"I . . . that's what I'm banking on." Then he smiled. "They all admit one thing, I'm quick. Do you know what they call me Squirrels."

I could feel my face go perfectly blank. He had lived on his desert island so long that he did not even understand a slang insult. Had I imagined when I ran after him that he would be grateful to me? He would never be grateful because he would never know anything about the other world, the mainland.

I looked at him. His dark blue eyes were determined, his lips smiled, his chin was proud. There was more than physical beauty in his face, there was a human importance. I had not imagined it, he had some kind of genius. It was only people that he was stupid about.

I knew it; but once more I felt the rise of frustration, of confusion like anger. I had not wanted to fall in love with him. I had fought even in those daydreams where he said simple nice things and understood me so easily. And the fact was nothing, nothing like the dream. I did not want to be angry again; I wanted to get away.

"We're back," I said. "Nice running into you, no joke intended." And I turned and ran toward my door.

But now he ran after me. Before he had reached me he had begun to recite what was clearly an overrehearsed speech.

"I'm a very bad dancer but I wondered if you would let me escort you to the dance after the first game?"

I turned back, stammering. "I . . . we sort of thought of going in a bunch . . . you know . . . our bunch all together, sort of ——"

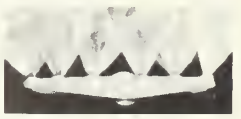
He looked at the ground. "Well, I guess nothing ventured nothing gained." Then he pushed back his shoulders and smiled. "Anyway," he said, "it was nice talking to you."

PICK A PORTABLE DISHWASHER

by KitchenAid®

CONVERTIBLE-PORTABLE—A front-loading portable today—it converts easily to a built-in when you remodel or move to a new home. Has beautiful solid maple cutting top, and the interior is sparkling, wear-resistant porcelain.

HERE'S WHY:



EXCLUSIVE...Hobart revolving power-wash arm scrubs tableware clean; yet, even fine china is "babied" in a KitchenAid.

EXCLUSIVE...Hobart Flo-Thru drying evenly distributes sanitized, warm air around every dish for a gently polished finish. Dishes are washed and dried clinic-clean in a KitchenAid—no spreading of colds.

CLEANEST DISHES...Because stainless steel dual filter guards guarantee the cleanest possible wash and rinse water all the time. Filters are self-cleaning and easily removable, too—in a KitchenAid.

FULLY AUTOMATIC...Yet if you wish, you can advance...skip...repeat...or interrupt the wash or dry action any time—in a KitchenAid. Use dry action for plate warmer.

LOOK for the big, blue, lifetime wash arm—it scrubs, while others spray or shower.

Built-in, free-standing, dishwasher-sink models also. The Hobart Manufacturing Co., KitchenAid Home Dishwasher Division, Dept. KL-P, Troy, Ohio. In Canada, 175 George St., Toronto 2.

The World's Largest Manufacturer of Food, Kitchen and Dishwashing Machines.

PORTABLE MODEL—Rolls from table to sink...connects to faucet in seconds...washes dishes, pots and pans. Rolls away when finished. Only KitchenAid has porcelain inside and out for lasting beauty. A prized possession in any kitchen

"But it will be all right," I said. "I can go th you."
His hand touched mine quickly and dropped ck. His eyes came full upon my face. I knew en that he had been thinking about me for a ng time; longer than I had been thinking out him.
It was a moment for quietness, but I was o young to know it. I wanted to give him mething in return for the gift of that look,
e look that told me I, too, was beautiful.
"I'm thrilled you asked me," I said. "This ll be the first time I ever went to a dance
th a member of the squad."
The caressing wonder went out of his
es. They looked shrewd and a little sad.
"That was sort of what I was banking on," said. And he nodded and walked away.
My mother was in the hall, smiling and rious.
"What in the world were you and that poor le Abbott boy talking about?"
I said flatly, "He just asked me to the dance.
n going with him."
"But, dear ——" She broke off. "Well," e said, brightly and without conviction, ow nice."
snapped, "Thanks a lot. And if it makes u feel any better, Tony Abbott is on the m."
turned my head from her and walked up stairs to my room. I sat on the edge of the

TRY-ON

By MAY RICHSTONE

This is the gown no shoppe should sell me,
Priced at a fortune I lack.
So get thee behind me, Satan, and tell me—
Is it becoming in back?

, working a fold of the spread between fingers. I wanted to remember his face king at me as if I was beautiful. But it kept ning back shrewd and sad as it was when said, "That was sort of what I was bank-on."
sat there on the edge of the bed, fighting self and the world and waiting to begin to happy.

Dave called me after supper. I babbled:
Oh, Dave, I'm so sorry, but I promised nebody else. Isn't that just awful? That's t you get for being so popular, nobody dares hang around and wait!"
worked at it hard, and he sounded quite red to his normal self-satisfaction so that s about to hang up at last when he said,
, who beat me to it?"
Tony Abbott."
Aw, don't kid me. Come clean, who is it?"
I told you. And I fail to see what is per about it."
nd bewilderingly Dave, Dave of all people, nded humble, uncertain.
guess you got sore when I took you g that night at Ellie's," he said. "I guess I retty bossy sometimes."
said, "I don't know what you mean," and ng up.
called Phyl right away to get it over with.
in a voice of profound meaning she said, e, I see, dear"; and then began at once to of other things.
had begun.
morrow, I thought, I'll be talking to him
e halls and eating lunch with him and the h will be whispering and trying to figure it Tomorrow everything will be diffierent.

nly nothing was different, except that e was morose and Phyllis uncomfortably er. I don't know what they'd all decided, it made no change. Tony rode his bike to ool, and the bunch closed around me as where the oddballs always sat singly or in pairs.

I said, "Hi, Tony," as I passed.

He looked up and smiled, but his eyes went back to his book and I was carried past him on the swirl and eddy of the bunch.

There were two weeks before the day of the game, and during them I was two people. When I was looking at Tony, when I was alone, I was a young girl in love for the first time. When I was with the bunch, I clung to it with a panic greed. And except that he would nod and smile when we passed in the halls, Tony ignored me. I began to wonder why he had asked me to the dance, and think that I had only imagined that he had looked at me as if I was beautiful.

I had started to school on the day before the game when I heard footsteps behind me and found him at my side.

"Chain came off my bike." He did not know how to lie; the words jerked out defensively.

He did not offer to take my books. He walked stiffly, looking before him; and when he spoke, once more the words had clearly been rehearsed.

"When you accepted my invitation," he said, "I hope you understood that I am very light and if tackled I should not do well."

I looked at his face, but he was staring straight before him.

I said, "What do you take me for? Do you think I took you on because I think you're headed for fame?"

"I just hope you won't have to be humiliated, that's all."

"Oh, for heaven's sake! How do you get that way?"

"I'm not really built for the game; and these last two weeks my aunt has often pointed out that I might be putting you in a position that you'd—well—resent."

It was humble and it was insulting, and it filled me with an impotent, aching tenderness. Didn't he know that people could just like people, without reasons?

I snapped, "You and your aunt! What makes you think she knows so much about me?"

He looked at me then. "You're very popular," he said simply. "When you're popular, it makes a big difference what people think."

The wholly unexpected insight struck to my heart. But I had not yet learned that boys, too, can be treated honestly.

I laughed. "Oh, Tony! Look, why don't you even notice me in school, why don't you eat at our table?" I asked. "You're the one that won't mix in!"

He answered slowly, with an odd kind of dignity, "It would be hard to join your group without seeming to intrude."

I wanted to be honest then, but I could not. "You're crazy! You imagine things."

"No, you're wrong. But—but ——" Then he stopped walking and checked me with his hand. He faced me, his look both sober and excited. "Beth, I didn't mean to belittle your kindness. I just wanted you to know that this game means more to me than it ever could to you." He paused for a moment, he swallowed, and then he smiled. "You see," he said, "if I do really well, I won't have to feel that I'm intruding any more."

His deep voice was controlled, but like his face it spoke of an almost unbearable excitement. I could not answer.

I saw his beauty lit by that cruel, unfounded happiness. I had been wrong about him; he knew there was a mainland, he wanted desperately to live upon it. In Miss Ardley's room, he had thought we'd like him for getting marks and being praised. Now it was winning games. He thought that acceptance, friendship were earned, paid out for accomplishment. Hadn't anyone, even his dim little uncle, loved him no matter what he did?

I think he interpreted my silence as a shyness like his own.

"Well," he said, "better get going or we'll be late."

And though we did not talk any more, he appeared to find the quiet natural, as we walked on, and be happy in it.

How's for tomorrow, Jim?"

"No worries. Westville's got a crumby team."

Dave asked, "Mr. Mac still cheerful about Abbott?"

Jim liked the game too much to remember I was there.

"Guess so. Anyway, we'll last through tomorrow. But I still say, put him up against real opposition and it will be murder. He'd just . . . agh, I don't know."

"Pl-ease!" It was Daisy. "Some of us are eating!"

I shut off my mind, tight.

that mother had let me get for the dance. It was bright cherry-red malines, and by any maternal standards of that time the neck was too low.

"Oh!" Phyllis was reverent. "Oh, how did you manage her?"

And I heard myself say, in a voice that closed the subject, "I guess she thought I'd need it."

That night I prayed, "Make him do something. And make it make a difference."

But I woke from my first sleep in the sweat of a nightmare. There was a crowd on the field, something terrible had happened; and

Fleischmann's Margarine brings your family the goodness of 100% Corn Oil*

By the Makers of Fleischmann's Yeast

100% GOLDEN CORN OIL* BRINGS THESE IMPORTANT BENEFITS TO FLEISCHMANN'S MARGARINE

High nutrition and energy values . . . Light, delicate flavor . . . Extra-smooth spreadability!

*At last, nutrition experts have scientifically perfected a margarine made from 100% golden corn oil. It's new Fleischmann's Margarine . . . partially hydrogenated to give it a flavor so delicious you can hardly believe it. And Fleischmann's Margarine has a finer texture, too, for extra-smooth spreadability.

Yes, Fleischmann's flavor is more delicate than the taste of ordinary margarines made from a mixture of vegetable oils. It has a golden taste just like the high-price spread. Try Fleischmann's Margarine.

Fleischmann's CORN OIL MARGARINE

I was so small.

The girls whose beaux were on the team had arranged to meet at Daisy's house and go to the game together. I was the last to get there. As I came into the room, everyone stopped talking, and when they began again all their remarks were addressed to me. I tried to ignore it, but I knew what it meant. And suddenly, just as I had been when I woke from my bad dream, I was frightened.

The fear was too great to bear. I began to laugh, and in a voice exactly like Daisy's I said, "Well, I sure hope that Abbott gets through this one alive at least."

An almost audible sigh of relaxation went through the room. All the frozen smiles went away and everybody drew closer.

"Yeah," said Daisy, "we were just saying that."

The girls started pulling on their coats. As she started out to the hall closet for her own, she beckoned me after her. She cleared her throat and hesitated then, and finally spoke in a bossy, big-sisterish voice.

"Maybe this is out of turn, Beth, and of course I never heard your side, but don't you think you rubbed it into Dave pretty hard? Squirrels!"

For one moment I felt completely helpless. And then, in the most amazing way, I was strong and quiet in myself as I had never been before.

"I haven't got anything against Dave," I said. "I just happen to like Tony, that's all."

"Baby!" she exclaimed. "Are you ever playing it tough!" Then she shrugged and laughed. "Oh, heck, maybe you're right. Dave's been pretty stuck on himself this year, I will say."

I smiled at her and let it go. The strong, quiet feeling was still there. I had told the truth, and she would find out that I meant it.

"Well, come on," I said. "What are we waiting for? Let's get a wiggle on, the gang's all here."

In the stands I found myself between Phyllis and Daisy. The teams came on, and

"Nothing like a sure walkaway to start them off feeling good."

Her knowledge of the game put no strain on us. All she expected was that from time to time one of us would say, "You bet!" or "Ain't it the truth!"

"Ain't it the truth!" I said.

The teams lined up for the kickoff. I saw Tony take his position. His head was down and his padded shoulders looked big. I wondered why I had been afraid.

The whistle blew. I thought, I'll have to listen to Daisy, so he won't be disappointed, my not knowing what he did.

> All progress is made by men of faith who believe in what is right and, what is more important, actually do what is right in their own private affairs. THOMAS DREIER

What happened to Tony happened almost at once.

Daisy began to scream, "Yeah! Yeah!" and I realized that Tony had the ball and was running. And then she was saying, "Oh, jeepers, oh, my world, what does he think he's doing?" And then the whistle blew, and he was lying on the field, hidden by the players crowded around him.

It was my dream, and Daisy's voice was part of the dream.

"Well, at least he got himself knocked out in the first five minutes. Now we can play." And then, "Oh, heaven help us, no. Back on his feet." And finally, with a sigh, "No, we're saved. Look at that limp!"

I opened my eyes and stared at my hands. Tony told me, weeks later, what happened. The center of the field looked wide open, and he knew it was where they would expect him. He veered to one side, but a moment too soon;

He was unconscious only for seconds, but his ankle was sprained. I saw his face just before they got him off the field. It was white and there was no expression in it but one of physical pain.

That was when Phyllis put her arm around me.

"Look," she said. "You come to the dance anyway. Lots of boys are going stag."

"Sure," I said. "I'll be there with bells on."

Daisy, who had heard, said, "Atta girl!"

I sat through the rest of the game without seeing any of it.

I had to see Tony, to make him feel that it didn't matter. They might have taken him to a hospital, but probably not. Probably I would have to make Mrs. Abbott let me in.

She would not welcome me, that was certain. Everything had worked out according to her predictions. She would not want me there to take the edge off. But I had to be there. I could not work it out ahead, but I would know what to say when I saw her.

I sat still, waiting until everyone was shouting around me and it was over. We had won.

The bunch stopped off at Ellie's and I got away from them there. When I got to my corner, I ran the half block to Tony's house. My hand was firm as I rang the bell.

Mrs. Abbott opened the door. She looked at me as if I were a stranger.

I said, "Is he all right?"

Her answering voice was pleasantly satisfied. "The doctor says it's a very bad sprain. It will mean his losing too much practice to stay on the team."

I swallowed, waiting for words that did not come.

"I told him not to worry about the dance," she said. "I said you'd doubtless get there and enjoy yourself."

I have said before that I never knew what made that woman tick, and it is true. I looked at her face then and the purpose went out of me; I was weak with a small child's fear and hate.

Was it that last bland lick that saved me? do not know, but in that instant she remind me of Daisy. And at once I felt as indiffere to her as I had felt to Daisy when I sai "You see, I happen to like Tony."

I had come to see Tony, and she stood in r way. I measured my strength against he She'd let me see him fast enough, I thoug if I'd just come to rub it in. Pretend I was sor but really rub it in. And I laughed and a swered in Daisy's voice: "Oh, you bet! A we won the game, too, easy. It didn't mak bit of difference. I just thought I'd take t load off his mind." Then as she still hesitat I shrugged. "Or you can. Jim made a couple touchdowns that were super!"

I felt both strong and matter-of-fact and was without surprise that I heard her lau with an ugly echo of my own.

"Come in and tell him yourself. He's in t sunroom." And then, lifting her voice, "Be has stopped by, Anthony, to tell you about t game. It went splendidly."

In her anxiety to be no check on my tongu she left me in the hall. I stood where I w until she had started upstairs. I called o "Tough luck, Tony, but don't let it eat yo We won, all right, all right." After that I sh my eyes for a second. Then I walked throu the living room, and to the sunroom door.

He sat sidewise on a wicker settee. His l with the swollen, bandaged ankle, was e tended before him. His face was white a shut in. He had a book in his hands, and a came in he pretended to finish the page.

I looked at him, and all the curious co petence of those last minutes was gone.

My voice faltered, small: "I . . . does it h much?"

"I had a pill." He kept his eyes on the bo

"I . . . did you get knocked out?"

"I guess so. Your corsage is in the iceb You can get it from Aunt Alice."

"I'm not going to the dance."

His face shut tighter. "I get you. It m have been pretty embarrassing. I'm sorry

In Just 15 Days You Will See How Wonderfully

"Ice" Helps Improve Touchy Skins That Break Out*

—without costly facials, "lights", hormone creams or any other complicated skin treatments

New York, N. Y. (Special)—Skin scientists have now developed an invisible pharmaceutical ice—Ice-O-Derm®—that promises miraculous new-looking complexions. Ice-O-Derm actually gives timetable results of changes you can see.

Ice-O-Derm replaces present ordinary methods. Fortified by proper nutrition, good circulation and facial cleanliness, it will give you positive results—timetable results or money back.

*Due to overactive oil glands in skin.

AT DRUG & DEPARTMENT STORES

Here is Your 15-Day Complexion Timetable

1st 5 days: Ingredient number one helps free pores of blackheads, pasty fat and impurities not removed by soap and water—thus helps prevent pimples from spreading. Result: Clearer, fresher skin!

2nd 5 days: Ingredient number two holds moisture in, shields it from sun, winds, steam heat that dry out and wrinkle skin. Result: Softer, moister, skin!

3rd 5 days: Ingredient number three stimulates and improves skin circulation, tightens pores and helps build up natural resistance against surface infection. Result: Firmer, healthier looking skin!

1960 Shulton, Inc., Pharmaceutical Div., Clifton, N. J.

"I can imagine." As if he did not know why vas lying and cared less.

I blundered on. "We—we can go to the next e."

He looked at me then. It was an old look, happy and yet oddly patient. He spoke as I were a stupid, greedy child.

"You heard Aunt Alice. If the doc is right, n off the team."

I began to shake. "Tony, I had to talk to her e that because she wouldn't want—wouldn't ——"

But it was not a thing that could decently put into words, and I broke off. Then I oked at his face and I knew that I had to ake him understand me. I loved him.

"I had to talk like that so she'd let me in. ny, I'm so sorry."

"Well, so am I. Don't rub it in." And he ned his head sharply away and stared out window.

His blind, deaf rejection of the love, the w-found courage I had come to offer him uck my body like a blow. I caught my ath, and without warning I was whirled by h a fury as I had never imagined. My voice ook, but the words came fast, fast.

"You make me sick. No wonder you haven't any friends, no wonder everyone thinks nuts going out with you as if it mattered being on your wonderful old team. You're rse than your aunt, worse. Once I used to sorry for you. Then I got to like you. I was zy both times. You stink."

Then I fell silent and we stared at each er.

"I'm sorry," I said wearily, "you can't help knowing anything about people's feel- s."

He said, "Beth?"

"What?" I was turned from him, my head ging.

"Beth, I—I'm not asking you to change r mind about me. I—I just got the wrong a. Beth, would you tell me why I'm so . . . on't know . . . the way you said?"

The anger was gone. And still I was com- tely hopeless. I sat down in the chair near- the door.

"You won't get it," I said. "You don't know w people can like people for anything but ff, football or being good at something. e the way you never noticed me till this r when I got to be popular."

He did not answer, and I just felt hopeless l tired out.

"Anyhow, I learned something," I said. "ou couldn't get this, either, but I don't nk I'm ever going to be afraid to like people in just because they don't fit in with some ch."

heard his voice, deep and young, and at variance with the funny formality of his speech. "You—you have made a justified criticism, Beth. It is true that I—I don't always value people for the right things."

I looked at him then. I don't know what I expected, but it was not what I saw: not his face as it had been on that morning in Mr. McIntosh's class, composed and beautiful, the eyes absorbed, the lips lifted, as if he saw something both subtle and self-evident, both lovely and impersonal.

I held my breath. But after a few seconds, the look changed and his lips worked.

"Only you were wrong about one thing," he said. "Not that it makes any more difference, but I want you to know. I wanted to ask you out all last year. But I'm a bad dancer and I—well—I hadn't done anything to earn it."

Yes, he had understood me, but only with his mind; he still had understood nothing. And I still wonder at my next words, for I was not yet old or wise enough to know that they were the only sufficient thing to say.

"Did you like me back then because I'd earned it?"

He looked at me. For a single moment his face was once more the face of an intellectual angel, beautiful in abstract, impersonal thought. Then he smiled, and he was looking at me as no one would again for many years, though young men would say and believe that they loved me. He looked at me as I like to think that in time he looked at the woman who would be his wife.

"I get it," he said softly. "I get it."

We sat quiet, looking at each other as if we were looking at the first morning of the world.

It was not going to be easy; the bunch was real, my mother was real, and I knew it and knew he would never know it. It did not matter. Love and joy do not ask for easiness.

We looked at each other in wonder, quietly.

At last he said, "You'll take the flowers home, won't you?"

I whispered, "Yes, I will."

He smiled into my face. Then he spoke abruptly, urgently. "Aunt Alice will be back here any minute. Will you go now?"

"Yes. Yes, now."

I got up and moved close to him.

"Tony, will you come over as soon as you can?"

He nodded, his face still raised to mine. And suddenly I, who had never let a boy kiss me, bent my head; and lightly, timidly, yet in the promise of every kiss that I would ever give, I kissed him full upon the lips.

And at once, as if it had not happened, I said, "I'll get the flowers," and ran from the room.

MIRROR, MIRROR ON THE WALL

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 143

elp the North Shore Hospital." Well, that's way I'm going to look even if it means I have to help the North Shore Hospital. ooking back over these paragraphs, I sense absence of that one piece of constructive ice that might save this from being simply ther self-reproaching sermon entitled ice I Was Considered Plain—Today I Am a s." Luckily, I have just remembered not , but two definite rituals for Beauty that e been known to work.

How to Be Adorable, Though Pregnant. ually, this is much simpler than it seems. mother-to-be should get her hair set, apply sy-pink make-up, put on her most becom- maternity frock, and—here we get to the portant part—climb into bed and pull the ers up under her arms. In this position she feel chic. Overheated, perhaps, but chic. s a matter of fact, I have never been able ollow this prescription to the letter be- e I wear a size 18, and, as you may know, practically impossible to buy a maternity s, becoming or otherwise, in size 18. The ufacturers seem to operate on the un- tionably sound premise that a woman who takes a size 18 is already in sufficient trouble, and has no business getting pregnant. Having made this mistake, she ought to have the simple decency to remain indoors in her bathrobe where she will not depress the entire community with the spectacle of her bulky contours.

2. How to Keep Your Husband Believing That You Are Still the Same Enchanting Girl He Married. First you set aside a half hour in the late afternoon to put your hair up in pin curls and —— No, this is ridiculous. I don't believe one word of it. Of course you're not the enchanting girl he married. How could you be—with those kids, and that dog racing through the house, and practically no help, and a washer that's always on the blink? And don't tell me about Mrs. Skylark; that woman probably lives at a beauty salon.

Besides, why should you be all that enchanting? How does he look these days? Is he still the lean and handsome athlete that first swept you off your feet? And was he even embarrassed when you had to take back all those size-40 shorts and get size 42? Do you catch him poring over articles instructing him how to look younger and sprucer so he can make your little heart palpitate? Boy, that'll be the day!

This is an excerpt from the new Jean Kerr book, THE SNAKE HAS ALL THE LINES, recently published by Doubleday & Co., Inc.

"What to do" is a booklet of funeral facts that everyone should know — prior to bereavement when emotional strain makes decisions on unfamiliar problems difficult. Since the first publication of this booklet, over two million copies have been distributed to people who wanted guidance.

If you would like a copy, write to National Casket Company, 60B Massachusetts Ave., Boston, Mass.

National Caskets are furnished by leading Funeral Directors throughout the U. S. A.

High School at Home Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin. American School, Dept. H83, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37.

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved

Dr. Scholl's Super-Sheer

51 GAUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS

Nylon, full-footed, full-fashioned So sheer, they look like regular nylons—yet give comfortable uniform support. No overhose needed. In French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops, Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores. $12.95 pair. Free booklet—Dr. Scholl's, Dept. 13E5, Chicago 10, Ill.

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get you down." To get the kind of relief that doesn't cause weakness, be sure to get Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Doesn't cause cramps. Contains ingredients that act to soften waste, stimulate intestines without causing upsetting digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets rated 71% better, on the average, than other laxatives tested. These included candy and chewing gum laxatives, so-called "liver" pills, a well-known bulk laxative, milk of magnesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief without distressing weakness. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today!

EARN MORE! You can earn more to help take care of expenses this year by joining our staff of independent representatives. Send a postal to the address below, and you will receive complete details about our offer. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY, 727 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

BRITTLE, SPLITTING NAILS

RESTORED TO Natural Beauty

CORRECT THEM THIS MEDICALLY PROVED WAY. Just drink one daily envelope of Knox Unflavored Gelatine (115-120 grains, about 5¢) in fruit or vegetable juice, bouillon or water. Published clinical studies—using Knox, and Knox alone—show 7 out of 10 women have success. Mostly within 90 days. Avoid imitations. Your doctor will tell you.

PHYSICIANS: Reprints of all published medical studies on request.

© 1960 Knox Gelatine, Inc., Johnstown, N. Y.

"...and she loves the doll you sent her best of all!"

When you feel like saying "thank you" to someone, Long Distance is a happy, thoughtful way to do it. The folks you call can tell by the sound of your voice how grateful you are. Why not try a "thank you" call like that tonight.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

Here are some examples:

Cleveland to Pittsburgh	45¢
Des Moines to Chicago	75¢
Washington, D.C. to Boston	85¢
Miami to St. Louis	$1.20
San Francisco to New York	$1.75

These are the Station-to-Station rates for the first three minutes, after 6 p.m. and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Keep in touch by Long Distance

"Fashion is not only new clothes;
it's the way you wear the ones you have."

CONTINUED FROM PAGES 56 AND 57

Bright green silk damask is a favorite Washington dress for evening. Mrs. Johnson wears the costume complete in the afternoon, the dress alone for evening.

A short black silk is a frequent choice of Mrs. Lodge's for evening. With it, she wears her short "fake fur" jacket. "I like to add a large jewel" (make-believe too) "to the collar."

Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson

"Washington favorites for evening" is her brilliant green jacket dress shown in the photograph above.

Most of Mrs. Johnson's costumes have slim skirts "because my husband likes them best." There is one exception to this. Her most loved costume "for travel and to wear all day long" is a lightweight black-and-white jacket dress. The skirt has flat box pleats and gives the necessary width for "taking big steps and for getting on and off planes."

Mrs. Johnson's accessories are small in number, but are as carefully chosen as her wardrobe. She never adds scarves or large pieces of jewelry to a costume. Her "look" is completely "uncluttered" and fits perfectly with her tiny, 5'4" figure. Her handbags are chosen to carry out the color scheme of what she has on. Although she prefers not to wear a hat, she has several for "occasions when I must wear one." Shoes "are always simple pumps, usually the same style over and over again because my foot is narrow and hard to fit."

Jewelry is "mainly a matter of sentiment." One of her special favorites is her single strand of real pearls given to her by her husband. These she wears for "good," and for everyday she always has on hand an inexpensive set of pearl earrings and a pearl necklace.

Mrs. Johnson loves things that are gay. In her clothes she achieves this through color; many times it is red. One type of costume she especially enjoys wearing is a long hostess gown. "I like to put something comfortable and pretty on when I come home in the evening." Although she bought a new red one not long ago, she still finds it hard to part with her red silk one which she bought eight years ago. Another favorite is her coat from last season in a clear, vivid red. Typical of Mrs. Johnson's fashion philosophy—"It will brighten up any costume, any day." END evenings. In summer she likes a simple linen sheath or a navy or black linen skirt. "With the skirts I can wear different tops and blouses." For winter, suits and basic dresses have been her standbys. "I love something I can change around."

Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge

To a suit, she often adds a scarf or ascot. "The skirt alone I like to wear with different tops." This might be a sweater for more casual wear in the country, satin blouse to add elegance in town.

Using a pretty accessory or adding a special touch goes into practically all her costumes. "A flower on an old dress makes it look new." Her green silk evening dress she changes with either a white or a soft pink stole, always adds a flower or two at the neckline. For the convention—"One of the exciting times I shall never forget"—Mrs. Lodge wore a mauve sheath with a linen coat in a deeper shade. She took along a simple black sheath and an organdy cover-up her husband had given her. "But I never had a chance to put these on." To the mauve costume she finally added a bunch of violets "which were rather wilted," but the effect was very good.

Mrs. Lodge says she is "lazy about clothes" because she does not enjoy shopping. One of her favorite means of finding clothes is "looking at the ads in the Sunday papers." Although she may not enjoy shopping, Mrs. Lodge is exuberant about finding something that looks just right on her and that she knows she can depend on for a long time.

One such buy was her red coat bought at a greatly reduced price. "I have worn it constantly for four years and have even slept in it when traveling." Another favorite is a mauve tweed suit which "I have had for ten years. The hem has gone up and down with fashion changes. It is still in good condition and I like it so much I don't think I shall ever part with it." END

Printed in U.S.A.

JOURNAL

The Magazine Women Believe In December

1960 · 35c

Ladies' Home

TO BE POPULAR give 6 easy rules

ELINA COURT
A new novel by
Rumer Godden

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

RIVELL TO WHITE HOUSE
OWERS HOLIDAY DINNER

d Vonderful Christmas ets . . . For you to make

IE TRUTH ABOUT LLEGITIMACY

e age and Debutante FASHION

hilling Mystery Novel omplete in this issue

WHAT IT MEANS TO B

Presenting EMILY

A President's Great-Granddaughter

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CALIF.

Give the gift you're sure will be used with pleasure– soft, beautiful Cannon towels

Give the gift today, the bath-brightening beauty of Cannon towels—wrapped your own special way or chosen from a group of enchanting sets. Your gift of Cannon towels will stay soft, thirsty, wear for years, because of Cannon's Beauti-Fluff process

POM-POM GIFT SET

Gay wicker basket holds two bath towels, two fringed guest towels, two wash cloths, $7.98*

VERSAILLES

Fresh floral with a French accent—in soft pastels. Lavish bath size, $2.98*

COMMAND PERFORMANCE

Magnificent texture—the only towel with loops of combed Pima cotton! 27 x 50, $3.98*

*All-cotton. Prices shown are approximate. Cannon Mills, Inc., 70 Worth Street, New York 13

CANNON

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

VOL. LXXVII NO. 12

December 1960

Journalities

Rumer Godden

"Announce it with trumpets and cymbals," one of our editors says of RUMER GODDEN's China Court (beginning page 42). Appropriate, but we must be content with the warmth and pleasure it stirs in the hearts of readers. Rumer Godden, novelist supreme, a Sussex-born, India-reared mother of two daughters, now lives in Buckinghamshire, England. A personal note: "Things I like best are books, china, flowers and Pekingese. Things I hate worst are parties."

Jean Muir

The way to get a story is to stop into the Spanish National Tourist Office in San Francisco, as JEAN MUIR did, and BENJAMIN REGUERA FERNANDEZ will tell you one. If you then add a little of the creative artistry My Uncle Pepe had (see page 78), as Jean Muir did, you will have a story almost as charming as the women Uncle Pepe created (by a device any man can learn but few can do really well).

Margaret Summerton

MARGARET SUMMERTON says her first job was "as a dogsbody with book publishers in London and Paris." (No lady can say that without arousing curiosity. What's a "dogsbody"?*) At the moment she lives in a 200-year-old stone cottage in Sussex, writing with her face to a wall so as not to be distracted by the view. Not long ago, she enjoyed the remarkable view from Journal Workshop windows. "My most exciting morning in New York," she says. The Sea House (page 74) is her fourth novel.

An unskilled and undistinguished person required for menial tasks." —Ed.*

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

74 The Sea House By Margaret Summerton

Stories

42 China Court (First part of four) By Rumer Godden
48 The Lighting of the Candles By Elizabeth Goudge
68 The Nice Boy By Ann Chidester
78 My Uncle Pepe By Benjamin Reguera Fernandez as told to Jean Muir

Special Features

11 The Necessity and Function of an Opposition By Dorothy Thompson
18 Tell Me, Doctor By Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.
34 Can You Spot a Delinquent in the Making? By Benjamin Spock, M.D.
41 So Hallow'd and So Gracious Is the Time By The Editors
46 The Way Angels Are
66 Must These Little Ones Grow Up Homeless? By Margaret Hickey
66 "You Are My Real Mommy—Don't Let Them Take Me Away" By Eric Simpson
70 How to Be Popular By Elizabeth McFarland
76 The Truth About Illegitimacy By Glenn Matthew White 127 How America Lives: Presenting Emily Tyler By Jean Todd Freeman

General Features

4 Letters Our Readers Write Us
22 This is a Leaver-Outer By Munro Leaf
28 There's a Man in the House By Harlan Miller
31 Under Cover By Bernardine Kielty
32 Making Marriage Work By Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.
81 Fifty Years Ago in the Journal
104 Reference Library
141 Ask Any Woman By Marcelene Cox

Fashion and Beauty

58 A Man, a Girl, a Dress, a Party By Wilhela Cushman
62 Holiday Debuts in Fashion and Beauty
By Nora O'Leary and Dawn Crowell Norman
118 How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing! By Bet Hart

Food and Homemaking

50 The Eisenhowers' Holiday Dinner
52 Wonderful, Wonderful Christmas Sweets
54 Such Sweets Remembered
56 Sweet Treats
71 Make a Sugar Plum Tree
72 If She Loves to Entertain By Margaret Davidson
100 'Twas the Month Before Christmas
144 Southern Hospitality Unlimited By Jean Anderson

Architecture and Interior Decoration

106 A "T" Floor Plan for a Hillside By John H. Brenneman
138 Glowingly Traditional By Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland

Poems

13 Winter Song By Caroline Neilson
16 Lullaby By Chad Walsh
37 Beautiful Is Her Seeming By Kate Barnes
39 Christmas Symbols By Antoinette Adam
85 Help! By Janet Henry
117 Come and See By James Hayford
123 At Evening By Dorothy Lee Richardson

Cover Photograph by Roger Prigent

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, ©1960 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Thursday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cory W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

fireplaces, florists, flags, pottery, poultry, paper bags whatever you need—

Find it Fast In The Yellow Pages

Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

SNOW CAP SPREAD: MIX 2 4½ OZ. CANS UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM, 1 TBSP. MINCED ONION. MOUND ON PLATE. "FROST" WITH BLEND OF 8 OZ. PKG. CREAM CHEESE, ¼ CUP SOUR CREAM (OR MILK), 2½ TSP. SHARP MUSTARD. SERVES 10-12 GENEROUSLY.

A "pleasure island" on any party buffet. Underwood Deviled Ham makes this festive Snow Cap Spread in minutes. Delicious with Fritos® corn chips. For the holidays have lots of cans of Underwood Deviled Ham in your pantry.

P.S. The handy ham made from fine whole hams.

FOR FREE PARTY RECIPES WRITE: ANNE UNDERWOOD, DEPT. L120, RED DEVIL LANE, WATERTOWN 72, MASS.

LETTERS
OUR READERS WRITE US

DID SOMEONE MENTION A MRS. CRABTREE?

CALIFORNIA

You know, dear editors, the world is short on humor and long on sadness; and when at 6:30 my husband woke me with "Come on, Mrs. Crabtree, start bouncing," we both laughed ourselves awake and into the kitchen. My husband was still chuckling away as he shaved, and when he finally left for work, I thanked Mrs. Crahtree and your October "How America Lives" for a very good conversational piece so early in the morning!
Pomona SOPHIA GRAY

OKLAHOMA

So this is what I've been living in for sixteen years—perpetual squalor! Do you know I have even been cooking three meals a day for this bunch around here because I thought it was expected of me? In fact, I must really be dumb because I didn't know that after the dishes, beds and floors were done I didn't have to do anything else. I thought I had to go to the grocery, P.T.A., help with homework, read bedtime stories, go to 4-H and Mothers' Club. Not to mention sitting up nights with sick boys and pregnant ewes. Why, I'll bet there are thousands of women who don't realize their condition. What a surprise my husband will have tonight when he comes home!
Burlington MRS. IVAN DIEL

OHIO

Spurred on by Mrs. Crabtree, I too managed to get my housework done by 8:30 in the morning. How did I accomplish this without a dishwasher, laundry or helpful husband? Why, I got up at 2 A.M.!
Columbus MARGARET H. RUSSELL

SOMEWHERE ON THE WEST COAST

We used to read the kids' Mad magazine for laughs, but now we read the Journal.
TWO STUPID HOUSEWIVES

FLORIDA

It is surprising and heartening to read about a family which doesn't follow all the rules in the marriage manual. I never thought I would meet in your pages a woman who is a terrible cook, sends out her laundry, spends six hours a day playing bridge—or a husband who goes off on weekends to hunt and fish by himself, without feeling it necessary to take the whole family along. The Crabtrees suit each other—and that is what counts. If you have managed to show any frustrated young couple that every marriage doesn't have to be like every other one, I think you've done a pretty fine thing.
Sarasota LOIS CARDOZO

OREGON

Before I got around to feeling sorry for Billy Crabtree, I realized that he is happy with the situation and loves and cherishes Janice. Apparently she is admired by relatives and friends, and she herself is grateful and happy. So, I'll say it—I'm a little envious, but I'm glad that someone has got it so good!
Eugene MRS. MERL NICOLSON

KANSAS

RE YOUR OCTOBER HOW AMERICA LIVES—CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?
Wichita JAMES C. HARRIS

PENNSYLVANIA

I wish you would tell me if Mrs. Crabtree really exists.
Bethlehem LUCILLE ANN MEYERS

• Yes, and though we can't give personal answers, we'll be reading our Crabtree mail right through 1961. ED.

NEW YORK

HELP FOR PSYCHOTIC CHILDREN

Dear Sirs: Thank you for your most interesting and elucidating "Scream in the Night" (September Journal). I should also like to thank the Sheldon Paul family for their courage and wisdom in wanting to be identified. Only with the help of intelligent people who recognize and face the agonizing problem of childhood psychosis can we fight it, can we combat prejudices, can we see to it that these children get their birthright, an education suitable to their needs.
Jamaica Sincerely,
RUTH TUTEUR, Corresp. Secretary
National Organization for Mentally Ill Children, Inc., Queens Chapter

PEACEABLE LANE

VIRGINIA

Whether you print this or not (and I'm betting you won't), I wish to register my complete disgust with the Journal for the new low you have achieved. The revolting story "Peaceable Lane" is nothing more than Negro propaganda. Why don't you just merge with Ebony?
Alexandria MRS. J. E. MORGAN

ARIZONA

The Journal has matured and modernized beyond most women's magazines, as evidenced by the October issue. It takes a lot of courage to publish a story like "Peaceable Lane," and I can imagine you will receive complaints. I, for one, think Keith Wheeler did a wonderful job.
Phoenix ANN HARPER

MINNESOTA

Do you suppose we Americans will ever reach the day when we will judge one another as individuals, rather than by one characteristic such as race, color or creed?
Minneapolis MRS. J. B. ANDERSON

NEBRASKA

LET YOUR HEART SPEAK

Dear Journal readers: When was the last time you said to someone, "I love you very much"? If you can answer quickly, you are one of the warmhearted

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

Copyright 1960, The Nestlé Company, Inc.

NESTLÉ'S MAKES THE COZIEST COCOA

real old fashioned flavor...ready instantly

Nestlé's is the only instant cocoa with whole milk and sugar—made expressly to be enjoyed hot. It's the only instant cocoa you can make perfectly with water. And it's the only one with all these extra nutrients: Vitamins C, B_1, D_3 and Iron. Light up late afternoons and evenings with the special chocolate flavor and cozy warmth of Nestlé's® EverReady®—the deluxe instant cocoa in the bright red package. Get some today!

PARTIAL LOADS get a short power-rinse that removes food particles—no hand-rinsing. Hold and store dishes until you have a full load.

FULL LOADS are now scrubbed twice by the KitchenAid power-wash system. Two washes, three rinses, Flo-Thru hot-air drying.

UTENSILS get their own individual treatment. KitchenAid dual wash, triple rinse help soak away baked-on foods... ease scraping chores.

push a button...
dishwashing's done!

NEW SUPERBA VariCycle

NEVER BEFORE a dishwasher that combines such convenience, capacity and wash-ability—the new KitchenAid Superba VariCycle.

NEW KING-SIZE CAPACITY. New-design racks handle a whole day's tableware for a good-sized family. Two-position upper rack with quick-adjust dividers enables variable arrangements for big or odd-shaped pieces.

DUAL DETERGENT CUP automatically releases the contents of each section for each wash. Rinsing Agent Dispenser helps dry spotlessly under any water conditions.

NEW LUXURIOUS LOOK with modern styling and wide choice of finishes, including wood. Look for the big, blue, lifetime wash arm that scrubs while others spray or shower. See your dealer or write: The Hobart Mfg. Co., KitchenAid Home Dishwasher Div., Dept. KL, Troy, Ohio. In Canada: 175 George St., Toronto 2.

2 OTHER NEW DISHWASHER SERIES available in many models

NEW IMPERIAL Every "full cycle" feature of the Superba is found in this model—including king-size capacity.

NEW CUSTOM Real value for the economy-minded. Same superior KitchenAid wash-and-dry system. Capacity for ten.

there's a quality KitchenAid for every kitchen...every budget

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

few who are not afraid to express what is in their hearts. Most of us are different

But there are times when these are the only words which should be said. Last fall my daughter with her two small girls came home to visit. It was a most satisfying two weeks, but at the end I was exhausted. The temperature was over 95° and I was probably looking grim when four-year-old Jenny spoke up:

"Anyway, grandmother," she said, "I love you."

What a beautiful sound those words made! My eyes full of tears, I sat down on the floor and hugged her. "What a lucky little girl," I thought. "A lot of people are going to love you!"

Sometimes, of course, those three words only need to be implied. I know a middle-aged couple who run their own lumber business. "In the mornings," she told me, "we're both horribly grumpy, so we try to get along without talking. But driving down to the office, we have a sort of routine. Sometime during the trip one or the other will say, 'Well, good morning, sweetheart,' and the day will be all right."

When you are young and in love, putting feelings into words is such a blissful thing that it comes easily. But as the years pass, you stiffen and grow more reticent. (One of my own moments not to remember is when I met an old friend's outstretched arms with a conventional handshake.)

In keeping the wholehearted gesture, the tender words to yourself, you are short-changing yourself and those dear to you. Let your heart speak out!

Sincerely,
Omaha ELEANORE MOOBERRY

MISSOURI

OUR 1954 CHRISTMAS STORY

Dear Journal: It has been six years since our story ("Ten Angels for Christmas," December, 1954) appeared in your "How America Lives," but we think of you often. Our family statistics have also changed somewhat—with number fourteen due to arrive this summer. If we get a little girl, it will make it even with seven sons and seven daughters; but the boys are all pulling for another brother "so the boys will keep ahead"!

Yes, one family.

Do hope all is well for you,
Independence MARVEL CROOKSTON

• The boys won. Douglas Arthur. 8 pounds. arrived July 13. ED.

DELAWARE

HOW WOULD YOU ANSWER?

Dear Editors: Can you, or any of your readers, help me understand what is the matter with me?

I love my husband, my teenage children and my home. I have a satisfying hobby and many friends. I take part in community activities, and often serve as chairman of various charitable drives. I worship God in my heart and in my church.

Yet every day round about four o'clock, when my busy day is slowing down, I find myself wondering: what is the purpose of life?

My husband says the purpose of life is to glorify God, and while I agree with him, somehow this doesn't seem enough answer. I can't ask my friends, because they'd think I was crazy. So now I ask you: what is the purpose of life?

Hopefully yours,
Name Withheld

NEW YORK CITY

NOON TO NINE WOULD BE FINE

Dear Editors: Must working people be deprived of the cultural benefits of our museums and historical societies? Why can't museums open at noon and stay open after 5 P.M. so more people can enjoy them? Sincerely yours,
A.L.A.

SOMEWHERE IN MICHIGAN

LET'S POLL TEACHERS THEMSELVES

Dear Sir: I am not saying that all administrators are bad, or that professors be allowed to "run" our colleges. But I am firmly convinced that faculty voices must be heard and heeded if we are to effect the sweeping reforms in educational policy upon which our national survival may depend. Public opinion can never make a wise choice in conflicting educational ideologies so long as one side is denied expression—too often through the fear of reprisal which prompts me, regretfully, to ask that my name be withheld.

Associate Professor of English

MASSACHUSETTS

CAN'T EVEN BOIL AN EGG?

Dear Journal: Recently two girls who are college sophomores visited us. Since I had to leave early for work the next morning, I made preliminary preparations for breakfast and suggested that they "sleep in." Later, I discovered they had eaten only toast—not because they weren't hungry but because neither of them knew how to cook bacon and eggs!

Both girls are intelligent and attractive, but their lack of any home skills distressed me. Is this typical of today's teenagers?

Sincerely,
Boston ALICE GARDNER

CONNECTICUT

WHAT THIS COUNTRY NEEDS IS MORE DOGHOUSES

Dear Editor: You show lovely houses in your magazine for all sorts of people—but nothing for our four-legged friends. I would like to see a small Alhambra with keyhole-shaped doors and windows for cats' and dogs' whiskers to slip through, or Greek-revival houses with a "widow's walk" for dogs to watch from. Or that modern house you ran with a hole and a tree in the overhanging roof would make an ideal house for a cat.

Are architects never animal lovers?

Sincerely yours,
Stonington MRS. B. MARKOFF

NEW JERSEY

JUST FOR YOU

Dear Editors: One year my son redid my telephone and address book. A daughter showed up with all the summer furniture repainted in rustless white. A son-in-law bore a laundry hamper full of new pots and pans into my kitchen from which all the old had been removed on Christmas Eve.

This is Christmas! This is love.

The present which says "This could only be for you and could only come from me" makes the wonderful day.

I'd better get started. Sincerely,
Hopewell HELEN EVERITT

When the frenzy holiday chores traps into serving family meal in minutes, remember... just a few more seconds can add a bright gourmet touch to the simplest menu.
You'll find cling peaches make all the difference!

Look what you can do with cling peaches quick!

Here below are only a few of so many reasons why we say canned cling peaches are the sunniest... and quickest* way to brighten any meal!

*For instance, you can broil cling peach halves and serve as fragrant golden garnish with hamburger... slice a loaf of canned luncheon meat, baste with peach juice and heat in oven with cling peach slices... heat frozen chicken or meat pie to serve with peach half —hot or cold (try filling the peach hollow with relish).

CLING PEACH ADVISORY BOARD

I dreamed I was

HAT BY JOHN FREDERICS

WANTED

in my Maidenform bra

Name: Star Flower* Reward: Just wearing it!

Distinguishing characteristics: Circular stitched cups in pretty petal pattern. Twin elastic bands beneath cups. Upper bands adjust to make bra fit like custom-made. Lower bands make bra breathe with wearer.

Physical description: White broadcloth. A, B, C cups. 2.50.

Last seen: In stores everywhere. Looking ravishing.

*REG U S PAT OFF ©1960 MAIDENFORM INC NEW YORK 16 N Y

C right 1960, Benrus Watch Company

You'll swear your Benrus has nine lives, too!

Watches by Benrus, built to last...and last...and last! Styled to stay in style. The movement is the remarkable 17-jewel, or more, Benrus movement which carries this Unconditional 3-Year Guarantee: It must run properly, or Benrus will repair it or replace it free and fast. To give...or to get...a Benrus is the present with the guaranteed future. At your jeweler's, from $25.00. BENRUS

Don't miss "THE WIZARD OF OZ" in color, CBS-TV Sunday, December 11.

Unconditionally Guaranteed for 3 Years

BE REALLY REFRESHED... AROUND THE CLOCK!

RECIPE: On toothpicks serve green olives, tiny franks stuffed with American cheese, dill pickle chunks wrapped in thin carrot strips, pickled onions between small salami slices, parsley cream cheese between bologna slices, ripe olives stuffed with carrot and green pepper sticks, American cheese wrapped with salami strip.

At snack time...serve these "Snappy Center" Tidbits and King Size Coke and be really refreshed! Only Coca-Cola gives you that cheerful lift...that cold crisp taste that makes snacks more appetizing. Sign of Good Taste Tune in "The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet" each week on your local ABC-TV station.

COPYRIGHT © 1960 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY. "COKE" IS A REGISTERED TRADE-MARK.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

METROPOLIS. Chicago-born Richard Florsheim not only is a working artist; he teaches and writes about art as well. Many of his prints and paintings are inspired by city scenes.

EXECUTIVE EDITOR:
Mary Bass

ASSOCIATE EDITORS:
Peter Briggs
William McCleery
Mary Lea Page
Curtiss Anderson
Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella G. Shouer
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Stanley Freeman
Hal T. Williams

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS:
Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES:
John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills
Conrad Brown
Anne Fuller

ASSISTANT EDITORS:
Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Grant Harris
Ann Blackmar
Lee Stowell Cullen
Elaine Ward-Hanna
Carole O'Brien
Hazel Owen

EDITORIAL ASSISTANTS:
Helen Olchvary
Mary Jane Engel
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen M. Snead
Judith Harkison
Dorothy Shuler
Natalie Schram
Julie Ditchy
Lee Pettee

The necessity and function of an opposition

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

The national election is over, we have a new President-elect, there will be changes in the next Congress, and a partly new Administration will take over next January. I say "partly" because the enormous Federal and state bureaucracies change only in fundamental policymaking positions with changes in Administration. The workers in these bureaus, numbering millions, are under civil service and can be removed only with great difficulty, even for incompetence.

Since the prestige and rating of a bureau depend to a large extent on its size, every bureau head tries to extend his empire, and every department is thus invariably overstaffed. The theory that the more employees one has the more efficient will be the performance of the whole has been disproved time and again in both public and private business. But the number of employees keeps on growing. This proliferation of bureaucracies is universal in all countries, but in few countries, if any, is government bureaucracy more of a leviathan than in the United States. The Federal Government alone employs 7 per cent of the nation's labor force. The unremitting increase in state, municipal and local government expenditures and staff is known to everybody who pays tax bills, whether state income tax, on a home he owns, on other real estate, and on nearly everything he consumes, including travel, telegrams and telephone calls.

In following the recent presidential campaign we have been struck by the fact that no real presentation of issues has been made at all. The "outs" have accused the "ins" of failures or inadequacies at home and abroad. The "ins" have defended Administration policies while promising changes or modifications. But neither side has recommended any fundamentally new considerations or approaches.

In foreign affairs both parties are equally committed to the U.N., without raising a single question about the way its structure, composition, membership, functions and powers have been developing.

Both parties, likewise, are committed to continuing foreign aid in the form of grants, loans and outright gifts to governments, but the candidates of neither unrolled, specifically, what such government-to-government aid has been doing to the countries that receive it, and to their popular reactions toward the United States.

Each side promised increased aid to "the farmer," without defining who "the farmer" is or revealing what the effect of the policies of the Eisenhower Administration and its predecessors has been on the farm and national economy as a whole.

Both sides have promised increased Federal aid to education in the form of grants to the states for school-construction purposes, to free funds for raising teachers' salaries, together with other educational aid, such as scholarships or direct aid to teachers' salaries. But no candidates have set forth, 1—the actual condition of public education in the United States and how, if at all, it should be changed; 2—what school-construction costs actually are, state by state per classroom CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

GOLDEN LIGHT MAZOLA® CORN OIL

Your golden guarantee of special nutritional benefits

It's the Mazola Corn Oil in this marinating sauce that makes London Broil specially delicious...specially nutritious. See recipe below.

Of all leading brands

ONLY MAZOLA IS CORN OIL

Highly unsaturated! Not hydrogenated!

For you and your family, cooking with Mazola can mean more than better tasting meats and salads, because Mazola gives you special nutritional benefits, too. Mazola is highly unsaturated, not hydrogenated . . . so digestible!

There are so many ways to enjoy the special benefits of golden light Mazola Corn Oil. Use Mazola to make your own fresh salad dressings, for all your frying, and in baking use in any recipe calling for melted shortening.

Ask your doctor about the special nutritional benefits of corn oil in your daily meals.

London Broil

One flank steak top-quality, surface scored on both sides

MARINATING SAUCE

- 1 clove garlic
- 1 cup Mazola Corn Oil
- ½ cup vinegar
- 1 teaspoon salt
- ¼ teaspoon pepper
- 2 teaspoons dry mustard
- 2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce
- Dash cayenne
- Few drops Tabasco sauce

Slice garlic into large shallow pan. Add remaining ingredients, stir until blended.

Place steak in pan, and pour marinade over it. Let stand at least 3 hours, overnight if possible. Remove from marinade.

Preheat broiler. Broil steak 2 to 3 inches below heat, allowing 3 to 4 minutes for each side. Carve diagonally across grain into thin slices.

Refrigerate and reuse left-over marinade for meat, fish or poultry; or as dressing for tossed salads.

NTINUED FROM PAGE 11

d other units of space; how these construc-n costs compare with those of private ilding, and if they vastly exceed them, why; iat proportion of these costs is invested in ssroom space and libraries, and what in mnasiums, swimming pools, recreation oms, elaborately equipped home-economics aboratories," cafeterias, kitchens, playing ounds and other things that are secondary to ential education; or whether, and in what ions or communities, the salaries of teach-, most of whom are women, lag behind the el of the incomes of equally educated per-ns not engaged in profit-making enterprises. In short, the electorate during the recent mpaign heard no fundamental discussion of ues and policies or the facts pertinent to em. Again, the appeal was, not to the indi-tual and his mind and reasoning faculties,

WINTER SONG

By CAROLINE NEILSON

Now frost bejewels every weed,
No motion stirs the cruel air,
The bird is frozen to the branch,
The rabbit stiffens in the snare.

Beneath the foot, the ringing ground
Forbids the spade, or upward shoot.
The juiceless stems unchanging stand;
The cold has seized the shallow root.

Now nothing alters, nothing mars
The outlines bare, of trees, hills, stones,
The basic structure summer hid—
The permanent shape, the earth's great bones.

t to mass organizations or groups, with their bies—organized labor, organized business, mers, ethnic and national groups, and local liticians who presumably "delivered" votes. Now, American democracy (and "democ-y," like every other political idea, requires nstant definition, or open redefinition) was nded on the assumption that man is a rea-ning animal. If confronted by choices fairly cisely defined and put in possession of facts t assembled by special pleaders paid by the nerican people), he will be able to make a re or less educated decision, always with his n interests in mind, man being what he is d not what he should be), but also with a triotic view to the security, justice and gen-l welfare of the American people, and the eservation of liberty for themselves and their sterity.

(The preamble to the Constitution of the ited States which defines the national pur-se should be lettered on the wall of every ssroom in America, and learned by heart every child in elementary school. And the ention of each student should be called to e listing of priorities in purpose.)

Since March, 1933, when F. D. Roosevelt gan his first term, until this moment, a riod of twenty-eight years, there has never en an effective opposition in this country. oosevelt for twelve years had a completely cile Congress. The only reversal of his licies came from a few decisions of the preme Court.

Truman, during his second term, had a publican Congress, but the Republican nks were divided.

Eisenhower has governed in his second rm with a Democratic Congress, but the mocrats have been so divided that he has t from it nearly all he wanted.

The Democratic Party holds within its ranks members who should properly belong to a Labor-Socialist Party, and extreme conservatives, largely from the South. The Republican Party, since it rejected Senator Taft in the 1952 convention, has become a liberal party, vying with the Northern Democrats in its appeals to organized masses.

The normal division between parties is liberal-conservative along lines of basic approach and principle. This no longer exists. The conservative element in the combined electorate is effectively disfranchised for lack of choice. Yet there are certainly hundreds of thousands of thoughtful American citizens who now feel at home in neither party, and who, however they may cast their votes, do so without confidence or enthusiasm. The outstanding characteristic of such individuals is that they do not belong to "organized man," do not wish to vote according to the position taken by group leaders of special interests, and do feel a strong concern and responsibility for the future of their children and the fate of the republic.

Since so many words have lost or changed their meanings, it is necessary for any writer to describe what he means by "liberal" and "conservative."

The "liberal" has always been favorable to democratic reforms and the abolition of privilege. He has wished to equalize opportunity within the limits of natural endowment over which nobody has control. But he has always been, and in the nature of the word itself, for the widest freedom for the individual within the limits of statute law. Historically, the liberal has always opposed great concentrations of political or economic power, whether in the hands of great corporations, in our own day monopolistic unions, and/or governments. He has distrusted the power of the state, knowing the obvious: that the state is the police and the punitive power, and that the power to tax is the power to destroy.

This was most notably true of the founders of this country. The American Revolution was essentially against the interference of the British power in the lives of Americans at every level, a bill of grievances on these matters being incorporated in the Declaration of Independence. In revolting and starting a new national government, the founders had not the slightest intention of substituting an omnipotent American government for a British one, and designed a constitution precisely to prevent a consolidation of national governmental power.

Today such a definition of "liberal" is meaningless. In practice "liberal" could much better be defined as "socialist": namely, the belief that individual freedom should be wholly or largely subordinated to the interests of the community (as judged by men as fallible as the rest of us); that the ownership (or regulation and control) of the means of production should be in the hands of the state and its bureaucracies; and that it is the duty of the state to care for its citizens from the cradle to the grave. The essential, perhaps, of this neo-liberal view is that the state and its employees and "experts" are better judges of what the individual needs (or should want) than he is. That the state, of itself, creates no wealth whatever, and can only distribute what it forces (under heavy penalties) out of the pockets, profits and pay checks of the people or borrows on the account of future generations, is never emphasized—or even mentioned—by these liberals, who are always promising to give away, via government, what they neither create nor possess except by compulsion. Socialism, whether it comes gradually, or suddenly in a revolutionary way, has so far invariably led to the extinction of liberty: economic, social and political.

The word "conservative" has become a term of reproach, and today is usually called "reactionary."

It is nothing of the kind. The conservative is one who is disposed to maintain existing institutions and change them cautiously, only with much deliberation. The conservative believes in experience—the experience of a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

New—from the Big Green Man

White Shoe Peg Corn

New delicacy in corn! Very tall, very slender kernels the shape of a shoe peg and the color of white gold. Unusually crisp with a flavor unlike any corn you've ever tasted before. Quick-cooked and vacuum packed to save the fresh-picked flavor, color and crispness. Green Giant Brand White Shoe Peg Corn. Try some soon.

GREEN GIANT®
Good things from the garden

GREEN GIANT CO., HDQRS., LE SUEUR, MINN. GREEN GIANT OF CANADA, LTD., TECUMSEH, ONT. "GREEN GIANT" BRAND REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. © GGCo.

NEW OLD SPICE Deluxe Gift Set: Shampoo, Body Talcum, Hair Tonic, large After Shave Lotion, Stick Deodorant, large Cologne, deluxe Soaps 10.0(

New... new... new gift ideas

OLD SPICE Gift Set: After Shave Lotion, Stick Deodorant, Men's Cologne 2.60

NEW OLD SPICE Gift Set: large After Shave Lotion, Body Talcum, large Men's Cologne 4.50

OLD SPICE Pro-Electric Shave Lotion 1.00 and .60

OLD SPICE After Shave Lotio 1.75 and 1.0

The best in beauty and fragrance for her...

SPRAY COLOGNES, available in Friendship Garden, Desert Flower, Early American Old Spice, Escapade 2.50

NEW DESERT FLOWER "Vanity-Caddy": Toilet Water, Beauty Bath, Hand and Body Lotion 6.00

by SHULTON

Prices plus tax where applicable. Also available in Canada.

NEW FRAGRANCE FLING, Toilet Water in four fragrances: Early American Old Spice, Escapade, Friendship Garden, Desert Flower 2.50

NEW DESERT FLOWER Deluxe-size Dusting Powder 3.00

NEW FRIENDSHIP GARDEN Gift Set: Toilet Water, Hand and Body Lotion 2.50

TRIM EVERY LIMB

with stockings, stockings, stockings tinted! textured! sparkling!

Du Pont Nylon

DU PONT
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

BETTER THINGS FOR BETTER LIVING . . . THROUGH CHEMISTRY

DU PONT MAKES FIBERS, DOES NOT MAKE HOSIERY SHOWN HERE.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 13

nation, the value of its tried and tested traditions, and the experiences of history, within any given civilization.

The conservative, who is the least Utopian and most commonsensical of political minds, is the one most disposed to exercise foresight and to weigh alternative policies in the light of their probable consequences. He does this from what is known of previous experiences in his own civilization and others, and what is known of human nature, which has changed far less in centuries than have the external factors of life. He feels at home only in dealing with realities. Before he makes judgments he wants to know facts, and not just the "facts" as set forth by the "information" officers of bureaus, sub-bureaus and official committees, who are not pure information sources, but are engaged in justifying the policies their chiefs represent.

Even at the risk of being called "inhumanitarian," he wants to know what policies have cost, will cost, what the results have been, and by logical deduction will be, and who profits and loses.

The intelligent conservative, whose judgments are based on fact and reason rather than on instinctive reactions, is not opposed to change. If he were, he would not be intelligent. For change is a law of life and implicit in the evolution of this century, which has seen more enormous changes in the way men and women earn their livings than in any comparable period of human history. But he wants to know what changes are necessary or advisable, at what pace, and why. He is, perhaps, less interested in "know-how" than in know why.

In a democracy, based on representative government, the function of a political opposition is to be the watchdog and gadfly of the party and Administration in power. Its purpose is to work to supply what wants supplying and check what wants checking, with a view to securing that the basic principles it represents should eventually prevail.

Normally speaking, this is the business of a party out of power. But with party lines at present so unclear, it seems to me that a new "loyal opposition" must begin to form itself outside either party. Acting as critic-guide, and exerting pressure on both, it would involve the coalescence of forces outside the great organizations, public and private, that now, through their leaders, lawyers, public-relations counselors, and so on, largely determine the policies of the United States.

It must begin by associating people at the grass roots, in every community, initiated by those who take the lead under their own steam. It should not be a movement that goes into action only at the time of elections, but act as a continuing force, unremittingly raising questions, demanding answers and suggesting alternatives.

Uncounted thousands of intelligent, patriotic and dissatisfied Americans are, at present, intimidated by their belief in and fear of their aloneness. There are, for instance, devoted and experienced classroom teachers who, as I have learned from their letters, are more dissatisfied than anyone else about the status of education in the United States, and whose complaints are not about their salaries but about their incapacity to apply their experience, the diffusion of their time and energies to activities that are extraneous to real teaching, the pressures of school boards, principals, parents and educational theorists who prevent them from exercising reasonable classroom disciplines, and the theories under which they must work, invented for the most part by people who have never taught a classroom in their lives.

There are, for instance, individual critics of "foreign aid" as at present administered (including a great many foreign correspondents) who are not opposed in principle to a large and rich country's generously helping the poor ones, but who have observed on the spot many evil political, social and economic results of the projects and policies as actually applied.

At present the voices of these largely disinterested observers and recorders are muffled out by the vast official propaganda t emerges unceasingly from hacks paid by American taxpayer, or self-interested perso and nowhere are the critical views assembl checked and analyzed.

This, as I see it, and under existing con tions, cannot be satisfactorily done except citizens who have no axes to grind, are immediately seeking power, but are genuin and devotedly concerned for this republic. general there is a cynical notion abroad toc that every man has his price and is motiva only by self-interest.

I know this is not true. In every class society, not least among workmen, acc tomed as they are to face and deal with hard facts of life, are such persons. A la (and perhaps disproportionate) number women are among them; and I am not thi ing chiefly of professional women, but intelligent, responsible housewives and mo ers. Women are the least organized-for-s interest group in America, if half of the po lation can be classified as a "group." Th

LULLABY

By CHAD WALSH

Why are your eyes so far away,
Little one, little one?
What are your lips shaped to say,
My son, my son?

A breast for your lips and milk fo
your need,
I offer my little one.
But where do your eyes steadily feed,
Jesus, my little son?

The sun in the sky, a fleece of a cloud,
I see, and my little one,
And a lark sings soft, and my hear sings loud
To carol a new-born son.

Take what I have, the milk and th breast,
Close your eyes, little one,
See when you must, but sleep is best
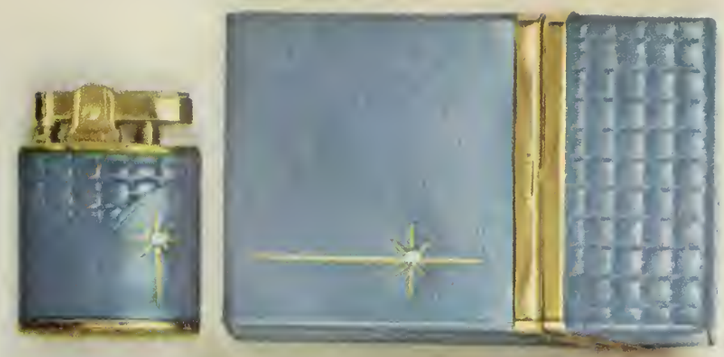
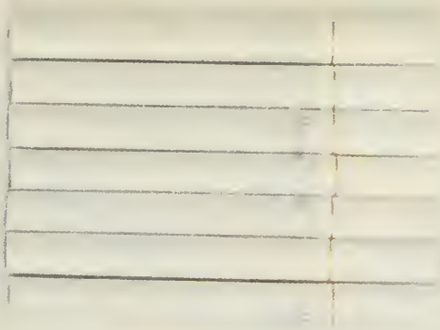
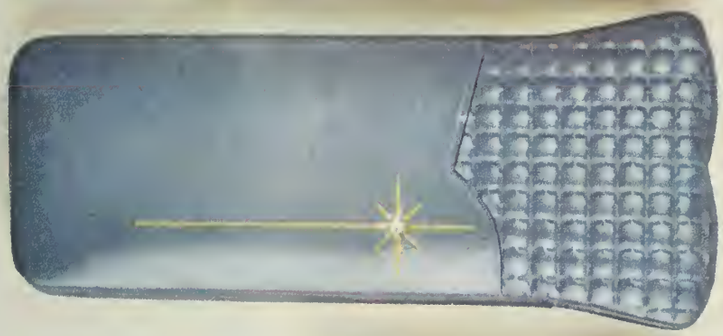
This hour, Jesus, my son.



nature, lives and experience tie them to future generation, confront them with realit rather than theories, and compel them to rec nize common sense as a basic standard judgment and action. But they, too, suffer fr a sense of inferiority toward women w "careers."



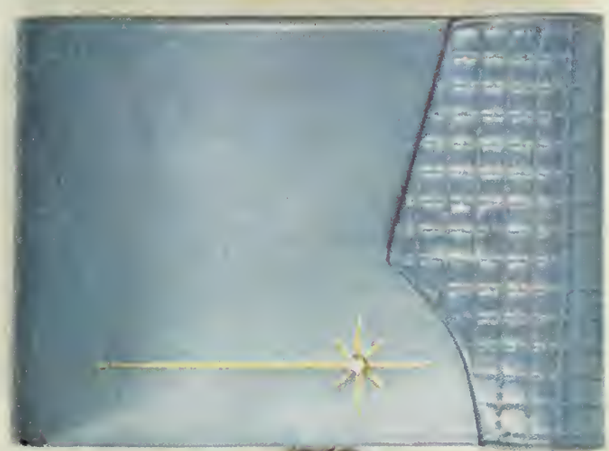
The real governor of the world today public opinion. And public opinion is not result of counting heads. It is created natural leaders, in newspapers, other pul cations and media of communication, pulp and in all social groups where people gat together spontaneously. Although there few general stores left, there are still thousa of cracker barrels even in metropolises.



A source of active aid in such a moveni for the republic will be found, I am sure, men and women who have been forcibly tired long before their mental and even phy cal powers have approached exhaustion.

In succeeding articles in this space I sh try to elucidate on some now widely accep policies, which require the presentation facts and evaluations. I wish to do this a stimulus to fresh, independent and disint ested thinking. If I am wrong in my facts shall certainly be corrected.

Nevertheless, when policies are palpably fa ing there is always a reason. And the cur not to be found in changing the administ tions of the policy for others bent on do more or less of the same thing. E



If you smoke, wear glasses, unlock doors, carry lots of pictures, or just spend money. The Evening Star Set by LADY BUXTON

best for your money

IN YOUR CHOICE OF BLACK, WHITE, BLUE OR RED. FRENCH PURSE $5.00*, BILLFOLD $5.00*, CIGARETTE CASE $3.95, KEY TAINER† $2.95*, SPECTACLER* $2.00, LIGHTER $4.95. *PLUS TAX ©1966 BUXTON INC., SPRINGFIELD, MASS. ... SEAT IN CANADA ... THE CONT...

For His Leisure Life

CHEROKEE . . . deep down comfort that lives on glove-soft leather. Also in black saddle or creme glove.

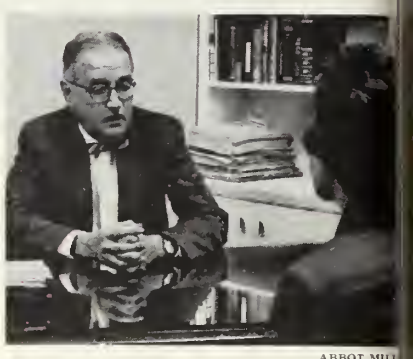
PLANTER'S PUNCH . . . cool comfort, carefully Hand Turned to make relaxation the fashion of the day.

VANGUARD . . . to give him at-home comfort wherever he goes. Also in camel or black nylon suede with cushion soles.

BARONET OPERA . . . an easy-going friend any man appreciates. Also in blue or tan.

Priced from $6.95 to $8.95 at all fine stores.

Evans SLIPPERS FOR MEN



©L. B. Evans' Son Co., Wakefield, Massachusetts

There are many questions which wome would like to ask a trusted physician, bu there is not always the opportunity. I this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Docto Schauffler will discuss some of the prol lems which have been sent to him b readers. The situations are all real, bu all the names which are used are fictitious

TELL ME, DOCTOR

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M.D.

"I've known since I was eighteen that I'm low on thyroid, and have been taking medication. My old symptoms have returned with this pregnancy. Will my baby be affected?"

ABBOT MILL

The doctor always shook hands when a new patient entered his consult ing room. He felt the handclasp told him something about the woman's personality, sometimes even about her physical state. In the present case twenty-six-year-old Mrs. Foster had a pudgy hand, the flesh bulging around her rings, and it felt limp and lethargic in his. At the same time he noted a little enlargement of the lower neck area, and a heavier-than-usual growth of fine dark hair on Mrs. Foster's upper lip and forearms. Also he caught an apprehensive glance at the scales standing in a corner.

"I can see you don't like to weigh yourself, Mrs. Foster," he remarked with a quizzical smile.

She looked up, startled. "I'm pregnant now, Doctor, about five months along. That makes me look fat. But fat is one of my big problems."

"And do you find yourself low on pep a good deal of the time?"

This time it was Mrs. Foster who smiled. "You've spotted that I'm hypothyroid! The answer is yes, and most of the symptoms seem to be worse when I'm pregnant, especially the weight. I've had other kinds of trouble, too, about pregnancy."

"Suppose we start with your weight and pregnancy difficulties. Tell me more about them."

Mrs. Foster settled herself comfortably in the patient's chair. "When I was as young as twelve or thirteen, I began having to fight excessive weight. The puberty hair appeared early, and mostly in the wrong places. Menstruation didn't become regular and normal until after I began taking thyroid, when I was eighteen. My blood pressure was always low too.

"I did better all the way round after I was put on thyroid, especially in my schoolwork. But after I married and we moved here, I began to lose ground almost immediately. I had no pep at all. My blood pressure got low again and even my pulse slowed up. It was quite a while before I became pregnant."

The doctor nodded. "All that is a rather common experience hereabouts with women who are low in natural thyroid. You see, this region is a so-called goiter belt. There is little or no iodine in the water, therefore there is little in the fresh vegetables and other foods. This seems to produce special difficulties with the reproductive mechanism for a good many women. We know now that the trouble is with the thyroid."

"I wish you would explain to me about this thyroid and goiter and iodine business, Doctor. I know of course about the thyroid gland, and that there are people who haven't enough thyroid and are called hypothyroid, and other people who have too much and get goiters. Then there is the thyroid we take for medicine, and somehow or other iodine seems to be mixed up with the whole thing. I never have understood it very clearly."

"It's not too complicated, really. The thyroid gland furnishes a natural secretion, or hormone. As you said, either too little or too much secretion can cause difficulties. The best understood part of this hormone is a substance called thyroxine, which appears to carry the bulk of the thyroid's work. The gland's effectiveness, however, operates through its iodine content. The thyroid medicine

CONTINUED ON PAGE 20

SHOWN IN ENGLISH MOROCCO $7.50 PLUS TAX. OTHERS FROM $5.00 PLUS TAX. ©1960 BUXTON INC. SPRINGFIELD, MASS., BUXTON CANADA LTD. TORONTO 9

Does your billfold do all this?

1. Does the pass case snap shut for flatness and safety? 2. Are the card and photo windows made of tough, thin, polyester film that won't tear and resists surface scratching? 3. Is there a special place for a charge plate and spare key? 4. Can you remove or add windows? 5. Is there a large handy pocket for extra cards? 6. A small section for stamps and tickets? 7. Is the billfold fabric-lined? 8. Does it have a secret compartment for hiding big bills? And does it feature one-piece stitchless construction? If you can't answer "Yes" to all of these questions, you need a Convertible® by LORD BUXTON

best for your money

Exciting gifts to get or give . . . the luxury of a relaxing Wrisley bath . . . the subtle romantic scent of a refreshing Wrisley Cologne . . . gifts created to enhance your natural beauty . . . fine cosmetics for bath and boudoir.

A. Hobnail Cologne. Delightful fragrances. Milk glass bottle. $2.00. B. Hobnail Bubble Bath. Matches cologne fragrances. Milk glass vase. $1.50. C. Fragrance Bubble Bath to match spray mist cologne. $1.00. D. Spray Mist Cologne for every mood. Blue Fern (shown), Enchant, Queen's Guard. $1.50. E. French Lilac Soap. Hauntingly reminiscent of Paris. $1.50. (Matching fragrance available in bubble bath and spray cologne.) F. Bath Superbe Soap. Five heavenly fragrances. Lathers luxuriously. $1.00. G. Superbe Bubble Bath. Four superb fragrances. Attractive French Provincial chest. $1.00.

H. Wrisley Magicolor Bubble Bath. U.S. Certified colors (pink, blue, yellow, green) won't stain tub, towel, or youngster. $1.00.

Wrisley
New York • Chicago
FINE COSMETICS FOR BATH AND BOUDOIR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 18

that you spoke of is simply a refined extract of the dried and pulverized thyroid glands of animals. It was the first thyroid medication available and is still our stock in trade for thyroid difficulties. There are more refined, and theoretically more potent and exact, thyroid derivatives, but thyroid extract remains the least expensive and is probably just as effective as the others. Incidentally, it was the very first of the hormone medications and is still probably the most reliable. Finally, because of the part iodine appears to play in the chemistry of thyroid functioning, it, too, is used in the treatment of thyroid troubles in a number of ways.

"But I'd like to know more about you, Mrs. Foster, and the difficulties you had after you moved into our low-iodine area. You said you had trouble getting pregnant."

"Yes, and when I finally did get pregnant, I had what my doctor called a spontaneous abortion around the second month. He said that's a fairly common complaint in low-thyroid conditions."

"Infertility is common enough. And strangely enough, it is also common in *hyper*thyroid states. Spontaneous abortion in early months, and even miscarriage later on, are thought to occur more often than usual in hypothyroid states. In true hyperthyroidism, what we doctors call exophthalmic or toxic goiter—also Graves' disease—fertility is affected so adversely that pregnancy seldom occurs, so there isn't so much opportunity for accidents related to it. Incidentally, the drug Thiouricil, which is extensively used in nonpregnant hyperthyroid patients, is dangerous in pregnancy.

"It seems as though in pregnancy the thyroid gland must definitely stay in the middle of the road. Too little or too much of its hormone is apt to cause trouble all along the line. Doubtless the amount of thyroid extract you were using where you lived before was not enough to fill your requirements in this region. And in pregnancy there is normally an extra demand on the thyroid."

"After the spontaneous abortion, my doctor gave me basal-metabolism tests and raised my thyroid dosage up to two grains a day, got pregnant again right away and carried my little girl to term—she's three years old now. Even so, I felt dull and listless during the pregnancy and I gained forty pounds. I feel listless now, with this pregnancy, and my weight is getting away from me again."

"A great many women in the goiter area need extra thyroid," the doctor commented, "and they may need to have the dosage stepped up during pregnancy. This is true, too, of many women who don't live in goiter areas. Many doctors nowadays routinely give small doses of either thyroid or iodine—in ordinary cases either seems to give the necessary boost—to all pregnant patients who aren't hyperthyroid. But the women should be tested carefully first, to make sure they aren't hyperthyroid, or sensitized to thyroid.

"Whosoever on ye nighte of ye nativity of ye young Lord Jesus, in ye greate snows, shall fare forth bearing a succulent bone for ye loste and lamenting hounde, a wisp of hay for ye shivering horse, a cloak of warm raiment for ye twittering crone, a flagon of red wine for him whose marrow withers, a garland of bright berries for one who has worn chains, gay arias of lute and harp for all huddled birds who thought that song was dead, and divers lush sweetmeats for such babes' faces as peer from lonely windows, Unto him shall be proffered and returned gifts of such an astonishment as will rival the hues of the peacock and the harmonies of heaven, so that though he live to ye greate age when man goes stooping and querulous because of the nothing that is left in him, yet shall he walk upright and remembering, as one whose heart shines like a greate star in his breaste."

"YE GREATE ASTONISHMENT" FROM "YE MIRACLE OF YE SEASONS"

It can be very dangerous, in fact, for someone low in thyroid, like you, to try to regulate her own dosage."

"In what way?"

"You might be oversusceptible, and in that case you could go into true hyperthyroidism. That's the exophthalmic goiter or Graves' disease I mentioned. The thyroid gland enlarges and the eyes may bulge, get glassy-looking. The heart is overworked and may be damaged. Also, there is a type of thyroid nodule, an irregular small tumor, that can start growing wild—become overactivated, as we doctors say."

Mrs. Foster confessed, "Ever since my nice doctor moved away, I've been going along on the two grains a day that brought me through my second pregnancy. I hate to take a basal-metabolism test! It always made me so breathless and scared that half the time my tests were no good."

"Many doctors would agree with you, Mrs. Foster, that the old basal-metabolism test had disadvantages. We have more modern tests now, such as the Protein Bound Iodine test—

CONTINUED ON PAGE 22

©1960 BUXTON INC., SPRINGFIELD, MASS., BUXTON LTD., TORONTO, 9

Two ways to guard your jewel collection

IN BLUE BLACK IVORY ABOUT $15.00.

1. Get a fierce, wide-awake watchdog and have him stand guard. (That'll discourage "borrowers.")
2. Keep it in your Lady Buxton Jewel Case. (That'll discourage disorder, dust, damage.) Now look at the photographs and pick out the case that's right for your own individual array of jewels.

Jewel Cases by LADY BUXTON

best for your money

IN PINK, WHITE, BLUE ABOUT $5.00.

IN GOLD, BLUE, PINK, WHITE ABOUT $15.00.

IN WHITE, BLUE, GOLD ABOUT $20.00.

give her Jewelite

She'll be flattered by the lavish elegance of this Jewelite Dressing Table Set—and as she uses it her gratitude will grow! The alabaster panels are inlaid with flakes of gleaming gold. And the nylon bristles in the brush are the safest nylon that ever caressed your scalp. Jagged nylon can be a menace to hair and scalp, you know. But, with Jewelite, EVERY BRISTLE-END IS SMOOTHLY ROUNDED. And every Jewelite Brush, Comb and Mirror is precision-molded, polished by hand and styled to be a reigning fashion. See the wide range of Jewelite sets for women (and men). PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH COMPANY, FLORENCE, MASS., makers of famous Pro Tooth Brushes and Combs.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 20

called P.B.I. for short. There's another one, called the B.E.I.—Butyl Extractible Iodine—that will probably take precedence over the P.B.I. in time. Some laboratories are not yet properly set up to interpret it, however, and on that account I'm going to give you the Protein Bound Iodine test. You don't have to prepare for it in advance. All we do is get some blood from a vein. By the way, have you been taking thyroid within the last few days?"

"Yes, I take it every day."

"In that case I'll examine you now, but we won't do the thyroid test, for the thyroid medication might alter the results. I'd like you to stop the thyroid extract for four days and then come in for your P.B.I. test."

After examining Mrs. Foster, the doctor told her that generally speaking she and the baby were in good shape. "Of course you are overweight, but that is to be expected. I don't think you have myxedema—that's when the thyroid secretion is really low—but a great deal can be done by using a diuretic and putting you on a strict diet. You must get bathroom scales and weigh every day. It is quite possible you may need even more thyroid—I will know more about that after the P.B.I. test. But don't forget that too much salt and too much fattening food constitute the biggest part of the permanent overweight problem with anyone, regardless of the way the thyroid is functioning."

"One thing has worried me since the old symptoms came back with this pregnancy. Could the baby be a dwarf or cretin, because my thyroid hasn't been functioning right? I've read that can happen."

"You haven't the slightest need to worry about any such thing as that, Mrs. Foster. It is true that a good many children were born physically stunted, or possibly seriously retarded mentally, before we knew what we now know about the need the thyroid gland has for iodine, and the implications of iodine lack. There are regions of the world where there is scarcely any iodine at all in the water and food. In such regions, serious things could and did happen before doctors learned to supply the missing substances. If the mother's thyroid lack is greatly exaggerated, especially in early pregnancy, there could be irregularities in the baby's development. Even nowadays this happens occasionally.

"But there is absolutely no necessity for this to happen if every mother will put herself under medical supervision as soon as she suspects she is pregnant. Doctors today understand these matters clearly, and the thyroid can generally be brought into balance quite easily. Unless, that is, it has been irreparably damaged before help is available.

"We have even found that the thyroid gland can be removed as safely during pregnancy as at any other time, when it is so overactive that it threatens the welfare of mother or baby."

"Would you clear up another point? I was taught that the function of the thyroid gland is to control metabolism. How does it get mixed up with menstruation and pregnancy?"

"We don't know exactly, Mrs. Foster. Certainly metabolism—transforming food into energy and elements from which the body can build its tissues—is the most obvious function of the thyroid, and probably its most important. But there appears to be a subtle connection between the thyroid and the reproductive organs in both sexes. There is certainly a connection between the thyroid and the ovary. How it operates hasn't been worked out clearly, but it's conjectured that the thyroid acts on the pituitary and that both the pituitary and the thyroid act on the ovary. Some scientists think the thyroid has some components of a sex hormone, in addition to its metabolic function. At any rate, today it is part of the obstetrician's duty to check every patient's thyroid functioning. If it is not working in a way to insure a good outcome for the pregnancy, there are many medicines, even surgery, that can help avoid complications.

"But there are still great gaps in our knowledge of thyroid chemistry, even though it is our oldest and best-known hormone. But we do know enough to avoid many of the tragedies that used to happen—when our patients give us the chance to avoid them. I guess that's the really important thing, isn't it?"

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses the prevention of toxemia.

Softens Rough Hands Overnight

Dryness disappears! Skin is softened! Wake to prettier hands with Italian Balm.

Campana
Italian Balm
FOR HANDS

HOW TO MEET EXPENSES

YOU can earn extra cash to meet expenses by selling subscriptions to the Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, The American Home, Holiday, Jack and Jill and other popular magazines. Earn generous commissions in your spare time. We'll send details without obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
798 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

Now Possible to Shrink and Heal Hemorrhoids Without Surgery

Only Preparation H Contains New Healing Substance That Can Shrink Hemorrhoids Without Surgery And At Same Time Relieve Itching and Pain.

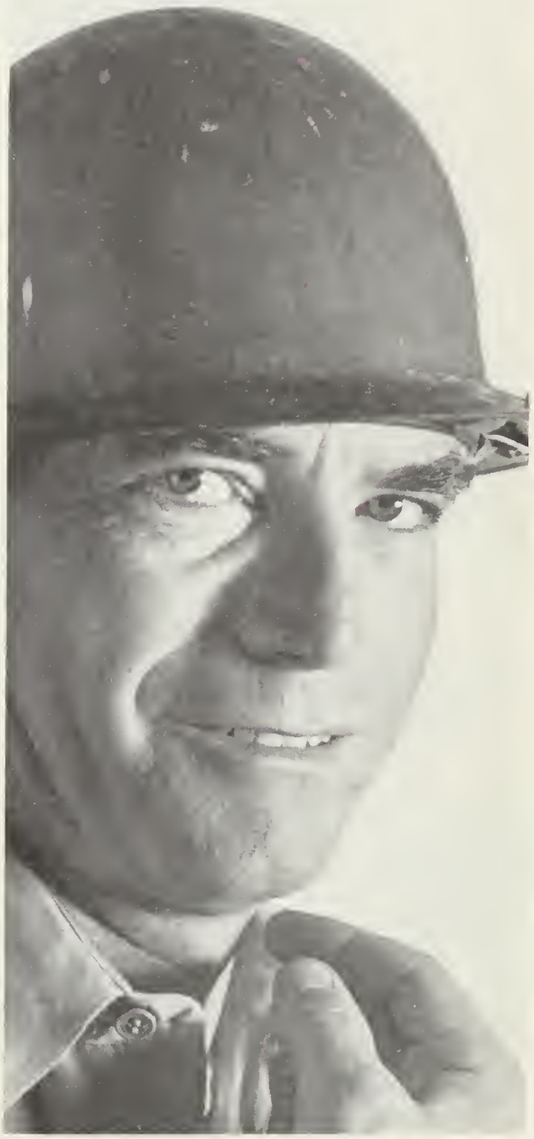
A world-famous research institute has discovered a new substance which now makes it possible to shrink and heal hemorrhoids without surgery. It stops itching and relieves pain in minutes, then speeds up healing of the sore, injured tissues all while actual reduction (shrinking) takes place.

Tests conducted under a doctor's observations proved this so. And most amazing of all, this very striking improvement was maintained over a period of many months.

In fact, results were so thorough, sufferers were able to make such statements as "Piles have ceased to be a problem." Among these sufferers were a very wide variety of hemorrhoid conditions, some of 10 to 20 years' standing.

All this was accomplished without the use of narcotics, astringents or anesthetics of any kind. The secret is the remarkable new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) which quickly helps heal injured cells and stimulates regrowth of healthy tissue again. It is offered in ointment or suppository form called Preparation H®.

In addition to actually shrinking hemorrhoids, Preparation H lubricates and makes elimination less painful. It helps prevent infection which is a principal cause of hemorrhoids. Just ask for Preparation H Ointment or Preparation H Suppositories (easier to use away from home). Any drug counter.



"I take Bayer for ACHING MUSCLES!"

"I take Bayer for the headachy feeling of HOUSEWORK FATIGUE!"

"I gargle with Bayer for SORE THROAT due to a cold!"

BAYER®

BRINGS FASTEST RELIEF!

... the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get from pain, thanks to INSTANT FLAKING ACTION

Men who know medicine recommend Aspirin! In medical journals, in newspaper articles and in personal interviews, doctors and public health officials repeatedly recommend aspirin as the one thing for headaches, muscular aches and pains, fever of a cold. So, buy the best aspirin — buy Bayer Aspirin.

DOCTORS who looked inside a living person's stomach saw that Bayer tablets are not whole when they enter the stomach but disintegrate on the way and enter in a shower of soft, tiny flakes ready to go to work instantly so you feel better fast! In fact, Bayer brings the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get.

CHRISTMAS COOKIES

Gold Medal

NEW

THAT LOOK LIKE CANDY

as fun to bake as they look!

Trust Betty Crocker to dream them up...

and her Gold Medal Flour to give you kitchen confidence!

For all their fancy look, these Candy Cookies are easy to make with Gold Medal Flour. Just follow Betty Crocker's recipes and use her Gold Medal Flour for sure! Gold Medal gives you confidence—kitchen confidence—because it's the only flour that's "Kitchen-tested" in recipes like these clear across the country. So—go to it! Here's your chance to spoof everyone...with candies that are really cookies!

Peek under for a gay new idea!

FREE! Betty Crocker's Candy Cookie Recipes inside special Gold Medal sacks.

Only about 1 family in 20 likes Danish Dessert. Will you?

"Junket" Danish Dessert isn't anything like the ordinary gelatine desserts Americans are used to. It has the tang of fresh berry juice. And it sits in the spoon all shimmering and silky, not stiff and wobbly. People who have traveled in Scandinavia love it. So do people with educated tastes—and, usually, above-average incomes. Surprisingly, you needn't go to a gourmet shop to buy Danish Dessert. Regular food stores have it—for those very special customers. Maybe you?

"Junket" is a registered trademark of Salada-Shirriff-Horsey Inc. for Danish Dessert and other fine food products.

Just heat and eat

with

VEG-ALL®

7 garden mixed vegetables

Send label for FREE RECIPES:

The Larsen Company, Dept. E14
P.O. Box 728, Green Bay, Wis.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

GRAVY MASTER

KRYLON® You have a use for SPRAY PAINT

No Muss! No Brush! No Fuss!

IF YOU PRIZE IT...KRYLON-IZE IT!

BUYING GIFT WRAP?

FOR QUALITY, BEAUTY AND UTILITY BUY IMPERIAL PERMASHEEN, PARK LANE, AND RIB-N-TYE® BRANDS AT YOUR LOCAL STORE.

SUPREME RIBBON AND PAPER CORPORATION, Syosset, L.I.

"I don't know if we will come or not, Verna—
I haven't conducted the growl test yet!"

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

My shopping for Noel is accomplished; I've found a magic kaleidoscope, ideal gift for any child of 6 to 66. I'm ordering nineteen of 'em sent from the shop; and no gift wrapping by my Dream Girl.

I've told my favorite restaurant man he can put up to fifteen kinds of meat in a mixed grill à la Chile, from sweetbreads to tenderloin tips. Men love meat, and so do women, though more elegantly.

With help from Freud and John Dewey, we've bewitched our teenagers into an unearthly blend of Queen Guinevere and Borgia, Don Quixote and the Marquis de Sade. I think they're still like Tarkington kids.

"I've dreamed up a marvelous Christmas gift for my husband to give me," murmurs Betty Comfort dreamily, chopping her Christmas-greeting list. "A dreamy pair of diamond earrings! A wise investment, too, because inflation makes 'em worth more every year!"

"I'm a self-educated man," confides our town's most vociferous Ivy League college grad, in a rare moment of humility. "Since I graduated from college I've secretly looked up in dictionary or encyclopedia everything I pretended to know all about."

As a carver of Thanksgiving turkey, I get more brazen. They used to demand seconds before I'd filled my plate. Now I chew ceremonially at titbits and slivers while I slice for twenty.

Our town's deadpan cynic speaks up strongly for polygamy for rich men who can afford it. "Up to five wives and a marriage counselor," he says. "And I favor polyandry for rich women too."

We agreed at our bridge-table symposium on marriage that the wrong tone of voice rasps more husband-wife quarrels than what's said. "Husbands are sensitive to voices," our dummy-moderator said. "The tone hurts 'em more than the words."

Our town's most dominant wife concedes it's useless to whip up her husband's career by calling him stupid. "If I tell him he's a genius," she admits, "darned if he doesn't scintillate for the boss."

Maybe my wife's entirely too perceptive. If I put on my Hong Kong jacket for a party, with my Roman pants I had remodeled in Tokyo, she asks, "Now which girl are you impressing tonight?"

I hope they hurry this paste "space food" in tubes for home consumption. What a variety you could keep in a small fridge! And your wife can't tell how much you've squeezed out of each tube.

Even in our remote back yard the glare of the city illuminates the night sky. For a look at all the stars bright and dim we drive out to a country road where it's dark.

"Years of gladness, days of glee, like torrents of spring, they flee, they flee!"—From an old folk song immortalized by Ivan Turgenev for the Russians: they can't be all bad.

My wife is a flatterer: she tells me I look wonderful in almost any costume, especially if it's a dark suit with a white shirt.

As I've long threatened, I've evolved a masterly dish I can prepare in five minutes: tinned beef Stroganoff on quickie semi-tame wild rice. "This," I tell my guests, "would cost you nine dollars à la carte at the Colony."

I've just read a classic love tragedy, in which the hero's supreme indiscretion with a woman not the heroine is described by three asterisks. (And the next paragraph begins mystically "Four hours later . . .")

For six or seven months never-baggy Bermuda shorts have been our relaxing garb around the house. We've resolved to wear 'em all day the first blizzard and sunbathe under a lamp in the living room.

Our town's most wife-eclipsed husband confides his brave-new-world Minerva is never quite so subdued or humble as when her zipper's stuck and he extricates her.

Maybe it's our suburb's most fragrant romance: the marriage between the husband who brings home two or three flowers several times a week and his wife who has a single flower put on his desk daily. (They're married to each other.)

Even the most gorgeous woman in your little coterie can make you forget her beauty if she babbles and prattles on and on and on and on.

They flew me over to an air base on Lake Huron to watch our National Guard fighter interceptors shoot their rockets, and slept us in a long barracks with fifty cots. Brave-new-world acoustics: nobody heard a snore.

Our town's stingiest millionaire brags he can wear his college son's narrow pants. "I not only can, but I do," he boasts. "He buys new clothes all the time; my newest suit is seven years old."

Dauntlessly our clique of aging athletes walk to their offices. They complain the scenery gets tedious. One day a pretty girl of memorable physique walked downtown just ahead of 'em: they may hire such a girl to adorn their landscape.

When Aunt Daisy was a girl, etiquette required a man to remain standing if his lady on a walk became fatigued and sat down. (To sit down alongside would be "flagrantly indecorous and insulting.") Today he sits down first.

In her dual role as mother and mother-in-law, my Dream Princess interchanges recipes between our West Coast daughter and our East Coast daughter-in-law. (And she gleans quite a few tasty dishes!)

. . . When our daughter puts her gramp's gold cycling medal on her bracelet,
. . . And our son scrounges our old golf clubs so he and his wife can both play,
. . . Or our youngest lectures his prof's class on T. S. Eliot, whom he admires more'n I ever did,
. . . And our son-in-law transforms an old rowboat into a craft faintly resembling a yacht,
. . . Or my Dream Girl begins to outcook the chefs of the "12 Caesars,"
Then I begrudge the unmarried years I wasted in my twenties.

LOOK WHAT GAS IS DOING NOW!

NEW ANSWER TO LATE MEALS! Keep the whole dinner table-hot without over-cooking, with new 140° oven setting. Not just a roast (though rare roast beef stays rare)—but casseroles, vegetables, fish or even pastry!

New oven control on this CALORIC holds dinner 'table-ready' for hours!

Automatic Meat Thermometer shuts oven off when roast is ready!

Automatic Rotisserie does the turning and basting for you!

Automatic Burner-with-a-Brain* adjusts so food won't burn, boil over!

SEE HOW MODERN! This Caloric shows you how modern a Gas range is—how helpful, how automatic. It's the fastest, cleanest, coolest to cook with because it's Gas. And only Gas has the basic qualities needed for great cooking—instant response, cool efficiency, controllability—plus economy. Only Gas brings you ranges like this Caloric, that have won the Gold Star award for design and performance. See them, at your Gas company or dealer's, to see what a modern range can really do! AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

Everything's automatic on a range that's won this Gold Star award!

Only GAS does so much more...for so much less!

*A.G.A. Mark © Am. Gas Assoc. Inc.

These are the first cooking tools ever designed to serve in the dining room
The handles look like fine china, the stainless gleams like sterling. They'r beautiful, dishwasher-proof, made to cook and serve! Have these new tool with a new under-cabinet lazy susan for your kitchen; a sculptured, honeye mahogany susan for your buffet. NEW COOK & SERVE TOOLS BY EKCO/FLIN

AT ALL [illegible] STORES; ALSO AVAILABLE IN CANADA. EKCO AND FLINT ARE REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF EKCO PRODUCTS CO., CHICAGO. COOK & SERVE IS ALSO A TRADEMARK. ©1

UNDER COVER

I have personally been Under Cover for the past ten weeks. I find a coronary thrombosis is something akin to a spiritual experience. After the first few days, pain, shock and apprehension are left behind. For weeks you lie in bed, quite still—with your thoughts. An inner calm pervades you. Contentment such as I at least had never known before, and which I hope will never leave me, takes over your whole being. This is not, I have learned, unusual. You are out of the world. Life, though remote, seems far lovelier than you'd ever imagined. It was a small hospital I was in, and out of the 200 patients there at the time I was carried in, 30 were heart cases, 20 of which were coronaries. So I had no call for self-importance or self-pity, nor did I feel any. From my bed I could see the treetops and blue sky, and hear katydids at night. And the busy details of hospital life (quite new to me) never ceased to please: the good cooked cereal for breakfast; the small carts that rumbled along the corridors carrying everything from newspapers to blood; the Leonardo face of my night nurse and the camaraderie of my day nurses, all dedicated women, I found.

It was the goodness of people that I thought about most as I lay there—their natural kindness and genuine desire to be of help. Busy friends with a thousand other things to worry about wrote letters, not once but many times. Old, old friends who'd almost lost a pal, but not quite, avowed their warm affection in letters that brought their personalities right into the room. The bonds that united us became firmer. It was heartening, too, in this rather offhand day, that so many wrote of praying. Prayer—like love—is a private word among most of the people I know—one that doesn't come easily.

Then there were the literary folk, the reading of whose books has long been my business in life. They added the light amiable touch.

William Shirer's The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich is probably the most spectacular book of the year. It is a big book, of 1200 pages. "I hope you will have a look at my Third Reich," he wrote, "but before you read it you have to be able to lift it!"

"I understand that you must lie still in one spot for a long period of time," wrote Bennett Cerf. "I hope you will bear it more patiently than I will when Cerf gets wheeled in one of these days!"

Tom Costain, whose lean fingers are never off the typewriter except when they're holding a hand of cards, said, "There will be some consolation in all this if you begin now to reserve more time for the pleasant and easy things in life, like playing cards and writing books." (I was at the card table, in the late evening, when I got this attack, and was also engulfed in writing a book.)

"I'd be more sympathetic," wrote Helen Papashvily (of the Anything Can Happen Papashvilys), "if it were not for the fact that several of our friends have had the same thing and I have come to see that it is a passport to a long life of ease and pleasure where you can do everything you like but nothing you don't!"

When I finally became able to lift The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich (Simon and Schuster, $10.00) I found a devastating step-by-step disclosure of the inhuman career of a madman who was also a kind of fiendish genius. A whole generation has grown up that knows comparatively little of Adolf Hitler, and we, who know too much, never till now could know all. We didn't know that his own generals were conspiring against him from the beginning to the end; we could never have believed—in those innocent days of comparative truthfulness—how continuous and deliberate was the web of lies that he wove through European politics; we didn't know that Ribbentrop had 50,000,000 Swiss francs ready to bribe the Duke of Windsor to come over into the Nazi camp; or that one of Hitler's last orders was to destroy Paris by heavy artillery and V-1 bombs. The mosaic of evil and corruption is unending. It is a history of outstanding importance. Yet it reads like a thriller.

In Khrushchev's Russia (Penguin, 85c) Edward Crankshaw gives an enlightened objective analysis of that country today. He is an English journalist who has spent long periods in Russia and knows the language. He gives Stalin his due in his general background. But his focus is on Nikita Sergeievich Khrushchev. Khrushchev is an old aristocratic name in the Ukraine, where serfs frequently took their master's name, so Nikita is quite likely a descendant of serfs. His ambition to rise high was personal. The devious methods used to attain his end the world knows well—cruelty and ruthlessness, deceit and deliberate confusion.

But back to happier thoughts. Times Three: Selected Verse from Three Decades, with 70 new poems, by Phyllis McGinley (Viking, $5.00) is a lovely book, tender and understanding, with complaints enough to be normal. It is a book to give a woman confidence in herself.

Two charming books by Frenchmen (translated), both with many fine pictures and characteristic illustrations, are Paris in the Twenties, by Armand Lanoux, and Paris, Fin de Siècle, by Jean Roman (Arts, Inc., $6.50 each). "For the collector, the historian and every admirer of Paris," says the publisher modestly. And this time it's true.

And now, to say good-by; for though I have recovered from my attack, and am feeling fine again, I have decided to get out from Under Cover, at least for the time being, see a lot of my friends and, in general, enjoy life. Thanks to you all for listening. And Merry Christmas.

BY BERNARDINE KIELTY

NEW COLOR MAGIC! And only Reynolds Aluminum Foil Gift Wrap has it!

Because only Reynolds Aluminum Foil can give you colors that really glow. Glittering reflections and light effects to take your breath away! Luxurious textures and designs beyond compare!

NELSON SHAWN PHOTO.

From only 39¢ at Variety Stores everywhere including:

BEN FRANKLIN STORES, F. W. WOOLWORTH, G. C. MURPHY CO., J. J. NEWBERRY, S. H. KRESS CO., S. S. KRESGE COMPANY, KUHN'S 5-10-25¢ STORES, M. H. FISHMAN CO., MORGAN & LINDSEY, INC., ROSE'S STORES, SCOTT STORES, T. G. & Y.

Look for these packages when you shop.
Generous quantities, wonderful values!

REYNOLDS ALUMINUM FOIL GIFT WRAPS

for those who want to give...in the world's most beautiful way!

REYNOLDS METALS COMPANY, RICHMOND 18, VA., THE WORLD'S LARGEST PRODUCERS OF ALUMINUM FOIL, MAKERS OF REYNOLDS WRAP. SEE REYNOLDS ALUMINUM SHOWS, ABC-TV... "HARRIGAN AND SON" FRIDAY NIGHTS, "ALL-STAR GOLF" SATURDAYS.

"I'm still immature"

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

Does the average husband give his wife more help around the home if she holds an outside job?

Yes; about 40 per cent more than if his wife doesn't work.

ASK YOURSELF:

Is My Husband Thoughtful?

Except for the basically selfish and warped husband, most men show a sense of duty to their wives and want to be considerate of them. Occasionally a wife does not give her husband credit, either because she is too harried to think beyond herself or has no yardstick by which to measure him. By answering these questions "Yes" or "No," she can get some idea of how her man compares with other husbands. (Give him the benefit of any doubt.)

Does your husband:

1. Seem interested in what you say?
2. Usually come to meals on time?
3. Appreciate your efforts to please him?
4. Notice when you wear something new?
5. Help you with heavy chores?
6. Put away his personal belongings?
7. Co-operate when you are under pressure?
8. Share the car for your convenience?
9. Telephone when he is delayed?
10. Treat you kindly in public?
11. Often praise and compliment you?
12. Keep his temper under control?
13. Get along well with your relatives?
14. Respect your personal privacy?

In marriages of less than four years, the average wife scores her husband with 11 or 12 "Yes" answers. The total drops to 10 or 11 in marriages of five to eight years, and may be only 9 or 10 for marriages of longer duration. If your husband scores low, part of the reason may be that you are not very thoughtful of him.

"EVENINGS I'M LIMP AND EXHAUSTED WITH A STILL-MESSY HOUSE"

"At twenty-two, I've been married five years, and we have boys of four and three and a girl of eighteen months. Ed is a wonderful husband and we have a lovely home. I have all I've ever wanted, yet I'm not the kind of wife I want to be. I'm too drained to give of myself. Though I've tried hard to grow up, I'm still immature. Too often I think first of myself, and I get upset about almost everything except my in-laws—thank goodness Ed's parents are wise, wonderful people.

"The biggest thing is I never feel very good. The doctor says there's nothing wrong with me and I try to eat and sleep properly, but I feel exhausted when I wake in the mornings and often have tension headaches. When I feel good, I fly around and get caught up with the housework, but many evenings I'm limp and exhausted with a still-messy house. I'm a great one for making schedules, but I don't stick to them very well.

"I crave adult conversation in the evenings, but Ed isn't much of a talker and this drives me batty. There are differences in our personalities. He is steady, methodical, rather quiet, easygoing and slow to anger. I'm impulsive, quick-tempered, talkative and love people. But we do love each other, and I do want to be a better wife.

"Another thing that worries me is that I'm not responsive as I should be. I'm naturally warm and affectionate and I love for him to hold me and be tender, but he seldom shows affection unless he wants to make love. Too often he doesn't give me satisfaction, and this must be shattering to his ego."

With three children before she was twenty-one, no wonder this young woman sometimes feels unable to cope with her responsibilities. And no wonder she gets tired and dissatisfied with her performance (which actually is very good).

Obviously she is carrying too heavy a load. Though her doctor says she is physically well, the care of three small children is a twenty-four-hour-a-day job and a constant drain on her strength. Moreover, she is taking a psychological beating from the constant pressure, frustration and feeling of inadequacy. It may help her to remember that when the older children enter school, the pressure on her will lighten. But meanwhile she can take steps not only to become a better wife (we think her performance commendable now) but also to become happier and more relaxed.

Seek his help, first of all by telling him frankly how she feels. Since they have not formed the habit of talking things over, Ed probably has no idea of his wife's burden of tension, frustration and anxiety. She says he loves her and is dependable; if so, she can count on his understanding and support. The mere fact of sharing her problem with him will give her more strength to deal with it.

Ask for practical suggestions. She indicates that she is not a very good manager; perhaps he can suggest short cuts or more efficient methods. (Time and again in talking to wives, I discover little ways of making their daily routines easier.) Quite likely he will volunteer to take over certain tasks to relieve her—supervising the children's baths, emptying the trash, even doing the marketing. By devoting a Saturday to relocating equipment and perhaps building shelves, he may be able to make the kitchen more convenient. He may urge her to omit tasks now performed for his benefit, which cost her more in energy than they are worth to him in comfort.

Follow a schedule. In planning her work, she must be realistic; the best plan is useless if it cannot be carried out. Her time and energy are limited; she must provide for necessary tasks, but eliminate or postpone time-consuming extras. Better to let the best silver go unpolished (or to pack it away) than to end the day exhausted and depressed.

Break the day with rest and recreation. With planning, this is possible for even the busy young mother. She should set definite intervals during the day when she will sit for fifteen minutes with a cup of coffee, a glimpse of the newspaper or a telephone call to a friend. Instead of catching up on extra chores during the children's naps, she should plan to rest or do something she herself enjoys.

This young wife's only complaint on her account concerns lack of sharing, companionship and communication with her husband. At present she is too emotionally and physically fatigued to take the lead in initiating the kind of association she longs for. But the simple program we have outlined should help to relieve the fatigue, and taking her husband into her confidence is a step toward sharing. From that beginning, together they can build up interests and activities in which both can take part.

As these things are accomplished, she will almost certainly find herself becoming more responsive. And as she learns to find satisfaction in physical intimacy, her tension and anxiety will be further decreased.

From all indications, Ed is satisfied with his marriage. Perhaps this young wife expects too much, not of her husband or of marriage, but of herself.

CREATE CHRISTMAS MEMORIES TO CHERISH

Most adults cherish memories of childhood Christmases: often these memories are passed on to their children and become traditions in the next generation. Probably no other recurring holiday so profoundly affects personality, so effectively promotes family sharing.

For the essence of Christmas is sharing, the wholehearted participation of every member not only in the observance of the day, but in the days and weeks of preparation. Even preschool children take pleasure in making gaudy paper chains for the tree. Mother might decorate the house more artistically without their lopsided contributions, but her goal is a happy, festive home, not a shopwindow.

By the same token, Christmas provides an opportunity for children to learn the joy of giving. It is not enough for the mother to provide trinkets to be passed along in their names; instead, even young children should be encouraged to save their spending money to buy gifts, and should be allowed to make their own selections. One young mother says despairingly that each year, just as she thinks she has finished her Christmas preparations, she is confronted with the demands of the children to be taken on their shopping trip to the ten-cent store! But she does it, and this is one of the high points of the holiday season to her children.

In some households, the observance of Christmas is actually rather mechanical and materialistic, because the various rites are arranged rather than celebrated and shared. For instance, if the mother simply has the tree delivered, the children have little sense of participation. Our family used to go to the woods and cut the tree. This is no longer possible, but instead we make choosing the tree a family expedition, taking the grandchildren with us.

Over the years, most families who truly share Christmas will surround each aspect of the Christmas observance with their own special customs. Gradually these become cherished tradition. To the tired mother, with a long night and a busy day still ahead, it may be a temptation on Christmas Eve to forgo reading A Christmas Carol or The Night Before Christmas. But let her remember that in observing this custom, she is building enduring memories.

In our household, the day begins with a tradition begun by my mother—fried oysters for breakfast. To some families, this would be an unpalatable choice—to us, it is an inseparable part of Christmas.

So is the grab bag which ends the exchange of gifts. The grandchildren open their trinket-filled stockings first of all. Then come the tree and the general distribution of presents. When the last package is opened, comes a respite—and perhaps a letdown. Then I drag in a carton filled with lumpy paper bags, two or three for everyone. The "gifts" may be useful trifles, like a plastic apron, ball-point pen or a deck of cards, or they may be sheer nonsense, like a jack-in-the-box for my son-in-law or a fake shrunken head for my daughter. Whatever they are, they provide laughter and fun before we gather round the table for the turkey dinner.

The essence of Christmas is family unity and sharing. I have never liked to attend or to give large parties on Christmas, for it is a family day. The gifts may be forgotten, but the memory of giving will endure.

If you don't have this many in the kitchen now, it's time to go shopping –

There's almost no limit to what a smart girl like you can do with Sunkist Lemons in the house—

- The lemon cuts through the richness of sweets and fats.
- It gives you a healthy helping of vitamin C.
- It's low in sodium—high in potassium—and only 4 measly calories per tablespoon.
- Many fine chefs prefer to use the juice of fresh lemons in place of vinegar for cooking and salads.
- The only thing better than one Sunkist Lemon is a lot of them. When you add a little lemon, you add a lot to life.

Sunkist®—the way the best lemons sign their name

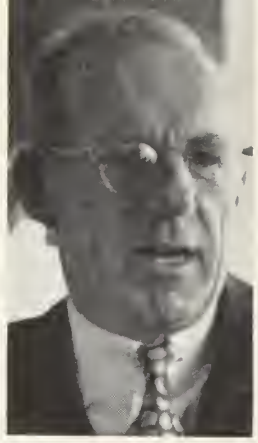
New Curity®

S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

MORE ABSORBENT
for maximum protection
STRETCHABILITY
renews itself with each washing
BETTER FIT
for all size babies
EASIER PINNING
overlaps easily—the stretch does it!
NO BINDING
expands with baby's tummy
LESS BULK
more comfortable, streamlined size



Curity washes softer, smoother in quality products like Ivory Snow, Ivory Flakes or Dash Detergent. Don't forget Curity dress-up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers
DRY FASTER
WASH EASIER ABSORB MORE WEAR LONGER

THE KENDALL COMPANY
P.O. 11395—Dept. J120
Charlotte 9, North Carolina
Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper. Print clearly. Only one to a family.
Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii

CAN YOU SPOT A DELINQUENT IN THE MAKING?

"Delinquencies are caused by various kinds of disturbances—either in the child's spirit or in the family or in the neighborhood or in the times. To think of them as if they all had one cause is misleading."

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

It worries parents to keep reading about the increase in juvenile delinquency that has occurred in the 1940's and 1950's. And when they see in the paper that a shocking crime has been committed by a group of boys who come from "good families," they wonder whether this epidemic might not eventually infect anybody—even one of their own supposedly wholesome children. In this article I'd like to try to shed a little light on the meaning of delinquency, so that parents won't feel quite so baffled and threatened by it.

The first point to make is that juvenile delinquency is a broad legal term which covers all the misbehavior for which children under eighteen can be brought to court—from truancy to murder. It is as if every adult wrong, from parking by a hydrant to starting a revolution, were labeled "adult turpitude" in the daily papers, and viewed as an epidemic.

The next point is that various delinquencies are caused by quite different kinds of disturbances—either in the child's spirit, or in the family or in the neighborhood, or in the times. To think of them as if they had one cause is as misleading as it would be to consider all physical ailments such as cancer, contagious diseases, malnutrition, broken bones as having only one cause. So I want to discuss some of the types of misbehavior, and the psychological and sociological factors that are believed to cause them.

In two different cities in which I've lived I've served on temporary citizens' committees on delinquency. After a meeting had been going for an hour it was noticeable that a number of the committeemen, all responsible citizens, were whispering with their neighbors and chuckling. They were admitting—a bit boastfully—that they did some of these things themselves in their youth.

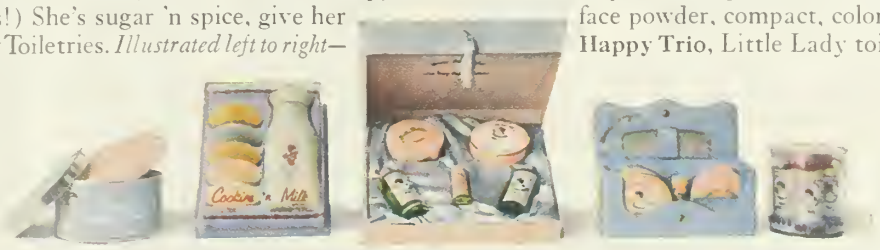
In fact, studies based on interviews with hundreds of ordinary male citizens have shown that as many as nine out of ten of them committed acts during adolescence which were definitely illegal and would have got them into trouble if they had been caught.

One form of mild delinquency which is commonly engaged in by boys from all social levels is malicious mischief—dumping the garbage cans of unpopular neighbors, marking the walls of schools, letting air out of tires. Another is petty thievery—stealing food from stores, or building materials from neighborhood construction projects. Offenses like these express only mild destructiveness and defiance of property rights. They do not necessarily imply any serious emotional disturbance in the individuals who participate only occasionally, especially in neighborhoods where the standards are not strict.

A considerable majority of the delinquents who come to the attention of the courts are from families of lower economic and educational levels. But it is common knowledge that when a middle-class child causes trouble, the complaining citizen is more apt to turn to the child's parents than to the police, on the assumption that the parents will pay damages and make every effort to prevent recurrence. And when a complaint of not too

CONTINUED ON PAGE 37

Many childish offenses do not imply serious emotional disturbance, especially in neighborhoods where standards of child behavior are not strict.



DI PIETRO

Give her the fun of playing grown-up

She's all little girl; all precious. And every once in awhile you glimpse the eternal feminine . . . the part of her that will truly be grown up some day! Give her her heart's desire; Little Lady Toiletries . . . playing grown-up in an entirely lady-like way can be so much fun! (and a wonderful way, also to form life-long habits of daintiness!) She's sugar 'n spice, give her everything nice, give her Little Lady Toiletries. Illustrated left to right—

Dusting Powder, daintily scented and with fluffy lamb's wool puff $1.25
Cookies 'n Milk, pure castile soap 'cookies,' bubble bath powder 'milk' $2.00
Vanity Box, with lip pomade, toilet water, rose mint cologne, face powder and her very own compact $3.50. Compact Carry-All with delicately tinted face powder, compact, colorless strawberry lipstick and comb $3.00
Happy Trio, Little Lady toilet water, cologne and hand lotion $1.00

Just a few of many Children's Toiletries by Little Lady. Created by Helene Pessl—found at the very nicest stores.

Little Lady

There's no other dog in the world like yours:

Available in 1 pound and economy size 26 oz. cans.

For 8" x 10" print of picture alone, send 25¢ in coin to Dog Picture 40, Box 7366, Chicago 77, Ill.

There's no other dog food like Ken-L-Ration with Lean Red Meat*

More dogs, old and young, large and small, eat Ken-L-Ration than any other dog food in the world. Reason? Ken-L-Ration provides exactly the kind of diet every dog is known to need to stay fit and fun. High protein Lean Red Meat! Delicious steaks, roasts and chops of *Gov't. Inspected Horsemeat plus other essential ingredients. So wholesome every can receives the Dept. of Agriculture Seal of Approval—one of few dog foods that do! Your dog is one of a kind. So is the quality of Ken-L-Ration.

Packed Under Continuous Inspection of U.S. Dept. of Agr.

PUT YOUR TRUST IN KEN-L-RATION...MORE PEOPLE DO!

NTINUED FROM PAGE 34

ious a degree is brought to the police, it their custom to attempt to deal with it di-tly with the parents, rather than make a rec-d of it, if the parents promise to cope with the uation. In cases actually brought to court, the dge is more inclined to dismiss them when e parents volunteer to make compensation d to deal with the child by either home pun-ment or psychiatric treatment. So many ddle-class youths manage to evade being ted in the delinquency statistics.

But it is probably true that a larger propor-n of children of lower-income families com-t delinquent acts. However, this does not an that low income and little education in emselves necessarily mean lower morals. In ny stable communities there is good evi-nce that there is no such association. But in ge cities the lowest-income families are usu-y compelled to live in the most crowded, n-down parts of town, with the poorest fa-ities for fostering good family living.

It is also true that some groups and indi-duals of limited education and income have

BEAUTIFUL IS HER SEEMING

By KATE BARNES

Beautiful is her seeming.
Her being more beautiful than her seeming;
Early her rising, quiet her going,
She is a green tree that is always flowering.

Beautiful is her singing.
Her talking more beautiful than her singing;
Her hands are never in her lap.
She is a spring of love that is always welling.

ot yet acquired the strong middle-class be-fs in the importance of education, planning r the future, the channeling of aggression to competition and advancement. When eir sons feel the rebelliousness of adolescence ey are much more tempted to tangle with e authorities or to refuse flatly to continue school.

Street gangs have sprung up most often mong the children of newcomers to Amer-an cities, recently the Puerto Ricans, Mexi-ans, Negroes from the south. But in earlier enerations they were from many other parts f the world, showing that this phenomenon is ot due to the traditions or characteristics of ny one ethnic or racial group but to the con-itions under which these families have had to ve at first. They have had to take the most enial jobs, occupy the poorest housing. hey have been looked down on because of eir poverty and "ignorance," been discrim-nated against and called names. The adoles-ents have felt scorned by other groups and et, because they were taking on American at-tudes, they could not believe wholeheartedly n their parents' "old-fashioned ideas." So ey have responded by forming tight-knit angs with their own kind. Into these they ave channeled their loyalty and bravery. To-ard rival gangs they have channeled their ccumulated hostility.

Needless to say, the great majority of fam-ies immigrating from European countries nd Puerto Rico, and those moving from the outh to Northern cities, have proved to be w-abiding and productive people. When amilies from far away move into a commu-ity where there are already relatives and riends and compatriots from the old country, nd where there are strong religious institu-ons and traditions of neighborhood leader-ship, they have the least trouble keeping their youth in line. There has been almost no delinquency, for instance, from the Chinese community in New York City, which is tightly knit. And individual families in which the parents are high-principled, adaptable and have good relationships with their children can move anywhere without much fear of trouble.

Up to this point we have been discussing types of delinquency in which sociological factors play a considerable part. From here on we'll deal with types largely the result of disturbances in the parent-child relationship.

A good proportion of the delinquents who repeatedly commit offenses of mild to moderate degree (a majority of the cases of chronic truancy, running away, theft, burglary, stealing of cars for an evening's fun, sexual promiscuity and prostitution on the part of girls) can be thought of as having defects of conscience. A traditional label is psychopathic personality. Psychopaths are defined by psychiatrists as individuals who are irresponsible, impulsive, emotionally shallow, and who don't learn from experience. Past histories of many of them show clearly they were unappreciated and neglected in early childhood.

In some cases a parent died or deserted, and the child was turned over to a relative or neighbor who showed him no love and little attention. Perhaps he spent periods in understaffed orphanages. This is the kind of broken home that really produces delinquency, where the parents are not only separated (by death or divorce or desertion) but where the remaining parent makes poor provision for the child, perhaps visits him irregularly, goes back on promises, and in general leaves him with the feeling of being unwanted anywhere.

(The simple fact that a home is broken does not mean psychopathic personalities or delinquents will be produced. Most widowed and divorced mothers—and divorced fathers too—show adequate devotion to their children and make suitable provision for their care so that the children feel well loved.)

Never having been loved, psychopaths have no devotion to give to others. Never having known the satisfying security of being approved of, they don't dread the loss of approval that comes from misbehavior. Punishment doesn't make them feel contrite, only resentful. The emptiness of their childhoods makes them crave attention and pleasures and possessions, so they grab them when the opportunity arises. They take little interest in schoolwork because they have no model of a fond parent to emulate, no particular ambitions, no capacity to devote themselves to projects or work.

Though most psychopaths come from underprivileged families, it's important to remember that some children from comfortable or prominent families are also brought up without deep affection or devotion. The neglect may be less obvious because of the conventional front that the family maintains. In some cases the parents, out of a vague sense of guilt, try to make up for their lack of love by heaping possessions and privileges on the child. The good-for-nothing teenager who has been given an expensive car is a dramatic example of this.

There is another common form of chronic delinquency in which the parents are reasonably devoted. The child has a fairly sound conscience in most respects, but persists in committing one particular offense which is out of keeping with the ostensible standards of the family. This form of delinquency was studied intensively by Dr. Adelaide Johnson and Dr. Stanislaus Szurek. They noticed that a parent, with whom they would be discussing the child's problem, would show indirect evidence of a suppressed impulse to indulge in the same kind of misbehavior. A mother suspects that the jackknife her son is playing with was stolen from a store. When with a little grilling she gets him to confess, her next impulsive question is: "Did anyone see you?" Of course this is not the line of thought of a moral parent, who should be entirely concerned at this point with correcting the child and helping him make amends. Instead it shows a degree of identification with

CONTINUED ON PAGE 39

CORRECTOL—the woman's gentle laxative for easy relief

A single tablet helps take care of nature's tardiness

Because you're a woman, you may have very special needs when you're constipated. The laxative you use should be extra gentle to your sensitive system, and extra dependable, too—one you can count on to stimulate the normal movement so essential to regularity.

Correctol® is made to meet these special needs of women. It contains a medical discovery that softens waste for easy, relaxed elimination, plus a small amount of mild laxative that moves the waste gently.

Working together, these ingredients bring a comforting kind of relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can.

Hospital-proved Correctol is recommended even when your system is particularly sensitive—from adolescence through the older years. Try it today.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols: no machines. Uses ABC's. Learn at home or through classroom instruction. Lowest cost. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing available. 38th Year. Write for FREE booklet.

Speedwriting®
Dept. 9912
55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

LIPS SORE?

"WHERE'LL I GET THE CASH?"

HOW many times have you asked yourself that question when you are faced with household expenses that have to be met? We would like to suggest an answer that can mean increased income for you.

By selling magazine subscriptions, you can earn generous commissions. Many of our representatives earn more than $3.00 an hour in their spare time—and you can do the same! Just send us your name and address on a postal, and you will receive our offer and easy-to-follow instructions.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
799 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

Face Cream of unique consistency is found in the incomparable HELEN HEMPSTEAD'S ALL-PURPOSE CREAM—hand blended with natural oils and ingredients—delicately scented and most outstanding in its adaptability to cleanse, nourish and fill all requisites for proper skin care—throat, under eyes, astringent value and powder base. Contains no animal fats, petroleum oil, hormones or preservatives. SOLD ONLY IN HEALTH FOOD STORES. If not available in your vicinity, write direct to Manufacturer. 4-Oz. Jar $5.35 Postpaid. HELEN HEMPSTEAD, P. O. Box 1143, Culver City, Calif.

SOMERSET by Quaker Lace

For modern homemakers—an easy-care blend of spun rayon, DuPont Dacron polyester and two-ply cotton. The perfect gift—to get or to give Priced from $9.99 to $18.99

Send 25¢ for new Booklet on Table Settings to Quaker Lace, Philo. 33, Pa

QUAKER LACE
Tablecloths

NEW! GAME OF LIFE— Art Linkletter family fun game revolves around the Wheel of Fate. Each player sets out on the Path of Life with a car and $2,000 in play money — his goal, to be first to make $1,000,000. Three-dimensional board adds interest with travel over hills, through valleys, across bridge. (10-adult) — $6.00

RACK-O, a fast exciting card game offers thrill of lively, keen competition. It's easy to learn, easy to play. For two, three, four players. (10-adult) $2.

EASY MONEY — two players or a crowd compete to build a real estate empire. Fortunes are won, in spirited play at running businesses. (7-adult) Deluxe $3. Standard $2.

GO TO THE HEAD OF THE CLASS teaches as it entertains with 792 questions and answers. For everyone, quizzes for Juniors, Intermediates, Adults. (8-adult) $3.

PARK AND SHOP —all is hustle and bust as each player tries to pick most favorab parking spot, get shopping completed quickl return home first. (7-adult) $

Look...look...when you're looking for a game...look for PIRATE AND TRAVELER has the excitement of world adventure, pirate chases. Youngsters are fascinated by trips, learn about the world as they go. (7-14) $2.

GAME OF THE STATES helps school children learn about all 50 states, their capitals, as players buy and sell products, moving cross-country by truck. (7-14) $2.50.

CANDY LAND is dandy for small folk. They love matching colors to go over Gum Drop Mountain on a rainbow path. For the lollipop set, no reading. (4-8) Deluxe $2.50 Standard $1.

CHUTES AND LADDERS gives gleefu hours to little ones, lots of thrills and spills Teaches rewards for good deeds. No need fo reading. (4-10) Deluxe $2. Standard $1 the name, Milton Bradley...games for all...big or small..

UNCLE WIGGILY, based on the world's gentlest bedtime story, gives children the treat of hippety-hopping on an exciting journey by drawing cards. (5-9) Deluxe $2.50 Standard $1.

fun and learning games...

Milton Bradley!

COMMENDED by PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

For Christmas fun for everyone, write for a free folder to Milton Bradley Company, Dept. LH-20, Springfield 2, Massachusetts.
Manufactured and distributed in Canada by Somerville Ltd. Prices slightly higher in Western U.S.A. and Canada.

MB MILTON BRADLEY

100 YEARS 1860 1960

ONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

e thief, and tips him off that the parent gives least partial permission if the theft is successful. A father is complaining about the fact at his small son, who is present, has run way from home a half dozen times. Then, as describes the ingenuity of the boy in covering vast distances each trip before he is caught, e father's tone becomes increasingly proud. his show of approval, of which the father is ot aware, more than offsets his official disapoval. A mother is haranguing her daughter bout staying out late with a boy and ends up declaring that she knows the girl has opped at nothing. It so happens that this is ot true—it's the mother's fantasy. But it is an dication to the girl of what her mother exects and thus is a kind of permission. Drs.

CHRISTMAS SYMBOLS

By ANTOINETTE ADAM

Raise to the holy Carpenter the tree
Memorial to Him Who rebuilds still.
Transforming stalls and yokes and human will.
Whose touch the image in dead wood sets free.
Hang high the star, unfathomed mystery.
A lone pinpoint that pierced the night until
Its light the sapphire void begins to fill.
Light of all lights, for waiting worlds to see.
Let stagnant silences awake and sing.
Speak the unspeakable in fragile sphere,
Then the old echoes, lost awhile, will ring
Praise to Immanuel, God with us here—
Of time and world without an end the King,
And sovereign in all worlds yet to appear.

ohnson and Szurek pointed out that in such ases as these the defect in the child's conience really corresponds to and is caused by ie defect in the parent's conscience.

It's also a sign of potential trouble ahead which calls for expert help) when parents ay—not jokingly—that they think their child heading for delinquency or that they are elpless in controlling him. Such statements idicate either that the parents, without realizig it, are giving the child permission, or have ome intense guiltiness toward him which is locking normal discipline and will continue o do so.

Next I want to mention a couple of much nore serious types of distorted character. hey are infrequent, but they cause consternaon. For example, three boys murder in cold lood a person who has not harmed them, who fact means nothing to them. Yet they do ot appear crazy in the usual sense. Their only xplanation is that they did it for the thrill. ne can be quite certain that a cruel, perverse ct like this is never committed by individuals ho are emotionally or morally normal, even nough they may have seemed like ordinary eople to casual acquaintances. Anybody ho had known one of them well would be ble to give evidences of unusual meanness nd coldness going back to early childhood. urthermore, long familiarity with the family, r psychiatric investigation, would reveal that the parents, no matter how "respectable" they seemed, had treated this boy with the lack of human kindness that he shows toward others. Not necessarily beatings or other crude forms of cruelty. Meanness can be carried out with velvet gloves.

Another somewhat different example of severe character distortion is the youth who commits a gruesome crime, perhaps a "sex murder." Yet it is reported that he had not only never been a bad boy before but had established a reputation for unusual virtue in terms of attendance at Sunday school or Scout meetings. However, one should not be fooled by the newspaper reporter's desire for drama and contrast. It may well be true that such a boy had not previously got into any scrapes, but you can be sure that he was not the usual warmhearted, outgoing American boy. He probably had noticeable peculiarities in his personality throughout childhood but was able to conform to the requirements of school and the neighborhood. Then the inner tensions of adolescence broke through his fragile self-control, in somewhat the same way that they push other maladjusted adolescents over the brink into insanity. Here, too, one would have been able to see, all along, an atypical parent-child relationship.

To show how broad is the variety of delinquency, I'll now refer briefly to three examples of nonvicious disturbances which might be grouped under the heading of "mixed-up unconscious attitudes." These are caused by hidden conflicts in the unconscious levels of the mind. But there is no gross distortion of the character, no inhumanness. Kleptomaniacs have an irresistible compulsion, which they cannot explain, to steal certain objects which have no realistic usefulness to them. They are usually girls or women and they may have quite respectable reputations in other respects. A kleptomaniac may steal dozens and dozens of fountain pens, for instance, even though she may have plenty of money to buy as many as she needs. Through psychoanalysis it is usually possible to discover what the fountain pens stand for symbolically. It is some other forbidden thing which the girl craves. But the true nature of the desire is deeply repressed and hidden from her.

Psychiatrists dealing with court cases recognize a type of adolescent or adult who commits thefts, for instance, in such a way that he leaves clues all over the place, which invariably lead to his detection and punishment. Psychiatric investigation shows that he is not a conscienceless criminal at all. Perhaps he has a neurotic sense of guilt about something quite different, and unconsciously wants to be punished. Or perhaps he is angry at his parents and wants to hurt them; so he brings shame on them but pays for it by hurting himself too.

Most Peeping Toms have no impulse to do harm to anyone and are, in other respects, lawabiding boys. But because of certain aspects of their upbringing they are too inhibited to approach girls in the usual teen-age ways, and all their intensifying sexual interests during adolescence become concentrated into a craving to look. There are other disturbances of sexual interest which belong in the same category, in the sense that there is no cruelty, no impulse to take advantage of another person by force. It is important to make this point because when a community becomes alarmed by a violent sex crime there is an inclination to deal drastically with every Peeping Tom or other mild deviant as if he were a fiend too.

Can we draw any general or positive conclusion from this array of disturbances? I think the main one is that if a child receives warm love and guidance from his parents—even though they get mad at him or discouraged with him at times—he will acquire a sense of belonging and a conscience which will keep him from committing any serious offense in adolescence and will make him in adulthood a good citizen.

Later I want to discuss the relationship between adolescence and misbehavior, some possible reason why delinquency has increased so much since the war, and the treatment and prevention of delinquency.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

for healthy growth in your baby's Protein Age turn to the meat specialist...Swift!

As every proud parent knows, there's nothing more heart-warming than the sound, steady growth of a baby!

Sparkling eyes, sturdy legs, a strong back . . . these are some of the happy signs of healthy development. And all are built by the complete, high-quality protein of meat.

That's why we call the first year baby's Protein Age.

This is the time to turn to the meat specialist—Swift—to make sure your baby gets the best of meat's health-building benefits . . . and to assure your peace of mind.

The two most trusted words in meat. Our 106th year.

SOLD IN TINS ON THE WEST COAST

9 nourishing 100% Meats . . . and 6 hearty High Meat Dinners . . also Egg Yolks, and Egg Yolks & Bacon and in the very gathering, there is renewal and strength. There is remembering — and rejoicing. There is laughter, there is love. There is joy, and there is peace. The festive holiday dinner has been part of our American heritage for more than three centuries. And we growers who raise cranberries for Ocean Spray are immensely proud of having been a part of the American family feast for most of those years. To add zest, color and extra flavor to your holiday dinners, be sure to serve plenty of Ocean Spray Cranberries . . . thick, juicy slices of tangy jellied cranberry sauce; big "help-yourself-to-more" bowls of juicy, whole-cranberry sauce! It's a great tradition! Happy holidays to you — and those you hold dear. And may our land continue to be blessed — and to be strengthened — through its families — your family.

We gather together...

So hallow'd & so gracious is the time

Christ is born today! That is the message of Christmas. Christ is born! There is a joy in the season not made in the hearts of men. There is a mystery stronger than life that even love cannot explain. On this day it swells triumphantly in chorales of exultation. Good Christians, rejoice!

Ancient legends say that as the sun turns on its course each year, for one brief moment the sun stands still. Strange, wonderful and weird instant! Mountains open to reveal their treasures; the water of springs turns into wine; silver mists arise, gentle as fragrance. But all these miraculous happenings, according to ancient belief, are too fleeting for mortal eyes to see.

The Christian legends are still more wonderful. On this holy night, in the birth moments of the Light of the World, sunken bells ring, caverns are mysteriously lighted, bees sing, cattle kneel in their stables and sheep march in procession in commemoration of the glad tidings brought to the shepherds in the hills of old Judea.

All the old stories of Christ's birth are a part of us today—the shepherds keeping watch over their flocks by night, the singing of the angels, the bright new star that guided the wise men to the Child's home. Such is the magic, such is the divine gift of life to us all. If for one moment we feel the hush and solemnity that pervaded all nature when Christ was born, in the miracle of our awareness of God's grace Christ is born again.

Who can be angry with oneself or others when the great themes of exultation and reverence surround us? We "get the Christmas spirit," so we say, but the spirit has us always and no one can, or would, escape it. We expect Christmas to be a time for loving and giving, a time of gentle thoughts and tender greetings; and because we expect it, we help it to become so. "Merry Christmas!" we say, smiling, even to strangers in the bustle of city streets, and we mean, "May God be with you this day." Our hearts reveal their treasures; our world is suffused with light and warmth; we have a glimpse of that glory which ordinarily only saints and poets can see. "The bird of dawning singeth all night long." Shakespeare says in Hamlet. "So hallow'd and so gracious is the time."

Exultation we know—in the eyes and exuberance of children and in the child in us. Have you seen blue eyes and a red sweater skimming down a snow-covered slope? A mother's exultation may sometimes be thinly spread over the days, but joy is there—too much to realize in a passing moment. My children, my children—all children with lilting eyes and freshly dirtied faces—may you live forever in the knowledge of love! Blessed are those moments of unspoken but ecstatic prayer. But it is too much to know, too much to feel at all times. Who dares to probe the depth of a happy moment? Lightly and quickly over the time of our lives each of us moves on the surface of eternity. Only this day. Only this day.

Reverence for life and for God we know. So hallow'd and so gracious is the time that moments of spontaneous worship come, even to those who do not seek them. In our homes, in our churches, in solitude or crowds, peace fills our hearts and we are grateful to our Creator for His World and for the life we share with His Son.

Love life this day! Love life! That is the meaning of Christmas. The present is both the past and the future. Live joyfully, live lovingly, live honorably and well—that is the Christmas message. We cannot go backward to our Creator. Time leads nowhere in a backward direction. Time does not flow forward from a Creator Who made the world, but backward, like the tail of a comet, from a Creator Who makes the world—and makes it now. We look forward to our God. And where selfless love is, Christ is born, every moment.

—The Editors

Illustration from A CHRISTMAS CARD FROM THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART: CUPIDS. Detail from a painting by Jacob De Wit, 1695–1754.

Her real name proved to be Deborah, but "Ripsie" she stayed. From the first moment she saw it, she was entranced by China Court.

She was Ripsie—without a father, without fortune, with only her own spirit, unafraid and independent, to match against the world. He was the charmed and charming Boro. Theirs is the story of two enchanted by an attraction as strong as the barriers separating them. . . . And can love then be "deathless"?

CHINA COURT

By RUMER GODDEN

This is the Journal's Christmas present to our readers. Save the four installments if you want to read this serial as a book, all at one marvelous gulp.

Old Mrs. Quin died in her sleep in the early hours of an August morning. The sound of the bell came into the house but did not disturb it; it was quite used to death, and birth, and life. The usual house sounds went on, but muted; footsteps upstairs. Dr. Taft's, though he did not stay long. "Cause of death: stopped living," wrote Dr. Taft on the certificate. Then Mrs. Abel's steps as, quietly, she did what she had to do, and downstairs Cecily's as she carried in the coal and made up the kitchen fire, while August, the young poodle, rushed to the front door, back door, upstairs and down, barking, anguished by he knew not what. The postman dropped letters into the letter box. Trill, the canary, sang. Moses, the cat, miaowed for his morning milk. Groundsel, the gardener, had come at eight o'clock as usual. The sound of his shears, as he clipped a box hedge, came in from outside. With all these other sounds, mingling with them, came the bell.

"In the midst of life we are in death" was the message of the bell. The house seemed to answer, "In the midst of death we are in life."

"Shouldn' us pull the blinds down?" asked Mrs. Abel.

"She wouldn't like it," said Cecily. "She always says, 'Don't shut out the garden.'"

Neither Cecily nor Mrs. Abel whispered, nor did they speak of Mrs. Quin as if she were not there; but all the same, things were muted. There was no early-morning firing of explosives from the quarry, which had stopped work when the news was heard, and the men had been sent home as a mark of respect. "But the news will be in the village before the men," said Cecily.

Of course Dr. Taft's car would have been seen, and Cecily knew the vicar would be here at any moment. "No one goes in or out of China Court who isn't seen," complained Cecily often. "Seen and talked about." She bent down to push the damper of the range. "You have enough hot water, haven't you?" she called to Mrs. Abel. "I must get the oven hot."

It is, as it always has been, an Eagle range, with shining steel hinges and handles.

"Everything in this house is hopelessly old-fashioned," Mrs. Quin's eldest daughter, Bella, always cries when she has to come to stay. The Eagle has flues that Bella cannot wrestle with, but Cecily understands it. "I ought to; I have known it for nearly fifty years." It is the same great old range and now it burns red. "I shall have to bake," said Cecily. "Eighty-one strokes," and as she straightened herself a tear sizzled across the iron plate.

Copyright © 1960 by Rumer Godden

CHINA COURT

CONTINUED

"It seems so dreadful, only the two of us," said Mrs. Abel, but, if Mrs. Quin could have been asked, this was as she would have preferred it. Cecily was her long familiar and neither of them could remember the time when they had not known Mrs. Abel, who was the unofficial nurse of the village and its layer-out of the dead.

She and Cecily conferred together. "The best linen sheets?"

"Certainly," said Cecily.

"One pillow?"

"She always had one."

Cecily helped to make the bed and when they moved the pillow they found a book tucked under it. "Her prayer book," said Mrs. Abel approvingly. Then, as she looked more closely, "It id'n a prayer book."

"It is," said Cecily and had to resist an impulse to snatch it out of Mrs. Abel's hand.

All these last years the book has been kept by Mrs. Quin's bed, on the table with "mother's old clutter," as Bella calls it. There is certainly a clutter on the table and most of Mrs. Quin's possessions are old. There are, too, always flowers, not often a vaseful, but a bouquet of the smallest wild ones in a miniature Venetian glass, sharp at one side where it has been dropped and chipped; or else there is a rose or a single flower in a specimen glass. A candlestick,

"Gran wouldn't have let them."
Tracy whispered because she couldn't trust herself to speak.
Must she love and lose China Court—this tall young man as well?

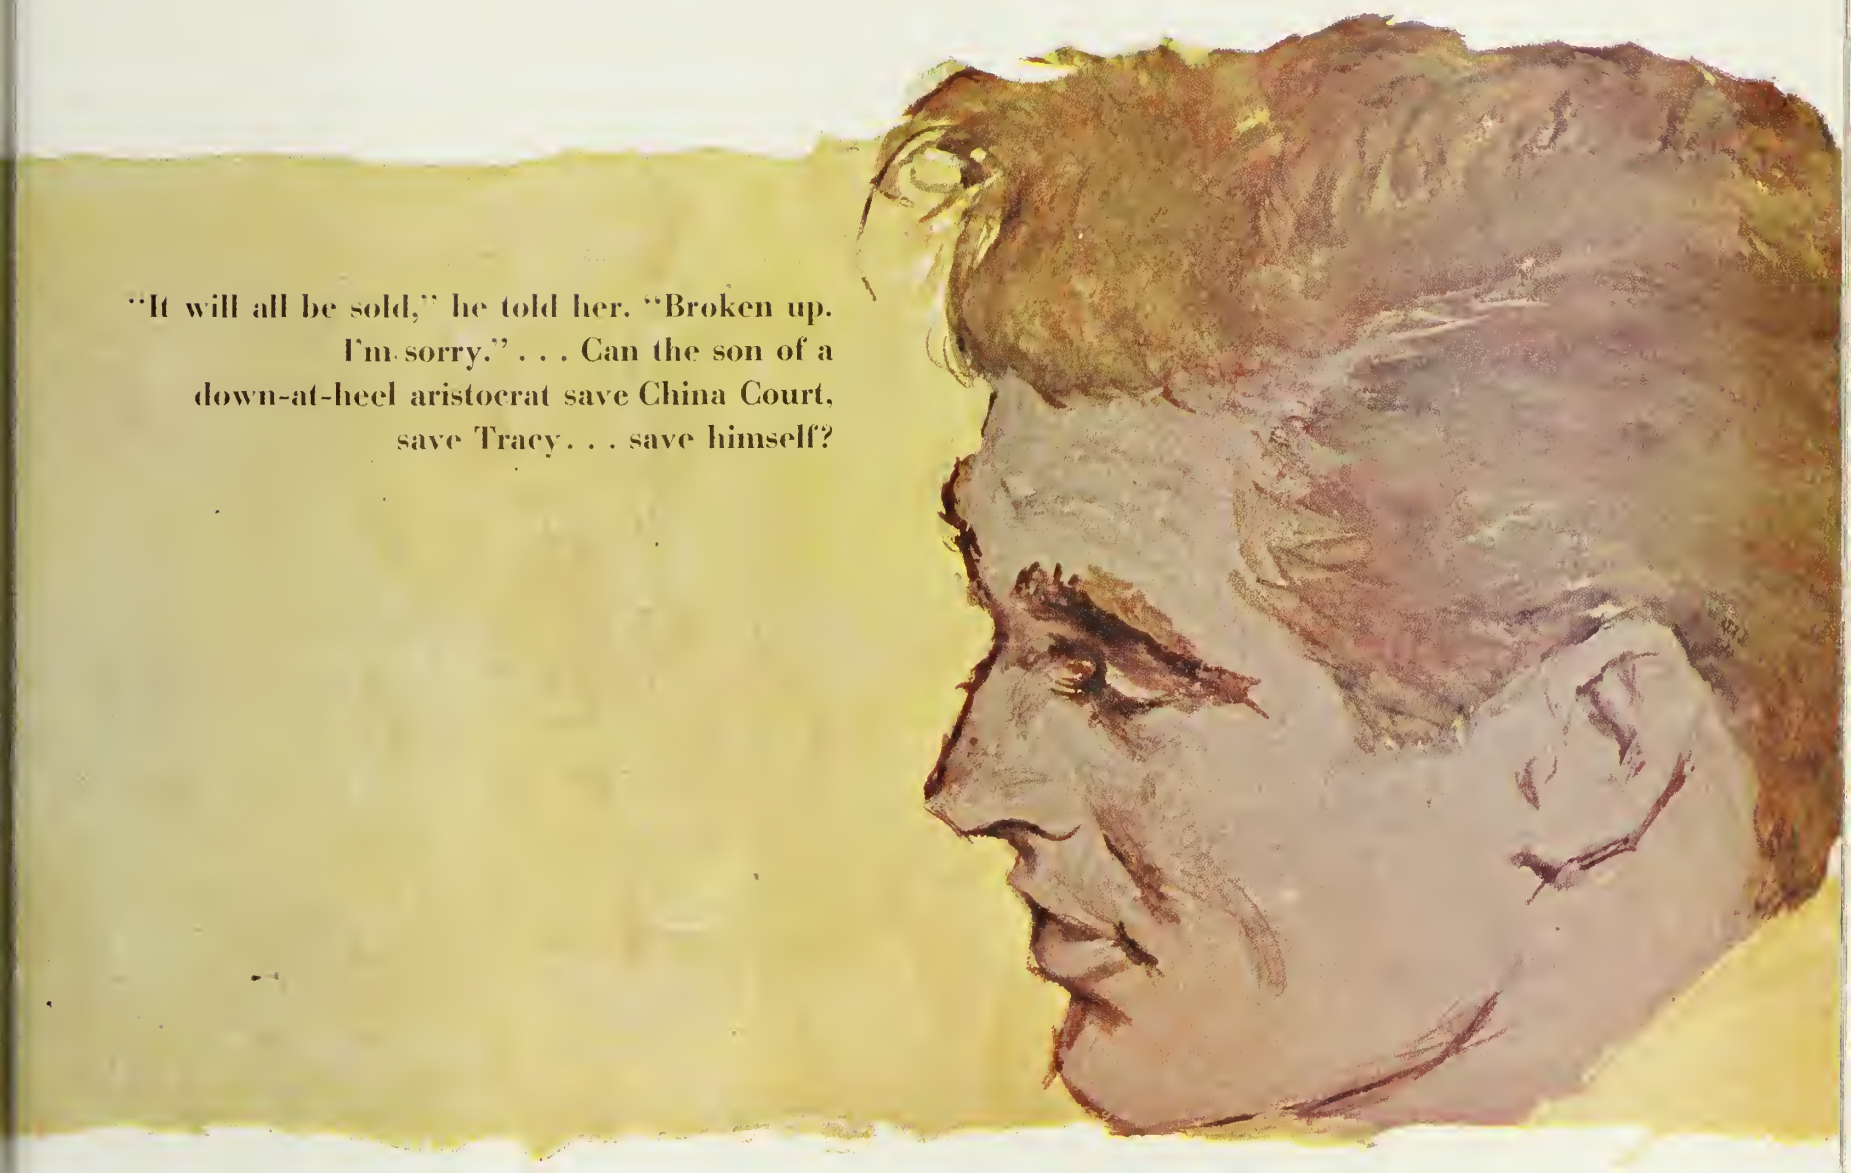
matches, a bottle of indigestion pills are part of the clutter with, usually, a paper-bound detective novel and the two books that never change: the one in Mrs. Abel's hand, shabby now and bound in black leather; the other, a very old and dumpy book, bound in rubbed pink velvet with a silver clasp, and always carefully wrapped in a silk handkerchief, so old that it is nearly rotten.

"The Day Hours." said Mrs. Abel, reading the title of the black book. "Day hours; whatever be they?"

"Prayers for the hours of the day," said Cecily.

"I didn' knaw Mrs. Quin was religious."

"She wasn't," said Cecily, but when the bed was made and Mrs. Abel had carried her basins out of the room, Cecily put the book back under Mrs. Quin's pillow. Then she smoothed the bed and began to clean the room. Next she carried in a vase of the small pink Damascus roses Mrs. Quin had loved the best and put them on the bedside table. She set the window a little open and came out and then, as gently as if Mrs. Quin could have heard it, closed the door.



"Shouldn' us watch?" asked Mrs. Abel. "Some of the women 'ud be glad to come and sit with us for a bit."

Cecily shook her head. "She always liked to be alone," she told her companion. But in an old house, a family house, one is never alone.

The motes of dust that Cecily had disturbed glittered and spun in the sun that came through the window. A tiny fly whirred in the roses. As they grew warm, their scent filled the room. As if, like the dust, they had been disturbed, the house voices seemed to rise:

"You can have my egg collection." . . . "Hester will show you the different rooms." . . . "I thought Latin was battles. Roman wars." . . . "Tracy, if you poke that fire again I swear I shall hit you." . . . "You will be grown up. Then you can come back." . . . "That whacking great allowance ——" . . . "It is papa's place, my dear," and, like a cry, a single name: Boro! Borowis!"

Tracy, Mrs. Quin's grandchild, loves to go back from herself through the family tree written in India ink and gold on the pages at the beginning of the big Bible that has a table to itself in the hall. "Funny names," says Tracy, creasing her forehead as she tries to spell them out. "Enstace. Adza. Jared. Borowis. I have never heard of them."

"It will all be sold," he told her. "Broken up. I'm sorry." . . . Can the son of a down-at-heel aristocrat save China Court, save Tracy . . . save himself?

"You have heard of Enstace," says Mrs. Quin. Tracy has heard of Eustace because his name is like her father's, Stace, and her own, Tracy. Eustace's name is the first on the family tree, hers is the last. Some of the names are ordinary, names everybody knows: Eliza, Ann, John Henry, Mary; but there is a Lady Mary.

"She wasn't called that. She was always called Lady Patrick."

This is more confusing still. "Patrick is a boy's name."

"She was called Lady Patrick because she came from Ireland. Irish people are sometimes called Patricks." And, "Poor tragic, exaggerated, silly Lady Patrick," says Mrs. Quin.

"Why Lady Mary?" asks Tracy.

"Tragic" and "exaggerated" are too difficult for Tracy, but, "Why was she silly?" she asks. She likes Mrs. Quin to tell these stories over and over again and Mrs. Quin is willing. "As far as I know them," says Mrs. Quin. Stories, she knows, can never be really told, so much of them is hidden, and she often says that when

CONTINUED ON PAGE 80

The Way Angels Are

HAROLD HALMA

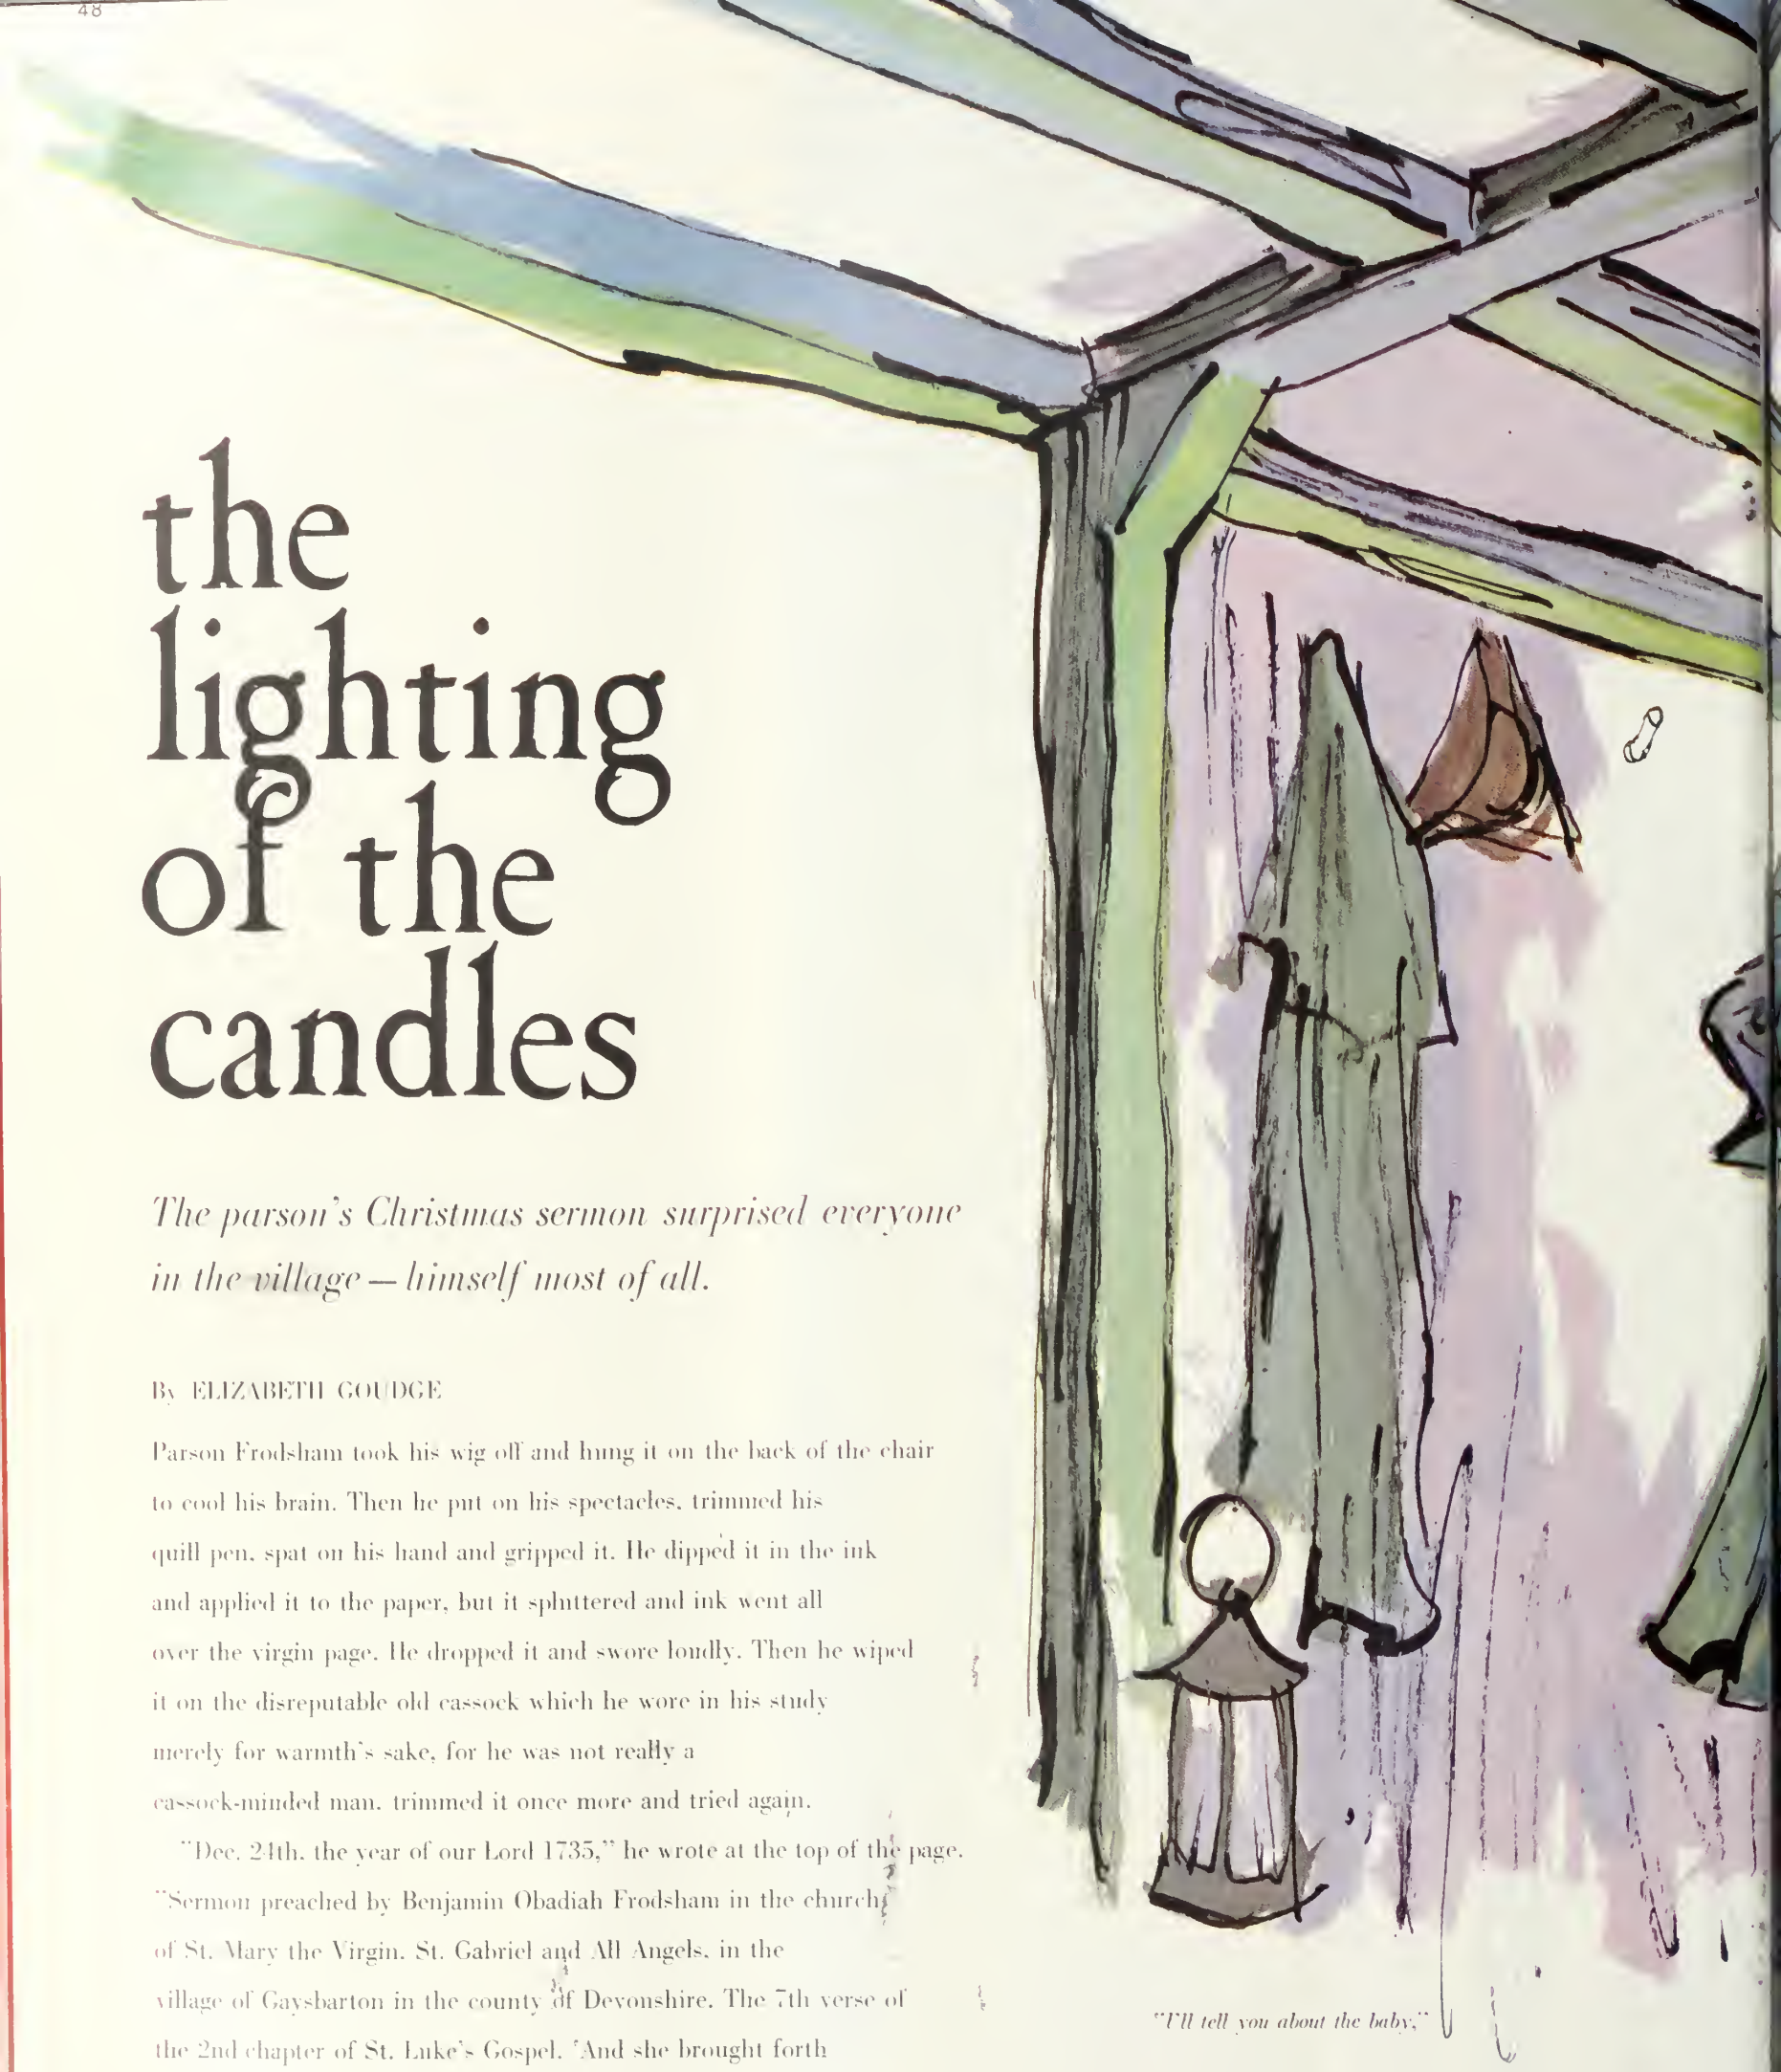
Oh, angel—you, there, big angel with the red hair—how old are you? Ten? And this is your last year to be an angel? Well, that's the way it is with angels. They don't last long. The amazing thing is that you are here at all—all of you! Heaven has been populated with a completely new set of angels in the last five years—a completely new set of angels.

Thank you, darling. Merry Christmas to you too. Your wings are fine, fine. Don't go flapping against one another now. And don't lean against the wall, crush your wings. Stop talking. Who needs a pin? I have a pin. What's your name. honey? Can't you talk? Everybody stop yelling! Line up. Line up, angels. Are you chewing gum? How many are chewing gum? Get rid of the gum, please. No, don't swallow it. Oh, well.

No chewing, please, and no talking! It's about time to go into the sanctuary. Sally, your wings are crooked. No—not you—yours are fine. Say, you're kind of little, aren't you? Now, line up. Who's the leader? Who's the lead angel? Oh, you, the big one. Of course. Now. we're about ready. Everyone please be quiet. Whose wings fell off? Well, don't pull on your wings. Don't pull anybody's wings. Do you all hear me? Let your wings alone! Let everybody's wings alone! Try to remember you are angels.

All right. Line up according to your height—tall angels in front, little angels in the rear. Hurry, hurry. There's only a minute now. Are all the angels ready? I said, are all the angels ready? Please hush. The audience will hear you. Imagine—gabbling, noisy angels! Ready now? No talking. I'm going to open the door. You must not even whisper after I open the door. Not a word. Shush. Shush. No. No! It's too late now. You can just wait. The trumpets are sounding—that's your cue. I'll open the door. All right, go. No pushing. Keep three feet apart. Shush. Shush! I'll whisper, but you don't need to whisper anything. Just—go, go! Be angels now, be angels. That's right, that's splendid now. You look lovely, lovely. . . . No, I am not crying. You're the last—hurry up. Of course I'm not crying! Why should there be tears in my eyes?

the lighting of the candles



The parson's Christmas sermon surprised everyone in the village — himself most of all.

By ELIZABETH GOUDGE

Parson Frodsham took his wig off and hung it on the back of the chair to cool his brain. Then he put on his spectacles, trimmed his quill pen, spat on his hand and gripped it. He dipped it in the ink and applied it to the paper, but it spluttered and ink went all over the virgin page. He dropped it and swore loudly. Then he wiped it on the disreputable old cassock which he wore in his study merely for warmth's sake, for he was not really a cassock-minded man, trimmed it once more and tried again.

"Dec. 24th, the year of our Lord 1735," he wrote at the top of the page. "Sermon preached by Benjamin Obadiah Frodsham in the church of St. Mary the Virgin, St. Gabriel and All Angels, in the village of Gaysbarton in the county of Devonshire. The 7th verse of the 2nd chapter of St. Luke's Gospel. 'And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger.'" So far so good. Parson Frodsham had a fine flowing handwriting with enormous s's and f's, and CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

1958 by Elizabeth

"I'll tell you about the baby," the girl said, and began to relate the usual story of love and betrayal.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN McCLELLAND

The small family dining room in the White House, the warm white room where the first family gathers together for its private dinners, is aglow with Christmas decorations.

The Eisenhowers' Farewell to the White House Holiday Dinner

I pray heaven to bestow the best of blessings on THIS HOUSE
and on all that shall hereafter inhabit it.
May none but honest and wise men ever rule under this roof.

This beautiful prayer, written by John Adams in a letter to his wife, is cut into the marble mantel of the White House State Dining Room. President and Mrs. Eisenhower ordered it placed there at the time of the 1955 renovation. Since then it has graced many state and family dinners and will again, this year, be a lovely part of our First Family's festivities.

Holiday entertaining at the White House begins early in December and lasts almost into the middle of January, but Christmas and New Year's themselves are private, family times. Mrs. Eisenhower loves gay flower arrangements. The house will be bright with holly and poinsettias, probably matched in seasonal spirit by Mamie's dress—red tulle, for example.

Everything in the small family dining room, which looks across Pennsylvania Avenue, must pass the affectionate inspection of the First Lady. As custodian of the national shrine, Mrs. Eisenhower can be an exacting housewife. Not even her adored grandchildren dare to smudge the historic walls.

It's the children who bring Christmas to the White House. They will gather around their grandmother at the organ for carols: Barbara Anne, quite the young lady now; baseball-happy David; impish Susie, who has to be watched; and little Mary Jean. Everybody sings. Voices may waver, but not the youthful spirits.

In the family dining room white-and-gold china glistens on linen place mats. Large napkins (initialed U.S.) sometimes slip from little laps onto the deep red carpet. The broad red-and-white-striped chairs seem made for Christmas. Each child must have a chance to sit next to "Mimi" and Granddad, so there is an "Alice in Wonderland" quality to the constantly shifting order of seating. Quite a change from State Dinner protocol!

The President, who likes anything as long as it's very rare beef, skillfully carves the Rare Roast Beef. Dolores, the Eisenhowers' own cook, has also made holiday-red Tomatoes Provençal, Green Beans Amandine and Baked Stuffed Potatoes, all presidential favorites. Mrs. Eisenhower doesn't like to cook, so after planning the food and decoration she leaves dinner in Dolores's good hands.

When the Eisenhowers are alone, they usually eat on trays in the sitting room of their second-floor private quarters. Both are weight watchers. Sometimes the President likes to broil a steak just for two.

But the holidays are different. Then the family draws together. The Gordon Moores (she is Mrs. Eisenhower's sister) will probably be there, and Dr. Milton Eisenhower and his daughter, Ruth. All will bow heads with the children in the private dining room downstairs. The best of blessings on this and on every house.

RECIPES ON PAGE 125

WIDE WORLD

President and Mrs. Eisenhower, "Mimi" and Granddad, celebrate the holidays with their most immediate family.

UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

Barbara and John Eisenhower, David, Barbara Anne, Susan and Mary Jean together make happy holidays for President and Mrs. Eisenhower.

STUART-FOWLER

Rare Roast Beef, holiday-red Tomatoes Provençal, Stuffed Potatoes and Green Beans Amandine are Eisenhower favorites—and creamy Devil's Food Cake for the children and Frosted Mint Delight.

STUART-FOWLER

Wonderful, Wonderful Christmas Sweets

Joyous in the holiday season, gifts happily remembered: golden taffy nuggets sweetly flavored with molasses, pulled till tawny gold; white velvet creams piled high with flaky coconut; chocolate cream fudge crunchy with Brazil nuts. Sugarplum strawberries are crimson, plump, delicate with almondy flavor. Christmas sugar mints are gay with red poinsettias—and easy, easy to make!

Golden Taffy Nuggets

½ cup butter
2 cups sugar
1¼ cups light molasses
1½ cups water

Select a large heavy kettle. In this melt the butter and then add the remaining ingredients. Stir well and heat slowly until the sugar is dissolved. Cook rapidly at first, lowering the heat as the mixture thickens, to prevent burning. When the syrup makes a hard ball in cold water, or the candy thermometer registers 258° F., pour the mixture into three greased pie plates. As the edges cool, turn the taffy toward the center with a spatula, or the edges will be hard before the center is cool enough to pull. When cool enough to handle, butter the hands slightly, and with the tips of the fingers pull the candy until light in color and too hard to pull farther. Stretch out and twist into a rope about ¾″ thick. Cut with scissors into desired lengths and wrap in cellophane twists. Makes about 1½ pounds candy.

White Velvet Coconut Creams

3 cups sugar
1½ cups light cream
6 tablespoons butter
Pinch salt
1 teaspoon vanilla
2 (3½-oz.) cans flaked coconut

In a large heavy saucepan mix together sugar, cream, butter and salt. Bring to a boil, stirring occasionally. Lower heat and continue cooking, without stirring, until candy reaches 234° F. (soft-ball stage) on candy thermometer. Remove pan from heat and let stand about 5 minutes. Then pour onto a large buttered platter. Let cool completely. Add vanilla. Using a wooden spoon, beat candy until thick and creamy. Add 1½ cans of the coconut; mix well and continue beating until candy loses its shine and is very thick. Pour into a buttered 8″x8″x2″ pan. Sprinkle with remaining coconut. Let candy stand, covered, for several hours or overnight in refrigerator. Cut into squares. Makes about 2 pounds candy.

Chocolate Cream Fudge

2 cups sugar
1 cup light cream
3 squares unsweetened chocolate
1 cup confectioners' sugar
2 tablespoons butter
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup coarsely chopped Brazil nuts

Mix the sugar, cream, chocolate and confectioners' sugar together in a large heavy saucepan. Bring to a boil, stirring occasionally. Lower heat and cook without stirring until mixture forms a soft ball in cold water, or candy thermometer reaches 234° F. Add butter and vanilla. Cool until fudge is lukewarm, 110° F. on candy thermometer. Beat by hand until mixture is thick and still glossy. Add ⅔ cup Brazil nuts and continue beating until mixture begins to lose its shine. Pour into an 8″x8″x2″ buttered pan. Top with remaining Brazil nuts. Chill. Cut into squares. Makes about 1½ pounds candy.

Sugarplum Strawberries

1 can (8-oz.) almond paste
Red food coloring
1 cup sugar
1 egg white
1 cup confectioners' sugar
1 teaspoon soft butter
Green food coloring

Add a few drops red food coloring to almond paste and knead until color is evenly distributed. Repeat this procedure until desired shade of red is obtained. Form into a long thin roll and cut into about 20 even-sized pieces. Shape into balls and then into a strawberry shape. Add a few drops red food coloring to ½ cup sugar. Work the color evenly into the sugar. Repeat until same shade of red as almond paste is obtained. Roll strawberries in red sugar. Now roll very lightly in remaining uncolored sugar. For the leaves: Beat the egg white until frothy. Add confectioners' sugar and continue beating until mixture holds very firm peaks. Add butter and mix well. Add a few drops of green food coloring. Use a leaf tube to decorate each strawberry with the frosting. Makes about 20 strawberries.

Christmas Sugar Mints

5 cups sugar
2 cups water
Pinch cream of tartar
1 cups confectioners' sugar
1 teaspoon peppermint flavoring

Combine sugar, water and cream of tartar. Bring to a boil and continue cooking to 230° F. on a candy thermometer, or just below soft-ball stage. While boiling, brush the sides of the kettle with a pastry brush dipped in water to wipe away any sugar crystals. Remove immediately from the heat. Add confectioners' sugar and flavoring. Stir with a hand whip until creamy—about 2–3 minutes. Drop from the tip of a teaspoon onto waxed paper, or use a 2-cup plastic funnel and the handle of a wooden spoon. Insert the spoon handle into the opening in the funnel. Pour in the hot candy syrup and then by raising and lowering the wooden spoon drop the candy onto the waxed paper to any desired size. Keep the unused syrup quite hot but do not boil. The total time for making this candy is 10 minutes. One caution: be sure that all tools are ready where you want them before you start. Store candy in an airtight container for two days. Decorate as desired with Royal Icing. Makes 100 patties.

Royal Icing

1 egg white
About 1 cup confectioners' sugar
1 teaspoon soft butter
Food coloring

Beat the egg white until frothy with an electric mixer. Add the sugar gradually, beating constantly until icing will hold its shape. Stir in butter until well blended. Then divide into separate containers and color as desired. Cover these bowls with a damp cloth until needed. Using a pastry bag and the desired decorating tips, make any patterns you like—poinsettias, Christmas trees—on the mints.

Such Sweets Remembered

These Christmas desserts make your feasts unforgettable

"My palate now anticipates something sugared and evanescent." Welcome and festive hospitality comes to your Christmas table with white fruitcake amandine*, glistening with sugary nuts;* tutti-frutti date pudding*, in honey-lemon sauce;* Christmas snow cake*, frosted with leaf-green meringue;* chestnut-mocha roll*, its center luscious chocolate-chestnut cream.*

White Fruitcake Amandine

3½ cups cake flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 cup butter
1½ cups sugar
½ cup milk
½ cup candied cherries cut into quarters
1 cup slivered citron
1 cup toasted slivered almonds
1½ cups finely chopped flaked coconut
1 tablespoon almond flavoring
4 teaspoons vanilla
10 egg whites

Sift the flour, baking powder and salt together. Cream the butter. Add the sugar gradually and continue beating until the mixture is light and fluffy. Sprinkle ¼ of the flour mixture over the cut fruits and nuts. Work it around them until they are evenly coated and each piece is separate. Then add the remaining flour alternately with the milk to the butter-sugar mixture. Mix well. Add the floured fruits and nuts and the flavorings. Stir thoroughly. Beat the egg whites in a separate bowl until they hold soft peaks. Stir them quickly and thoroughly into the batter. Have ready two 9″x5″x2¾″ loaf pans lined with oiled brown paper. Divide the batter evenly between the two pans. Bake in a slow oven, 300° F., 1 hour and 35–40 minutes. Keep a pan of water on the bottom rack of the oven during baking. Remove the cakes from the oven and allow them to stand about 5 minutes before taking them from their pans. Pull off the brown paper and allow to cool. Wrap well in heavy aluminum foil and store in a cool place for several days to bring out the delicate almond flavoring. Two days before serving, top with crunchy Almond Topping.

Almond Topping

4 cups sugar
2 cups water
1⅓ cups light corn syrup
Pinch salt
2 cups toasted shaved almonds

Measure all ingredients, except almonds, into a heavy 2-quart saucepan. Bring slowly to a boil, stirring frequently. Continue boiling, but not stirring, until the

MORE RECIPES ON PAGE 124

STUART-FOWLER

Sweet Treats

Cookies and comfits to pass or hang on the bough

"Glittering stars of colored ice, Sweetened with syrup, tinctured with spice."
Cookies win their way to a child's heart almost as fast as the speed of love—and these homemade Christmas cookies are filled with love.
Walnut-fudge brownies melt tenderly on the tongue, as do lemon-butter daisies crisp with almond halves; confetti shortbread stars glazed with tangy sweet orange icing; apricot-Brazil-nut rounds glistening with apricot jam. Butterscotch jewel bars are packed with candied cherries, raisins and nuts; spicy fruit-nut jumbles are tender, white-frosted.
Pile honey-butter popcorn balls lavishly in a bowl, inviting eager small hands.

Walnut-Fudge Brownies

- ⅓ cup butter
- 2 squares unsweetened chocolate
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 beaten eggs
- ½ teaspoon vanilla
- ¾ cup flour
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- ½ cup broken walnuts

Melt the butter and chocolate together in the top of a double boiler. Remove from heat and cool slightly. Add the remaining ingredients and mix well. Pour into a greased 8″x8″x2″ pan and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., 25–30 minutes. Remove from the oven and cool a few minutes, then turn out on a cake rack and cool. Makes 20 brownies. Frost with the following Fudge Topping.

Fudge Topping

- 3 cups confectioners' sugar
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- 4½ tablespoons cocoa
- 4½ tablespoons very soft butter
- 1½ tablespoons warm strong coffee
- ¾ teaspoon vanilla
- ¼ cup broken walnuts

Measure all ingredients except walnuts into a mixing bowl. Stir until very well blended. If too soft to spread, chill slightly. Spread over the cooled brownies and top with the nuts.

Lemon-Butter Daisies

- 2 cups butter
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 eggs
- 1 tablespoon and 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
- 5 cups flour
- 1 teaspoon baking powder
- 2 tablespoons lemon juice
- Colored sugar
- Almond halves

Cream the butter; gradually add the sugar and continue beating until light and fluffy. Add the egg yolks which have been slightly beaten, and the lemon rind. Stir in the flour which has been sifted with the baking powder, and last, the lemon juice. Mix well and chill dough several hours. Roll out ¼″ thick and cut with cooky cutter measuring either 1½″ or 3″ in diameter. Brush each cooky with egg white, sprinkle with colored sugar and decorate with almond halves. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 10–15 minutes until they begin to turn golden. Makes about 5 dozen 1½″ cookies or 2½ dozen 3″ cookies.

Confetti Shortbread Stars

- 2 cups flour
- ½ cup superfine sugar
- 3 hard-cooked egg yolks, rubbed through sieve
- 1 cup butter
- 3 tablespoons grated orange rind
- Pinch salt

Put all ingredients for the cookies into a bowl and blend together thoroughly with a pastry blender or fork. Knead slightly and divide dough into 4 parts. Chill for about 3 hours. Roll out on a floured board, keeping dough that is not being rolled in a cool place until needed. Roll ¼″ thick and cut with star cutter. Bake on ungreased baking sheet in a hot oven, 400° F., for 8–10 minutes. Makes about 5 dozen cookies. Let cool a few minutes on baking sheets before removing to racks to cool. When cookies are cool, glaze with following icing and sprinkle heavily with multicolored sugar candies.

Orange Glaze

- 1½ cups confectioners' sugar
- ½ teaspoon grated orange rind
- 5–6 teaspoons orange juice
- Yellow food coloring
- Multicolored sugar candies

Mix sugar, orange rind and orange juice until smooth and thick. Tint with a little yellow food coloring. Spoon icing over cookies, covering them completely. Note: These cookies are also delicious rolled very thin. Bake only 7–8 minutes and serve unglazed. Makes 6 dozen thin cookies.

Honey-Butter Popcorn Balls

- ⅓ cup honey
- ¼ cup light molasses
- ¼ cup light corn syrup
- ½ cup butter
- ⅔ cup sugar
- 1 quart popped white corn
- 1 cup coarse-chopped roasted cashews

Cook honey, molasses, syrup, butter and sugar slowly until mixture reaches soft-crack stage (260° F. to 270° F. on candy thermometer). Do not overcook. Stir occasionally. Remove from the heat. Pour over corn and cashews. Allow to cool a little. Butter fingers lightly and mold mixture into balls. Cool on a buttered dish. Makes about 11 balls.

Apricot-Brazil-Nut Rounds

- ¾ cup butter
- ½ cup sugar
- 1 egg
- 1½ teaspoons vanilla
- 2 cups flour
- ⅛ teaspoon salt
- ¾ cup very finely chopped Brazil nuts
- Apricot jam
- Brazil-nut slices
- Red and green candied cherries

Cream butter and sugar together. Add egg and vanilla and cream until fluffy. Blend in flour and salt. Add nuts and mix well. Shape into ¾″ balls. Place on ungreased baking sheets, about 2″ apart. Flatten them with bottom of a glass that has been dipped in flour to prevent sticking. Make indentation in center of each cooky. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for about 4 minutes. Remove from oven, press center again, fill with a little apricot jam and return to oven. Bake for another 4–6 minutes, until edges are lightly golden. Remove to cooling rack. Decorate each cooky with 3 slices of Brazil nut arranged spoke fashion. In the center, place pieces of red and green cherries. Brazil nuts will slice easily if nuts are boiled in a little water for a few minutes before slicing. Makes about 5 dozen cookies.

Butterscotch Jewel Bars

- ½ cup butter
- 1 cup brown sugar
- 3 eggs
- 2 cups flour
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- ¼ teaspoon nutmeg
- 3 tablespoons milk
- 1¼ cups skinned filbert halves
- ¾ cup diced candied pineapple
- ¾ cup candied red cherries cut into halves
- ½ cup raisins
- 1 teaspoon vanilla
- 1 teaspoon brandy flavoring
- ¼ cup sugar

Cream the butter and brown sugar; add 1 egg. Sift the flour, salt and nutmeg together. Add alternately with the milk to the butter mixture. Blend well. Spread mixture in a buttered 15″x10″x1″ pan. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 10 minutes. Meanwhile mix the nuts, fruits, vanilla and brandy flavoring. Beat the remaining 2 eggs very slightly and stir in the sugar; add to the fruit mixture and spread over the hot layer. Bake 20 minutes longer in a moderate oven, 350° F. While still warm, cut into 5 lengthwise strips, 2″ wide. Cut each strip into bars 1½″ long. Makes 50 bars.

Spicy Fruit-Nut Jumbles

- ½ cup butter
- 1 cup light brown sugar
- 1 egg, beaten
- 1¾ cups flour
- ½ teaspoon baking soda
- ½ teaspoon salt
- ⅓ cup commercial sour cream
- ¾ cup chopped pitted dates
- 1 cup chopped candied fruit (cherries, pineapple)
- ¾ cup chopped walnuts
- 1 teaspoon rum flavoring

Icing

- 1 egg white
- 1¼ cups confectioners' sugar
- 1 teaspoon lemon juice
- Red and green candied cherries (decoration)

Cream together butter and sugar until light. Add beaten egg. Sift together flour, soda and salt. Add to butter-sugar-egg mixture alternately with sour cream. Add fruit, nuts and flavoring and mix well. Drop from teaspoon onto greased baking sheets. Bake 10–12 minutes in a hot oven, 400° F. Transfer cookies to a cooling rack. Ice while still warm. To make icing, beat egg white until foamy. Add sugar a little at a time, beating until icing is thick and glossy. Stir in lemon juice. Drop icing by teaspoons onto the cookies. Decorate with bits of cherries. Makes about 5 dozen cookies.

A MAN A GIRL A DRESS A PARTY

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

Mary Van Nuys talks with her eyes, but she needn't talk. Her black chiffon trimmed with ostrich is happy talk enough. J. Gordon Douglas III, law student, listens, which for a lawyer is a switch. Designer Guy D. made her what she is tonight.

"We're having a party and we very much want you to be with us." There aren't more exciting words, for a man as well as for a woman. No sooner is the telephone cradled than, instantly, in imagination, the party is struck into being: that marvelous moment when one arrives, and is so carefully introduced to each guest; why— after the first greetings — do holiday affairs begin with such a hushed, breathless quality? But they do, and perhaps it is only to highlight the joy to come as one dances, and talks, and observes.

Joan Delanney is being watched by John D. Cochran, deep-sea diver. Bet he's never seen a green below as pale and subtle as the green in Joan's printed taffeta dress. Anne Klein designed the merry bait, Seaman Schepps the pearl-and-aquamarine bracelet.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

Sandra Brown twirls toward? away from? the mistletoe in her blue flower-printed silk dress by Betty Carol. Doro provided her, not with her escort, J. Gordon Douglas III, but with her sapphire-blue wool sweater sprinkled with blue sequins.

Partying again, eh, George Plimpton? With Miss Van Nuys on his arm, wearing a gray flannel dress, belted and brocaded with jewels and sequins, Plimpton neglects his writing. The cause of it all is Louis Faurot's creation for David Crystal.

A MAN A GIRL A DRESS A PARTY

For beautiful people and things to see are an important part of the magic of these precious hours. But imagination can go so far. Facts are better than dreams The evening is here; one is rested, one is dressed, one is ready to go — to contribute to the gayest season of the year. in person and proudly, one's own particular magic. And who is to say that at this party the door will not open to admit just that incredible individual with whom one may touch hands, and hearts?

—Image of a Christmas Party
by David Loovis

The rain in Spain never fell on a trench coat like this, a gold one worn by Dodi Lynn, and on her golden arms young escorts Thomas G. Auchineloss and Frederick ("Freddie") Guest. Since it's his design, Bill Smith gets the gold star, but not the one on the top of the tree.

The fashion and style pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide for fall buying. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, comparable or similar ones will be available.

kinned filbert flavoring

A PART

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Edito

Mary Van Nuys talks with her eyes, but she needn't talk. Her black chiff trimmed with ostrich is happy talk enough. — Gordon Douglas III

As crisp and clear and exciting as the first snow of the season, this dress of white chiffon with its glittering sequin top . . . worn by Mary Van Nuys, designed by Anne Klein. Pumps by Mario.

"A soft natural hair-do is what most of us l

Above: Bonnie Trompeter, haven't w[illegible]et before? In a gold-and-white brocade dress designed by Ole Borden, with gold shoes and a gold bag, for the most golden season of the year. Pumps by Ben Sommers.

Left: She's very young, her name is Donna Mitchell, the jacket of her Jonathan Logan printed taffeta dress comes off very prettily to make her dress exactly right for the party. Crepe-de-Chine pumps by Sylvia Fiorentina.

That's a velvet bandeau around Mary Van Nuys' hair, and she brings herself in a beige jersey dress with crystal beads to this gala night. Anne Klein's design.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

An intricate paisley dress in metal cloth, but as light and as beautiful as Lois Heyl, who wears it. But for Anne Klein's work, the party would not have been so brilliant.

Holiday G

IN R

A GIRL A DRESS A PARTY

For beautiful people and thing to see are an important part o
the magic of these precious hours
But imagination can go so fa
Facts are better than dreams
The evening is here; one is rested one is dressed, one is ready to go dress for me in the morning, and I can wear it that evening," says lovely Richmond debutante Randy Kendig. "By choosing our own fabrics we can have a more individual look," all debs agree. Of all the glorious moments in a girl's life to be adept at "do-it-yourself," the dizzying, dazzling coming-out season takes a top place. Here and on the next pages, a bouquet of Richmond debs show how they love to look. From their JOURNAL-planned dresses to their pink-and-polished finger tips, all glamour is accomplished at home.

Vivacious Greta Gibson says that five formal dresses would be a minimum for a debutante. One of hers, this charming turquoise satin, is Vogue Design No. 4183. Pretty Randy Kendig, a sophomore at Sweet Briar College, will wear this velvet-and-lace dress to holiday parties and to college formals. Vogue Design No. 4181.

FUR BY JULES LEITMAN

COPYRIGHT © 1960 BY THE CONDÉ NAST PUBLICATIONS, INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

*"A soft natural hairdo is what most of us like," says Emily Tyler. "And that's lucky because we do our own hair. When? Any time we can grab an hour or two between brunches, lunches, dinners or late dances!"

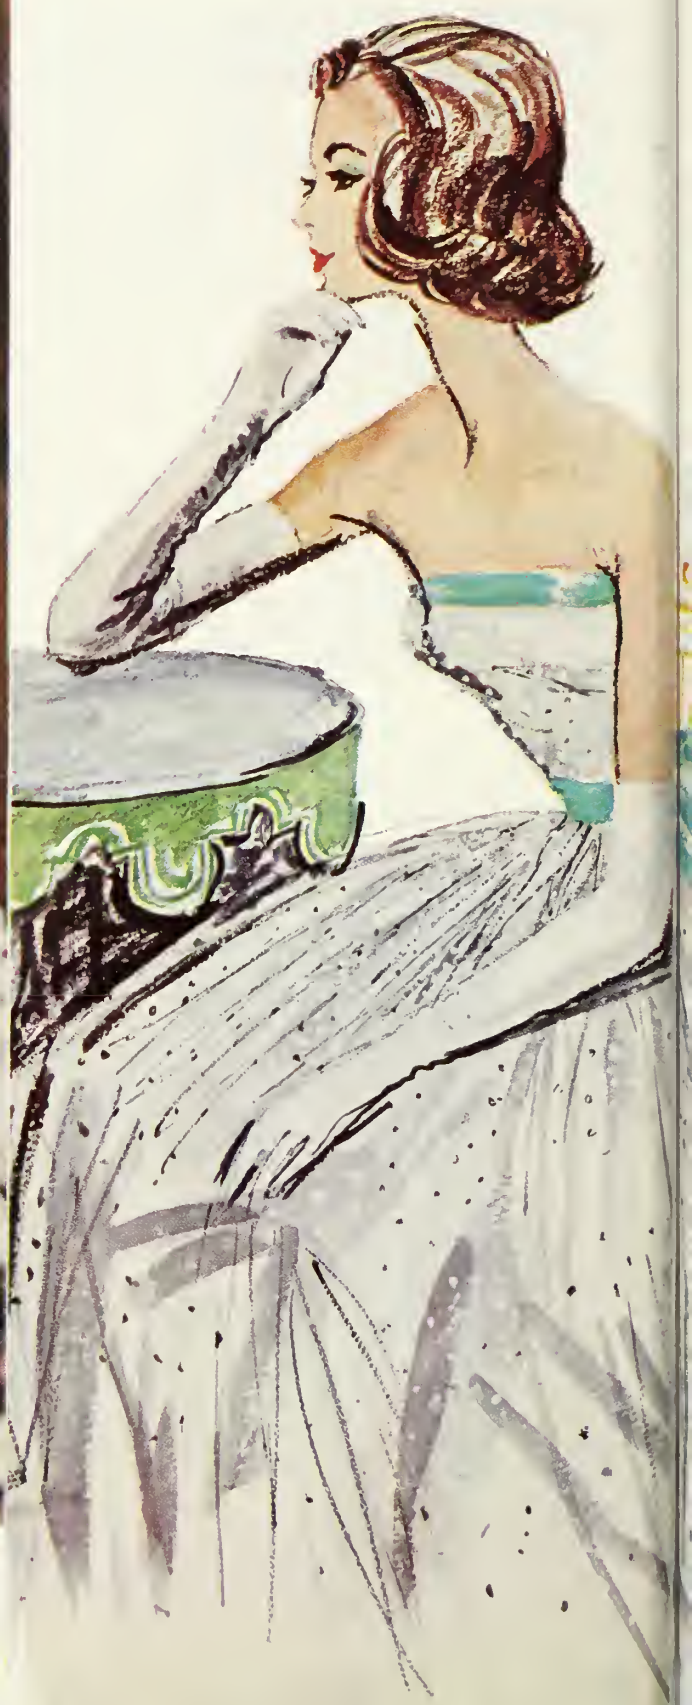
PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

"During the parties we're tempted by so much rich and delicious food we have to make up for it at other meals to protect our figures and complexions," says cameo-fair, tiny-waisted Randy Kendig.

For her glistening pageboy, Melinda Page has a collection of ribbons in different colors. "If a boy brings a flower, we often tuck it in our hair at the side, or some girls use flowers to decorate an upsweep or chignon."

PEARLS BY HATTIE CARNEGIE

Melinda Page is the fourth generation in her family to make her debut at the Richmond German. Her dress for the german will be a copy of the one her mother made her debut in. Here she is wearing a pale pink satin with an overlay of lace on the bodice. Vogue Design No. 1170.



*THE STORY OF EMILY TYLER'S DEBUT IS ON PAGE 127

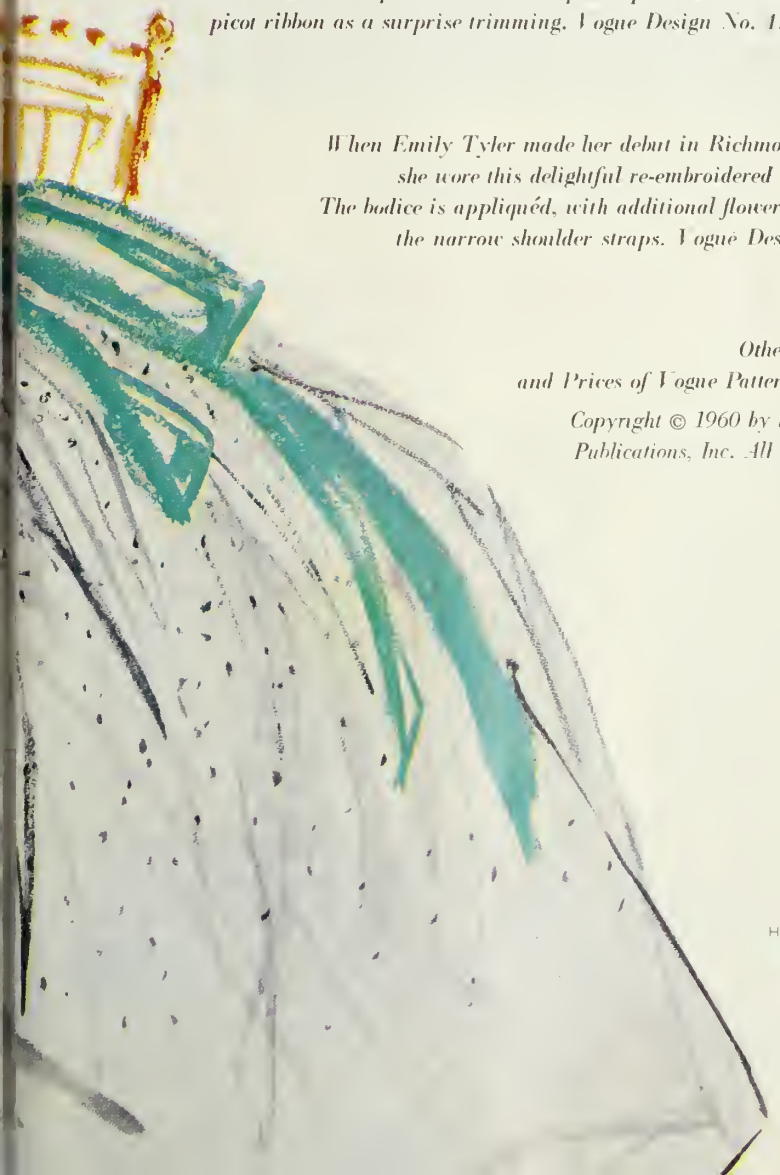
HOW AMERICA LIVES

To wear in your hair: this bright ribbon cockade has a bobby pin sewn in back. Another decorative use is to pin it at the neckline of a fur or simple gown.

All the Richmond debutantes we interviewed favored the traditional dress over the sophisticated. This was true of Patsy Davis, a Duke University sophomore shown here wearing a white silk ottoman dress banded with white fur. Vogue Design No. 4140.

SKETCHES BY MARGARET SOMMERFELD

"I know boys who come right out and speak their disapproval of too much make-up," says Patsy Davis. The debs' favorite formula: lipstick and powder by day; for evening add a touch of mascara and eye shadow "if it does something for you."



Accessory preferences: something simple. A flower with a circle pin for a wrap or gown is always pretty.

White point d'esprit has long been a favorite fabric for debutante dresses. The secret is to use yards and yards of it in a skirt and to keep the bodice as simple as possible. Use a bright picot ribbon as a surprise trimming. Vogue Design No. 1170.

When Emily Tyler made her debut in Richmond in August, she wore this delightful re-embroidered organdy dress. The bodice is appliquéd, with additional flowers following up the narrow shoulder straps. Vogue Design No. 1175.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 86

Copyright © 1960 by the Condé-Nast Publications, Inc. All rights reserved.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY
MARGARET HICKEY

Must these little ones grow up homeless?

By MARGARET HICKEY

Throughout our country the "orphans of the living" face an uncertain, even tragic, future. When will we wake up to their needs?

There are some 270,000 children in foster care, according to recent studies conducted for the Child Welfare League of America and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Advisory Council on Child Welfare Services. Most of them are not going to return to their families in a brief time; thousands (roughly 168,000) never will, under present circumstances. Some are visited or written to occasionally; a few, frequently—but by parents or relatives who have no plans for their future, who cannot or will not make homes for them. Before them stretch years of prolonged foster care, very often including a psychologically damaging series of moves to and from homes and institutions.

These are the boys and girls, says the Child Welfare League in its study of foster care in nine communities, who "have more than the usual problems in discovering who they are . . . who learn to develop shallow roots in relationships with others, who try to please but cannot trust."

Why are they in this limbo? Why can't they be adopted? Heartbreaking barrier time after time is the one encountered by the "Simpsons" in this month's story: centuries-old, common-law tradition upholding a natural parent's right to legal control of his child even when parental duties and devotion have been abandoned.

"One of the first priorities," says Joseph H. Reid, executive director, in the League's book, Children in Need of Parents, "is to clarify each child's legal status and to sever parental rights in all situations where it is obvious that the parents will never take responsibility for the child." Often this will require new laws, such as the one New York State passed last year, which defines the "permanently neglected child" and allows a court to free the child for adoption without consent of a parent.

Because there will always be some who must remain in foster care—those who are "unadoptable," not being infants, average or above-average in intelligence, white, without physical or emotional difficulties—every community must see to it that the service is of high quality.

Greatest responsibility falls on citizens of good will who care about children, but who, often, know next to nothing about children in foster care. If they will start right in their own communities, studying their services, their legal systems, their ways of helping these foster parents and children, they can be the vital "yeast for action."

"Children cannot be their own spokesmen," Mr. Reid points out. "Only as responsible adult citizens make clear to their legislators, to their directors of United Funds and Community Chests, to their county commissioners, to their governors, what it is that children require, and what the price of fulfilling these requirements is, can we eliminate the tragedies of the 'orphans of the living.'"

This is the cry not just of Grace and her little sister Mary but of thousands of foster children whose mothers do not take care of them but refuse to let them be adopted.

By ERIC SIMPSON

"You are my real mommy—

Grace is long-legged and just six, with enormous, clear blue eyes. Mary is the minx—tousled and blond and usually dirty. She's four. We call them our "daughters," and they would be except for certain matters of law which we find it difficult to explain. But they are meant to be our daughters.

In 1956 my wife and I were childless. From the first days of our marriage three years before, we had wanted a family, but three successive pregnancies ended unsuccessfully. Karen had helped to raise five younger brothers. Blond, plump, rosy-cheeked and pretty, she is the picture of a perfect wife and mother. She had looked around at the other wives in the seminary community—smocked, most of them—and become increasingly depressed. The "last time" she had been four months along and we had bought baby clothes which, kept tucked away in a bureau drawer, began gradually to mock her.

I graduated, was ordained into the Episcopal Church, and moved to a Western city as curate of a fine old church in the center of town. Life was happy and satisfying, our marriage good. But we continued to hunger for a family, children to care for, to teach, to love.

We finally gave up waiting. Doctors' tests were inconclusive.

The man at the local county welfare department was courteous but discouraging about adoption. "You have been married only three years. It is quite possible you will have a baby of your own at some time."

We were halfway out the door when he said, "Would you be interested in our foster-parent program?" Karen and I looked at each other, remembering that both our parents had taken foster children at different periods in our childhood. At least we would have a child, some child, in our home. That in itself would be fulfillment.

There were forms to be filled out and medical examinations to be had. An inspector looked over our house. The weeks dragged on. We heard nothing until one day in February, 1957.

"I have two of the sweetest little girls for you," Mrs. Forrest, of the county probation department, said over the telephone. We had not even been told that we were acceptable foster parents, and now two little girls were coming to live in a four-room duplex, the older three and a half, the younger seventeen

ABBOT MILLS

"Her mother was out of jail and wanted her. . . . Mary did not cry or speak. She simply would not budge. Finally we forced her coat on her and carried her to the car."

don't let them take me away" months. We had a studio couch; a parishioner offered us a crib. Their room was made ready, ruffly curtains at the windows, a few stuffed toys waiting.

At last it was the day. Hearts pounding, we stayed indoors when Mrs. Forrest's car pulled up. Better not to appear too anxious! The door opened. It was love at first sight for me. Grace was dimply, wide-eyed, obviously bright. Mary toddled over, batted her long brown lashes and grabbed me round the knees. Within minutes Mrs. Forrest was gone, promising to return a few days later. The four of us were on our own.

"Those are my sister's toys," Grace said with a lisp, pointing to a large carton. She began unpacking. "Here's sister's night-night ——" Her activity was feverish; she talked incessantly, with perfect composure: no questions; no apparent fears. We were astonished, yet we sensed the insecurity and loneliness that made a tot act older than her age.

For us, parenthood began that first night, about twelve. Mary began screaming and would not be comforted. "Sister wants her bottle," Grace told us sleepily. Mary had tasted her first junior foods at our house. Within a week, however, the bottle was gone, though both girls were plagued by nightmares for several months. Several times each night we went to them or called out, "That's all right, honey. You just had a bad dream. Turn over and go to sleep."

Where did they come from, these two? What was their story? Why were they wards of the court, in the hands of probation officials? All we knew was what Mrs. Forrest had told us. "Mrs. Todd was a good mother. She's a very pretty, intelligent young woman who made a mistake. Beyond that I can tell you nothing, except that she will not be out of prison until 1958."

We were satisfied, or nearly satisfied, with the explanation. It meant steeling ourselves against the day when the girls would be gone; but we looked forward to many, many months of being "mommy" and "daddy."

The duplex proved too small. Fortunately we were able to find a large, comfortable brick house not far away. The young people of the church organized a painting and papering party; the interior had a complete redecoration. A day after we were in I got the flu, Karen and the girls following me. But the girls, tucked in "for the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 140

Is there anything worse than a little sister plunk in the middle of her brother's romance?

the nice boy

By ANN CHIDESTER

They could bury him here in the supermarket, under the castle of neon-red detergent cans, for he would choose death or torture before he would allow Mary Alice Farnum to see him now. Mary Alice, slim and regal, a vision in pink jeans and a sparkling white blouse, had just floated into the market. Here he was with the entire brood hanging on to him — Baby Kitten bouncing in the wire basket, obscenely smeared with brown concrete from her teething cooky, Billy banging his guns showily in a foolish, backward six-year-old fashion. And Mimi.

"Here we are, Mary Alice! Oh yooo hooo!" she bellowed. Her voice shattered the cold air of the supermarket. He imagined everyone knew it was that Mimi Hall, the midget witch disguised as the four-year-old child of a good, decent family.

"Be quiet! Don't beller," he told her.

Mimi grinned, satisfied that everyone knew she was here. "Mary Alice seen us. Here we are, Mary Alice, honey," she crooned, smirking around the corner.

Mary Alice approached. The earth swayed like a wild ship under him. He heard wind chimes and smelled some kind of perfume that made him hungry for waffles. "Hi, Tom," she said. "Hi, Billy. Hi, Baby Kitten. Oh, hi, Mimi."

"How's it?" Mimi giggled. She stuck out her flat chest and simpered. She had the shape of a baked potato. "Tom's takin' care of us. Ain't you, Thomas?" she purred.

He held his breath as flames scorched his feet and ears. He prayed to die, but he managed to explain that his parents had had a wire saying his grandmother was ill in Denver, and they were trying to catch the evening plane. "Mrs. Gogarty's coming to sit as soon as she finishes putting up her pickled mushrooms." As though Mary Alice

Continued on Page 147

He had been stupid again. He deserved to lose her. "Yah, peasant! Yah, stupid!" he thought.

HOW TO BE POPULAR

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

PHOTOGRAPHS BY TOM MEEHAN

MEN GIVE SIX EASY RULES

If you want to be popular with men, you are going to have to learn to like them. Probably you already do, but it is surprising how dense men can be at understanding that they are appreciated. Often they feel ill at ease, inclined to get away from the girl they cannot guess is secretly yearning for friendship. What to do?

Find out how to get the message of your niceness and interest across to them, that's what. The Journal has drawn up a list of six easy rules, compiled from interviews with actual subjects (the kind you want to know), that are sure to make a big difference in your life. Perfect yourself in these and it will be like the familiar movie scene, where the star takes off her glasses—and suddenly she has a wonderful figure! Here, then, are the rules:

1. SMILE

The human animal is the only one with smile muscles, a fact many people have thought carried with it an overtone of personal responsibility. Since they smile frequently, you will have to, too, or expect to be considered a sourpuss. It's like lipstick; most women wear it, so you, no matter how bonny your natural coloring, know you look drab when caught without some on.

Anyhow, the important thing to remember is that men depend on smiles. The smiles of pretty women (and any woman who smiles warmly seems pretty to them) nourish men, make them glad to be alive. Make them glad to be with you.

2. IN CONVERSATION, HANG ON HIS EYES

Your eyes are your most expressive feature, so you can best show your interest in what he is saying by giving him the full homage of your gaze. Men prefer this sort of rapt attention to a verbal reply any day. Remember Garbo and how little she had to say, even in the subtitles; yet after a typical Garbo tête-à-tête with the leading man, one felt that a tremendous communication had taken place.

Never let your glance wander to faraway objects while he is talking. As a matter of fact, a touch of myopia has turned many a merely pretty girl into a sought-after belle. Not that her looks are actually enhanced by the affliction; but, staring nearsightedly at her partner as she must, she presents him with twin shimmering orbs in which he can find his own reflection.

Men are always grateful for this gift, always eager to ascribe beauty, sensitivity, spirituality even, to the giver.

How well we recall the example of Dorothy, whose large brown eyes are notoriously low on kilowatt. After a party recently, where she had made a really smashing impression on one of the most eligible men, Dorothy was not surprised to hear that Tom was going about praising her rare sympathy and intelligence. "Tom?" she said. "You know, I thought that's who he was."

3. GET HIM TO TALK ABOUT HIMSELF

This is a good rule for several reasons: (a) he will enjoy the conversation; (b) there is very little work required on your part; (c) what his talk reveals will help you to decide whether or not you want to be popular with him.

Nine times out of nine the answer to this last is "yes." Then, from the bit of autobiography he has given you, you are now ready to choose your "delayed reaction" gambit.

Did he mention that he had just returned from skiing in New Hampshire? Send him a newspaper survey on slope and snow conditions around the country. Is music his hobby? Please him with a little note asking which of alternate recordings is the wise one for you to buy. A review of a new play by his favorite playwright may have happy consequences, especially if you can scribble "You were so right!" in the margin. Another fortunate offshoot of the getting-him-to-talk rule is that it presents you with a clearer picture of his tastes. After all, a woman is many different people. She may as well bring into focus that aspect of her personality most likely to enchant.

4. EXPRESS ENJOYMENT IN HIS COMPANY

You might think that any man who had been smiled at, gazed at and listened to skillfully would know he was liked; but as we pointed out earlier, men are fantastic. You almost have to spell it out in pebbles dropped at their feet. "It's so good to see you again!" and "I can't tell you how glad I am that you came by!" are phrases they hug to their massive chests. Don't forget, their social antennae are not nearly so delicately attuned as yours. A woman, seeing a man's hand suddenly leap to his tie at her approach, knows she has achieved impact. But a man often does not dream that there is any connection between your date with him and your new hairdo.

5. NEVER MAKE UNKIND REMARKS

"Why can't women be more like men?"

All the men interviewed expressed great dislike for cattiness—a fault to which they feel quite superior. It's true that men, as a sex, tend to stick together. They have a code. Their competitiveness is worked off in argument winning, or in putting across aggressive deals or showing off aggressive ears. This seems to them more "honest" and "direct" than women's little tactics.

Whatever you think of the point of view, just try to imagine a man saying, "George, I've always loved you in that little Homburg," and you will quickly see that things are best the way they are.

Besides, catty comments sometimes have a ruinous side effect. They make the woman attacked appear helpless, in need of a champion. Perhaps the very champion who was, a moment ago, at your side.

6. FORGET YOURSELF

Forget whether you are beautiful or pretty or plain. Do not count upon good looks to win his admiration or, on the other hand, take it for granted that your physical plainness will shut you out.

Some of the handsomest men have been exposed to so many pretty women that they develop the immunity of a male professor in a girls' college. The beauty seems meaningless, anonymous, boring, because there is an oversupply of it. Then along comes an irregularly tilted face to steal the professor's heart with its quirkish charm.

There are all sorts of fascinating men in the world! Some of the most attractive have a strong strain of the explorer in their nature. They seek the fresh, the uncharted. The kind of woman *any*one can appreciate does not interest them. Let such a man see your natural niceness and your interest in him, and chances are he will want to be your discoverer.

Then there's the kind of man who responds to the sense of need in a woman. He wants to place his affection where it will do the most good. No party girls for him.

Another man has to prove to himself and the world that of all the many men a popular girl has dated, she likes him best. Of course it is even more likely that another man will adore the same girl simply because she is . . . well, adorable.

There are men who —— But the list is endless. As a manicurist once remarked during a discussion on the subject, "Ah-h, they're all alike. Know what I mean? Different!"

What really matters is that there are men.

STUART

MAKE A SUGAR PLUM TREE

Have you ever heard of the Sugar-Plum Tree?

'Tis a marvel of great renown!

It blooms on the shore of the Lollipop sea

In the garden of Shut-Eye Town.

EUGENE FIELD

Festive, inexpensive and lots of fun to make—our sugarplum tree. You'll need: paper cups (the cone-shaped kind that you can buy at the drug-store fountain and the more conventional cups in assorted sizes); paper soup bowls; gay cellophane sippers which, stapled together in the center, make glittering stars; lace doilies of snowy white and silver and gold; colored construction paper; slim satin ribbons in Christmas red and green; bright stickers (notary seals are wonderful—come in red, gold and silver at the stationer's); poster paints and, of course, a big pot of glue (rubber cement seems to work best). Clear off a big table, spread out the materials and then let each family member create his own designs to hang on the tree. Variations are as infinite as your imagination. To hang: loop string or heavy thread through the rims of the cups and slip over sturdy boughs. Fill each cup with cookies and confections—your own pet recipes, Christmas canes and rainbow-colored hard candies. An evening's fun for everyone and you have it—a radiant sugarplum tree. What a lovely way for you to say, "Merry Christmas!"

If she loves to entertain...

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

Specialist in speed, a gift any hostess admires, this two-speed blender which in seconds whizzes together soups and sauces, whisks up frosty drinks.

Fruit-design serving trays, in useful 11" size, are gay for display too. Set of four includes splashy pear, plum, lemon and apple.

Stone figures of fruit stay forever fresh, are always ready to appear as a table centerpiece. These amusingly copy the real thing, a little larger than life.

Carver's aid delights those who make serving a ritual, for the wide-prong fork grips roast or fowl with authority and the handle is comfortable.

Lacquer tray of emerald green is a jewel, a generous 21" across. Put it to work for serving or for arranging foods on the buffet table.

Brass bowls, a nest in the traditional Paul Revere style, are a new stainless finish, tarnishproof so that you can put polishing time to better use.

Perforated ball and chain produces perfect rice every time, fluffy and dry.

Nutcrackers, individual size, are fun to use when fruit and nuts end the meal or when sampling mixed nuts in front of the fire.

The JOURNAL's own cookbook with recipes and menus galore for every woman to explore.

Electrified skillet with a "china" look to it. The skillet is ceramic—so is the base which is temperature regulated to cook and keep hot. The 10" cooking dish separates from the base for use on the range and easy washing.

Coffee mill custom-grinds beans to make freshest flavor every time and enhance the hostess's reputation for good finale to a good meal.

Espresso coffee maker of gleaming copper with its little candle warmer makes after-dinner coffee a romantic ritual.

Raffia rings hold napkins and add colorful accents at the table. Their colors are so keyed you can use them to accent a scheme.

Bun warmer heats and keeps breads and rolls hot. Gay gingham wrap is removable and washable.

Dessert tray with electric insert for keeping coffee hot is handsomely worked of solid walnut.

Colorful cups and saucers for espresso brighten the grand finale to a party dinner.

Indoor-outdoor grill is electrified and provides new spatter shield to protect both surroundings and people.

STUART

Glamorous gifts to help the hostess entertain easily and graciously when "helpers" aren't available. They're pretty, practical and priced right.
Ready to serve upon unwrapping, they'll be used year round by a happier hostess who will thank you again and again for making party giving more fun.

Ice container, brass bound, and of pebbly-finished plastic, is 12" high, tall enough to chill soda pop and keep cubes for many an hour.

White-fronted toaster is as at home on the table as it is by the range. It's engineered for quick toasting—automatically lowers and pops up slices.

Candle collection of graduated sizes, used singly or grouped, adds glamour and color to a gala dinner.

Urn-type coffee maker which perks up to 30 cups of coffee (and keeps it hot for "seconds") makes minding the pot passé.

Leaf-pattern plates are a "go-with" kind of design, versatile enough to work well with other china when special occasions demand it.

Plate warmer holds ten at a time and gently heats them electrically.

Junior-size hibachi is the baby sister of the charcoal-brazier family, but a big conversation piece when serving hot skewered hors d'oeuvres.

Little spreaders are festive and effective for cheese and spreads with their practical porcelain handles, thin olivewood blades.

Knife sharpener, electrically operated, keeps knives in keen cutting condition, includes a special slot for scissors too.

Ladle of chrome neatly serves soups and punch and stews: its straightforward design is at home in the kitchen or on the dinner table.

Folding slicer cuts meats, breads, cheese or vegetables into uniform pieces, thick or thin as you wish, then can be stored in limited space.

Seasoning servers, tall and handsome, include salt shaker and pepper mill.

Can opener, electrified, features magnetic holder to keep lid from falling into the opened can and handles all sizes and shapes of containers.

Grill with rotisserie is electric heated and powered for grilling, broiling and barbecuing.

White bowl in fine china is just right for salads, fruits or flowers, a perfect companion piece for other dishes.

Gay flower arrangement —anemones in this vase—won't wilt and are wonderful for a table decoration.

Herbs and spices, a gourmet array or a fragrant few, are always welcomed by creative cooks.

Tile-topped tray can double as cheese server or hot-plate holder—either way it's decorative as well as useful.

The Sea house

What strange secret held these people in their unwilling alliance? Charlotte knew, somehow,
that it concerned her...

By Margaret Summerton

The cupboard swung out, and I could hear the sea plainly through the passage. Then I was being thrust into the darkness. "Mark!" I screamed.

Esmond. It was a name I'd always known, an image engraved in babyhood, waxing into maturity with me: a child, a boy, a man. Yet never glimpsed, not even in a photograph, or built into physical substance by another's words; because no one with whom I'd grown up knew Esmond.

But in the enclosed mind of a lonely child, a shy, often gauche girl, a reticent young woman, he was real; he existed. I believed that one day we would meet to laugh together at the ridiculous skein of events, raveled before our birth, that had parted us. And then, instantly, miraculously, there would develop between us a relationship that would warm and enrich our lives forever.

Esmond, my twin brother, had been left in the care of my paternal grandmother, Edwina Elliot, over a quarter of a century before; my mother, Tamara, had bought her freedom from my father by abandoning her son. Presumably the Elliots, as a matter of form, had claimed the male twin. My sole wonder was that my glamorous green-eyed Russian mother had encumbered herself with me. The likelihood seemed to be that she was given no choice.

My father had died in the Spanish Civil War—killed by a sniper's bullet in the suburbs of Madrid—and it was one of Tamara's many inconsistencies that she always spoke of the event as if it had been his private act of vengeance against herself, though in fact he had divorced her several years before his death. "I could have died, literally starved to death in the gutter, without any of the Elliots caring. And so could you, don't forget that," she often said.

Before I was old enough to temper Tamara's arbitrary opinions on people with my own yardstick, Edwina Elliot, the grandmother I'd never seen, had been established in my mind as a coldhearted archvillainess who had driven her daughter-in-law from the house, and I'd never been sufficiently interested to discover whether or not the label was justified. So, if it had not been for my feeling about Esmond, I would have been only mildly curious when Tamara sent for me one Saturday in London, the autumn I was twenty-six, to tell me that my grandmother wanted to see me. "But what does she want with me?" I asked. "She's got Esmond."

"That's the whole point. She hasn't got Esmond, not any longer." I felt the impact of a dark and fearful dread, but it lasted no more than a second, and then she spoke again, turned the dread into stark fact. "Esmond is dead."

Silence fell between us. I turned my head, so that she couldn't see my face. CONTINUED ON PAGE 103

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL
© 1960 BY MARGARET SUMMERTON

THE TRUTH ABOUT ILLEGITIMACY

By the creation of children without families, illegitimacy menaces the very structure of our society—and those most innocent suffer the severest consequences.

Carolyn could hardly be called an attractive girl. She was too thin and too pale. Her chin receded. She had omitted using lipstick—purposely for this interview, one suspected, for her eyebrows were plucked in a sharp little arch that indicated she did give time and thought to her appearance. She smiled hesitantly, as though it required effort. But her skin was clear and smooth, and steady blue-gray eyes seemed to fill half her face.

"You just don't believe it until it happens to you," she said. "Then it hits you like a ton of bricks and you feel all hollow. I still didn't believe it—I was too numb, I guess. But when the baby is born and you go through all that and give it up—then you believe it."

Her counselor nodded, but said nothing for a few seconds while the words hung in the air. Then she changed the subject to ask the girl about her job.

Carolyn seemed relieved to talk about less personal matters, but the smile never did break through fully. Animation started, then died in her face. The place—an office in a social agency—and the presence of a visitor probably caused some constraint. She spoke matter-of-factly about her job, as she had about her pregnancy. She wasn't pleading any case or reliving unhappy memories. The facts were what they were, and she had faced them.

"Mother still wants me to go to college," she remarked. "She always wanted that, but I don't think so. I don't think I ever really did like school, even before ——" Her voice drifted. "I like my job," she concluded positively. "I'd like to stay on there."

She had passed her eighteenth birthday not long before. And, among very young unmarried mothers, hers is a "success story"—that is, though her high-school education was interrupted by an illegitimate pregnancy, she had received sympathetic professional help. She had had her baby, released it for adoption, had returned to another high school from which she was graduated with a good academic record last June, and she was now employed. The firm thought highly of her work, and she was occasionally dating a young man she had met on the job.

Carolyn's file was complete and "closed" as far as this office was concerned. The director took considerable pride and satisfaction in her case, for it had worked out as well as anyone could have hoped. Arranged in Manila folders in a single filing cabinet in this particular office were several hundred records of illegitimately pregnant schoolgirls, most without a hint of happy endings, or any endings at all. Few of these unfortunate girls return to tell what happened to them.

Carolyn is a "fact," one tally in the statistics of illegitimacy for the year. As such, she is far more understandable than the statistics which should be considered with more than a grain of caution.

The estimates of illegitimacy in the United States are based on data provided by 35 states to the National Office of Vital Statistics. The latest Public Health Service reports show an increase, in recorded illegitimate births, from 201,000 in 1957 to 208,000 in 1958. The increase in the number of out-of-wedlock births during recent years has occurred primarily among teenagers, but the increase in the rate has been substantially smaller among teenagers than among women between twenty and forty years of age. That is to say, the number of illegitimate births among girls under twenty has not increased greatly in proportion to the teenage population in the last twenty years. In 1957, the rate slightly declined. Furthermore, the count in 1957 was more nearly complete than in 1937 because more accurate records were kept and reported to the national office. Any comparison with past records cannot be accurate.

The total number of illegitimate births in the nation is not by any means equally derived from all regions, or from all segments of the population. There is a vast difference between the number of white and nonwhite illegitimate births, for example, as there is between the numbers reported by various states. In 1957, about 2 in every 100 white births were believed to be out of wedlock. An estimated 70,800 white illegitimate children were born that year. Among nonwhite births, about 21 out of each 100 were believed to be illegitimate in 1957.

There are obvious reasons for such births' being much more numerous among Negroes than among whites. Large numbers of American Negroes are less than a hundred years removed from a slave culture which often forbade marriage and encouraged a high rate of reproduction. According to Dr. E. Franklin Frazier, a sociologist at Howard University, courtship begins at an early age for many Negroes, especially those in the rural South, with sex relations often regarded as normal behavior in courtship. When sex relations result in pregnancy, the young people may or may not marry. There is no aspect of the national economy that favors Negroes, and as they have moved from rural areas to urban the problems of the wretchedly poor, including illegitimacy, have become more evident.

The plight of these Negro families is not merely Southern; it is nationwide: ". . . the Negro suffers from many lacks which cannot but help affect the illegitimacy rate. Living in overcrowded slums, often sleeping in the same room or even bed as their parents, lacking even

PINNEY

WHO AM I?

by Glenn Matthew White

Every year some 20,000 girls and women enter the approximately 150 maternity homes† scattered about the country, in order to give birth to those babies called illegitimate. These girls come from every walk of life, from every stratum of society. They range from brilliant to mentally retarded. They may come from solid, respectable families or from none at all.

Though most of those who turn to social agencies for help are in their teens, the Youth Consultation Service in New York reports assisting several unmarried mothers as old as forty. A former director of that organization recalls two surprising visitors, a brother and sister, eighteen and sixteen years old, who brought their mother. Their father had died two years before, and in her loneliness their mother had turned to an old friend of her husband's. And now she was pregnant, almost out of her mind with grief and shame, and completely unable to deal with the situation. The two children went to work to earn enough money to see their mother through, and later the baby was adopted.

The time of the discovery of pregnancy is not the right moment for other members of the family to moralize or chastise. Still, there is always the inevitable question, "Why did this happen—to you?" The more appropriate question is, "What emotional or psychological needs and circumstances lead to premarital intercourse that results in illegitimate pregnancy?"

The search for common factors in the psychological make-up of unmarried mothers has been the subject CONTINUED ON PAGE 102 rudimentary recreational facilities, lacking in many areas the opportunity for a decent education and experiencing dietary deficiencies . . . it is small wonder that these children as teenagers and young adults turn to illicit sexual activities in their drive for some satisfaction and recognition . . ."*

These facts, though basic to an understanding of the national pattern of illegitimacy, afford little consolation to the individual girl who finds herself illegitimately pregnant. For her, the choices are few and unavoidably grim, the results almost inevitably disillusionment, pain, guilt, misery. If it is inadvisable or impossible for her to marry the boy, what can she do? Have the child? Abort it? Keep it? Give it away?

 Report to the Governor and General Assembly of Virginia by Commission to Study Problems Relating to Children Born Out of Wedlock, 1959.*

† Thirty-six of these are under the auspices of the Salvation Army; forty-six are Florence Crittenton Homes.

MY UNCLE PEPE

All women will love

the story that all men should read!

By BENJAMIN REGUERA FERNANDEZ
as told to Jean Muir

DRAWING BY BANBERY

Every day at five, which is the shank of the afternoon in Madrid, my Uncle Pepe used to take me walking in the Retiro. He would proceed along the tree-shaded walk, very sedate and erect, his paunch cutting the breeze before him, and every now and then, as is the custom among the Spaniards, he would compliment some passing woman. This was always done with dignity and stateliness, a simple "Ah, bonita!" dropped into the sunny afternoon, for after all my uncle was a man of station. Yet the words were spoken with feeling. Great feeling.

Sometimes we would stop at the Prado art museum and then my uncle would seek out the paintings of Goya. He would stand in front of the Nude Maja, his hands clasped behind his back, rocking a little on his heels and with a look of complacency in his hooded eyes. Or perhaps he would choose the lovely ladies under their sun-dappled parasol, with their tiny feet and their wealth of color. And my uncle would hum a little to himself, happily. It always seemed to me that these visits left my uncle with a great sense of well-being. As we strolled homeward through the afternoon crowds, my uncle was almost sure to murmur his admiring words into some passing woman's ear.

I was twelve years old and growing, perhaps, more observant of women myself before I noticed that there was a strangeness about this custom of his. One day I glanced up when I heard him say "Guapa!" to a woman hurrying by, and immediately I was aware of a very great astonishment.

"But Tio Pepe!" I cried. "That woman was not beautiful at all!"

I turned around and looked after her. Certainly not beautiful. Quite the contrary. One might almost say she was dowdy.

My uncle glanced at me out of the corner of his eye and blew a little through his mustache, but he made no comment. In consternation I searched my memory, and then I realized the truth. None of the women my Uncle Pepe had complimented were in the least beautiful. Without exception they had all been quite ill-favored.

To me this was a shocking discovery. I admired my uncle very much. But since he had proved so poor a judge of women, how then could I trust his judgment in other things? In the matter of pelota players, for example? Or of matadors?

We continued our walk in an embarrassed silence, until we had reached a certain small café and settled ourselves at our usual table under the green-and-red awning. There my uncle's cognac was brought to him, and to me the chocolate crested with whipped cream.

With the cognac, Uncle Pepe appeared to relax. "My child," he said, setting down his glass and dabbing at his mustache with a big silk handkerchief, "are you aware that at one time I was an artist?"

This was something I certainly had not known. In fact, to me it was incredible. I always thought of him in connection with his big house on Avenida Felipe Segundo, with the flourishing soap business which took so charmingly little of his time, and with the ponderous, high-chassised automobile in which he occasionally went bowling into the country for a day's sport with a shotgun.

"Perhaps," my uncle said judiciously, "I exaggerate when I say I was an artist. Let us say, instead, that there was a period of three years when I turned my back upon my family and its soap, when I rented a shelter of sorts in a part of town unknown to you, and there painted with fury and an empty stomach. Would you believe it? There was a moment when I seriously considered stealing a panecillo off a baker's cart."

My uncle stroked his mustache which had the suspicion of a smile below it. "But to be honest, my boy, I do not remember this period with sadness. I had a friend. A dancer. La Florencia. Perhaps you have heard the name?" He looked at me hopefully and then his face fell. "No, of course not. At your age. Still, let me tell you, there was a time when Madrid rang with that name. The click of her heels and castañuelas could kindle the eyes even of the old men.

"You understand, this was not such a woman as the dancers are today," he said, and his nostrils delicately indicated his disparagement. "This was a woman of body, of the true bravura and of a great beauty. She had that line of back and hips which the women of Spain alone possess, and the long eyes whose gaze can rock a man's heart." My uncle was becoming very intense. "And the fire!" he

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

souper pork chops

3 ways to turn a plain meal into fancy fare

Glazed Pork Chops. In skillet, brown 4 pork chops (about 1 lb.) on both sides; pour off drippings. Top each with slice of apple and orange; sprinkle with ground cinnamon and cloves. Add 1 can Campbell's Beef Broth, 1 tbsp. brown sugar. Cover; cook over low heat 35 min. Stir 1 tbsp. cornstarch into 2 tbsp. orange juice till smooth; gradually blend into soup. Cook; stir constantly till slightly thickened; simmer few min. Serves 4.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soups

Fiesta Pork Chops. In skillet, brown 4 pork chops (about 1 lb.) on both sides; pour off drippings. Stir in 1 can Campbell's Cream of Vegetable Soup, ½ cup water. Cover; cook 15 min. Top each chop with tomato slice and green pepper strips. Cover; cook 30 min. or till chops are tender; stir occasionally. 4 servings of souper pork chops that'll do you proud.

Look for more recipes on every can of Campbell's Soup

Gala Pork Chops. In skillet, brown 4 pork chops (about 1 lb.) on both sides; pour off drippings. Sprinkle chops with pepper; top each with slice of onion and thin slice of lemon. Stir in 1 can of Campbell's Tomato Soup, ¼ cup water. Cover; cook over low heat about 45 min. or until chops are tender; stir occasionally. 4 souper special servings of delicious chops.

What did the explorer miss most in the polar vastness?

IMAGINE—if you can—a world in which you'd never hear a single familiar sound.

An explorer of the Antarctic once lived alone for weeks in this kind of silence. And later he wrote that he missed nothing so much as the voices of friends, the songs of birds—and countless other sounds that we hear daily.

If your hearing is good now, how can you keep it that way? Equally important, what can you do to protect your children's hearing?

Fortunately, most symptoms of ear trouble in adults are easily recognized. They include straining to hear low-pitched conversations, feelings of fullness or congestion, ringing or buzzing sounds in the ears. Any one of these symptoms should be investigated by your physician.

It's more difficult to tell when a child's hearing is affected. But there are signs that should alert parents to trouble. Inattention, a tendency to shyness, a desire to be alone and inability to pronounce words properly—all these may indicate a hearing difficulty.

Should any of these signs appear, a child's hearing should be tested. Moreover, it's advisable to have a child's ears examined after measles, chicken pox, mumps, whooping cough, swollen adenoids and a sore throat from any cause —even though there are no symptoms of ear trouble.

Ear infections are no longer the serious problem they once were—thanks to the antibiotic drugs. And surgery is of great benefit to many people in middle and later life afflicted with chronic progressive deafness.

Your best protection against ear troubles lies in regular tests of your hearing and prompt treatment at the first sign of any difficulty in hearing.

Metropolitan Life
INSURANCE COMPANY©
A MUTUAL COMPANY
1 Madison Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

CHINA COURT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 15

they are told they sound like fairy tales, as if, with time, truth leaks out of them. Only the house and the hours spent in it—"and the garden, of course," says Mrs. Quin—seem real to her now, but the people are very real to Tracy. "Damaris is another funny name," she says.

"Quite a number of girls were called Damaris then," says Mrs. Quin.

"But they are funny names," argues Tracy.

"Not when you get to know them," says Mrs. Quin. She closes the book, but Borowis's name stays in Tracy's mind and she asks, perhaps for the twentieth time:

"Who was Borowis?"

It is odd how Tracy asks that question again and again. Perhaps it is a difference in her grandmother's voice when she answers that arrests her. It is not what Mrs. Quin says, because she always gives the same answer: "Borowis? He was a boy."

"A Quin boy?"

"Yes."

"You knew him?"

"Yes." There is sharpness in that. Then Mrs. Quin's voice quietens and Tracy immediately grows still, for she knows her grandmother is remembering: "I came up the valley path," says Mrs. Quin, "and looked over the wall and he was there. They were there," she corrects herself.

"Borowis and John Henry?"

"Yes."

"That was when you were Ripsie?"

"When I was Ripsie." That thin, neglected, shabby little girl.

"Was Ripsie long before me?" asks Tracy. It is not really a question because she knows the answer perfectly well.

"Long before you."

The valley path is the children's path. It comes from Penbarrow by way of the river and woods to a gap in the China Court boundary wall which is built, as most Cornish walls are, of loose stones, covered with moss. By the wall two great beech trees stand in a dell where the wood flowers have seeded and, in spring, make drifts of snowdrops, then violets and anemones. From the dell, through a wicket gate, a path leads across a sloping field to the kitchen garden. In summer a hedge of sweet peas separates the kitchen garden from the flower beds and terraces of the garden proper. The garden is of little account when Ripsie first sees it, but it has a flagpole which impresses her very much. The house faces west and, as the time is sunset, every window has such a brilliance of light that the house seems lit with gold.

As she watches, a maid comes out on the terrace and begins to put away the garden chairs. Ripsie has not seen a parlormaid before and she leans on the wall, entranced. The maid is Pringle, who is often to shoo her away from the front hall, and even at this distance Ripsie can see how importantly befrilled Pringle is in black with a large white apron, pinafore-frilled over the shoulders. Ripsie watches fascinated, until a sound makes her turn. Near her, in the dell, is a boy.

"Your John Henry?" asks Tracy's mother, Barbara, who is unfailingly romantic—even after all those affairs, thinks Mrs. Quin unkindly. "Your John Henry?"

"No, it was Borowis," but Mrs. Quin does not say that aloud. "He invited me in," she says slowly. Barbara thinks she is speaking of John Henry, but Tracy knows better. Her grandmother is speaking of Borowis, for a different look has come into her harsh old face. "He invited me in," says Mrs. Quin. "I never went away again."

Here is a long span, stretching from Tracy back to Eustace, "for I can remember him," says Mrs. Quin. Eustace, the boys' grandfather, is paralyzed after a stroke so that he cannot move out of his bedroom when his son, Jared, marries Lady Patrick and brings her home. "We used to go in to the old man," says Mrs. Quin. "His beard was most beautifully combed and he had a complexion like an Ophelia rose."

"Ophelia rose?" asks Tracy.

"Those roses by the sundial, pink with brownish cream. They are old-fashioned now. On Sundays—and he always knew when it was Sunday—he used to spread a silk handkerchief on his lap and cut our nails. Yes, even Boro's. Mine were often dirty and bitten and he used to say, 'Those are not nails for a little lady.' He was the only person who ever called me a little lady and I loved him for it," says Mrs. Quin, "but I think he was confusing us with the Brood."

"The Brood?"

"That's what he called his own children. There were so many of them."

Tracy to Eustace, or Eustace to Tracy: it is a long span, and toward its end for Mrs. Quin, as for Eustace, names and times often become one, but the people and their stories are distinct.

When Barbara, the daughter-in-law, takes Tracy back to America and Mrs. Quin and Cecily are left alone, the girls do their best to make her leave China Court. Bella and her husband, Walter, and Mrs. Quin's three other daughters and their Tom, Dick and Harry, as she calls their husbands, all try to make her give up the house. "It has had its day," says Walter. "It's time it went."

"Yes. It's ridiculous, mother, you living all alone in that great house."

"It isn't a great house. It's only big."

"But all alone."

"I'm not alone. I have Cecily, August Moses, Trill."

"But it has no amenities."

"I don't want amenities."

"If you sold it, even as it is now, you could have a much bigger income and a comfortable little flat."

"I don't like comfortable little flats."

"You would be far more free," says Bella.

"I don't wish to be free. Even in this generation," says Mrs. Quin, her voice disagreeable, "a few people do not wish to be free of their house."

"If they can afford to keep it," says Walter. "Seriously, in rates and taxes alone ——"

"The farm rent pays the rates and taxes."

"When, and if, you get it." That is a thrust and Mrs. Quin knows it. The farm, Penbarrow, is let to Peter St. Omer. "That young man has got hold of mother," says Bella darkly.

Penbarrow is all that is left of the China Court estate. John Henry has to sell the quarry to pay off the debts he inherits and after Stace is killed Mrs. Quin sells the china-clay works and makes a settlement on each of her daughters. It is they who insist she keep Penbarrow. "And a lot of good it's been," says Walter. To begin with she will not turn out the old tenant farmer who has been there for sixty years and is long past farming. "Let him die in peace," says Mrs. Quin.

"And kill the farm," says Walter. Over the next tenant he prefers to gloss. "Because it was his mistake, not mine," says Mrs. Quin with asperity. Walter persuades her to put in an up-to-date farmer who spends so much on what Mrs. Quin calls gadgets that he goes bankrupt.

She refuses after this to let Penbarrow to the rich gentleman farmer Walter has patiently found again. "Let it or, better, sell," urges Walter, but Mrs. Quin will not listen. "It would have helped him with his income tax," mourns Walter, "so that he could have afforded a decent price, which Peter St. Omer certainly can't."

"No. Peter doesn't pay any tax because he hasn't any income," says Mrs. Quin calmly. She is calm about Peter; she believes in him.

From her bedroom window she can look over the garden and valley, to the farm which is so much on the sky line of the opposite hill that its animals often seem to be grazing against the sky. She can look and "mark carefully," says Mrs. Quin. She has marked very carefully, but she does not tell Bella and Walter her findings: that for these four years Peter has worked five hours every day for the old farmer at Glentyre. "To learn," says Peter. She has heard the tractor working at dawn and again by its headlamp or moonlight far into the night. She has watched Peter build up his stock of chickens and pigs. Now that, at last, he has been able to rebuild the c cowsheds, she has seen the beginning of herd and all this summer, as soon as she kes, she hears him calling his cows.

The cows have proper cow names: Clover, Buttercup, Daisy, Poppy, Parsley, which singely satisfies Mrs. Quin.

"If Peter has no income, how did he buy se valuable cows?" asks Walter.

Mrs. Quin pretends not to hear, but Walter s it again. "Perhaps his father helped him," suggests innocently.

"Nonsense. St. Omer hasn't a penny."

The St. Omers are scattered now and their n house sold while Tremellen, their Cornish t, is let as a girls' school. Tremellen is the great house of the district. Bella is exaggating when she calls China Court "great." s a family house, ample and plain.

t must have looked very plain, quite unnpromising, when it was first built. It is a nite house; naturally, granite is the local ne and China Court's granite has the added antage of being cut in Eustace Quin's own rry.

The house stands square to the valley; ind it, the quarry hill rises steeply to the age that lies along the spine of the hill, its ses built low against the moor wind. The shelters the China Court garden from se same winds when they whistle over the or, though it is open to the west and the antic gales.

The hill is steep and a steep lane runs down dividing China Court in two. Its orchards l stable block are on the far side and there, , is the waterfall, a fall of perhaps twenty feet, its pool choked with rubbish from the quarry above. The stream runs beneath the lane and comes out under the China Court gate, making, when the rain swells the water, a loud rushing sound in the darkness below.

The drive runs from the gate to make a loop round an island of rhododendrons. "Not an island, a fort," says Mrs. Quin and indeed, when they are in flower, red, white and pink, the clumps look like battlemented walls, bristling. "Rhododendrons are always militant," says Mrs. Quin.

At the side of the house and standing there long before it, the elms, rook-inhabited, rise higher than the slates. When the wind is from the west, that Atlantic wind, the elms make a sound in the house like the sound of the sea.

The rooms are ample, too; the drawing room runs the width of the house from front to back and needs two fireplaces to warm it. "Central heating," says Bella longingly, but there is no money for that. For years, little even of repairs and painting has been done. "It's too expensive," insists Bella, "too big."

Even the hall is spacious, stone-flagged, with a stone fireplace and granite curb. The stairs are wide and also of stone. A passage leads past morning and dining rooms to the big kitchen wing from which the back stairs go up to the nurseries. A comfortable smell of cooking, of wet wool drying, of hot starched linen always hangs about those stairs.

A green-baize door shuts off the kitchen wing and its noise from the main house, but before it is reached, and opposite the dining room, is a small arched door opening into the office, which has another outside door so that Jeremy Baxter, Eustace's clerk, can come and go without disturbing the house. It is a real office, overflowing with files, papers and deed-boxes, and has a safe and a copying machine. In 1850 Eustace buys, in one lot from a Penzance sale, a great bookcase with more than four hundred books and for a little while the office becomes the library, but nobody in the family ever sits or reads there and it soon becomes the office again. It was here that Mr. Alabaster had been installed the week before Mrs. Quin died. "And very glad I am that he was," said Cecily. "He sent all the telegrams."

The best rooms upstairs look over the garden; the big bedroom, where Mrs. Quin lay now, is first Eustace's and his bride Adza's. In the dressing room beside it are his wardrobes, shoe stand and mahogany shaving mirror, but Adza's furniture is gone. The spare room with two brass-knobbed beds is next door and there are lesser rooms named in colors—the Yellow, the Red, the smaller Brown and the White—and a room known as the Porch because it is over the front door, though that has no porch. The one bathroom is big and inconvenient, with a mahogany-edged bathtub set into the floor. The nursery bathes in a tin tub shaped like a flowerpot saucer but with a lip; it is painted white inside once a year by the knife boy—when there is a knife boy—and a favorite nursery-bath pastime is to peel bits of the white enamel off when it has become softened in hot water.

Until John Henry's time there is no downstairs cloakroom except in the servants' wing and, apart from that, only one lavatory, dark and big with a wide mahogany seat and willow-pattern pan. When its plug is pulled, the noise echoes through the house.

There is neither gas nor electricity, but the drains are well laid. The water, soft and sometimes brown, comes from the moors and is heated by the Eagle range which, as Bella says, eats coal. Since the war Mrs. Quin has only one fire in the morning room, an oilstove in her bedroom, another in the hall. The drawing room is too big to heat at all in winter, but in summer she goes back to it again. She loves the long room with its cabinets of famille rose porcelain, jade and family bric-a-brac, its pale darned chintzes, split damask and paintings. "Two Benjamin Wests and a Winterhalter," says Mrs. Quin.

The Winterhalter is over one fireplace, the mantel kept bare; but on the other is a French clock in gilt with an enameled cupid, holding blue ribbons. Each side of it is a Chelsea figure, a shepherd and a shepherdess that the child Tracy loves. She calls them the Pale Blue Girl and the Little Pink Boy and pretends they are hers. One window looks down the drive onto the rhododendrons, the other over the garden to the west; it is by this one that Mrs. Quin likes to sit.

It is an unruly Cornish garden, sloped, with granite rocks and steep paths dark with yews, its beds tangled with flowers. Cornish gardens are famous for their flowers—half Mrs. Quin's neighbors in the big houses live by selling theirs, specializing in Parma violets, arum lilies, mimosa, rhododendrons.

"But not your mother," says Walter to Bella sarcastically, "nothing half as useful."

"A garden isn't meant to be useful. It's for joy," says Mrs. Quin. To watch her among her flowers is, as John Henry, her husband, says, like watching a scholar in his library who, as he talks, goes to one shelf or another, pulling out a book to show, to brood over or to read from. Mrs. Quin, each time she comes in from the garden, has a leaf, a flower or a bud in her hand.

Her garden is her treasure; she refuses to commercialize it and at China Court the azaleas, unexploited, are left to shimmer on their banks with the tree peonies, with roses, iris, lilies and poppies bursting their buds; delphiniums, larkspurs, lilacs; while along the drive edge to the gate are hydrangeas, deep blue and as tall as trees.

50 YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In December, 1910, a Norwegian explorer reached the South Pole. Golden-voiced Caruso was in Puccini's opera "The Girl of the Golden West." Mary Baker Eddy, founder of Christian Science, died in Boston at the age of 89, and two plane crashes took the lives of two of America's foremost aviators, "Arch" Hoxsey and John B. Moisant.

"The modern young woman," writes a reader who calls herself Old-Fashioned in the December, 1910, Journal, "seems to find humming a pleasant pastime when obliged to wait in shops, hotel corridors, etc. Do you not consider this in bad taste?" Reply: "Anything a woman does in public that makes her conspicuous is in bad taste."

"The tendency to stoop when doing housework is strong and must be overcome if you have ambition to develop a graceful figure. When kneading bread dough, stand erect and take deep breaths in unison with the motions of the hands."

In this issue, the Journal continues showing the great art masterpieces of the world, new piano music, book reviews, decorating problems of the little house. Comments the Plain Country Woman: "The greatest enemy to happiness in this country is cheap ideals—the sheer lack of taste that penetrates everything we think or do."

"A useful gift for a boy is a rubber stamp with his full name and an indelible inking pad to mark his belongings. . . . A yard of dollar bills makes a good Christmas present. It takes five bills to carry out the idea."

"A large cold door key laid on the nape of the neck will cure a nosebleed."

2 pictures that tell a story every mother should know—

"Can you guess why I look so mad in this picture? It's to show how much I hated it when I had to take bad tasting medicine."

"See how glad I look now? That's because when I have a cold or fever my mommy gives me St. Joseph Aspirin For Children. It tastes good and makes me feel good, too."

Why most thoughtful mothers give the children's aspirin that doctors recommend 4 to 1 over any other brand

In a recent nation-wide survey more doctors—child specialists—recommended St. Joseph Aspirin For Children than any other!

No need to have an emotional upset when you give your child aspirin . . . no need to worry whether he has actually swallowed the dose the doctor ordered!

Most mothers solve that problem by giving St. Joseph Aspirin For Children . . . the aspirin child specialists prefer 4 to 1 over any other brand.

You see, St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is the best aspirin, with the creamy texture and pure orange taste children prefer. It has the preferred child dosage and the special safety cap doctors favor.

Is there any wonder that more doctors specify St. Joseph Aspirin For Children? Any wonder more mothers trust it—more children accept it willingly . . . than all other brands combined?

Next time you're shopping . . . ask for St. Joseph Aspirin For Children. Your child may need it tonight!

FOR ADULTS (5-grain tablets)

READY TO GO TO WORK FASTER
than other leading pain relief tablets!

Why pay for costlier aspirin, expensive buffering, or "combination" pain relief drugs? Laboratory tests prove that St. Joseph Aspirin disintegrates faster, is ready to go to work faster than all three other leading pain relief tablets. Millions take it without stomach upset. Get the best for less—be sure that you get trusted St. Joseph Aspirin!

The house date is under the passionflower that has ramped over the front door as other creepers have done over the garden front and side walls, softening their outline and weathering the granite.

To how many children has Mrs. Quin explained the passionflower? Breaking one off and, because she knows very well the added value given to things by having to wait for them, keeping the flower in her own hand as she tells the story. "The passionflower stays open for three days, because it was three days before Christ rose again. Its whiteness is for purity, its blue for heaven. See, here," and she points to the leaf, "is the spear. And here, the five anthers, are the five wounds. And here"—she touches the threads—"is the wreath of thorns, and the fringe, so gaudy on the calyx, is the glory of the nimbus." Then she gives the flower to the child.

To how many children does she tell that? She never knows, but always, below the creeper, she seems to see children's heads.

The last child at China Court is Tracy, not counting the evacuees from London in the war. Mrs. Quin has a fellow feeling for the evacuees—she was once Ripsie—but they do not stay long. Nor does she count her other grandchildren. "They are not Quins," says Mrs. Quin. To her, Tracy is the only grandchild, the last child at China Court, "as far as I know," says Mrs. Quin.

"I'm not interested in girls." She has always said that. Indeed, John Henry has a story that each time he goes in to ask his wife what the newest girl baby is to be called, she absently answers "Grace." The story is not true, but Bella's younger sisters are always known as the Three Little Graces.

Long, long ago Borowis decides to pencil Ripsie's name into the tree in the family Bible. "But what's your real name?" he asks her.

"Ripsie."

"That's not a real name. The name you were christened."

"Christened?" asks Ripsie, mystified.

"Oh, ask your mother," says Borowis, bored.

Ripsie asks and it appears she was not christened. "Mother says it's twaddle," she reports cheerfully, but Borowis and John Henry are shocked, especially John Henry.

Then Borowis solves it. "I will take her up to the church and christen her at once."

"You will?" asks John Henry.

"Yes."

"In the church?"

"Yes."

"From the font?"

"Why not?" But John Henry is so plainly horrified that Borowis, who now and then listens to his younger brother, remembers that he has not yet fed his ferrets and Ripsie's christening is put off. Her real name proves to be Deborah, but "Ripsie" stays, in pencil, in the family tree.

It is not noticed because for years nobody opens the Bible and then nobody bothers to rub the name out. When Tracy is born Mrs. Quin pencils in "Tracy," meaning later to put the baby's full name in India ink to match the others. But the months and years slip away and the name is still in pencil when Tracy finds it. "Ripsie"; "Tracy"—the penciling seems to make them kin, apart from the others.

"We were truly kin," says Mrs. Quin, and it is true that Tracy is like her grandmother in many ways. For instance, both, from the moment they first see it, are enslaved by China Court.

The small Tracy is not as interested in the story of the passionflower as she is in the date over the front door, when Mrs. Quin pushes aside the creeper to show it to her. "Eighteen-forty. That's more than a hundred years ago," she says.

"Yes," says Mrs. Quin.

"And we have been here all that time?"

"The house has never changed hands."

"Hands?" asks Tracy, startled.

"Yes, hands." Hands to direct, to sign letters and write checks for bills, to put a latchkey in the lock and bolt the doors at night. There are younger, slimmer hands that embroider, and do the flowers, play the piano, cut the pages of novels, sketch. There are small hands, very often dirty, that pry and poke, into cupboards, workbaskets, jam pots; make mud pies and cut out paper dolls; play cat's cradle and marbles. There are humbler, deft hands that sweep and dust, wash china and clothes and linen; iron, mend, sew, cook, bake, make fires and beds, dig, wash the motorcar, mow the lawn. "But all our hands," says Mrs. Quin.

"All belonging," and Tracy gives a sigh of content.

In her short life she has been rattled around "unmercifully," says Mrs. Quin, first in the wake of her father, Stace, in the army, which meant India, Egypt, back to England. Then in the war Barbara takes Tracy swiftly to America and Connecticut, her home. Barbara divorces Stace and gets her first part in films and grows ambitious. She and Tracy go to Beverly Hills, with changes to hotels or rooms in Bel Air, Santa Monica or Los Angeles as their fortunes vary. "Sleeping in so many different beds," says Tracy; getting to know people, friends and servants, and then losing them; leaving pets behind, gardens, schools. At China Court she sinks with bliss into an ordinary humdrum child life, but three years later Barbara comes to England with a strange man. Tracy knows what that means. "And he lives in America," she says in horror. It is not that she does not like America, but it is not China Court.

Tracy, like Ripsie, is wary of grown people, but she has learned that Mrs. Quin is safe and she decides to sound her. "Can I have another father?"

The question jolts Mrs. Quin. Stace seems to have been dead such a little while, but, I is nearly four years, and anyway they were divorced, thinks Mrs. Quin and she answers evenly, "You can have stepfathers, but only one real father and mother."

"And one grandmother?"

"You can have two." With a pang Mrs. Quin has to acknowledge that other and American grandmother. "Two, but you can't change them either."

Tracy gives another sigh. "I shall stay here forever," she says, but she is a child and children can be taken away.

When, that last day, the time comes for Barbara to take Tracy from her grandmother, Tracy clings to her with eyes shut. It is Mrs. Quin who bends down and gently unloosens her hands. "Listen," she says and Tracy, who on countless occasions these last three years has listened to story after story, all the tales and happenings, opens her eyes and listens.

"You will come back," says Mrs. Quin.

Tracy nods—she trusts her grandmother—but her eyes still stream with tears and her face is white and swollen with grief.

Mrs. Quin takes one of the pair of big front-door keys from its place on the hook

> The happiness of life may be greatly increased by small courtesies in which there is no parade, whose voice is too still to tease, and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention.
>
> STERNE

and puts it into Tracy's hand. "Here is the key."

Her voice is so matter-of-fact that it seems as if Tracy were coming back tomorrow, but the years pass and the gap between America and China Court widens. Soon, for Mrs. Quin, Tracy, Stace and Borowis slide into one.

Is it Borowis or Stace who has the glossy little hunter, Mirabelle? She seems to remember John Henry's complaint: "I never had a hunter"; but did he say it of Stace or of Borowis? And that small figure, flying up the drive above the scudding legs in blue dungarees. "Is it Tracy?" asks Mrs. Quin. It must be Tracy, and yet it could be one of Tracy's children. "Because I believe it goes on."

No one else believes that. "It has had its day," pronounces Walter. "It is time it went," until Mrs. Quin is driven to answer: "Walter, I think you should remember the apricot tree."

When Bella marries Walter as a young captain he has, as a hobby, just completed a correspondence course in agriculture and fruit growing. "When he finishes his service we shall go in for apples," says Bella and she brings him to China Court to advise on the orchard.

"I don't need advice," says Mrs. Quin. "I understand the orchard," but Bella brings him.

The young Walter spends the morning appraising the trees and then takes Mrs. Quin round, telling her of his findings. This apple has canker; this pear, pear midge. "Contarinia, pyrivora," says Walter, and Mrs. Quin listens in a silence that even Bella begins to sense is ominous.

Finally they come to the apricot on the south wall, an espaliered tree, mottled and spreading thirty feet wide, buttressed with iron hoops. "One of the oldest in the country," says Mrs. Quin.

"Kept for sentimental reasons?" suggested Walter.

"Kept for fruit," says Mrs. Quin. She says nothing more but listens while Walter tells her what is wrong with it.

"It is time it went," says Walter. And he shows her. "It has mildew. It might even be

JUNG IN KWAN'S TOTAL ASSETS

A discarded hat—a man's ragged suit—a look of hunger. These are all that 10-year-old Jung In Kwan has in the world.

Father and mother living? Jung In Kwan's father was killed in an avalanche. His mother died in a dynamite blast. He is alone.

Visible means of support? Well, Jung In Kwan does have a job of sorts. It is begging for food scraps to fill his gnawing stomach.

Any references? Yes, Jung In Kwan can refer you to several thousand orphans on the streets of Seoul. They are in the same business. They can tell you about his experience in aching hunger—lonely nights—frost-bitten hands and feet. They can tell you of closed doors—indifferent crowds—dying friends.

Prospects for the future? Almost certain death for Jung In Kwan and many of his friends. Unless—unless a friendly hand sends help. One can "adopt" such a boy or girl by sending $10 a month to the Christian Children's Fund. This opens a door to one of the 91 CCF-affiliated orphanages in Korea. Such support lets in a hungry child. Indeed, any gift, large or small, from an American heart and pocket can save the life of a little boy or girl.

The cake Jung In Kwan is eating was given to him by a CCF worker who later admitted him to a CCF orphanage school. He no longer will be one of the unhappy half of the world's children. For every other child in the world goes to bed hungry every night. Communism's strongest ally is hunger. While most of us worry about excess weight, children starve because of the lack of a couple of pennies' worth of rice.

The cost of an "adoption" is the same in any of the countries listed.

Christian Children's Fund, incorporated in 1938, with its 391 affiliated orphanage schools in 41 countries, is the largest Protestant orphanage organization in the world, assisting over 34,000 children. It serves 30 million meals a year. It is registered with the Advisory Committee on Voluntary Aid of the International Cooperation Administration of the United States Government. It is experienced, efficient, economical and conscientious.

COUNTRIES:

Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Borneo, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, England, Finland, France, Greece, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Iran, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Korea, Lapland, Lebanon, Macao, Malaya, Mexico, Okinawa, Pakistan, Philippines, Portugal, Puerto Rico, Spain, Syria, Taiwan (Formosa), Thailand, Turkey, United States, Vietnam (Indo-china), Western Germany, American Indians of greatest need.

For Information write: Dr. J. Calvitt Clarke

CHRISTIAN CHILDREN'S FUND, INC.
Richmond 4, Virginia

I wish to "adopt" a boy ☐ girl ☐ for one year in_____ (Name Country)
I will pay $10 a month ($120 a year). Enclosed is payment for the full year ☐ first month ☐. Please send me the child's name, story, address and picture. I understand that I can correspond with the child. Also, that there is no obligation to continue the adoption.

I cannot "adopt" a child but want to help by giving $_____.
☐Please send me further information.
NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY_____ Zone_____
STATE_____
Gifts of any amount are welcome. Gifts are deductible from income tax.

erleaf, Stereum purpureum," he says sol-nly.

'I thought that attacked plums, not apri-s," says Mrs. Quin, but Walter sweeps on. 'The wood here"—he taps the trunk—"is rmy. Yes, it has had its day. It's a mistake keep these old trees. The yield grows less, fruit gets bitter and small."

That is twenty years ago. Mrs. Quin still 's nothing, but every year she sends Walter asket of large, sweet apricots.

'What be 'ee goin' do now?" Mrs. Abel ed Cecily.

'Make cakes," and presently through the use crept the warm and living smell of cing: of Cecily's drop scones; of yeast in a wl set in the fender with a cloth over it; of fruit bread and, pungent, of saffron cake.

'They will expect that," said Cecily. "Saf-n cake and clotted cream. They don't have e to make homemade things, poor souls."

'Will 'em all come?" asked Mrs. Abel as and Cecily were drinking tea at the chen table. Cecily nodded, but the nod was rt.

'If Miss Bella and Mr. Walter takes over house I suppose you 'ud be stayin'?" said s. Abel for mischief.

'Not for all the tea in China," said Cecily. ella's all right," she added. "Her bark's rse than her bite, but Mr. Walter!" Then cily's face hardened, which was the only y she could contain her grief. "The house n't be taken over. It will be sold."

'Not for all the tea in China," is one of cily's favorite expressions and it is odd that should use it, for it is, in a way, the tea in ina that builds China Court. Great-Uncle cLeod, "who began it all," says Mrs. Quin, kes a fortune in the China-tea run and, ugh Eustace is only his nephew, it amuses cLeod to buy property in the village where began. He builds China Court as a wedding sent for Eustace and Adza.

The portrait over the fireplace in the hall is Great-Uncle McLeod. There has always n a rumor in the village that he has gypsy od and this, with the gossip that he is in lity Eustace's father, might explain the gnificent and unexpected darkness of the youngest of Eustace's brood, Jared and maris, though they do not look gypsy but if there were a strain, from some sailor haps, darker than Cornish, a Venetian or niard. It is only a rumor and certainly the Idle-aged man in the portrait is very much Englishman, portly, with pale brown hair, er blue eyes, a long nose and a floridly red nplexion.

The house is not named for the tea clippers, from the fact that the day the roof goes on lso the day Eustace, following in his uncle's tsteps in making money, buys the china-y works at Canverisk. "Better call it China use," he says, but to Adza, his little bride, house is more impressive than any she has ever imagined. "Not China House, China Court," says Adza.

It has a courtyard, where the kitchen-and-nursery wing makes an L, but the house is decidedly not a court. It is middle-sized, built on the edge of the Cornish moors. The house is quiet, domestic, but one has only to hear the wind in the chimneys to know how near and rough the moor wildness is. "Quite a lot of us that were brought up here are a little wild," says Mrs. Quin. "A little queer."

"Believe me," said Cecily to Mrs. Abel now, putting down her cup. "She knew something was going to happen."

"Mrs. Quin?"

"Mrs. Quin." Cecily was solemn. The tea was so black and strong that it gave the drinker a knockback almost like spirits. This was the fourth pot Cecily and Mrs. Abel had drunk since the morning and, with it and her tiredness and shock, Cecily felt what she called "out of herself." "I have been turning it over in my mind," said Cecily. "Yesterday she was excited."

"Mrs. Quin was?"

"Yes, and glad. It was as if somebody was coming."

"Do 'ee think her knawed her was goin' die?" asked Mrs. Abel. "Some folks do, y'knaw. I mind ——" But Cecily cut her short.

"It wasn't dying she was thinking about, it was living. She was at me to spit and polish the house. She did all the flowers. Somebody's coming. I'm sure of it," but nobody came. "Except the ones who would come," said Cecily.

There were many of them. August was kept busy, frantically barking and running first to one door, then another. Dr. Taft came again, then the vicar, while all day there was a trickle of people to the back door: women carrying a basket, or a plate covered with a napkin. It was odd that Mrs. Quin, who had done less in the village than any other lady of China Court, should be the one St. Probus loves, perhaps the first it really accepts.

The flowers began to heap up in the tubs Cecily put for them and in the afternoon telegrams began to come. "But no one will be here until tomorrow," she told Mrs. Abel. "Bella and Walter have to come down from Worcestershire. The others are on holiday in Oban. That's Scotland, isn't it?"

The second Grace was working in London, and could not get away until tomorrow. "They will all bring their husbands. That means getting all the rooms ready," said Cecily.

Mrs. Abel helped her with the beds. The sheets were linen but old now, and thin. The blankets were old, too, washed thin, almost cottony, and some of the towels were rubbed through. For years there had not been so many rooms used and Cecily had to send for cakes of soap to put in the soap dishes on the old-fashioned marble-topped washing stands. She filled the jugs with clean water.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, AND CIRCULATION required by the Act of Congress of August 24, 1912, as amended by the Acts of March 3, 1933, July 2, 1946, and June 11, 1960 (74 Stat. 208)

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, published monthly at adelphia, Pennsylvania, for October 1, 1960.

The names and addresses of the publisher, editor, naging editor, and business managers are:

blisher, The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

tors, Bruce Gould and Beatrice Blackmar Gould, opewell, New Jersey.

naging Editor, None.

siness Manager, None.

The owner is: (If owned by a corporation, its me and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of stock.)

Curtis Publishing Company, ndependence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

y W. Bok, Camden, Maine

ry Louise Curtis Bok Foundation, Philadelphia, Pa.

Curtis Bok, Cary W. Bok and Edith Evans Braun, rustees of the Locust Trust, Philadelphia, Pa.

Curtis Bok, Cary W. Bok and Edith Evans Braun, rustees of the Swastika Trust, Philadelphia, Pa.

stees U/W of Cyrus H. K. Curtis, Deceased, hiladelphia, Pa.

nds of the Curtis Institute of Music, Inc., hiladelphia, Pa.

lliam G. Welsh, New Bedford, Mass.

ry Curtis Zimbalist, Philadelphia, Pa.

he and Company,* New York, N.Y.

Cuyler & Company,* Reading, Pa.

International Utilities Corporation, New York, N.Y.

Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner and Smith,* New York, N. Y.

*Held for account of customers.

3. The known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are:

None.

4. Paragraphs 2 and 3 include, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting; also the statements in the two paragraphs show the affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner.

5. The average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the 12 months preceding the date shown above was: 6,133,046.

BRUCE GOULD, Editor.

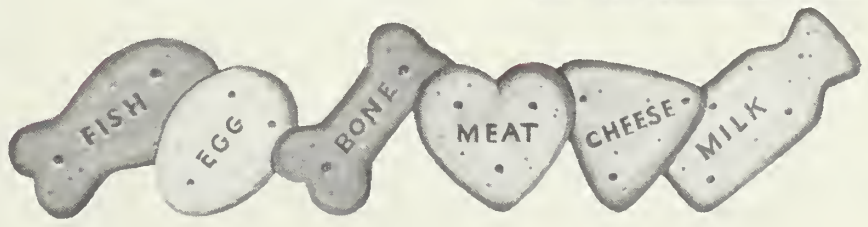
Sworn to and subscribed before me this 31st day of August, 1960.

WILLIAM C. ZIMMERMANN, Notary Public,

[SEAL] City and County of Philadelphia

(My commission expires February 3, 1961.)

CHRISTMAS COMING!



"I'd do anything for KEN-L-TREATS"

- Tuck a box of colorful Treats in his Christmas stocking!
- Treats are hard biscuits for gnawing on between meals. Excellent for teeth and gums.
- A wonderful aid in training and obedience.
- Contain all the proteins, vitamins and minerals a dog is known to need.
- Bite size! 6 delicious flavors. 6 fun-to-feed shapes.

By the makers of KEN-L-RATION
KEN-L-MEAL • KEN-L-BISKIT famous PARKER GAMES the Finest in Home Entertainment . . .

For every lucky one on your gift list . . .
for every age, taste and mood;
for family fun; for gay, informal parties, for the holiday and every day there's a famous Parker game to bring enduring pleasure and relaxation.

This Christmas, let famous Parker Games be your way to say HAPPY HOLIDAY!

RISK*
Parker Brothers Continental Game
Power is pitted against power in this contest for control of continents! $7.50

TRADE WINDS
Parker Brothers Caribbean Sea Game
Sail in search of adventure a treasure on islands, in stran ports of call! $4.

MONOPOLY*
Parker Brothers Real Estate Trading G
This world-famous, action-packed game is an ideal gift for all the family! $4., $5.

CLUE*
Parker Brothers Detective Game
For all would-be "private eyes" . . . the favorite "whodunit" game! $3.50

SORRY*
Parker Brothers Slide Pursuit Game
Fast-moving, fun-filled pursuit game keeps all the family on their toes! $3.

POLLYANNA*
Parker Brothers Track Pursuit Game
America's great family favorite. Avoid "capture", use unique "turnouts". $2.50

Parker Brothers Registered Trademark for the Game Equipment

It was late afternoon when they reached the White Room. "But I have done that," said Cecily. "It was got ready yesterday, before ——" She broke off, not trusting her voice.

The White Room by tradition belongs to the girls of the family. With its white-and-pink dotted wallpaper, white muslin curtains, flowered rugs and its low mahogany furniture, the White Room looks like a girl's bedroom in a book. No man or boy or married woman has ever slept in it. It is kept for girls and now, when Cecily and Mrs. Abel went in, they saw something that was not there when Cecily cleaned it yesterday: a vase of pink Damascus roses, twin of the ones she had put by Mrs. Quin. "She put it there," whispered Cecily.

Cecily always knows Mrs. Quin's rating of people by the flowers she gives them. She gives plenty; no visitor ever leaves China Court without a bouquet. Flowers are always put in Bella's or the Graces' rooms when any of them come to visit, "but only the ordinary kinds of roses," says Cecily, "or sweet peas, or anemones or snowdrops." Mrs. Quin is careful of her pearls.

Once, when Cecily is ill, Mrs. Quin gives her a bunch of these same roses and Cecily has known her to take them up to the churchyard for Damaris, but they were for nobody else, thought Cecily.

Now, for a moment, she stayed looking at them. Then she pushed Mrs. Abel out and closed the door. The room seemed suddenly private. I can put a Grace and her Tom into the night nursery, she said. Or they can split up and go into the Porch Room and the Yellow, but I don't think they should come in here. Especially not Bella, she added. No. I won't let Bella and her questions in here.

It was late when Peter came from the farm, down through its field to the river, across the bridge and up the valley path. He had been threshing since dawn—and two men short on the thresher. It was booked to go on to Glentyre so that Penbarrow had had to finish in one day. Peter's clothes smelled of oil and dust. There was chaff in his hair and down his neck. The throbbing noise of the thresher and the worry of its cost seemed locked into his head. He ached with tiredness and such sadness as he had never known for his old friend, Mrs. Quin.

"I have no father and mother now, thank you," says Peter when he first meets Mrs. Quin again and she talks of Lord and Lady St. Omer. "No relations, thank you, no friends," but he and Mrs. Quin grow steadily through all the stages until it is almost "mother and another son," says Mrs. Quin.

Peter comes up the drive one summer day to try and buy the famille rose. "I used to come here and see you sometimes when we lived at Tremellen," he says.

"I remember," says Mrs. Quin.

"And sometimes when you didn't see me," says Peter. "I was poaching." He has a smile that he has been told is charming. It does not charm Mrs. Quin.

"I remember that too," she says. "You tried to sell me a salmon out of your own father's river, you and that old rogue, Jim Nest. How did you get caught up with him?"

"I liked him better than my father."

"So did I," says Mrs. Quin. "And now you want to poach my china."

"Yes." Peter tries to be unabashed, but he does not say it with zest. "I thought you had some pretty nice things," he says. "And I'm down here poaching. I hoped the natives might not know the values."

"Including this native," says Mrs. Quin. "We're Cornish. If anyone is done, it won't be us."

"I'm Cornish too," says Peter.

"Then what are you thinking of?"

"It is no use thinking," says Peter severely.

Mrs. Quin is normally not much interested in people and it is only the severity that makes her look at this young man with more attention. Peter's face is more than thin, it is haggard; surely young people ought not to be haggard? She can see no reason for it. There is no depression now, no war. His fingers are yellow from cigarettes, his skin yellow, too, but yellow white, and his breath smells of drink. His clothes are worn thin, even frayed—she glances at his cuffs. "When you used to come here, you were going to be a farmer. Why weren't you?" she demands.

At once there is another look in his eyes. Then it is promptly throttled and his voice is as carefully light as before as he says, "Why wasn't I? Laziness? All my tribe are in London, haunting the more dubious professions. We are broke, you see. Really broke, even our consciences and our guts."

"I'm sorry," says Mrs. Quin.

"Don't be. It's quite peaceful; more, it's miraculous. What do we do for a living?" his voice mocks. "Almost nothing, yet we still live."

"Nonsense," says Mrs. Quin.

"There wasn't any money for training," he says quietly. "None of us has any brains. And we were brought up to be useless. The old man is wise in his ugly fashion. He has quarreled with us all so that he is quite justified in keeping what he has for himself." Then Peter says, as if in spite of himself, "I did farm a bit, at Tremellen, on the home farm, but father wouldn't let me keep it to try. Probably he couldn't let me. We were thick in mortgages fallen due, like a melodrama. I had to let it go."

"You could have tried somewhere else."

"Where?" asks Peter. "We left a nice little trail behind us: bills not paid, repairs not done, cottages falling to pieces, cases against us. Ask your Walter. He will tell you, and he's always right. No one in their senses would trust one of us with a dog kennel, let alone a farm."

"No one in their senses," agrees Mrs. Quin and she offers him Penbarrow.

"That scallywag and Penbarrow!" says Walter when he hears what she has done.

"Why not?" asks Mrs. Quin.

"Quite apart from being a St. Omer ——"

"He has quarreled with them," says Mrs. Quin serenely.

"There you are. It makes it even more unsuitable. A St. Omer; and he was trying to swindle antiques ——"

"He was never successful," says Mrs. Quin. "His heart wasn't in it."

"Trying to swindle," says Walter firmly, and "I'm quite sure he knows nothing at all about farming."

It must be said that Walter has cause for alarm. It did not seem likely that any young man, notoriously lazy and irresponsible, could take over a run-down farm and make it pay.

"Well, I didn't believe it either," said Peter. "It hasn't paid yet, but it will," and, "How could you die?" he wanted to cry now to Mrs. Quin. It seemed to him unpardonable. "I was going to surprise you," said Peter. He had harvested his real crop, built his first hayricks, and at long last started his herd. Tonight or tomorrow his first calf would be born, and he had planned to give it to Mrs. Quin.

He looked across the garden to the house. He could see starshine faint on the roof, catch a murmur of life from Cecily's guinea fowls in the tree in the kitchen garden where they roosted at night; but it was only the ghost of a murmur, the dark windows of the house gave their own message.

China Court will be sold, thought Peter. He could not imagine Bella or Walter living there, nor their echoes, the three Graces with their Tom, Dick and Harrys. There would be a sale; strangers would flood in as they had at Tremellen, to handle and pick over, assess furniture, pictures and china; it would all go: the private things, the flowers, even the cat. Then the house would be sold, though who would buy it he did not know. With a shock, he saw what he had not realized until this moment: he was finished too. With the house, the farm would be sold. Bella and Walter would certainly not have him as a tenant. The knell that had rung for Mrs. Quin had rung for them all.

It was then that he saw the lamp. He had not noticed it before, it was so small. Small but steady. It shone in one of the upper rooms—and for a moment Peter's heart leaped with shock—in Mrs. Quin's room. Then he knew the reason: someone was watching.

I never thought of watching, thought Peter. If he had, it would have seemed to him something remote from himself, old-fashioned, superstitious. But now he knew it was like China Court itself, fitting and faithful.

He wondered if he should go in, take turn. It was, of course, Cecily who watched, but he remembered he was not free. There was, after all, another kind of watching, of keeping faith. That calf might be born tonight. Her calf, thought Peter.

For a moment he stayed. Then, absurdly heartened—absurdly because nothing was changed—he swung back down the path.

Cecily had fallen asleep. She had meant to watch, but the constant stream of people, the baking and getting the rooms ready had made her more tired than she knew. And Mrs. Quin would want me to sleep if I was tired. Toward dawn she had grown cold and crept out and fetched a blanket to put over her knees and feet. She put one over Mrs. Quin too. Silly or not, I felt I had to, said Cecily. I can take it off before they see it.

"You are not afraid to stay alone?" Mrs. Abel had asked, but no more than Mrs. Quin was Cecily alone.

The Quins have always been good faithful employers and they have good faithful servants—almost always; it could have been said, "There was Ann Sly."

Ann Sly is second housemaid in Lady Patrick's time. Lady Patrick quite genuinely does not notice servants: for her they are part of the necessary furniture of a house. She would be surprised to know that they have feelings and if she wants a handkerchief or a glass of water in the middle of the night, she rings, but as Ann Sly goes about her work, curiously Lady Patrick has to look at her, and Ann Sly looks back, her black eyes hard and bold as marbles.

Ann Sly is well named, but faithfulness is more usual. Polly, for instance, comes as nursemaid to Mary and Eliza, and stays until she is nearly ninety. She is not Cornish, but no one remembers where she came from nor if she has a family of her own because she seems part of the Quins. And not one of them knows, least of all Polly, how much they love and depend on her; all the Brood: Mary, Eliza, Anne, Little Eustace—until he dies—McLeod the Second, Jared and Damaris. Borowis and John Henry love Polly, too, but she is not such a power with them.

"And how I dreaded her," says Mrs. Quin. She dreads McCann, too, when McCann comes to look after Stace.

Among the servants there is, too, the elegant parlormaid, Pringle, who first forbids Ripsie the house, Pringle and after her Paget. There is Hester, the upper housemaid, unfairly dismissed, and the little Alice, Tracy's nursemaid, not very much older than Tracy herself. Many village girls and boys take service at China Court. "We had knife boys then," says Cecily, "and stable boys and laundrymaids. We used to be seven in the house and two men and a boy outside."

When Cecily first comes, at fourteen, she has to be downstairs before six to light the fire for the morning baths. On Wednesdays she has to black-lead the big range, polishing the steel, and every day, when she has carried in the coals, she goes down on her hands and knees and scrubs the stones round it. "Lily white, they had to be," says Cecily often, telling of this. There had been no young kitchenmaid to do that for years and yet the stones still showed whiter than the rest.

Now Cecily slept and nothing stirred. No windows were open, except Mrs. Quin's; the front and back doors were locked. Moses, the cat, slept in the kitchen armchair. Cecily had prevailed on Groundsel to take August home for the night. "He's driving me mad with his panics," she said.

It was Moses who lifted his head when he heard the sound of a car, then the steps on the drive. The steps were so light that they did not wake Cecily. They came up to the front door and there was the sound of a key put in the lock and turned, though slowly as if it were not accustomed to being used.

Now the new light steps ceased, as if somebody stood in the hall and listened. There was a long pause, then lightly they ran up the stairs, crossed the landing, and knocked at Mrs. Quin's door.

That soft knock woke Cecily. Half asleep, she mumbled, "Come in." Then, like a dog on guard, in a flash she was wide awake. There is no one in the house. No one! Cecily remembered. No one could get in. No one had the key.

HELP!

By JANET HENRY

My modern "conveniences" have me dismayed,
And many times quite close to panic.
I'm saying good-by to my once-a-week maid
And hiring a full-time mechanic.

Her legs were suddenly cold, and her hands cold, too, as they gripped the chair. Her hair felt as if it crept on her scalp.

The soft knock came again, but Cecily's throat was dry and she could not speak. The handle turned and, slowly, the door opened.

There was another pause. Then startled young eyes met hers. They looked and Cecily half rose from her chair. "So that was who — –" began Cecily. "So that —— It is, it is, isn't it?" She was still not certain. Then, "It is," more positively, and "Tracy!" cried Cecily. "Tracy!"

Peter brought up the milk. He was still swollen-eyed and lightheaded with tiredness and want of sleep but he had bathed, shaved and put on clean clothes. "I want to pay my respects," he might have said. "My very profound respects." On top of the milk can was a bunch of clover. He had picked it because the cow, Clover, had calved in the night. Night! Two o'clock this morning, thought Peter. Though he could not help feeling happiness and relief about the calf, in his heart was the same unbearable ache of loneliness.

As he and Mrs. Quin had hoped, it was a heifer calf. There would be seven in the herd now. That was not all; the threshing yesterday had yielded an average of one and a half tons of wheat for every acre. "Not bad," said Peter. He would have to sell his wheat, as he had no room to store, but he would keep the straw. Yesterday at this time there was only promise; today this augmentation. I must be more than two hundred pounds richer, thought Peter, and again it was not only that: the corn and the calf were proof of his work and planning. And I was quite wise, thought Peter, surprised—the planning and the work of every day.

In spite of his sadness, of knowing what must happen, those two words "every day" seemed that morning to Peter the most beautiful in the world—heartlessly beautiful when he thought that, for Mrs. Quin, these were not every days but the last. Tomorrow, or the next day perhaps, they will bury her, thought Peter. He could not believe it. The marigolds along the kitchen-garden path brushed dew on his gaiters. The sun shone on the dew, drawing out sparkle, throwing long shadows; he had never seen the garden look more alive. Heartlessly alive, thought Peter. It should have been gray, shrouded for this last day. That was written now in capitals in his mind: "Last Day." But smoke was going up from one of the chimneys; the kitchen fire was lit. It was like a calm message from the house; last days, too, are every day, said the message.

Anyone walking up from the China Court kitchen garden to the house in high summer must come upon the sweet peas behind the low wall, a thick hedge of them: whites and creams, limpid pinks and mauves, queer hot-looking purples, magenta with white threads, salmon pink, deep-smelling wine. It is Mrs. Quin's habit to pick them in the evening when it is cool, and every night in August a bunch sits in a pail on the path to catch the dew.

Now Peter stopped bewildered; the pail was in front of him. But . . . they have been picked, he thought.

He smelled them, going down on one knee. Then he brushed the dust from his breeches and went to the house and round to the kitchen, treading on the grass so as not to disturb the quiet, then stopped short in the doorway.

"If he had seen me at any other time he would never have liked me," said Tracy afterward. "He wouldn't have let himself like me." And it was true that he would not have spoken to her if he had seen her as she had first appeared to Cecily that morning. In her traveling suit and matching coat she would have been like any of the girls in the world he had run away from—St. Omerland he called it now—and instinctively he would have run away from her too. But she had tied one of Cecily's aprons round herself and was getting breakfast—"Helping Cecily," as she would have said twelve years before. She was standing at the table slicing bread, too absorbed to see him. Behind her the range was well alight, making the gentle rushing sound of a fire drawing well up the chimney. There was a smell of breakfast, and Peter felt almost faint, remembering the mug of coffee, half warmed and full of grits, that he had snatched before milking. The smell that assailed him now was of coffee, fresh and hot, of milk simmering, of bacon and fresh toast, of warmed china. "It wasn't fair," said Peter afterward.

To Bella, China Court's kitchen has no charm at all, it is simply old-fashioned, muddled and deplorably cumbersome. The Eagle range has an array of plates, a spit and two vast ovens, the second used for warming china and drying kindling. Cuckoo, the little cat, always tries to have her kittens there.

The dresser is on the same scale and holds sizes of dolphin-handled dish covers, copper molds, japanned trays and china, while its drawers are always bursting with mysterious odds and ends, and there is an untidy pile of recipe books on its bottom shelf. The table is scrubbed white and has a coffee grinder fixed to one end. The floor is stone-flagged with a rag rug on the hearth and there are always plants on the window sills, geraniums now.

Altogether it is a warm, comfortable, spice-smelling place and to Peter it seemed to emphasize his emptiness and loneliness. He watched almost yearningly as Tracy put the fresh-cut bread ready for more toast and turned the bacon. Who is she? wondered Peter. Someone I don't know from the village? A friend of one of the younger Quins? But then she went to the dresser, opened a drawer and took out a tablecloth—as if she belongs here, thought Peter.

She must have sensed that somebody was there and thought it was Cecily because she said, over her shoulder, "Shall we have breakfast here in the kitchen?" Before Peter had time to think, "Please," he had said. "Yes, please," and Tracy jumped and turned around.

Always, afterward, she remembered that first glimpse of a young man gazing at her with such warm approval that it warmed her too. He was smiling at her, but as she smiled back the gaze was abruptly withdrawn. "I beg your pardon," he said stiffly. "Of course you were not speaking to me."

From the village! This unknown girl was looking at him with eyes that were completely familiar, the unmistakable gray-green eyes that were Mrs. Quin's but looking at him now from a girl's face. Young and wan as if it were tired—and shocked, thought Peter—dark-shadowed under the eyes and streaked with tearstains. The village! This girl was a Quin.

It was uncommon for Tracy to smile at strangers, however approving, but she was in a state of shock, a turmoil of unhappiness for Mrs. Quin, and happiness because nothing could gainsay the fact that she was back at China Court. Altogether she, like Cecily, was quite out of herself. She had forgotten to put on the polite defensive mask she usually clamped over her too childish face and now she smiled warmly at Peter. "Are you the milk?" she asked.

He did not look like a milkman, this tall young man in the shabby whipcord breeches and checked shirt. He was looking at her as if he were displeased and he said stiffly, even accusingly, "It was you who picked the sweet peas."

Tracy would normally have been routed at once, but when one defensive person meets another they recognize each other, like prisoners, thought Tracy. Peter's defensiveness only calmed her, so she answered, "Yes, I picked them. I used to do that with Gran, and Cecily wanted them."

If I had stayed in St. Omerland, Peter was thinking, I should have met girls like this on equal terms. It doesn't matter how rotten you are, he thought savagely, if you have the trimmings. What trimmings had he? A few cows and stock, a crop of wheat, some silver cups and books in a tumble-down farmhouse that isn't even mine. I had better go, he thought, and put the can on the table. "Yes, I'm the milk," he said abruptly.

"But you must have a name?" Tracy was still calm.

"Peter St. Omer."

"St. O—— There was a Lord St. Omer here. I remember him. Then are you ——"

"I'm the farmer at Penbarrow."

"But it was Mr. ——" She broke off. "Of course, that was twelve years ago." She lifted her eyes to look at him again. "I'm Tracy Quin," she said.

"Tracy? The Tracy?" asked Peter, interested in spite of himself. "But you were a little girl."

"I was twelve years ago," said Tracy sadly and she cried, "Oh! How could I have stayed away so long?"

"You seem to have managed it for twelve years." Peter was cold again, but she did not appear to notice.

"I let them keep me, let them order me about," she said, more to herself than to him. "I don't think it occurred to me that I could order myself. And all this time I was quite close, in Rome. Why, I have been there nearly two years." Her eyes were filling with tears, but Peter refused to sympathize.

"You must speak Italian very nicely," he said coldly.

"No. I'm not good at talking to people. I think altogether I was wasting my time. Then Gran wrote to me, but to America. They sent the letter on, too late." She stopped, looking down at the table, trying to hold back her tears. "Oh! I came as fast as I could," cried Tracy. "I thought I would surprise her. I came straight from London. I had to stay the night in Exeter, but I didn't leave the station and caught the first train." The words tumbled out pell-mell. "It was a funny little milk train to Camelford and the stationmaster there woke up a taximan."

"There's a perfectly good night train from Paddington that puts you out at Liskeard." Why was he so unsympathetic and terse? But Tracy was often terse herself and once again it had the effect of making her calm. She was able to lift her head and look at him squarely. She had not seen coloring like his before and the red hair, skin brown as a Mexican's, made her feel like a wraith in her paleness. His eyes were brown too. Not easy eyes and not friendly. "Please tell Cecily," he said, "I brought three pints extra for the Hoard."

"The Hoard?"

"I'm sorry. That was rude of me. It's my name for Mrs. Scrymgeour, Bella, and the others, your uncles and aunts."

"You know them?"

"I know them." He said no more than that but his briefness told Tracy what he did not say. "Tell me about them," she wanted to say, but she could hardly ask questions about her own relatives from someone so obviously hostile. Instead she put out her hand and touched the bunch of clover on the can. "You brought these for Gran?"

The edge went out of his voice—and out of his face—as he said, "The cow she gave me, Clover, had a calf last night."

"A calf?" Tracy sounded as pleased and interested as Mrs. Quin herself would have been.

"It's our first," Peter volunteered. He had to tell somebody.

"But you have other cows as well?"

"We had Clover, Buttercup and Daisy, Poppy, Pimpernel, Parsley, the beginnings of a real Jersey herd," said Peter. Then the edge came back abruptly. "But that's no use now."

"Why is it no use?"

"Because"—Peter said it as lightly as he could—"tomorrow or the next day, as soon as they read the will, my farm will probably belong to your Aunt Bella."

"To Aunt Bella?" Tracy looked startled. "And China Court? The house?" she asked.

"The house, too, I expect."

"What will she do with it?"

"Sell it, I suppose. If she can."

"Sell it. But she can't!"

"She can and she will. Bella and Walter or one of the others," said Peter. "It makes no difference. It will be sold, broken up. I'm sorry," he said as he saw the tears really spill over now. "I'm sorry, but it will."

"Gran wouldn't have let them," Tracy whispered because she could not trust herself to speak. She bent her head so that the sides of her hair swung forward and he could not see her face, but a sob shook her, then another. Peter did not go away at once as ten minutes ago he would have done; instead he felt an answering uncomfortable tightening in his throat and, Thank God Cecily came in then, thought Peter.

Cecily came in and looked at them, but all she said was, "Peter, you had better have some breakfast," and "Tracy! Are you letting that bacon burn?"

(To Be Continued)

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 62, 63, 64 AND 65

Holiday Debuts

Vogue Design No. 4140. One-piece dress jacket and stole; 10–16 (31–36); $1.50. Version shown requires 4¼ yards of 50″ fabric with nap and 1⅛ yards of 3″ fur banding, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 4170. One-piece dress, bolero and petticoat; Misses 10–16 (31–36) and Junior Miss 9–15 (30½–35); $1.50. Satin version requires 4⅛ yards of 50″ fabric with nap for dress and 1¼ yards of 35″ lace with one scalloped edge for bodice veiling. Point d'esprit version requires 10½ yards of 66″ fabric without nap (skirt cut crosswise) and 3½ yards of 1″ ribbon. All measurements for size 14.

Vogue Design No. 4183. One-piece dress; Misses 10–16 (31–36) and Junior Miss 11–13 (31½–33); $1.50. Version shown requires 4¼ yards of 50″ fabric with nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 4175. One-piece dress; Misses 10–18 (31–38) and Junior Miss 9–15 (30½–35); $1.50. Version shown requires 3⅞ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 4181. One-piece dress and cummerbund; Misses 10–16 (31–36) and Junior Miss 9–11 (30½–31½); $1.50. Version shown requires 2⅞ yards of 50″ fabric with nap for skirt and ¾ yard of 35″ lace without nap for bodice, and 1 yard of 39″ fabric with or without nap for cummerbund, size 14.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spodino Ave., Toronto, Ont. Same prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Calif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered.

Fruit Bonanza Salad...you give it special sparkle with bright, flavorful Del Monte Fruit Cocktail

When grown-ups get together, they'll enjoy this salad as much as children like DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail plain.

DEL MONTE is the fruit cocktail that always behaves itself beautifully, whether you serve it to guests or family – just as it comes from the can or with an added touch of your own.

Because in this fruit cocktail, the work's done as carefully as you'd do it yourself. You're sure of bright colors, neat cuts and a perfect flavor balance of 5 juicy fruits.

And since you always know what you're getting when you buy DEL MONTE Brand Fruit Cocktail, why not get it always?

FRUIT BONANZA SALAD (Serves 6)

1 No. 2½ can (1 lb. 14 oz.) DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail
1 pkg. (3 oz.) lime-flavored gelatin
2½ to 3 tablespoons lemon juice
½ cup mayonnaise
2 to 4 tablespoons blue cheese
Salt
6 small or 3 large bananas
Salad greens

Drain DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail, saving syrup. Heat 1 cup of this syrup to boiling; pour over gelatin. Stir till dissolved. Add another ½ cup syrup and 1½ tablespoons of the lemon juice. Cool till mixture is syrupy. Blend ½ cup mayonnaise with cheese and blend gelatin mixture gradually into cheese mixture. Beat well. Pour into 6 small (⅓-cup) molds or fill ½-cup molds ⅔ full. Chill till set. Pour the rest of the lemon juice over the drained fruit cocktail; salt lightly; chill. At serving time, peel the bananas and split lengthwise. (Large bananas should be cut in half crosswise also.) Drain lemon juice from fruit cocktail over bananas, coating well. Arrange 2 banana pieces per serving on salad greens with a gelatin mold and fruit cocktail. Serve cold.

Del Monte® Fruit Cocktail

THE LIGHTING OF THE CANDLES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

g's and y's with tails like sea serpents, and this had covered quite a lot of the page. He lay back in his chair and looked at the ceiling. A bunch of herbs dangled from an old oak beam within a few inches of his nose and he sniffed appreciatively. Sage. Thyme. Gideon was at this very moment preparing the goose out at the back. His mouth watered. "God have mercy upon me a sinner," he groaned, "for I have too much respect unto my stomach." He leaned forward again and wrote, "Good people, once more we are assembled here upon this feast of Christmas ——"

Now why, Parson Frodsham asked himself, dropping his pen as though it were an adder, did he leave the writing of his sermon until Christmas Eve? And why did he listen to this troublesome conscience of his, insisting that the Christmas, Easter and Whitsun sermons must be written by himself? Upon every other preaching occasion he merely grabbed a tattered book of other men's sermons and preached whatever came to hand. It saved him hours of anguish and sent his tired congregation off to sleep just as well as his own efforts. But somehow on the great festivals he felt that God was asking of him his poor best. His best got worse and worse as the years went on what with his being so fat and old, and so increasingly choleric in temper, and feeling the cold more than he had, but he did try to give it at least on the big days, the great days of God's glory. "—— to adore the Babe of Bethlehem," he wrote, "and receive into our hearts His peace."

Now that was a fine phrase. He'd expressed that very well. He was so pleased with himself that he put his pen down again and rubbed his hands together. After all, he thought, he ought to be able to write good sermons, for he was a literary-minded man. He read a great deal. There were so many piles of books on his study floor that it looked like a forest clearing full of tree stumps, with upon every stump a dirty cup and saucer, mementos of the tea drinking of many days past, the whole covered with a fine coating of dust and cobwebs. Parson Frodsham was a bachelor and his only servant was Gideon the mole catcher, for if there was one thing he hated more than writing sermons it was women. Gideon did not believe in disturbing dust and Parson Frodsham always knew where to find everything. Moleskins were nailed out flat against the beautiful paneling of the room, for Parson Frodsham was as fascinated by the art of mole catching as Gideon was. The two old men were very happy together.

"Good people, let us now consider the angels," wrote Parson Frodsham; not that he wanted to consider them particularly, but he had to say something, and Gaysbarton was named after Gabriel. The angels. What could he say about angels? Their song, now. Where was it? He peered through his spectacles at the torn page of his old Bible and pinned the verse down with a horny forefinger. "Glory to God in the highest, and peace on earth, good will toward men." He wrote it down and his pen, without his volition, made a spluttering but forceful line under the last word. He looked at it, finding himself entirely in agreement with the angels. Drat that woman! Drat the Widow Gascoigne! Gascoigne! What a name! And she liked to be called Madame, Madame Étienne Gascoigne, just because she, a Devonshire woman born and bred and christened Jane Cob in this very church, had married a heathen papist as her second husband. More shame to her! If it was true, as the village said, that her second marriage to please herself had been even more disastrous than her first marriage to please her father, he could only feel it was a judgment on her. Quarrelsome busybody! He was quarrelsome himself, always falling out with somebody, and then asking God to forgive him, but he never asked to be forgiven for quarreling with the Widow Gascoigne, for his war with her was a holy war

Every Christmas she insisted on bringing the Joneys into church and every Christmas he told her to remove them, and every Christmas she quietly refused and, her will being stronger than his, every Christmas she won the battle. But this year, Parson Frodsham told himself, she would not win. Roaring softly beneath his breath, he moved his table and chair, himself and his sermon nearer to the window, watching the village green that lay between the Widow Gascoigne's house and the church, so as to pounce on her and bar her passage as she and her sour-faced maid came along with the Joneys. In other years she had always got them into position inside the church without his knowing, and that had increased his difficulties.

Eighty years ago the Widow Gascoigne's grandfather had been appointed the parson of Gaysbarton. He had been a Caroline High-

NO TIME OF YEAR FOR TB. Is there ever a right time? Of course not. But Christmas, more than any other season, should be a time of glowing good spirits, health and happiness. In the fight against TB, it can at least be a time of hope—when millions of Americans help by using Christmas Seals. Answer your Christmas Seal letter today.

churchman and an expert wood carver and he had made figures of Joseph and Mary and the Child, Gabriel and the shepherds, and had put them in the church every Christmas to delight the children, who called them the Joneys, a Devonshire word for any sort of little image. Thirty years later his son, also a High-churchman, had succeeded him and remained at Gaysbarton for forty years, dying there as his father had done, and during all that time the Joneys had come into church every year and had become a part of village tradition. Even during the years of the Commonwealth they had come in, for the village was so remote among its wild hills that authority took little note of what they did in such a tiny place. Ten years ago Parson Frodsham had himself come to Gaysbarton, preceded by a mere two months by Madame Gascoigne, coming home in her widowhood to the place where she had been born, and determined that all things should be carried on at Gaysbarton as they had been in her father's and grandfather's days. Parson Frodsham had determined differently, for he was a Low-churchman, as Low as he could be without falling out at the bottom. The village was indifferent to churchmanship, High or Low, but liked the Joneys. There had been war between Madame Gascoigne and Parson Frodsham from the first.

The old man surveyed the village green, empty at present. It was twelve o'clock of a frosty morning. There had been a light fall of snow during the night, and it sparkled in the sun. Parson Frodsham was not an aesthetically minded man but he did think it all looked very pretty.

A group of small children came running from the direction of the church, rosy-cheeked and merry, and Parson Frodsham smiled benevolently as he watched them. Then clear high voices reached him through the closed but ill-fitting window: "The Joneys have come to church! The Joneys have come!"

He leaped to his feet, just remembered to clap his wig on his head but did not stop to put his cloak on. Gathering his cassock up in both hands, he shot across the green in kangaroo leaps and bounds, for it was just possible that the widow and her maid might still be in the church and he would catch them there. They must have taken the Joneys into church while he was absorbed in a late breakfast.

He was under the lich gate in two strides and across the churchyard in six. He fumbled feebly at the latch of the west door, staggered into the church and collapsed in a pew, so winded that there was no more strength left in him. The church was empty; the widow had gone home long ago. But within a small disused chapel to the right of the chancel he could see the straw-filled manger, and the figures of Mary and Joseph, Gabriel and the shepherds. Behind them, on the small stone altar, the widow had placed a pot of holly and two candles. Every Christmas Day she lit these candles and every Christmas Day Parson Frodsham blew them out again. He looked at the Joneys miserably. It was difficult to take them out when they were arranged there with such loving care, but this year he must do it. The old parson sighed deeply.

Then there slowly came to him the conviction that he had been wrong in thinking he was alone in this church. There was another human presence here. Yet he could see no one; only the Joneys with the soft sea-green light streaming through the south window to illumine their blue and red and green, and Gabriel's golden wings. What was that? Parson Frodsham's heart gave a great lurch, for he saw a minute hand waving above the edge of the manger. He stared, but there was nothing. Of course there was nothing. There it was again, waving to him. He passed his great hand across his eyes and groaned. The tricks that indigestion could play on a man! It was not there when he looked again. Of course not. Yes, it was. Motionless now, blessing him. Not blessing him? Yes, blessing him. Stuff and nonsense. Gone now. There was nothing to be seen any more, but a thin angry wailing filled the church.

Parson Frodsham heaved himself to his feet, staggered up the aisle to the little chapel, and stumbled to his knees before the manger. In it, instead of the usual beautiful bambino, pink-cheeked and blue-eyed, with golden curls and a seraphic expression, was an extremely ugly baby, its purple face creased up in fury, its fists flailing, bald as an egg, and wrapped up in an old shawl. Parson Frodsham passed through a moment of sheer terror and then he poked it, and found it damp. This, he knew, was invariably the case with babies, and was the chief cause of his objection to them. When he baptized a baby he clutched it, signed it, bawled its name over its head and handed it hastily back to its mother. He was not a baby-minded man. Nevertheless, this one was very new, and if left in the cold church in its damp state would soon freeze into a solid icicle. Murmuring a prayer for strength, he picked it up. Then holding it in the crook of one arm, he bent and looked under the manger. There, lying on the cold stone, was the real bambino. He picked that up, too, and put it back in its nest. Then he carried the baby out of the church.

Carrying it through the churchyard, he wondered what on earth he was to do next; but once he reached the village green, the matter was settled for him, for the baby set up a terrific wailing and instantly a window in every cottage surrounding the green was flung wide, including the parlor window of Madame Gascoigne's neat little house, and a female head shot out like a jack-in-the-box. "A baby has been abandoned in the church," he said, and stalked on with great hauteur toward the parsonage, every able-bodied woman in the village at his heels. In his study they steered expertly in and out between the piles of books on the floor, their skirts bunched close to them that they might not upset the cups and saucers. The excitement was intense, for not only was there the baby, but every woman present had for years been longing to get inside the parsonage and get her hands on its disorder, and those who could not get near the baby were even now piling the dirty cups and saucers on top of one another and carrying them out into the kitchen. Parson Frodsham's head went round, he swayed, and the baby was gently taken from him. "I will take care of this child," said a firm, cool voice. "Sit down, Mr. Frodsham. Maria Larkin, get his reverence a glass of brandy. Doubtless you will find it in the cupboard in the dining parlor."

In a moment the glass was in his hands. He flung his head back, tipped it over his nose and gulped once. The woman had put precious little in the glass, but it was enough to restore him to some semblance of his former self, and he was able to get the Widow Gascoigne into focus. She was a woman of perhaps forty-five or so, a pretty woman, small and neat, but the brilliance of her dark eyes and the line of her jaw showed great strength of character. She was dressed in a plain gray gown with a spotless white muslin fichu and a large white mob cap. Under the cap the wings of her dark hair were becomingly touched with gray at the temples. The baby was in her arms. "I will take charge of this child," she repeated.

There was an ominous murmur, and Parson Frodsham understood that every woman in the room considered the baby to be hers by right. He heaved himself to his feet, waved his hand for silence and said, "Madame Gascoigne, as granddaughter and daughter of former pastors of this place, has charge of this baby. It is her right."

Before he could withdraw his hand it was seized. He looked down and saw that a minute fist had closed about his forefinger with a grip of iron. The baby had opened its eyes and it appeared to Parson Frodsham that they looked straight into his, and the grip tightened as though in the fellowship of profound dismay. Was this life? All these women surging about a man? Men must hold together or be lost.

"He's a fine boy," said Parson Frodsham hoarsely.

"I believe him to be a girl," said the Widow Gascoigne tartly.

"A boy," said Parson Frodsham with conviction, and then, strengthened by the friendly sympathy of that grip, he raised his voice and said, "Ladies, now that this matter is settled I should be grateful if the use of my study might be restored to me. I have my sermon to write. Good morning to ye."

Gideon, who had been skulking in the larder until the tyranny should be overpast, shut the front door on the last rustling petticoat. It was now found to be dinnertime. Parson Frodsham took a very long time over his dinner, so exhausted was he and so sadly in need of nourishment. Then, to get himself into the right frame of mind for tackling his sermon again, he helped Gideon skin some moles. When that was over a fiery sunset was burning itself out into a luminous green twilight. But Parson Frodsham did not at once turn to his sermon because an insistent question had been slowly rising to the surface of his mind. Where was the mother of this child? Deep down in him, overlaid by age and fat and weariness, but in him, there was a true priest. He would, in the last resort, have given his life to save a soul. The child's mother might be a hardened and wicked woman, or she might be a weak and giddy young girl, but in either case she was a soul in danger, and where was she?

Parson Frodsham ate a couple of slices of plumcake to give him strength and said, "Gideon, I'm going out." Then he put on his cloak, lit his lantern and walked slowly and heavily down to the church. The moon was rising and a few stars were showing. Presently they would be brilliant in the clear frosty air, just as they should be on Christmas Eve. He went into the church and sat down, his large

CONTINUED ON PAGE 98

Buy this holiday baking pair...

get golden Butterscotch Morsels

FREE!

IDERFUL HOLIDAY HELPER — 18-inch wide Heavy-Duty Alcoa Wrap is a wide, extra strong to cover every job in the house. Wraps baked gifts ave freshness. lines cookie sheets to save scouring, roasts your turkey, zes dinners, helps in hundreds of ways.

OA WRAP BONUS! Free gummed labels for freezer foods in every box of nch-wide Heavy-Duty Alcoa Wrap. Also in thrifty 12-inch width.

TLÉ'S MAKES THE VERY BEST CHOCOLATE. The holidays are sweeter when treat with Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels. Nestle's means real cious flavor — your favorites and these idea-packed new recipes.

HERE'S HOW TO GET COUPON FOR FREE BUTTERSCOTCH FLAVORED MORSELS:

Simply buy a box of 18-inch-wide Heavy-Duty Alcoa Wrap aluminum foil, and a package of Nestlé's Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels. Send Nestlé's label and Better Packaging label from top flap of Alcoa Wrap box to: Nestlé's Offer, P.O. Box 15E, Mt. Vernon 10, N. Y. Coupon for a free package of Nestlé's Butterscotch Morsels will be mailed to you right away. Offer expires June 30, 1961.

Copyright 1960 The Nestlé Company, Inc.

ET HEAVY DUTY ALCOA® WRAP AND NESTLÉ'S® MORSELS TODAY!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 88

hands spread out on his knees, his lantern set on the stone floor near him. Its light glowed softly on the glorious carved pew ends, and there was a faint glimmer of moony light in the windows, but the rest of the great church was lost in deep shadow. Parson Frodsham could hardly be called a prayer-minded man, but whenever he was in a dilemma he came and sat in the church like this, his hands spread on his knees, and then his muddled mind began to clear. Now what, he asked himself after a while, had been the thoughts of this poor woman? Could he think of a similar case? He racked his brains but could only think of Moses in his rush basket. What had a woman done then? Hidden herself and watched, he remembered, until she saw the child taken to safety. In that case, he thought, the woman would have gone away after she had seen him rescue the child. Or would she wait until it was dark?

Parson Frodsham picked up his lantern and began a thorough search, unaware that the noise he was making falling over the hassocks was more than enough to warn any stowaway of his purpose. He looked under the seats and behind the altar. He looked in the pulpit and behind the brooms in the corner, but there was no one there. He was just about to go away again when he bethought him of the little vestry. The door was shut, but he pushed it open and went in. It was a small place, furnished with a cupboard, a table and a chair. The chair was a large one, for it was one of his own brought down from the parsonage. Curled up in it was a child asleep. She had kicked off her shoes and they lay on the floor. Her hood had fallen back from her head and her dark hair lay on her shoulders. He bent over her, but she was so deeply asleep that she did not stir. Long dark eyelashes lay in pools of shadow on her cheeks. Her lips were parted and the breath came evenly and sweetly between them. Her small nose had a dusting of freckles on it. But she was evidently dreadfully tired. Poor child, thought Parson Frodsham, poor child, and forgot all about the reprobate mother for whom he was looking. He set the lantern on the table, put his hand on her shoulder and shook her gently and she awoke with a cry.

"There! There!" said Parson Frodsham, patting her shoulder. "There's nought for a little maid to be afraid of."

"Thomas!" she said, for she was only half awake.

"Who's he?" asked Parson Frodsham.

"My baby," she said, and thrusting her feet out from beneath her cloak she began feeling about for her shoes.

"Your baby?" ejaculated Parson Frodsham. "A little maid like you can't have a baby."

"I'm sixteen," she said petulantly. "Where's Thomas? I can't remember where I put him."

"In the manger," said Parson Frodsham dryly, "and I think you be a naughty little maid."

She was fully awake now and she began to weep. "It was because of Moses," she sobbed.

"I thought as much," said Parson Frodsham, and then he repented him that he had spoken dryly and made her cry. "There, there, child, put your shoes on. How are we to think what's to do next if you have no shoes on?"

Groaning, he bent and picked up her shoes. She held out her feet, very small feet in worsted stockings full of holes, and he put her shoes on them. They were icy cold to his touch, through the holes. It struck him, as with Thomas, that the first thing he had to do was to remove this child from the chill of the church before it froze.

"Come with me, maid," he said. "We'll get some hot milk inside you, and warm your feet at the fire, and then we'll see."

She came with him meekly enough, dragging her feet wearily as they crossed the village green, her sobs subsiding into hiccups. It was nearly dark now and no one saw them. It did not even occur to Parson Frodsham to take the girl to some woman of the parish. Instinct told him that this was something he could manage best himself. Also, he and Gideon had had more than enough of women for one day. This child was not a woman. She was so small, as she shuffled along beside him, that he could not believe she was sixteen.

In his study he sat her before the fire and yelled for Gideon who, appearing, accepted the situation with astonishing ease after the first shock. Seated before the fire, a bowl of steaming bread and milk on her lap, her stockings off and her toes curling and uncurling in the warmth, the girl began visibly to recover. Color returned to her face and a dimple to her left cheek. Watching her, Parson Frodsham could see that she was a pretty creature, and in good health probably wiry and strong. She had a brown little face, with a firm mouth, and her small hands looked capable. She finished her bread and milk down to the last drop, was given a boiled egg and an apple and finished those, more bread and milk and finished that. Then she asked who had Thomas and Parson Frodsham told her. "Will she be good to him?" she asked, and Parson Frodsham said she would. "For always?" she asked, and instead of answering Parson Frodsham produced a large pocket handkerchief and sneezed into it, for he was not sure. The Widow Gascoigne had never had a child. He remembered her precise ways, the acidity of her maid and the exquisite neatness of her house. He believed the widow's thoughts would turn to orphanages later on; especially as Thomas was not of the sex she had thought he was.

"I'll tell you about Thomas, sir," said the girl suddenly. Her hazel eyes were very direct in their glance. She was an apothecary's daughter, she said, but her father had died two years ago. Her mother had died in her babyhood and she was their only child. She had to earn her living and she had gone to be stillroom maid at a big house ten miles away. Then came the usual story of betrayal, which she told frankly and steadily, and Parson Frodsham heard with inward fury, all the more fury because he was as a rule far more sympathetic to his own sex than the other. The housekeeper at the big house had paid out of her own pocket for the girl to go to a farmhouse nearby to have Thomas, but they would not keep her there. Then she had remembered Moses, and remembered being told about the Joneys at Gaysbarton, and so here she was, and Thomas.

> These fellow mortals, every one, must be accepted as they are; you can neither straighten their noses, nor brighten their wit, nor rectify their dispositions; and it is these people, among whom your life is passed, that it is needful you should tolerate, pity and love; it is these more or less ugly, stupid, inconsistent people whose moments of goodness you should admire, for whom you should cherish all possible hope, all possible patience. GEORGE ELIOT

"And what do you mean to do now, maid?" asked Parson Frodsham.

"I don't know, sir," she said. "I thought . . . perhaps I could do like Moses' mother and be Thomas' nurse. I thought—I didn't know what to do and I went to sleep in the vestry." He saw that in spite of the firm mouth and the direct glance she was a child still. Her father had died too soon. "I do miss Thomas," she finished lamely.

"Then put your shoes and stockings on and I'll take 'ee to Madame Gascoigne," he said.

But she began to cry again. "I want to stay here," she sobbed. "I could sleep here by the fire, with Thomas. Please, sir, will you fetch Thomas? I could be your housekeeper, sir, and live here with you and Gideon and Thomas always." Parson Frodsham's heart fell. A woman in the house! She was a child now but she'd be a woman in no time at all. But there was Thomas. All day he had been feeling the grip of Thomas' hand upon his finger.

He reached for his cloak. "What's your name, child?" he asked.

"Penelope," she said.

"Stay here for tonight, then," he said, "and I'll fetch Thomas to 'ee."

The sour-faced maid was so astonished to see him on the doorstep that she ushered him straight into the parlor before she realized what she was doing. Madame Gascoigne was seated in front of the fire, but she was not looking her usual composed and immaculate self. Her cap was awry and her face flushed. She looked very tired. On her lap was Thomas, shrieking.

"Marm, he'll do himself an injury!" said Parson Frodsham in consternation. "What's the matter with him?"

Madame Gascoigne looked up at him, and she was near tears. "You see," she faltered, "this is a small village and just now there is no one——" Being a bachelor, he failed to follow the drift of her thought, and she had to come out with it. "We want a wet nurse," she said.

"Ah!" said Parson Frodsham, enlightened. "But I thought, in such circumstances, cow's milk could be used?"

"Yes," she said. "Diluted with warm water, and a little sugar. But he won't have it. He is a very obstinate and naughty baby. And he is a boy. I was so sure he was a girl."

"Don't you like boys, marm?"

Into her tired eyes came a glimmer of the old fire. "After all I have suffered from two bad husbands I cannot endure your sex," she said low and bitterly.

Somehow Parson Frodsham had never liked her so well. He held out his arms. "Then give me the boy, marm," he said. "His mother is at the parsonage."

She handed him the yelling Thomas and broke into tears of relief.

The next morning, after he had come back from the first service of Christmas Day, Parson Frodsham, exhausted, could think of nothing but breakfast. After the edge of his hunger had been slightly blunted by four slices of home-cured ham and two eggs, he looked up at Gideon and asked, "Where's the little maid?"

"Up the stairs," said Gideon, who was seated before the fire peeling potatoes. "She's sweepin' out the guest chamber. It'll make a nice little room for 'erself an' Thomas, so she sez." He gazed at his master. "She's stayin', so she sez. Our 'ousekeeper, so she sez."

Parson Frodsham brought his great hand down with a crash on the table. "Does she, indeed? I didn't say. She put it to me last night and never a word did I say in answer. What will you and I be doing with a woman in the house? Can you tell me that, Gideon?"

"What us be told," said Gideon. "But there's the boy. I could teach un to catch moles."

Parson Frodsham could see that he and Gideon were in agreement. They could not turn out that pretty child. They hadn't the heart. And there was Thomas. "Where's Thomas?" he asked.

"In the study. Good as gold, he is."

The word study reminded Parson Frodsham of something. His eyes widened in dismay and his two-pronged fork, loaded with ham, was lowered slowly to his plate. "My sermon," he said. "I've not written it."

"No time now," said Gideon easily. "But if 'ee'd not spent the 'ole of last evenin' watchin' the little maid with Thomas 'ee could 'ave written it easy. No matter. Preach one out o' the old book."

Parson Frodsham relaxed, finished his breakfast in a leisurely manner, lit his clay pipe and stretched his feet to the fire. Upstairs Penelope went backward and forward, putting her room to rights. Her footsteps were light, quick, happy and very busy. It was a pleasant sound. The church bells were ringing for matins when he went into the study to find his sermon book. The first thing he saw was Thomas, asleep in a wooden box by the fire. One small curved hand rested against his cheek. His right ear looked like a sea shell. A nice little boy. It was a full five minutes before Parson Frodsham turned from him to look for his sermon book, which he knew to be the fourth book in the pile by the window. Then, turned, he saw the appalling thing that had happened. His room had been tidied.

Penelope must have been up with the dawn, and done it while he was in church. All the books were back in the bookcases. There was not a dirty cup and saucer to be seen, nor a cobweb nor a speck of dust. For a short whi Parson Frodsham stood motionless in miser Then he took a grip on himself. He would g used to it. One could get used to anythin God helping him, he would get used to bein clean and tidy. The bells were ringing mo insistently and he turned to the bookshelves t find his sermon book. All his books were muc alike, old, brown, torn, and with their titl worn away. He hunted up and down, opene this book and that, but he could not find h sermon book. The bells had changed to th one five-minute bell and with despair in h heart Parson Frodsham put on his cloak, ac justed his wig and walked down to the churc Though he mechanically returned their gree ings he scarcely saw his parishioners, stream ing along in the same direction in their Sunda best, happy in the frosty sunshine. He ha never preached extempore in his life, and h people expected a full forty-five-minute ora tion. He tried to remember a text he knew something about it shall be given you wha you shall say, but he couldn't get it righ "God have mercy upon me," he prayed.

Inside the church he felt better. He alway felt better inside his church. He was even abl to say to himself that the Widow Gascoign was not here yet, because the candles on th altar behind the Joneys were not lit. Then h saw that she was here. She was in her accus tomed pew and she turned her head and smile at him. He could hardly believe it. To pleas him she had chosen not to light the candles He bowed to her, walked up to the littl chapel, took his tinder box from his pocke and lit them. Then he bowed to her again an went to the vestry. The Joneys looked ver bright and gay in the mingled sunlight an candlelight, almost as though they knew tha they would never now be banished.

The service that morning seemed even hap pier than it usually was at Gaysbarton o Christmas Day. The choir in the gallery scrape at their fiddles and twiddled at their flutes witl enormous gaiety, everyone sang hard, an people who had not been on speaking term for ages were seen to be smiling shyly at on another, even as the parson and Madam Gascoigne had done. But it all seemed like a confused nightmare to Parson Frodsham. I shall be given you, he kept saying to himself but when he got into the pulpit he couldn' even remember the text upon which he ha meant to preach. But he remembered anothe and gave it out loud and clear: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." His flock waited in delighted expectancy, for they saw he had no sermon with him. He must have for gotten it. Would he go back home for it? Would he send Amos the clerk for it? Would he try and remember it? Hush, now, he was off.

Parson Frodsham preached no sermon in the accepted sense. It came to him just to tel them how he had found Penelope and Thomas. They knew far more about it than he did, o course, for the story had been all round the village, with a thousand embellishments, long before midnight, but they listened with kindly attention. Then he told them that this child was a Christmas gift to them at Gaysbarton. They must take great care of him, and of his young mother who was no more than a child herself. They must bring them up to be good servants of Almighty God. And then, suddenly, he began to speak of himself. He was a sinner, he said, he was a quarrelsome old sinner, and it was because of him that there had been so much quarreling at Gaysbarton. He had set them a bad example. He asked them to forgive him. They couldn't have quarreling now, not with this child here to be brought up in the peace of God. He spoke a little, stumblingly and shyly, about the peace of God, but he managed to end up with what he thought was a good phrase. "Let us adore the Babe of Bethlehem," he said, "and receive into our hearts His peace."

It was the shortest sermon Parson Frodsham had ever preached at Gaysbarton, ten minutes instead of forty-five, but it must have been one of his best because no one went to sleep and some of his congregation were moved to tears. Parson Frodsham was much moved himself and felt a need for a handkerchief. He plunged his hand deep in his cassock pocket and brought out a dead mole. END

LIPTON ONION SOUP MIX

OR

ENTERTAINING IDEAS IN A PACKET

1. It's Dinner-Party festive...Serve Lipton Onion Soup au Gourmet. Top with toast and grated parmesan cheese.

2. California Dip. Blend packet of mix with pint of sour cream. Refrigerate. They'll scoop it up by the chip-full.

3. Onions are kind! (When Lipton does the peeling, slicing, crying.) They're browned and seasoned in a rich beef stock.

4. Amazing...those browned bits simmer into Onion Soup? Yes...in 10 minutes that will remind you of Montparnasse!

5. Rice Pilaf. 1 package Onion Soup Mix, 1 cup rice, 1 tbsp. butter in 3 cups boiling water. Cover and simmer 15-20 minutes.

6. Blushing Bowl. For holiday spirits without even mistletoe, fix California Dip, then add ½ cup catsup and 1-2 tsp. horseradish. Gay, hey?

7. Holiday Stuffing. Combine 2 cups boiling water, packet Onion Soup Mix, 1 cup butter, let stand. Add 2 qts. croutons, 2 tsp. poultry seasoning.

Lipton

home-cooked taste the new mix way.

Our Gift To You This Month Is Time—Mouth-watering meals that are made in MINUTES. In the frenzy of Christmas preparations, use these precious timesaving recipes from the Journal, and it's mealtime in jig time for you. A tantalizing fragrance of savory and basil belies the speed with which you can prepare and cook juicy sirloin tips to make a ragout "fit for a king." Succulent breasts of chicken, bathed in golden apple juice, cook in the twinkling of an eye. Tuna Supreme is made with plump chunks of white meat married in a creamy cheese sauce with hominy and okra. For your "pièce de résistance" quickie, spread melt-in-your-mouth juicy porterhouse steak with a lavish lemon-Roquefort topping. And for dessert what could be more delicious than sweet pears under a drift of spiced sour cream, or honey cake laced with applesauce and topped with crunchy meringue, both made faster than you can eat them!

20-MINUTE SAVORY SIRLOIN RAGOUT

2½ pounds beef sirloin (have your butcher cut it into strips ¼" wide and 1" long)
½ cup seasoned flour
¼ cup butter or margarine
1 can (10¾-oz.) onion soup
3 tablespoons tomato paste
½ teaspoon savory
¼ teaspoon basil
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
Flour-and-water paste (optional)
2 (3-oz.) cans button mushrooms
1 can (1-lb.) baby carrots, drained
1 package (10-oz.) frozen peas
2 (1-lb.) cans new potatoes, drained

Shake sirloin strips in seasoned flour. Melt butter or margarine in a heavy 3-quart saucepan or kettle. Sauté sirloin strips rapidly over high heat, turning constantly until slightly browned. Add onion soup, tomato paste, savory, basil, salt and pepper. Mix well. If desired, thicken more with a little flour-and-water paste. Bring to a boil. Add mushrooms (include liquid), carrots, peas and potatoes. Cook until peas are just tender. Makes 6–8 servings. To complete the meal we suggest serving French bread spread with garlic butter, chilled hearts-of-palm sections with your favorite French dressing.

30-MINUTE CREAMY TUNA SUPREME

1 can (10½-oz.) condensed cream-of-celery soup
1¼ cups grated Cheddar cheese
1 can (1-lb.) tomatoes
¼ teaspoon oregano
1 teaspoon sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon white pepper
1½ teaspoons onion juice
2 (7-oz.) cans tuna, drained
1 can (1-lb.-13-oz.) hominy
1 can (15½-oz.) okra, drained
¼ cup dry packaged bread crumbs

Heat soup in a 2-quart saucepan. Add 1 cup cheese, cook and stir until cheese melts. Drain liquid from tomatoes and add to saucepan. Add oregano, sugar, salt, pepper and onion juice. Heat. Add tuna (broken into chunks), hominy, okra and tomatoes. Mix gently. Cover and simmer 5–7 minutes. Preheat broiler. Transfer contents of saucepan to a buttered 2-quart casserole. Sprinkle surface with bread crumbs and the remaining ¼ cup grated cheese. Broil until golden. Makes 6 servings. To complete the meal, serve frozen French-fried potatoes or "brown and serve" rolls, pickled baby beets in lettuce cups.

20-MINUTE DOUBLE-THICK ROQUEFORT STEAK

5-lb. porterhouse steak cut 1"–1½" thick
¾ cup crumbled Roquefort or bleu cheese
¼ cup melted butter or margarine
1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
Juice of ½ lemon
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed

Preheat broiler. Slash edge of fat at 2" intervals. Broil steak 3"–4" from heat, 5–9 minutes per side for rare, 6–10 minutes per side for medium, 8–12 minutes per side for well done. Take care not to pierce meat when turning. While broiling, mix cheese, butter, or margarine, Worcestershire sauce, lemon juice and garlic to a smooth paste. Three minutes before steak is done to your liking, spread thickly with cheese mixture. Return to broiler and continue broiling 2–3 minutes. Makes 5–6 servings. To complete the meal, we suggest serving broiled tomatoes (to be broiled along with the steak), toasted English muffins, green-bean salad (use canned blue lake beans) tossed with French dressing.

30-MINUTE GOLDEN CIDER-GLAZED CHICKEN

6 small chicken breasts, halved (about 3 pounds)
½ cup seasoned flour
¼ cup butter or margarine
1 cup bottled apple juice
½ cup chicken broth
2 cups sliced mushrooms
¾ cup chopped scallions, include green stems
1 can (1-lb.) tomatoes, drained
⅛ teaspoon powdered rosemary
1½ teaspoons salt
⅛ teaspoon white pepper
Flour-and-water paste for thickening

Pull skin from chicken breasts. Shake in seasoned flour. Sauté breasts in a large skillet in butter or margarine until golden. Add apple juice, chicken broth, mushrooms, scallions, tomatoes, rosemary, salt and pepper. Cover and simmer until chicken is fork-tender—about 20 minutes. Remove chicken and vegetables to a heated serving platter. Thicken remaining liquid in skillet with a little flour-and-water paste. Bring to a boil. Pour some sauce over chicken and pass the rest. Makes 6–8 servings. To complete the meal, we suggest serving quick-cooking curried rice and a tossed green salad.

8-MINUTE HONEY-MERINGUE CAKE

1 (12-oz.) bakery poundcake (approx. 8" x 3")
¼ cup honey
½ cup coconut flakes
⅓ cup canned applesauce
2 egg whites
3 tablespoons sugar

Cut a thin slice from the top of the cake to level it off. Place cake on a baking sheet. Spread with honey, then sprinkle with coconut. Spoon applesauce over coconut. Preheat broiler. Beat egg whites on high speed on electric mixer or with rotary hand beater until frothy. Add sugar, 1 tablespoon at a time, beating constantly. When mixture holds stiff peaks, spread generously on top of cake. Broil until top is golden. Serve immediately. Makes 6–8 servings.

4-MINUTE SPICED PEAR SNOWBALLS

1 can (1-lb.-14-oz.) pear halves
1 cup commercial sour cream
½ cup softened vanilla ice cream
⅓ teaspoon cinnamon
⅛ teaspoon nutmeg
Maraschino cherries for decoration (optional)

Drain syrup from pears (save syrup for adding to fruit-juice drinks). Arrange in serving dish. Mix sour cream, ice cream, cinnamon and nutmeg. Spoon about 3 tablespoons mixture over each pear half. Refrigerate until serving time. Decorate with small pieces of maraschino cherry if desired. Makes 4–8 servings.

JASON KIRBY

FOOD WITH A FLAIR

It's a snap to prepare with light, lively

MIRACLE WHIP

FRUIT PINWHEEL Here's fresh fruit salad with a flourish of flavor. You'll be flushed with success as the compliments pour in. Fold ½ c. heavy cream, whipped, into ½ c. Miracle Whip Salad Dressing. Add to 2 c. each of orange sections, seedless grapes, seeded Tokay grape halves and 2 sliced bananas. Chill. Place in salad bowl. Arrange additional orange sections around edge. Garnish center with seedless grapes. Miracle Whip wraps its famous taste around each juicy bite. Its bright, lively, can't-be-copied flavor pleases everyone in sight.

PARTY SHRIMP DIP Shrimp love to drown themselves in this perfectly wonderful dip. So good, we warn you, guests won't want to go home. Combine 1 c. Miracle Whip, 1 t. Kraft Salad Style Mustard, 2 t. Worcestershire sauce, 1 t. lemon juice, dash salt. Chill thoroughly. Serve as a dip with cooked shrimp. Miracle Whip adds a tantalizing touch to seafood, sandwiches, even the simplest salads. The more ways you try it, the surer you'll be: there's nothing else like it. America's favorite salad dressing is light, lively Miracle Whip.

CHICKEN GOURMET Do something delicious to chicken tonight! For instance—this pleasingly simple, perfectly delightful chicken casserole. Combine ½ c. Miracle Whip, one 10½-oz. can condensed cream of celery soup and ½ c. milk. Add one 3-oz. can (⅔ c.) sliced mushrooms. Place a fried, cut-up 2½ to 3-lb. broiler-fryer in casserole. Cover with package of frozen peas and Miracle Whip sauce. Bake in mod. oven, 350°, 20 to 25 min. Only Miracle Whip gives that creamy texture—that surprising good taste. Don't substitute, whatever you do!

For every use, for every taste, KRAFT has a just-right dressing! 12 varieties!

THE TRUTH ABOUT ILLEGITIMACY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 77

of several sociological studies. Psychological differences between girls of the same social and economical circumstances who become illegitimately pregnant and those who do not are hard to analyze. Several such studies show, however, that illegitimate pregnancy occurs much less often among girls with strong religious convictions. There is a special need for affection or mere physical contact with the male among those girls and women in whose lives friends are few and parental love has been inadequate.

In Carolyn's case, the facts are simple enough. A young man had been visiting in the apartment next to the one she shared with her mother. (Carolyn is an only child; her father died when she was nine, and her mother works in a department store.) The visitor was a brother of the husband in the family next door and he stayed for almost a month. Both of these people also worked and he was alone in the apartment during the day. He made Carolyn's acquaintance when they met in the hall.

"He was real friendly and asked me a lot about what I did in school and at home. He said I was too serious and worked too hard, and that I ought to be having good times and going to parties. He kidded me about not having any boy friends and said I wouldn't know what to do if I did get one."

She never thought she was in love with the young man, nor did she have any expectation of marrying him. She was not yet sixteen at the time. When she learned she was pregnant, he had departed and was in military service. She was almost suicidal in blame for herself, for the disgrace and heartbreak her mother so volubly stated, but she expressed neither blame nor desire for the boy. One other oblique remark of Carolyn's, indicating the affair had no romantic aura for her, sticks in mind: "The beds were always unmade in that apartment!"

Some of the elements in her case can be neatly summarized: lonely girl, not very pretty, no father or "father figure," mother working, and so on. But none of these factors, common to many girls, necessarily leads to pregnancy—except possibly the opportunities provided by an unchaperoned apartment. Nowhere in the record of Carolyn's interviews with her counselor did she claim to have been "swept off her feet by an overpowering passion."

She was very young and curious, unrestrained by deeply held religious beliefs, family honor or tradition—and she was lonely. The opportunity presented itself and so she "just took a chance."

Carolyn's intelligence, as revealed by tests and schoolwork, is far above average. Her case history was chosen as an example partly because she is exceptionally articulate and lucid. She seems also to have had ample "sex education," in so far as it is related to the facts of human reproduction. Many of the illegitimately pregnant schoolgirls are inarticulate or display appalling ignorance of the facts of life and most other knowledge as well. They could hardly be expected to grasp the meaning of moral behavior.

Dr. John R. Pate, in a report made several years ago for the Commissioners' Youth Council in Washington, D.C., gives a few bizarre examples: "It is often related that, 'I didn't think this would happen because he said he had a cooky in the oven.' This means that the male told the female that she could not become pregnant because he was already the father of a child not yet born. Another statement which is not infrequent is, 'I went with this man because he said that I could not become pregnant because he was already married.' There is another unrealistic and dangerous belief among teenage males: that if he has gonorrhea or any other venereal disease, one way to get well is to have intercourse with a virgin." Most of the youth in Dr. Pate's report are from Negro families living in slum areas in the nation's capital.

In a survey paper prepared for the 1960 White House Conference on Children and Youth, the social anthropologist Margaret Mead states: "Paralleling the shift to short-time goals and immediate economic gratification [in the United States] has come a shift in attitudes toward sex which places an increasing burden upon the late adolescent, especially the boy, at a time when his sex impulses are the most urgent and he has least experience in managing them. . . . The social anxieties found in the poor and disorganized parts of our society a quarter of a century ago have spread upward, and parents heave sighs of relief when both sons and daughters are 'safely married.'"

Though such parental concern is almost universally genuine, some parents are more than casual about directing and supervising their children in early relationships with the opposite sex. Dr. Pate cites instances of parents' permitting very young daughters to go out unchaperoned with much older men and calls it "dynamite dating." Many illegitimately pregnant schoolgirls, when asked where they think conception took place, reply "at my house." Playgrounds, automobiles and even community youth centers are also mentioned as places of assignation. In one batch of interviews, a particular drive-in movie theater was named a half-dozen times. About this recurrence the caseworker remarked, with wry humor but not without point, "Probably they had already seen the movie."

> I have observed that the distinguishing trait of people accustomed to good society is a calm, imperturbable quiet, which pervades all their actions and habits . . . they eat in quiet, move in quiet, live in quiet and lose their wife, or even their money, in quiet; while low persons cannot take up either a spoon or an affront without making an amazing noise about it.
>
> LORD LYTTON

"Advertisements, movies, literature abound in erotic allurements," Ruth L. Butcher and Marion O. Robinson note in a recent Public Affairs Pamphlet (No. 282, 1959, published by the Public Affairs Committee, a nonprofit educational organization). "Freedom for dating is demanded and given without commensurate guidance. Having overcome many of the old taboos about sex, we now sit back and hope no harm will come of it."

Ruth L. Butcher is the executive director of Inwood House (for unmarried mothers) in New York City and a past chairman of the National Association on Service to Unmarried Parents. She goes on to say: "In our society, information about the use of contraceptives is fairly widespread. Yet we find that many women who know about birth-control methods do not use them, and as a result become pregnant. Why are they not used? There are a number of reasons, we find, besides religious scruples. They include a failure to look at the consequences, impairment of judgment, or some overriding emotional need. Frequently the sexual experience is spontaneous and not planned at all. Use of contraceptives would have implied a deliberate plan which would have produced guilt in the girl or been unacceptable to her. The emotional reasons are so varied as to be impossible to list."

Motivations, or reasons for lack of restraint, differ for each person and are undoubtedly complex. Speaking before the National Conference of Social Welfare in Atlantic City last year, Dr. Marcel Heiman, a psychoanalyst, surveyed with acumen some of the complexities of out-of-wedlock pregnancy in adolescence. After nine pages of erudite discourse, intended for professionals, he offered this blunt but easy-to-understand suggestion: "Prophylaxis for out-of-wedlock pregnancy follows the general principles which have been advocated for years regarding in-wedlock pregnancy, only more so: abstinence." To specify that there would be no illegitimate pregnancies if there were no illicit sexual intercourse may seem unnecessary, but it is undeniably solid ground on which the adolescent can brace himself.

Most marriage manuals, treatises on sex education, moral philosophies and much technical literature agree in emphasizing the disadvantages and general undesirability of premarital sexual intercourse. Under orthodox Jewish codes and the codes of nearly all denominations of Christian churches, sexual intercourse outside of marriage is judged to be morally wrong. For many people that is an absolute, not subject to debate. In most states it is also illegal and subject to criminal prosecution, although the law is rarely enforced.

One basic truth is that an embryo does nothing immoral or illegal. The baby that is born of an illegitimate pregnancy has done no wrong. What happens after conception cannot be changed except by induced abortion, which, with few exceptions, is illegal and endangers the life of the mother. Wyatt Jones, a New York University sociologist who has spent eight years in the study of illegitimacy, says too much weight has been placed on one side of the scale. He suggests that those persons who are seriously interested in understanding illegitimacy should direct their attention not primarily to those girls who have illegitimate babies but to those who do not. "Increased social pressures on illegitimately pregnant girls," Mr. Jones says, "will tend to increase the number of illegal induced abortions but will not reduce the number of illegitimate pregnancies. The basic question is not why unmarried girls become pregnant, but why some girls choose to have premarital sexual intercourse and the rest do not."

There is a good deal of evidence that sexual freedom among all classes in the United States is on the increase. The most irrefutable is the fact that the number of girls who bear illegitimate babies is but a small fraction of the number who become illegitimately pregnant. The difference between a "legal" and an "illegal" birth is the availability of a legal father before the baby arrives, but from a strictly moral point of view it can hardly be considered more sinful to bear a child out of wedlock than to conceive one. In Children and Youth in the 1960's Dr. Aaron L. Rutledge, of the Merrill-Palmer school in Detroit, says: "A variety of studies indicate that more than a third of the girls in teenage marriages are pregnant at marriage and that an unusually high proportion of the total divorces are from this population." Dr. Harold T. Christensen, reporting on studies made in two communities, writes that about 20 per cent of first babies born within marriage had been conceived before marriage. He does not claim these data would be applicable to the rest of the United States (although other sociologists accept the 20 per cent figure as general). "From all available research," Dr. Christensen concludes, "one might judge premarital pregnancy to be a rather common phenomenon in most societies."

Whatever the behavior of multitudes, the great codes of human conduct will remain. They cannot be destroyed; they must be built upon. The basic threat of illegitimacy is to the family as the essential social unit in our society. By the creation of children without family, marriages without love, cohabitation without commitment, illegitimacy menaces the very structure of our society. The public—society—has both the right and duty to oppose it and will continue to do so, for if it were allowed to prevail our present social organization would end.

Public indignation has often been directed to the fact that some unmarried mothers are assisted through the Aid to Dependent Children program from public funds. In a small percentage of cases, the allotment is increased as these women bear still more so-called illegitimate children. Many critics of the ADC program imply that its existence as a law has created the problem of mounting out-of-wedlock births. "If this is so," one public-welfare director commented, "it is the first time in history that a statute has fathered a child." A recent publication of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare shows that the greatest majority of all children born out of wedlock—about 87 per cent—are supported by parents, relatives or adoptive parents without help from Aid to Dependent Children.

The weakening of the family as a social unit, caused by illegitimacy, is more worthy of the public's concern. History confirms the importance of the family. Substitutes which would change the long-time association of adults and their offspring have been tried from time to time. They were tried in ancient Sparta, and in communal groups such as the Brook Farm Colony, the New Harmony Colony, the Oneida Colony and other experimental societies in the United States a century or more ago. Something far less altruistic and akin to "free love" was tried more recently in Nazi Germany, Soviet Russia and Communist China. None of these schemes worked and most were soon abandoned.

It seems especially hard for some youth today to see continuity and purpose in their lives. But with the personal problems that plague them even the wisest men and women who have ever lived have also grappled. Our present moral and legal structure is partly the result of their struggles.

The great romances of literature are sometimes mentioned as indications that people of earlier times faced more realistically the strong sexual drive of the young and accordingly treated them with more understanding and respect. Acis had just passed sixteen at the time of her love affair with Galatea. Narcissus had barely reached his sixteenth year when "many youths and maidens sought his love." Some say that Helen was only twelve years old when Paris carried her off from Sparta. In one of the great pastoral romances, Daphnis was fifteen and Chloë was thirteen. Juliet was less than fourteen when Romeo made love to her. The authors of Sexual Behavior in the Human Female remark, with apparent regret, that these youth, the great lovers of history, would be looked upon as immature adolescents and identified as juvenile delinquents if they were living today.

So they would be, but none of these engaging young lovers ever really did live at any time, as we know them, except in the imaginations of poets. Even in fictional form, their love affairs usually resulted in sorrow, violence and death, and their parents probably wished they had stayed at home that night. They expressed their demands too late, of course.

There is no poetry and little romance or love in the true stories of illegitimately pregnant schoolgirls today. They adhered to no moral absolutes; neither did they pause to debate the consequences of their behavior. In the world's great literature, including the Bible, there is persistent moral admonition, a continual probing of the nature of good and evil and the choices people make for better or for worse. There is a consistent wholesomeness in Shakespeare, for example, even though he deals with the widest range of emotions and much horrifying human behavior. In all his work there are few pages not related in some way to standards of conduct, to decency and the human struggle to make ethical decisions. He was one who lived, as the late Oscar Hammerstein II said all are born to do, "to advance life on this planet." His underlying purpose was to celebrate the good in life, as was Oscar Hammerstein's—to make life better and not worse. Such admonitions fail to reach many youth today, for they are lacking in most contemporary literature and education, as they are in much contemporary life.

Youth look about them for direction and frequently do not find it among adults. Yet human responsibility in a matter so personal and private as sex can be neither personal nor private. It involves responsibility to self, family and society—and to new life, the innocent unborn. Dr. Marcel Heiman offered some advice to social workers who deal with illegitimately pregnant girls which might be put to better use by parents somewhat earlier. "None of this 'I'm going to help by standing by while you work it through,'" he said. "What is expected from the worker is what the child expected, but did not get, from her parents—a decisive 'No!'"

END

THE SEA HOUSE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 75

"He was drowned."

Because I couldn't keep silent indefinitely, I ked, "In Africa?" Five years before, Ta-ara had told me casually that Esmond was Africa.

"No, off the Devonshire coast, near Gliss-g. Apparently he came home nearly a year o."

The silence came back, like a wall between Tamara attacked it with a playful belliger-ce:

"There's no reason for you to be so stricken. rling. You didn't know him; you never uld have. He's dead. But you're alive, and am I."

The hard practical half of Tamara that was curiously married to a half that was wildly, erly heedless and accepted no fact it found palatable was in the ascendant.

"Edwina wants to see you; and, indeed, I d that quite understandable. She's a very d lady now, over eighty, and her health isn't od. Well, darling, without being crude, nat-ally she's interested in you, as you should be erested in her."

"I'm not."

"That's silly. Edwina's rich. She can't live rever."

"It's nothing to me whether she's a million-ess or a pauper."

"Ah, yes, it is. You can't pretend that it esn't concern you. Edwina possesses a for-ne; she's an old woman. You've a right to r money—some of it—when she dies."

"Not necessarily. In any case, I don't want see Edwina."

"Charlotte, stop being a woodenheaded ild. It needs only a small effort. You're say-g no just because you've always imagined if is opportunity arose, you'd turn your back it. I tell you, you can't afford to."

"I'm not going, Tamara," I said. "No mat-what arguments you use, how much you ead, I'm just not going."

She put her hand on my shoulder. "You're strange girl, Charlotte. I know you've always manticized Esmond. And now it's hit you rd to learn that he's dead. I was afraid it uld." She said no more, but I knew that just she, in giving me the news of Esmond's ath, had murdered my dream, I, in refusing enter the race for Edwina's gold, had mor-ly disappointed her.

Esmond dead I said it to myself a dozen nes, trying to gauge precisely what it meant me. The death of someone I'd never seen; d, if the fact must be faced, someone who d never wanted to see me, for if he'd wished smond could have done so.

When I was thirteen, Tamara and I had en living temporarily in a hotel in the Crom-ell Road. I was left largely to my own de-ces. It was the time when children were going ck to school, and I'd worked it out that smond might be traveling through London om Devon to whichever boarding school he tended. I had spent a long time framing a tter suggesting that we should meet, which I nt to him at Glissing Park, keeping my fin-rs crossed that it would reach him. Three ys later I'd received an answer from him: a hoolboyish scrawl saying it might be rather lark, and fixing a rendezvous at the Café oyal. Arriving breathless, ahead of time, I'd t on a red plush bench for two hours, but no hoolboy entered the foyer. He never wrote tell me why he had not turned up, and it as nearly eight years before I found the cour-ge to write to him again. This time it was a unty, casual note. I suggested that as we ould be celebrating our twenty-first birthday ithin the next few days, we should meet ometime for a celebration drink. I had no ply for a fortnight and then my letter was turned from Glissing Park marked: "Gone way. Address unknown."

His death robbed me of nothing that I'd tually possessed of him. The theft oddly had en laid in the future: I'd lost forever the ope of knowing him.

On Tuesday morning, Edwina's letter arrived. The body of the letter, below the die-stamped heading "Glissing Park, Glissing, Devonshire," was composed of two paragraphs of writing stabbed viciously into the notepaper:

Dear Charlotte: Your mother will doubtless have advised you that I shall be writing to you. She will also, I presume, have told you that your brother, Esmond, was drowned when his dinghy capsized in a storm off this coast.

My object in writing to you is to suggest that you pay me a visit. This coming Saturday, October 4th, would be suitable for me; and if you are able to make the necessary arrangements to be absent from your work, I would suggest that you stay at Glissing for one week.

It was signed, without the grace of a closing salutation: Edwina Elliot.

I smiled to myself, mentally phrasing a refusal as curt as the invitation. My vacation from the bank where I worked as secretary to the chairman was due the following week, but I had plans to spend it abroad.

Yet, without consciously changing my mind, on Friday I found myself replying to Edwina's note, and saying that I would be glad to accept her invitation. The earliest I could arrive, I added, would be the next Tuesday evening, and I would be coming by car. I was not going to Glissing to wheedle myself into Edwina's good graces as Tamara had implied I should do; I was going because I wanted to know what manner of man Esmond Elliot had been before his life had been cut short in a sea storm in his twenty-seventh year.

Before I left my flat on Tuesday there was a second note from Edwina, saying that I would be expected at Glissing Park at six P.M.

I aimed to get there on the dot of six, but I miscalculated the mileage, or drove faster than I'd intended, and it was barely a quarter to three when I passed the Glissing village sign.

It's a bright new fruit, today's California Prune. Soft, succulent, tender...with a taste like ripe sunshine. Prunes are gently processed to keep that tree-ripened flavor, to retain all the natural fruit sugar and vitamins they soak up from the hot California sun.

Today's new prunes are delightful at any meal. But for a special breakfast treat, try this new recipe for Prune All-Bran Muffins.

CALIFORNIA PRUNE ALL-BRAN MUFFINS

1 cup Kellogg's All-Bran
¾ cup milk
1 egg
¼ cup soft shortening
1 cup sifted flour
2½ tsps. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
¼ cup sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon
½ cup cut cooked California prunes

1. Combine Kellogg's All-Bran and milk; let stand until most of the moisture is taken up. Add egg and shortening; beat well.
2. Sift together flour, baking powder, salt, sugar and cinnamon. Add to first mixture, together with prunes, stirring only until combined. Fill greased muffin pan ⅔ full.
3. Bake in moderately hot oven (400° F.) for from 25 to 30 minutes. Serve hot.

Yield: 10 to 12 muffins, 2½ inches in diameter.

Discover the bright new taste of today's

PRUNES

THE CALIFORNIA WONDER-FRUIT CALIFORNIA PRUNE ADVISORY BOARD

I pulled up by the green; I had three hours to fill, and for some time the knowledge that the sea, though out of sight, was only just over the horizon had been tempting me. I got out of the car. There was a notice nailed to a pole at the entrance to a lane that circled the churchyard: Footpath to Maidenford Cove. I took a couple of steps along it, then changed my mind, and on impulse went down the slimy flagged path which led into the churchyard.

It had the same dumb, piteous air of all graveyards: lurching tombstones, ragged grass mounds, jam jars filled with decaying flowers. There were also one or two grander memorials set snootily behind railed enclosures. Wondering which one belonged to the Elliots, I left the path. I soon found it, the largest there: a graduated marble plinth which supported a strapping angel with drooping wings. On the lowest slab was engraved:

Sacred to the beloved memory of William Timothy Elliot, M.P., who departed this world for the greater glory of life everlasting on the 8th day of December, 1919, and to his wife Edwina Charlotte, who joined him in heaven on

There was a blank space, as presumably not even Edwina would prophesy the date of that joyful reunion.

I stood for a moment staring at grandfather's tomb. My father, if he had been afforded the comfort of a grave, lay in Spain. Esmond? He had been drowned, so maybe the sea was his resting place; yet even as I thought this, I became aware of a mound just outside the Elliot railing, newly made—but not too new, because the turf had already been clipped. On it lay two wreaths, one of evergreens, one of fresh chrysanthemums. I had only to move sideways a couple of paces to read the black-edged cards. The one attached to the evergreen wreath had been reduced to smudges by the rain, but the familiar forceful writing on the other was still distinct. Perhaps Esmond's body had been recovered. I bent over it. "To Danny, who will never be forgotten by his loving and devoted friend Edwina Elliot."

I stood upright, began walking away, conscious of a sense of anticlimax, and at that moment no curiosity at all as to who Danny was, no premonition of the part he was to play in my future.

The narrow lane to the cove looked short. There seemed to be a rise of headland at the end, and over that would be the sea. I began to hurry down the path. But what had appeared to be a headland was a hill, and once over the rise I found myself in a shallow bowl filled with brambles, all signs of the path lost. I was hot, breathless and disheveled when at last I breasted the final patch of scrub, and there, suddenly, spectacularly, was the spread of pale azure sea under my eyes.

From where I stood the cove below looked no bigger than a hand, its rose-brick sand scattered with tumbles of rock and shale. To the right, over the top of a high clump of gorse, I saw a house built of stone and slate, foursquare and solid, fronted by a patch of lawn that ran down to a creek that emptied itself in the sea; its back was set tight against the foothill of another headland.

I stared, astounded and enchanted. The house might have been a jewel I'd glimpsed in a shopwindow. I wondered who lived there. The windows were shut, not a curl of smoke rose from the chimneys.

I turned to follow the path I now saw below me that led toward the sea and then branched upward. The ascent was slimy and once my feet slid from under me. Spread-eagled, I saved myself from falling backward only by grasping the trunk of a straggling thorn tree. In clutching it, my head turned back, and in one of the upstairs windows of the house I saw a figure captured in a sudden dazzling spray of sun. The next instant the space between the confining curtains was empty. It had been too swift a sight for me to register more than a fleeting impression of a man, and that without absolute certainty that anyone had been there at all.

I pulled myself upright, got nearly to the top when again my feet began to slide from under me. I gasped, reached for the branch of a tree, and cried out as my hand was seized. I was dragged up as if by a pulley; then released so abruptly that I staggered.

"You looked as if you were in need of a hand."

"Thank you. I certainly was." Disconcerted that my ungainly scrambling had been seen, my voice shook. My rescuer stood back from me, a man dressed conventionally in gray flannels and tweed jacket, of an age I guessed to be around thirty. A swift, embarrassed glance gave me an impression of height, leanness, and under dark hair a thin, strong-boned, proudly somber face. He did not smile, nor make the slightest attempt to.

I mumbled, "I'm afraid I lost my way."

"It's easy enough." He paused. "You know, you really shouldn't be here at all. This is private property." He bent back the branches of the hedge beside him to reveal a weather-cracked board on which was printed: PRIVATE. TRESPASSERS WILL BE PROSECUTED.

"But the sign by the church distinctly said 'Footpath to Maidenford Cove.' I assumed it was public."

"This is Glissing Cove, private property. Maidenford Cove lies farther east, over that headland. I suspect you left the public footpath half a mile back."

"How do I get back to the village?"

He took a couple of steps forward, pointed. "Keep along this track, bear right by that patch of bracken you can just see. After that the path will take you downhill and then over a rise, from which you'll see the church tower."

I glanced at my watch. It was past five. "Thank you." I smiled at him. He did not return my smile, however, but gave me a polite nod of dismissal.

I went past him, as swiftly as I could without actually running. Too late, I realized I should have told him who I was, that as my grandmother's guest I had a right to trespass on what was presumably her property.

Back in the village, I got myself tidied up. By that time it was ten past six; then I was held up by the car's starter refusing to function. It was another half hour before I drove in at the open gate of Glissing Park.

It was dark now, a hint of mist shifting in the car lights as I followed the curving drive. As I rounded a bend, the beam from the headlights swept over the façade of the house, revealing it foot by foot, from left to right. I saw the side nearest to me, followed by a portico set on stone pillars that whitened dramatically as the glow touched them, and then the far wing, where I was startled to see windows boarded up, brickwork marked with elongated tongues of soot that were the obvious legacy of flames. From the newness of the boards that blocked the windows, I judged that the fire had been comparatively recent.

I parked immediately in front of the door, took my suitcase out of the back, then turned off the headlights. The shock of darkness was overwhelming. There was not one crack of light along the front of the house, not the smallest token that anyone lived inside.

As I put one foot before the other, my toe struck the shallow step, my outflung hand a pillar. I steadied myself, and with eyes becoming accustomed to the dark, I saw the bell pull. With a feeling of relief, I tugged it hard.

I waited . . . how long? A minute, maybe two. Then the long sash windows at either side of the door were filled with light, and I heard the lift of a heavy latch. As the door swung back, I saw a very short, rather plump middle-aged woman in a pink uniform.

"Miss Elliot? Oh, please do come in. We'd been expecting you to arrive much earlier." Her greeting was breathless, agitated.

As I crossed the threshold I was dwarfed, almost swallowed up by a sea of huge black and white diamonds that stretched right and left and forward of me to the base of a stairway that grew out of the back of the hall.

My glance went back to the little woman, who was edging me forward, affecting me with her urgency. "I wonder if you'd mind, as you're so late, if I take you straight to your room, and then you can join Mrs. Elliot and the others."

The woman scurried ahead of me up the stairs. By the time I had thoroughly lost my bearings she paused, opened a door, switched on a light and waited for me to go ahead. The room in its Victorian heyday had no doubt been pleasant, maybe luxurious, but now the heavy furniture, the worn pink satin bedcover and curtains were shabby. The chill air struck like a blight.

Again came that breathless agitated pleading. "Mrs. Elliot dines at seven, and as it's that time now —— I don't want to hurry you, but could you be as quick as you can?"

"Of course. Are you ——"

"I'm the housekeeper here—Mrs. West." She gave me a nerveless smile. "I'd better come back for you. Ten minutes?"

I promised that I would try to be ready by then.

Standing in my slip, I ran water into a washbasin that was as big as a baby's bath. It was tepid. Shivering, I pulled a crimson jersey dress over my head, straightened the seams and inspected the result in a smudgy looking glass set into a tall wardrobe.

I was reaching for my lipstick when I heard the noise. Scratch . . . scrabble. For the first few seconds I couldn't locate it. Then there was a telltale snuffle, a muffled yelp. I opened the door and a boisterous little white wire-haired terrier leaped on me, pawing my knees. As it made a bound for the bed, I caught it by the collar. The name plate glittered in the light and I read: Kelly, Esmond Elliot, Glissing Park.

"Oh!" Mrs. West stood aghast in the door. "How did Kelly get up here! Oh dear, give him to me. He'll cover you with his hairs, and on the bed too!"

Bursting with indignation, she carried him out upside down, his legs fighting the air.

"Dogs should be trained," she snapped on her return. "Are you ready to go down?"

She hurried ahead of me down the staircase, across the checkerboard hall and along a corridor. She paused at a door, then flung it open and announced my name. I had a sense of being tossed to the wolves.

The wolf in this case was enthroned in a blazing cascade of light. The throne was no more than a wing armchair; the light came from a tall floor lamp which shone entirely on my grandmother and left the rest of the room, and whomever it contained, in obscurity.

"I'm very relieved that you've arrived at last, Charlotte. You're extremely late."

I went forward until I stood on the edge of the circle of radiance, then stopped. I'd never seen a photograph of Edwina, but in my mind she was ugly. In the flesh she wasn't especially so: just a rather unattractive old woman, with big bones from which the meager flesh hung discolored, gaunt. Her lank hair was a mixture of gray, white and a nasty metallic gold. Her voluminous garments, of no fashion, were a drab black. From her gnarled, brown-spotted hands spurted the fire of jewels, and hanging from her ruined throat was a pretty crystal chain supporting a locket which she clutched to her breast as she glared at me. I apologized for being late and she gave a grunt, then said in a strong but querulous voice, "Well, aren't you going to kiss me, Charlotte?"

Her cheek tasted like warm brown paper. As I raised my head, I found myself looking directly into faded blue eyes that were astonishingly alive and disconcertingly sagacious.

There was a rustling behind her. Though their heads were above the radius of the light, I made out two men, one woman.

My grandmother beckoned impatiently and a girl stepped forward, a girl so exquisitely beautiful—with soft blond hair curving round a small oval face, eyes that were a clear, serene sapphire—that I drew in my breath in sheer astonishment. She was smiling at me, gently, almost modestly, as she held out her hand, and Edwina said, "Charlotte, this is Lisa, my granddaughter."

The girl's touch was warm and firm, and her voice curiously light like a child's. "Charlotte, I'm so glad you made it. We were beginning to be scared you'd had a breakdown."

Two men moved in to share the light. As Lisa dropped my hand, it was taken into a larger grasp as Edwina said, "Charlotte, my agent, Major Tarrand."

A powerful man, his full, open countenance marked by a fair mustache that matched his hair, bent toward me. "How do you do, Miss Elliot." His voice was hearty, welcoming.

And then Edwina was saying, "And this, Charlotte, is Mark Halliwell, my godson."

This time there was the black-and-white severity of dinner clothes instead of tweed and flannels, but the scrutiny was the same as it had been on the cliff beside the sea: totally noncommittal, a grave, wordless determination to reduce communication between us to a bare minimum, expressed this time in a movement of the head, a polite, "How do you do, Miss Elliot."

The girl sank gracefully onto a stool by the side of Edwina's chair. Her dress was black—not the dead black of Edwina's, but soft, with sheen where the light touched it. Who was she? Either my father had married again, and she was his daughter, or she had been Esmond's wife.

The gong sounded, and with a mighty heave on her stick Edwina came to her feet. She moved cumbersomely but with dogged strength, and when Mark Halliwell offered her his arm, she thrust it away.

REFERENCE LIBRARY

CARD-TABLE PLAYHOUSE

Delight the children for Christmas with this easy-to-make fabric playhouse that fits over a regulation card table. White muslin walls are topped with a red denim roof, crepe-paper chimney. Windows have striped canvas awnings edged with fringe. Walls and red denim door are adorned with gay Christmas decorations: a wreath, tinseled trees.

For Journal Pattern No. 2919 send 25c* to Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

*Pennsylvania residents please add 4% Penna. state sales tax.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

PRETTY HANDS BY JOY

Joy saves your hands for nicer things than dishwashing

It's when you're doing tender little things like this that you (and he) really appreciate how soft and pretty Joy leaves your hands. Joy's different from other dishwashing liquids. Joy has a mildness you can see on your hands. That's because it's as mild as a bubble bath. You try Joy and see how it helps keep your hands nice, for all the nice things they have to do.

Mild as a bubble bath to your hands

JOY HAS A MILDNESS YOU CAN SEE ON YOUR HANDS

New soft plastic bottle

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

After Edwina had gone through the door, Lisa came to my side. We were moving into the dining room. I had to put my question to her abruptly, without preamble. "You were married to Esmond?"

The sapphire eyes widened at the question. "Yes—of course." My first breathless astonishment at her beauty was fading. The hair, the eyes, the delicate bones had been gifts at birth, but the rest —— Already I sensed the rigid schooling.

Edwina was already seated at the head of the table. "Here, Charlotte." She rapped at a place on her left. "Mark can sit beside you. Come along, Ivor."

Lisa with pretty, good-mannered charm and Major Tarrand with genial, almost protective humor engaged me in conversation about the journey down from London, while Edwina concentrated on spooning up her soup with noisy greed, and Mark Halliwell, beyond performing the small courtesies of the table, kept silent. It was a comfortless meal.

Gradually I became aware that of the four guests round the table only Mark Halliwell appeared at ease. His air, I decided, was that of a stranger exercising good-mannered restraint at a meal to which he'd been dragged against his will. Once I found courage, spurred by intensifying curiosity, to look directly into his eyes. They were under his strong black brows not brown, as I'd expected, but blue, a strange metallic blue, and not proud and arrogant as I'd supposed on the cliff, but serene and coolly amused.

As we left the dining room Edwina once more stumped doggedly ahead of us. When she was again enthroned in the wing chair, the light beating down on her, she tapped with her stick on a small upright chair. "Sit there, Charlotte, where I can see you. Now dinner is over, I want to talk to you."

As I obeyed, the three others retreated to seats out of reach of the direct light from the lamp.

After a moment's uncomfortable silence, Edwina began. "You don't bear the least resemblance to Esmond. Not that that surprises me. You were not identical twins, you know. As babies you were totally unalike."

"So I've been told."

"So you work in a bank. What do you do there?"

I told her, giving her the tersest reply short of rudeness. It was only the first of many answers she prized from me. She was remorseless, not pausing until she possessed a complete dossier of my life from the age of six months.

Since I was her granddaughter, and I had accepted her hospitality, though I writhed under her questions, I could not actively resent them. What incensed me almost past bearing were those three eavesdroppers. They were strangers, with no right to act as silent witnesses as Edwina prodded and poked at the bones of my life.

Afraid that my anger might be showing, for distraction I turned my head and saw on the fringe of light, on the table near Edwina's chair, an old-fashioned silver frame. I leaned forward to see it better; it was a photograph of a young man. I reached out, picked it up, and discovered it wasn't a photograph at all, but a painting, a very amateurish one.

I turned to Edwina. "Is this Esmond?"

"Esmond!" She snatched it from me. "That is Danny, a self-portrait. He painted it only last spring, especially for me, with a looking glass. I used to sit and watch him work ——" Her voice suddenly started to shake, and her hand trembled. "In those days I had three Dannys: Danny painting, Danny in the looking glass and Danny in the portrait. Now ——" Her voice cracked, crumbled into an inaudible dirge of mourning.

No one spoke. No one leaned forward to console her. She was left isolated in her grief that was ugly, pitiful, and to me incomprehensible. I did not know who Danny was; nothing about him except that he was buried in Glissing churchyard and that my grandmother wept for him, while the others sat in a silence so rigid that they might all have been holding their breaths.

Lisa broke it at last, laying her hand on Edwina's shoulder, saying in her gentle young-girl voice, "It's nine o'clock, granny, and you've had an exhausting day. Don't you think you ought to go to bed? You'll be able to see Charlotte in the morning."

Without attempting to wipe away the tears that were sliding down the dark runnels in her cheeks, she demanded with a sudden reversion to her normal testiness, "Where's Mark? Before I go to bed I want to hear what he was telling me when Charlotte interrupted us. Mark ——"

"Yes, aunt."

He came to stand alongside me. I glanced upward, curious as to how he would react to being treated like a schoolboy. He did not appear to mind it in the least. So intent was I on my scrutiny of him that I missed Edwina's first questions, his answers.

" —— a little way into the third. I've begun marking the sections I'd like to use."

"I've not said you can. You know I have not made up my mind yet."

"I understand that."

"It's the gallery I'm concerned with. Have you heard from the man who owns it?"

He hesitated. "I'm afraid he won't commit himself, not yet."

"Let me see his letter."

"It's in the gun room."

"Get it and bring it to me upstairs."

Without a backward glance at any of us, Mark Halliwell left the room. Edwina turned on me, a semblance of kindness in her voice.

"I go to bed early. In that respect I follow the doctor's orders. I hope you'll sleep comfortably in your room, Charlotte. Tomorrow I'll show you round the house."

As Major Tarrand held open the door for her, and a drudgery of movement propelled her into the corridor beyond, I was caught,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 109

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER

The sloping roof protects a handsome entrance.

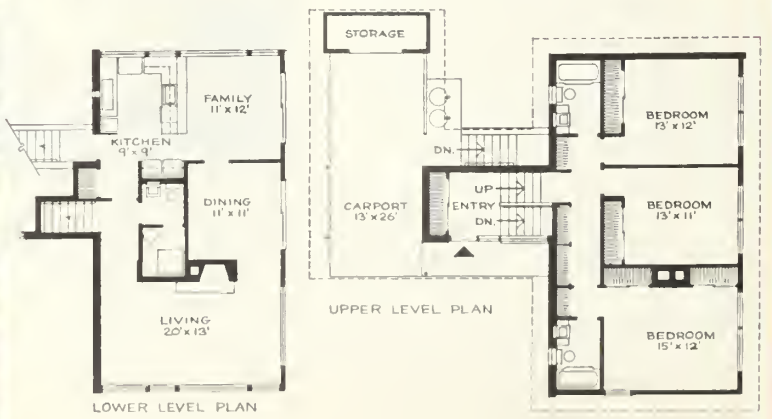
A "T" FLOOR PLAN FOR A HILLSIDE

BY JOHN H. BRENNEMAN
ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

Ideal for a gentle side-to-side slope is this ingratiating two-story house. Its bright roomy split-level entrance hall makes pleasant stairway access to either living level.

Down six steps are living room, separate dining and family rooms, and kitchen. The kitchen has a very practical U work area, and laundry equipment opposite in an alcove.

A neat trick is the rear entrance from the carport for deliveries without tracking through the entrance hall.



This house is planned so sensibly that it would be simple and easy to build. In addition, it has a bonus of fine proportions and efficient use of materials.

ARCHITECTS: HEERY AND HEERY
AREA: 1915 SQUARE FEET
COST: $22,000 TO $27,000 PLUS LAND

Dining and family rooms open to a deck for convenient outdoor lounging and dining.

Note spacious entrance, and wealth of storage near bedrooms.

Pepperell sheets and blankets make any bedroom beautiful

For someone who likes antiques—the look of finest heirloom linen captured in tone-on-tone Damask Rose. Yours in orchid, rose, green, beige or blue.

For the tailored, outdoor type—the classic stripe always makes a welcome gift. Solo Stripe is handsome in green, pink, blue, orchid, and yellow.

For someone you're very fond of—the charm of sentimental roses! On snowiest percale, Bridal Rose comes in rose, orchid, blue or yellow posies.

How to be a good Santa—without spending a fortune!

What a luxurious present these lush blankets make! 100% Acrilan with richest nylon velvet binding.

Newest stripe of all—Northern Lights! In a subtle blend of soft pastels, makes a conversation-piece gift!

Another delightful way to say Merry Christmas... any one of Pepperell's 8 newest, fashion pastels.

Lady Pepperell Go together Sheets and Blankets ® PEPPERELL FABRICS

Hunt's
SPICED WHOLE PEACHES
Hunt...for the best

ONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

uite unprepared, by an unexpected stab of ity so strong that it was almost love

Major Tarrand, after closing the door, rned on a couple of lights and instantly the oom changed, grew longer and wider. The moval of Edwina's tyrannical presence emed to effect a transformation in Lisa and Major Tarrand also. They even looked differnt physically—and, rather strangely, older. isa was no longer a demure girl, but a sophisicated young woman, and Major Tarrand had lso suffered a change. As he lighted a match r his cigarette, I saw his eyes, a cool, slate ray. As he blew the match out, they bore irectly upon me, and I became conscious of he appraising quality in those eyes, whose rises and pupils were almost the same cold nt, making them somehow alien to the rest f his face; to the nice, jovial laugh.

I laughed, and was surprised by the unteadiness of the sound. "After a time it gets rribly boring talking about nothing but neself. Now you know practically everything here is to know about me, do you think I ight have my turn, ask a few questions?"

Lisa said, "What do you want to know?"

"For instance, I didn't even know that smond was married. How long were you?"

"Five years. We were married the day he as twenty-one, when I was nineteen. Timmy's our and a bit."

"Timmy?"

"You mean you didn't know about Timmy?" I flushed at the frankly incredulous ght in her eyes. Both she and the man seemed aiting to pounce on and weigh every word uttered.

I took another tack. "Did Esmond ever alk about me?"

As she raised her head, the lightest, swiftest dance passed between her and Major Tarand. "Well, not to any extent. In fact, when Edwina suddenly developed this urge to see you, 'd forgotten that Esmond had a sister. It was uite a shock." She gave me that smile of nuscle and tissue that, as I now realized, she urned on at will. "Wasn't it, Ivor?"

His eyes left me for Lisa, compulsively, as if drawn by a magnet. I watched their glances neet. Even a face so schooled as Lisa Elliot's , once in a while, caught off guard; and that s how I knew that Lisa and Ivor Tarrand were, to some degree, in love.

I said, "I know Esmond lived in Africa for time. I suppose you were there with him?"

"We went to Rhodesia immediately after we were married." And that, I thought, explained the letter I'd sent to Glissing being returned to me. "Esmond wanted to farm there. We did, for a time, but he hadn't enough capital and the climate didn't suit either of us, or Timmy. About a year ago we came home."

My glance fell on the silver photograph frame. I gestured at it. "Who was he?"

"Danny?" The name struck the careful control from Lisa's voice. "If you want it in a nutshell, Danny was a louse."

The explosion of the ugly word, the venom behind it was like a small electric shock running through the room. Major Tarrand said hastily, as if to give it a cover of decency, "Daniel Wargrave, Miss Elliot, was your grandmother's great-nephew, the son of her only sister's child. He turned up here suddenly ten months ago. He was ——"

Lisa did not let him finish. "He was a parasite, an unscrupulous and despicable little man whose sole ambition was to live off a helpless old woman. For forty years he'd seemingly never remembered Edwina's existence, and then, when he'd run through everything else, he came and battened on her. Not only that, he hypnotized her into believing that he was a genius!" She snatched up the picture, thrust it toward me. "Take a good look at that, and you'll see what kind of an artist he was. Why, Timmy could do better."

"It seems pretty poor. When did he die?"

Major Tarrand answered. "In August. I don't suppose you noticed as you drove in, but the west wing has been more or less gutted. Mrs. Elliot had fixed up a bedroom and studio for Wargrave there. The theory is that an oilstove caused the fire. Wargrave had had it before any of us could get near him. Esmond and I did all we could before the fire brigade arrived, but it was quite hopeless."

Lisa stared at him all the time he had been speaking, her expression stony.

I made a calculation. "He must have died only a short while before Esmond was drowned?"

Lisa gave me a frankly sardonic glance. "I take it what you mean is that two sudden deaths in the family must have hit an old lady of eighty pretty hard?"

"Yes, I was thinking that."

"Danny's did. In fact, she was still in bed being treated for shock when Esmond was drowned." She began to smile and I felt a little sick. "But she survived the second loss remarkably well. It was much easier on her, naturally, as she didn't care a damn for Esmond; she never had. You'll soon discover for yourself that Edwina has loved only two people in all her long life: her husband and Danny Wargrave." She gave her smile briefly to Major Tarrand, and then returned it to me. "So you'll understand that what we're all waiting breathlessly to learn is if you're going to make a third."

Sitting up in bed the next morning with the soft buttery sun flooding the room, I was content to be in Devonshire instead of on a bus bound for a day's work in the bank. My first-floor window looked over the garden, a place of air and sunlight I itched to explore. I thought, as I always did when I escaped from London, I'm a country girl at heart. As I dressed, I wondered if it would be warm enough to bathe in the sea that could lie only just over the horizon. With a pang of excitement I remembered the dour little housewedged between cliff and sand that had enchanted me. Today I'd find out who lived there.

Even the geography of Glissing was simple to master by daylight. I opened the door of the breakfast room, and Mark Halliwell rose from his seat at the head of the damask-coated table. He pulled out a chair for me.

I looked at him curiously. "So you're my grandmother's godson. Are you just paying her a friendly visit?"

"More or less. My uncle, James Halliwell, is her solicitor. She needed his advice, but he happens to be recovering from a thrombosis. So I came down last Friday for a day or two to see if I could help out. Uncle James hoped if she could discuss this plan of hers with me, it might prevent her making herself ill with impatience."

"So you're a solicitor?"

"God forbid. I'm a publisher. My father founded the firm. By the way, dad knew your mother. So did Uncle James."

I said eagerly, "Then you knew about me too. And you must have known Esmond."

"Yes, I knew him." He made the admission casually, and the hope that had come bounding to me lost impetus as I waited for him to go on. "He was three years my junior, but he spent odd holidays with us in London; I came down here quite a few summers. When we were grown up, we weren't close friends, but we kept in touch. . . . You look disappointed. Why?"

And now it tumbled out, half against my will. "I'd hoped once I was at Glissing, that everyone would talk about Esmond, that his life would be laid open for me to read. That's why I came here, the only reason, to find out about Esmond." His glance was so startled, so darkly wary that I finished on a challenge. "I've a right to know, haven't I?"

"Yes. Yes, of course," he conceded. "You've a perfect right to find out all you want about Esmond. And that's really why you came here?"

"You sound as if you don't altogether believe me."

"Oh, I do. I do." He got up rather abruptly and went to the window. A moment before he had been friendly; now I wasn't sure.

"What is this business you're doing for Edwina?" I asked.

He came slowly back to the table, though he did not sit down. "You might say I'm here to protect the interests of the dead."

"Esmond's interests?"

He frowned and the small action made him formidable, even arrogant. "Not Esmond's. Daniel Wargrave's."

"Lisa said, and Major Tarrand ——"

He cut in abruptly. "I know. I imagine they gave you a thorough account of Danny Wargrave. What's more, they weren't far wrong."

"If that self-portrait I saw was anything to judge by, he certainly wasn't an artist."

"No, Danny couldn't paint," Mark said slowly. "But he was a master at self-persuasion. In his time he'd hoodwinked himself into believing he was not only a painter, but an actor, a script writer, a novelist, a film producer, even a theatrical manager; after a certain amount of initial success, he'd failed at the lot. He had no staying power. And though he had a lot of little talents, he had only one big one."

"What was that?"

"Ironically, it was one he appears never to have suspected he possessed. When it came to self-revelation, Danny was a near-genius. For twenty years he kept a diary, in which he was unfailingly honest. He used it as a magnifying glass on himself. And that, I may tell you, is extremely rare—very nearly unique."

"The diary of a failure!"

He nodded. "Precisely. These diaries make fascinating reading: an honest analysis of a human being; there's nothing more engrossing." He twisted a chair round, straddled it. Excitement was growing in him.

"How did you get hold of them?"

"By sheer accident. He kept them locked in an old safe in his bedroom. It survived the fire. The key was lost, so Edwina got an expert in to open it. I was with her when he came, and I asked her if I could read what we found in the safe. She agreed."

"Aren't the others curious? Lisa, for instance."

"Now she's learned that the diaries exist, Lisa's extremely curious. That's why I'm keeping them in the safe, and the key in my pocket."

"Are you trying to make some kind of deal with Edwina?"

"In a way. She's determined to have what's left of Danny's pictures exhibited in London. If I can pull that off, I'm hoping she may eventually consent to having the diaries published."

"But who on earth would put on an exhibition of those pictures?"

He grinned suddenly. "Leave that to me. There are always strings to be pulled."

Lisa came into my room that day, before lunch, and said, "Ivor rang up this morning. He's got to go and see the tenant at one of the farms this afternoon, and he asked if you'd like to go with him—that is, if you don't object to riding in the Land Rover. It would give you a chance to see the place. How do you feel about the idea?"

I said I'd like it, provided Edwina had no objection.

"She won't object; she rests every day after lunch. All right if Ivor picks you up at two?"

"I'll be ready." Then, as she turned to go, I asked, "Where does he live? Near here?"

"At a house down by the sea, Glissing Cove. Very remote and primitive. I can't think how he stands it, but that's one of the reasons he took the job. His family once owned it, and it was called Tarrands. Now it's known simply as the Sea House."

The afternoon was overcast by a pearly mist. As we got into the Land Rover, after lunch, Major Tarrand forecast rain. In corduroys, leather-patched tweed jacket, cap, he looked completely in his element: almost a blueprint for a country gentleman doing the rounds of his acres. The fact that they weren't his but Edwina's didn't affect the picture.

It wasn't until we'd been driving for half an hour that I found an opportunity to say, "By the way, at lunch my grandmother gave me a message for you. She wants to know how much longer you'll be keeping Nanny. She's anxious to have her back."

"Why?" The question came with such unexpected force that I gave him a startled glance.

"I've no idea. I don't even know who Nanny is."

"She was your father's nurse, and Esmond's. She's even older than Mrs. Elliot, and stone deaf. At the moment she happens to be staying with me."

"Has she been with you long?"

"Ten days—about that." There was a pause. "I'm a bachelor; I live alone. Occasionally a woman comes down from the village to clean, but every now and again there are things in the house—linen, cupboards, things like that—that need more attention than she can give. That's what is occupying Nanny at the moment."

His irritation was gone. He turned his head, gave me an easy smile. "Old women are hard taskmasters. But I'll see Mrs. Elliot, try to make my peace—though it will be short-lived if Nanny decides not to return to Glissing."

"That's a possibility?"

"Yes. She talks of going to stay with her grandson." His glance lay on me for a moment and then he said with cheerful heartiness, "And good luck to her, that's what I say. If her grandson is willing to have her, no one can compel her to come back here."

We drove in silence for a while. Ever since we had been together, I had been aware of a compulsion to speak to him of the little house by the sea, which I'd loved on first sight, and in which he lived. Finally I ventured, "Lisa tells me that you were born near here."

"Yes. In the house where I'm now living. It's on Glissing Cove, by the sea." He was smiling as he spoke, his voice rang with pride. "In fact, it once belonged to my grandfather. After I was kicked out of the Indian army, I wandered back down this way. It happened that Mrs. Elliot needed an agent; she'd known me as a child, and as by that time I'd had some experience of farming, I got the job. The house was empty, near derelict at that time; my taking it over was part of the deal. I'd always remembered it."

"You do love it, don't you?"

"Yes. You might say it's one of my two loves. There's the other." He nodded toward the horizon, and I made out the shape of a wind sleeve.

"Flying?"

"Yes. Three months ago I managed to scrape together enough money to buy my own two-seater plane. Goes like a bird. We're lucky to have a good flying club so handy."

"Was Esmond a flier?"

"No. His hobby was sailing. But Lisa's keen on it. She hasn't got her pilot's license yet, but it shouldn't be long, and meanwhile she goes up with me."

I asked him how often he managed to get to the flying club.

"How was the sales meeting?"

The merriest-looking Gifts are wrapped in twinkle foil

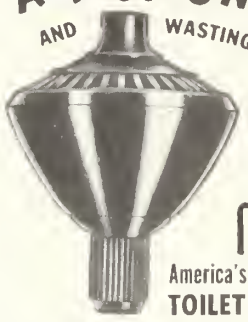
Make your gifts as sparkling and gay as Christmas itself! Wrap them in this shimmering foil that glitters with multi-colored sequins and stars. Even the smallest gift becomes "special" . . . a pleasure to give, a joy to receive. Four big rolls to box—one gold, silver, red and blue, $1.98.

Get the beautiful $1.95 Alcoa Book of Decorations for just $1.00, postpaid, with coupon on this box.



Get Twinkle Foil at leading stores everywhere!

Back of the box has unusual cut-out creations designed by famous CONNY of ALCOA. So easy—such fun to make!

MEMPHIS CONVERTING CO.
MEMPHIS, TENN.

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE
WATER MASTER
America's Largest Selling
TOILET TANK BALL

Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.

75c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE
Higher in Canada

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

Here's a way to feel better fast!

NO NEED to let constipation "get you down." To get the prompt relief you need to feel better fast ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. They're your best bet because they are a "balanced" combination of ingredients scientifically formulated to soften the intestinal wastes and stimulate intestinal function . . . without causing cramps or weakening digestive distress!

IN CLINICAL study Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets rated 71% better, on the average, than other laxatives tested. These included candy and chewing gum laxatives, so-called "liver" pills, a well-known bulk laxative, milk of magnesia and ordinary mineral oil.

RELY ON this trustworthy medical evidence. You'll be pleased to find how effective Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets are.

"Depends. Usually not less than a couple of times a week, generally part of Sunday. I was there yesterday afternoon. The weather was perfect. I did over three hundred miles."

I watched him, caught in the tiny memory of a figure standing in the upstairs window of his house. I wondered, if he hadn't been at home, who it had been; or had it been no more than an illusion created by the sun?

I said, "I imagine you must have a lot of visitors in the summer. Anyone with a house near the sea finds himself embarrassingly popular in the holidays."

"Not me. Never have company. I prefer the place to myself."

We turned down a narrow lane. "This is where I've got to make a call. Will you be all right here? It's too muddy for exploring, I'm afraid."

He parked the Land Rover inside the farm gate and, giving me a salute of his hand, went off. Watching him go, I thought. Two loves. But my guess was he had three, and I wondered how his affection for an isolated, primitive house squared up with his love for a girl to whom luxury appeared to be a natural métier. In any case, it wasn't my problem. Yesterday I'd fallen in love with the Sea House, wished that it could be mine, but that feeling had changed on learning that it was already loved and, in spirit at least, belonged to someone else.

Major Tarrand was walking back toward the Land Rover when I saw a policeman on a bicycle come wobbling down the lane. He jumped off and the two men met by the car.

"Hello, Vanstone. Want me?"

"Yes, sir. I'm glad I caught you; it's saved me a journey up to the park."

"What's the trouble?"

"Well, sir, it's like this. That other boot of Mr. Esmond's has been washed up. It's got his name inside; makes a pair to the other one we found. Well, sir, sergeant was wondering what should rightly he done with it He asked Inspector Adkins ——"

"Inspector Adkins? What's he got to do with it? He's gone back to his headquarters, hasn't he?"

"No, sir. At least he did, sir, for a time, but he's back again and staying at the Arms. He arrived day 'fore yesterday."

"What for? What's he doing in Glissing?"

"I'm sure I don't know, sir. In all probability he took a fancy to the place when he was here before. Mayba he's on a little holiday, sir."

"A holiday. Do you know for certain he's on holiday?"

"I don't, sir. Now, about the boot, sir. What do you want done with it?"

"Dispose of it any way you please. Burn it, if it suits you, or put it in the trash can. But don't on any account come running up to the house with it. I don't want either Mrs. Elliot or Mrs. Esmond upset. That's quite understood, Vanstone?"

"Yes, sir. I wouldn't for the world upset either of the ladies. Good day, sir."

Major Tarrand got in, backed the car, and drove down the rutted lane at a pace that set me jolting in my seat.

"Country police are the end for thickheadedness," he said angrily. "If I hadn't run into him by chance Vanstone might have come cycling up to the house, Esmond's boot dangling from his handle bars."

Back at Glissing I found Mrs. West crossing to the stairs, a tray of tea in her hands.

"Oh, Miss Elliot, I think you should know that your grandmother isn't well I shouldn't disturb her if I were you."

"You mean she's ill?"

"Oh, it's nothing serious. She had one of her slight attacks an hour ago. She'll stay in bed for the rest of the day, and she told me to ask you to excuse her coming down to dinner."

I was feeling for the switch inside my bedroom when I noticed a lighted room opening off the same landing. Through the angle made by the door and the wall, I could see a small white bed the covers turned down and a blue fuzzy rabbit sitting on the pillow. I went toward it, paused on the threshold. On the floor beside the bed, his back to me, a small boy squatted over a pile of wooden blocks, his pajama legs rucked up above bony ankles, sparrow-thin legs.

"Hello, Timmy."

He slewed round as if he had been shot, scowled and then, presumably deciding I was not someone who had authority over him, went back to the building blocks. I stepped into the room, stood looking down on his silky coal-black hair still wet from his bath. I asked him what he was doing.

"Building a steamhouse."

I dropped to my knees beside him. "I don't think I know what a steamhouse is. Show me."

He looked up: our faces were nearly level. "Are you my aunt? Mummie said you were coming. Are you going to live here?"

"No. I'm just staying a little while."

"Do you want to see my steamhouse?"

"Yes, please." I bent closer. "What's that you've got inside?"

Grudgingly he shifted two blocks and I caught a glimpse of a pint tin traveling kettle before he jealously encased it again till only the tip of its spout showed. "Steam puffs out. Perhaps it won't tonight, but when daddy builds it, there's lots of steam."

"Did your daddy teach you to make a steamhouse?"

"Yes." He threw open his arms so wide that his dressing-gown sleeves dropped back to his shoulders. "He makes lots and lots of steam. I'm going to have a train, too, at Christmas. He's going to send it to me. It'll go fast, lots faster than I can go," and on all fours he was off, slithering under the bed, round to the hearthrug and back to me in a frenzy of exitement, while I watched and could find nothing to say.

From the doorway Lisa complained, "Timmy, you really are the limit. You promised me you'd stay in bed."

As she tucked him in she said, on a laugh, "The things children get attached to! He's got heaps of perfectly good toys, but all he cares about is a tin traveling kettle! Imagine, we had to fly all the way home in the plane with him nursing the beastly thing, even when he was having his meals!"

"It's my kettle," Timmy said obstinately, "my dear, darling little steam kettle."

In Edwina's sitting room after dinner, Lisa poured Mark and me a second cup of coffee.

I said, "You're sure Edwina is all right?"

"Oh, gracious, yes. It's just one of her usual attacks. A day's rest in bed and she'll be back to normal."

She crossed to the fireplace. This evening she was wearing a plain dove-gray wool dress, disarmingly simple, subdued. Her only jewelry was her wedding ring. The effect was to enhance the exquisite alabaster-and-primrose coloring, the delicately rounded figure.

"Mark!" She didn't raise her voice, and her smile stayed put, so that what she said came as a slight shock. "I think you should consider going back to London at once."

"Why?"

She turned toward him. "There really isn't any purpose in your staying, is there? I mean, Edwina will have to be told that this ridiculous idea she has of putting Danny's pictures on exhibition is doomed to disappointment. No reputable gallery would show them. And as for this equally ridiculous idea of your publishing Danny's diaries, that's insane, and quite out of the question. How far have you got with reading them?"

"About halfway."

"I think I should warn you that you're not going to be allowed to continue with your fascinating task. Edwina has decided that Danny wouldn't have wished his diaries to be published. She wants them returned to her first thing in the morning."

"I see." He considered her leisurely, without any hint of acrimony. "When I saw her last she made no mention of it. Has she changed her mind since?"

"Yes."

He nodded. "You changed it for her?"

"No. I merely pointed out that few people wanted their private thoughts put on display—their sacred thoughts."

"A little scene . . . a slight attack! You should have learned a gentler approach!"

"It was nothing of the sort. Edwina got flustered because of a telephone call ——"

"From whom?"

She shrugged. "No one you would know." Then she gave him a slightly warmer glance. "Honestly, Mark, it's no go. Edwina has finally made up her mind. The best course for you is to admit that you can't get any gallery to exhibit the pictures and—I'm sorry if I sound rude—go back to London."

"If Edwina's come to that conclusion, naturally I'll have to accept her decision," Mark said. "Just one thing."

"What?"

He smiled at her gently, then without a change of expression plunged in his stiletto. "I think it's up to her to tell me of it herself. To ask me for the return of the diaries."

"She'll tell you." She gave him a final, benedictory smile. Then she turned to me. "We're boring you, Charlotte. I'm so sorry. And now I'm going to ask you if you'll forgive me if I have an early night. Looking after Timmy all day has left me fit for nothing except bed."

When Mark had closed the door behind her, I waited, expecting him to sit down again. There was a jumble of questions I wanted to ask; a rising desire in me to sit near him and talk, unwind after the tensions of the day.

But he didn't sit down. For a minute he stood silent in the middle of the room, bound by his thoughts, and then he gave me a glance so perfunctory that I knew I was no more than a blur in his eyes. "You be all right, Charlotte? There's something I've got to do. I'll be in the gun room if you want me."

After he had gone, an unnatural, breath-held silence set me prowling restlessly round the room. I even lifted the piano lid and struck a chord. As the last note died, I was startled by a long burst of noise: a car in low gear, shifting into high and fading into the distance, as though it had pulled round from the stables and driven away down the drive. Lisa? But she had said she was going to bed. There was no one for me to ask.

I read for a while; then restlessness, a need to talk—to talk about Esmond—sent me into the gun room, where Mark sat at a desk, absorbed in what he was reading, heedless of the opening door.

"I'm gate crashing," I said.

"On the contrary, you couldn't be more welcome." He smiled. "I was just going to take a break anyway."

Beside him, on the floor, was an old-fashioned green safe, on it two piles of square, stiff exercise books.

"How far have you got with the diaries?" I asked.

"Quite a way. After dinner tonight, with the possibility of having them confiscated tomorrow, I cheated, skipped a few years, and took a few samples nearer the present day. But with his tiny writing it's slow going."

"In your place, I'd have been tempted to read the end first, when he was presumably writing about places and people you knew."

NEXT MONTH

The beat of the drums, the blare of trumpets and the rattle of cha-chas made an incredible row. The congestion was beyond description. The town seemed to have gone mad!

Furious at himself and worried, Murray elbowed his way into the Grande Place, his eyes searching everywhere. Somewhere in this bedlam Mary Benchley had disappeared. "There's something wrong with this place," she had said, "and the people in it. Something evil ——"

A. J. Cronin's new novel tells a story of emotional tensions, violence and suspense.

NATIVE DOCTOR

Complete, condensed, in the January Journal

"I did consider it, but I decided I was likely to get a more objective view of the diaries by plowing through them from the beginning. However, now I intend to spend the first part of the night finding out just what Danny did have to say about Glissing."

I sat on the sofa, not speaking, the need that had driven me into the room pressing in upon me. I stared hard above his head at a fish immured in a glass case. If I could concentrate on the highly glazed scales, the protruding eyes, count the fins, I was safe, I thought. But a sudden swell of emotion carried me forward helplessly, and I heard my voice crying, "Why must we talk about Danny? Won't anybody talk to me about Esmond? He's only been dead a month. What did he do, to make people say so little about him? Pull legs off flies, beat his wife and child? What did he do?"

On the dark fabric of my skirt I saw my hand shaking like an old woman's, and then there were fingers raising my chin, warm, firm lips closing on mine, staying there until the shaking was gone. I tasted peace and an emotion to which I was not ready to put a name. I wanted to stay there, not to question, to reason: just to take and go on taking. But I couldn't. I drew back, made my voice light. "Is that your cure for girls with hysteria?"

When he didn't answer I had to look up. He was standing beside me, the expression on his face both tender and triumphant, not touching me except for his hand which clasped my shoulder.

"I'm sorry to be such a fool," I said.

He sat down beside me. "If it's Esmond that's worrying you, I'll tell you as much about him as I know. All right?"

"Please," I said. "I don't care how bad he was; what he did. I just want to know."

"There was nothing particularly bad about Esmond, but, on the other hand, nothing outstandingly good. Except for the fact that he was uncommonly good-looking, there was nothing out of the ordinary about him: average brains, average athletic ability, and he was good-tempered, easygoing. You might have thought that he was exceptionally well endowed with qualities to make him happy, but, on the whole, no, he wasn't a happy man."

Mark's hand came out. It was a narrow, strong hand, but its touch as he turned my cheek toward him was surprisingly gentle. "I think the best way I can say what was wrong with Esmond is that the prospect of one day inheriting a fortune crippled him. If Edwina's money had never been there, or if he'd come into it sooner, he'd have been sound and whole. It was like the sight of a lovely rich piece of pie to a starving man—a piece of pie forever out of reach."

I moved my chin slightly, and he dropped his hand. "Physically, too, it wasn't good for him: the tension, the increasing uncertainty. From childhood he'd suffered from cardiac asthma, and emotional stresses were bad for him, led to attacks that laid him up for days. And remember, it wasn't only for himself that he wanted the money; it was for Lisa and Timmy. That's one good mark you can safely give him: he adored his wife and son."

"But she didn't love him, not when he died. She couldn't have."

He stared at me. "How do you know?"

"Because she's in love with someone else."

"Who?"

"Ivor Tarrand."

"You could be right. Lisa's the sort of girl who couldn't take life without a man. Tarrand? Well, he's handy. But how do you know?"

I shook my head. "It's too tricky to explain, but I am sure." Then I looked at him. "Mark, if you had a son of four and his mother was dead, would you tell him quite definitely that at Christmas she would be sending him a present. a specific present?"

His face, looking down at me, clouded with exasperation. "How on earth do you expect me to answer that one? How could I know?"

"That's what Timmy believes. That his father has only gone away, that at Christmas he'll send him an engine."

"I don't know." He shook his head, obviously baffled. "Maybe that's what's called breaking it to him gently. Give the devil his due, Lisa is genuinely fond of Timmy."

"Devil! Why do you call her a devil?"

"Figure of speech." The smile made his eyes brilliant. "Let's say she's not my type."

And the words, so light an exchange, warmed me. My image of Esmond was a little despoiled, but the disfigurement had been done with kindness and understanding.

"Feel better?" Mark touched my hand. "All you've got to do is to take Esmond down from his pedestal. It's not a comfortable perch for any man, living or dead."

The sea upheld me; all I could see was sky. I was no more than a dot of white swim suit floating on forty fathoms or so of sea.

"Had enough?" Mark's voice sailed over the water.

"Just about." But I didn't follow him immediately as he struck out for the beach. I trod water, looking shoreward at Glissing Cove, at the rose-colored cliff with its frosting of green turf. The Sea House lay behind the bluff, but I would see it when I got back to the beach.

Mark was toweling his head when my feet trod clear of the last curling wave. "Not bad for October, was it? Hurry and get some clothes on, and then I've got some coffee to warm us up."

When I came back from the cave where I'd undressed, he was in slacks and sweater, the vacuum flask uncorked. I took the cup. "There must be hundreds of caves along the cliffs, aren't there? They're honeycombed with them. You must have had an adventurous time here as a boy. Did you come often?"

"About half a dozen times."

"Did you ever stay in the Sea House?"

"One holiday, when I was twelve and Esmond nine. They farmed us out with Nanny, that old tartar, and another servant." He gave me a smile as he reached for my cup for a refill, but I sensed his thoughts were moving on a different plane from his words. Fatigue was written into his eyes, across the sharply regular planes of his face.

THE PERFECT GIFT!

IRRESISTIBLE SEAMLESS NYLONS

IN AN IRRESISTIBLE CHRISTMAS BOX

Didn't you go to bed at all last night?" I asked.

"Not till five."

"Did you get to the end of your reading?"

"Nearly not quite I'm going back now to finish the rest. Coming?"

If I'd thought it mattered to him I'd have jumped up, gone back to Glissing with him. But it obviously didn't, and suddenly I found myself reflecting bitterly that he'd kiss any girl in tears, any girl he was sorry for.

"Now I'm here I'll stay for a while and sunbathe."

He hesitated, then crouched beside me, where I lay face down on the beach. "I'd like nothing better than to stay here with you, but Edwina may snatch those diaries away from me at any moment, and I want at least to know what I'm losing." His finger was tracing the hairline at the back of my neck. I said nothing, and his finger stopped, became quite still. "You see, I'm not sure now that ——"

I turned my head sideways, and his hand dropped to the sand. "Sure about what?"

"Nothing." He jumped to his feet, and I turned my head back into my arms. "I need another couple of hours."

I heard his feet, soft on the sand, louder as he leaped from rock to rock, but always urgent, hurrying, and then no more. When I looked up he had passed from sight. I was left alone with the sea and the sky and the sea gulls. And the house.

From where I sat only the upper story and roof were visible. I got up, walked along the cove till I had a full sideways view. I had never seen a house anything like this one. I jumped the last sea pool, clambered up the low rock wall and stood on the lawn, staring at it.

If the house had betrayed the least sign of habitation, I should have stopped my trespassing, but it didn't. Major Tarrand was out, I knew, doing some business in Wellmouth, because Lisa had suggested we should meet him there for a drink. And the only other occupant was stone-deaf. I crossed the grass and walked up the flagged path to look in through the nearest window. The room inside appeared dark, and the reflection of light on the pane prevented me from seeing much except my own face peering back at me. Then, on the point of moving away, I stopped.

The sash window wasn't quite shut. The bottom half was raised about two inches. My fingers touched the satin-smooth oak window sill inside the room; on it lay a bronze paper knife, an ivory elephant, the bowl of a pipe. My palm folded round it, astonished, yet not sure why. The bowl was warm. I took my fingers away, uncertain whether in holding it I had made it so, or whether —— I looked behind me. The sun had shifted; it no longer bore down on the front of the house. My fingers moved to the tobacco, and jerked away. It was hot, still alight. Someone had only just put it down, hurriedly carelessly.

Then, as if some sense warned me I was being spied on, my eyes flew up to the window above my head. A hand, a man's hand, was round the curtain. Even as I stepped back a pace to better my view, it disappeared. There was nothing but two lengths of fabric framing an empty window.

My fingers were stretching out to test the pipe a second time when there was a shout not a dozen feet away from me.

"Go away. Go away, you nasty prying tourist. Shoo! Do you hear me?" Almost on top of me was an old woman, thin, tiny, but vitalized by rage, her limbs, black skirt and even her little black boots in a fury of movement. She was brandishing a man's umbrella.

I raised my hand to ward her off. "I'm sorry. It was very rude of me. But I'm Charlotte Elliot—Mrs. Elliot's granddaughter. I know Major Tarrand ——"

But it was hopeless: like a pocket-sized witch she was coming in to attack, beating the air with the umbrella, practicing the strokes with which, given a chance, she would have thrashed me. I shouted again, then remembered I was wasting my breath. She could only be Nanny, and she was stone-deaf.

There was only one thing to do: run. She came after me, shrieking, "Tourist, ill-mannered tourists! Don't come prying in here or I'll have the police on you. You've no right on private property."

I reached the plank bridge over the little stream, crossed it. Safe on the other side, I turned, gave her what was meant to be an apologetic salute. The little black doll was watching me, making sure I didn't return.

She'd gone in when I looked back again. The house was sealed and silent. I stared at the window where, once, a man had been briefly illumined by the sun; once a hand. The first time might have been imagination, but the second most assuredly hadn't been.

In some deep level of consciousness I was aware that a burst of hope, illogical and utterly baseless, was fighting for life.

I was nearly home when I saw a man walking toward me. The path was narrow; we had to pass, which meant that one of us would have to step into the brushwood. He did so, and with a nod of thanks my foot was lifted to pass on when he stopped, raised his hat. It was a black one, very much a town model, as were his dark overcoat, his thin shoes.

"Miss Elliot? I am addressing Miss Elliot, I believe." He was a short, plump man, and he was smiling pleasantly.

"Yes."

"Adkins—Detective Inspector Adkins. A few weeks ago I had the unhappy task of investigating your brother's death, Miss Elliot. You know, I expect, that his body was never recovered from the sea. We had to presume he was drowned. May I, belatedly perhaps, offer you my condolences on your loss?"

"Thank you."

"I'll walk back with you, if I may?"

"But you were going the other way."

"No matter; my main purpose was a stroll on this beautiful morning. It must be a great comfort for your grandmother to have you with her at this time. I understand she receives very few visitors; is that so?"

"I'm not familiar with her habits," I said. "But she's not well today."

"I'd like to have a little chat with her some time. In fact, I telephoned her yesterday afternoon, but after we'd been speaking a few moments we were cut off, and when I dialed the number again, the woman who answered said Mrs. Elliot was too ill to come to the telephone. I was sorry to hear that."

The orchard gate was directly ahead. "Perhaps you could tell me what you wanted to see her about, and I could pass on a message."

"I think, on the whole, it would be more satisfactory if I saw Mrs. Elliot. I'll telephone another time. Perhaps I'll be luckier." His hat off, he gave me a little formal bow. "Good day, Miss Elliot."

Edwina, reduced unwillingly to the temporary status of semi-invalid, was still a complete despot. This afternoon she was showing me photographs. By far the largest number were of her and my much-lamented grandfather, and as the afternoon wore on I came to the conclusion that photography must have been a flourishing art at the turn of the century.

She handed me a large carton of pictures we had looked at. "Put that on the top of the table over there. Move the telephone out of the way. It doesn't work any more, just clutters the place up."

I moved the telephone extension to make room for the box. "Has it been out of order long?"

"Since yesterday afternoon. It woke me up."

"Who was it?"

"How should I know, child? No one ever speaks distinctly on a telephone. Probably the vicar; he's forever trying to persuade me to subscribe to one of his funds. Said he wanted to come and see me—and then before I could make him understand that it would be useless for him to call, we were cut off. Something to do with one of the wires being broken, Lisa said. Well, it can stay broken. That's what upset me yesterday afternoon, being startled out of my sleep, getting out of bed in a hurry. I won't be plagued with it any more."

"Are you sure it was the vicar who telephoned? I met someone this morning who said he wanted to see you, and that he'd telephoned you. His name was Adkins."

"Never heard of him."

"He was a policeman."

"Then his name must either have been Garwell or Vanstone. You misheard him. Those are the only two policemen in Glissing."

"This man was a policeman in plain clothes, a detective, and said quite definitely he wanted to see you."

"Ah," and her smile was knowing, malicious "a great many people want to see me. Or that's what they say. But they don't want to see me at all or only as long as it takes me to sign my name on a check, and then they run away as fast as they can."

There was a knock on the door, and Ivy came in with the tea tray. In the commotion of clearing a space for it, Mark, whom I had not seen since he'd left me on the beach, stepped into the room.

Edwina threw him a glance of withering hostility. "Well, Mark Halliwell, and what have you got to say for yourself now that you've deigned to come and see me at last?"

Mark held out a letter to her. "I'm afraid, aunt, I've got a disappointment for you. This second letter has just arrived from Canning, the gallery man, in reply to my telephone call to him."

"Read it to me. You know I can't see typewriting without my glasses. What does he say?"

It was a short, concise letter. Mr. Canning regretted that after further consideration of the paintings it was obvious that his gallery would not be suitable for an exhibition of the late Mr. Wargrave's work.

Mark folded the letter in the envelope laid it on the foot of the bed. "I'm sorry I know how much it means to you, but I'm afraid I can't do any more.

There was a bright stain across Edwina's cheekbones; her voice was hoarse. "There are other galleries. You must write to them."

"No. Canning was my only personal contact. In any case, the answer would be the same. The quality of Danny's paintings, whatever else you may think, isn't up to exhibition standard. They are precious to you, naturally, because of their associations, but they'd have insufficient merit in the eyes of an expert."

"It's not true. Danny was a great artist. If he had lived he'd have been recognized as such. You're like all the rest, incapable of keeping a promise if it involves you in any trouble." She was all anger now, thumping the bed. "And what's more, Mark Halliwell, I've decided that I don't wish to have Danny's diaries published. I regret now I ever let you touch them. They're to be returned to me immediately. This instant, do you understand?"

Mark laid a key among the jumble on Edwina's bedside table. "I'd already decided that it was I who'd made an error in judgment. The diaries would not after all make a satisfactory book. I've put them all back in the green safe. There's the key. No one else can touch them while you keep it." He spoke with the utmost kindness, without rancor or hint that he had met defeat. I was astounded. "One thing, aunt," he added. "Take good care of them. Don't trust them to anyone. Perhaps, if you could bring yourself to do it, it would be a good idea if you had them burned."

"Burned!" Her voice rose to a crescendo of horror.

"Well, in any case, keep them safe from prying eyes."

"You pried."

"And I've returned them to you intact," he said as he turned toward the door.

"What made you decide to give up the diaries without a fight?" I asked Mark. He and I were having coffee by ourselves in the drawing room after dinner. Ivor and Lisa had left to attend a party in the neighborhood—a long-standing invitation, Lisa had said.

"Oh, that!" Mark's voice was light, without a shading of regret, even remembrance that twenty-four hours before the diaries had been of supreme importance to him. "I changed my mind. Aren't you glad, Charlotte? I thought you'd congratulate me."

"I don't understand you."

"Oh, for heaven's sake, what does it matter! I've handed the diaries back to Edwina, washed my hands of them and Danny's deplorable paintings. I'm in the clear." His voice became warm, compelling. "And now I've got you to myself for a little while. What better luck could I have?"

"Mark," I said tensely, "I've got something I want to tell you. I've been waiting to tell you ever since before lunch."

"Something's happened?" He leaned forward and for a moment our faces were so close that our breaths must have mingled. "Obviously it has. What, Charlotte?"

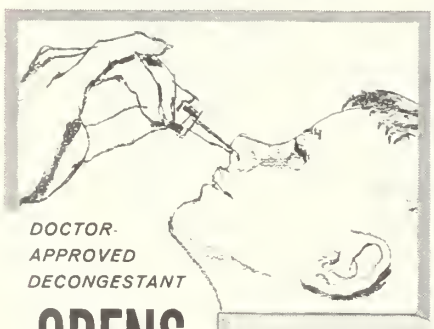
For a long moment I hesitated. "It's something about Esmond," I said at last.

I saw him relax, slump back away from me.

"Esmond is dead, Charlotte. Stop trying to dig up pieces of his life. Believe me, Esmond wasn't the man to relish your doing that."

"Esmond isn't dead."

His glance was that of a man called upon to reassess in a split second a situation trans-



NEW! SPECIAL FORMULA
Cherry Tasting ST. JOSEPH COUGH SYRUP FOR CHILDREN with amazing Supressin* "breaks circuit" to "cough reflex center"—
CONTROLS COUGHS
DUE TO COLDS
UP TO 6 FULL HOURS

*Plough's brand of d-Methorphan Hydrobromide

Up to twice as effective as codeine! Safe, non-narcotic. St. Joseph Cough Syrup For Children with Supressin acts through blood stream to block cough impulses from the brain. Controls coughs in a new scientific way not possible with ordinary cough syrups.

Cools, soothes irritated throat, loosens sticky mucus for easy expectoration; helps to open breathing passages. Child gets sleep to speed quick recovery.

DOCTOR-APPROVED DECONGESTANT
OPENS STUFFY NOSE
ST. JOSEPH NOSE DROPS FOR CHILDREN with NEO-SYNEPHRINE
AQUEOUS and ISOTONIC CONTAINS NO OIL
Plough, Inc.
CHECKS SNIFFLES, SNEEZES

Physicians recommend St. Joseph Nose Drops For Children because they contain approved decongestant Neo-Synephrine,* plus other preferred medication.

Quickly shrinks swollen membranes, opens stuffy nose, checks sniffles and sneezes. Your child breathes easier, is more comfortable . . . right away!

Children welcome these specialized nose drops because they contain no oil—no sting. Pleasant to use.

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

*Reg. Trademark of Winthrop-Stearns, Inc

From the makers of St. Joseph Aspirin For Children

formed out of all knowledge: wary, calculating, a little afraid. But his voice remained cool, undisturbed. "Esmond was drowned nearly five weeks ago. If your belief is based upon the fact that his body was never recovered, let me tell you that the bodies of men drowned off this coast are very seldom available for burial. That is the fault of the strong currents, and the rocks that lie ten miles offshore. Is that why you say Esmond isn't dead?"

"No."

"Then suppose you tell me your reasons."

It was obvious, I told him, that the police were still interested in Esmond, that Inspector Adkins was trying to see Edwina. I told him of the shadow I'd glimpsed at the window of the Sea House, the first day I'd arrived at Glissing when Ivor had been at the flying club; of the hand against the curtains this morning; of the pipe with the smoldering tobacco on the window sill, though Major Tarrand—as I had ascertained at dinner—did not smoke a pipe and had been in Wellmouth at the time.

All the while Mark watched me stonily, not uttering a syllable to indicate whether my careful arguments swayed his opinion.

"And what use," I finished, "do you imagine an old woman of over eighty would be to Major Tarrand, if he didn't need her to look after someone who was sick, someone she'd always nursed when he was ill?"

"And your idea is that Esmond is being kept a prisoner at the Sea House?"

"Not necessarily a prisoner. Why should he be a prisoner?"

"Why should he be hiding there at all? If you are right, and he is alive, why should he

Help Others
At Christmas
Through
The Salvation Army

have staged this elaborate masquerade of playing dead?"

"I don't know. How could I know?"

He shrugged. "You haven't bothered to think that far, have you? You've seized on a wild supposition and you're hanging on to it like grim death. For heaven's sake, let go."

I said, "All right, you think I'm a credulous fool. Maybe I am. Maybe I'm not. I'm going to find out. I'm going down to the Sea House."

I got up. His hand came down on my wrist in a grip I could not shift. Eyes, blue-black, glittering with anger, looked back at me. I thought in the turn of a second, This is the end: a pain in my wrist; words that can never be forgiven. Then the pain was no longer there. His face had softened into an expression of self-derogatory exasperation.

"Sorry, Charlotte, did I hurt you? I didn't mean to. All right, you're going to the Sea House. I can't stop you. So"—he smiled—"in that case I'll have to go with you."

"No."

"But yes. You're in no position to be proud, you know. Those cliffs aren't safe after dark even when you know every inch of them. And you haven't a hope of getting into the house without my help."

"No," I said, suddenly frantic, "I don't want you."

He took not the slightest notice of my protest. "Go and get into something warm, slacks if you have them. I'll find a flashlight, meet you in the hall in five minutes."

I struggled into slacks, thick jersey, tied a scarf over my head. When I came back down, Mark was there, silently waiting for me.

"All set?"

"Yes." I stood by his side, looking up at him. He leaned forward to tuck the scarf in the back of my jersey. "But one thing I don't understand. If I can't get in the Sea House, how are you going to be able to?"

"Because I stayed there as a kid, as I told you, and the house hasn't yet been built that is burglarproof to a twelve-year-old boy." He went forward, opened the door and waited for me to pass. As I did so, he said softly, "In fact, I'm the perfect if unwilling accomplice."

It was the end of an argument. We were both committed. In a little while I should know whether Esmond was alive or dead.

We emerged on the crest of the headland, and began the slippery descent to the little creek. There was scarcely any wind, but some distant power had unleashed the pulses of the sea, and the sound of it sweeping the sand, then folding back upon itself, was like the continuous beat of low thunder.

The plank bridge complained, first under his weight, then under mine. On the firm, soft grass we paused and stood, close, looking ahead through the dark at the squat, solid shape of the Sea House. Bleak and night-bound, it held no enchantment for me now: it was merely four walls which had the power to trample my hope to ashes. I shivered, and stumbled against Mark. He did not move; he, too, like me, was staring at the house.

I said urgently, "Let's go."

He moved then, not toward the house, but to me. "It's not too late, even yet. You can still turn your back on this crazy idea. Charlotte ——"

The pressure of his arm was round my shoulder. His hold tightened. Then his hand was on my throat, turning my head up. For a moment the faint light showed me his face, then his lips were on mine. It was the second time he had set loose in me a wild upsurge of emotion against which I had no defense, wanted none.

Our lips parted, but we were close still, his fingers on my cheek. I whispered, "Why . . . now . . . at this moment . . . here?"

He said softly, "You don't choose the place, darling. It's suddenly there, and the moment can't wait."

I was at peace, where I'd longed to be all day, drinking in the murmur of his voice.

He drew away from me a little space. "Let's go back, darling. Charlotte, my sweet, crazy little love, I've so much ——"

"No."

That small, sharp denial struck the love, the gentleness from his voice, his arms.

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Charlotte, don't interfere. Leave it. I know ——" He stopped as if he'd bitten his tongue.

"What do you know? You know something that you won't tell me?"

"Nothing." He wasn't touching me any longer. "I don't know anything except that I love you, I want to save you from ——"

"From what?"

"From yourself, your ridiculous sentimental obsession."

"You won't explain ——"

But his eyes were once more on the house, and when he spoke it was in the cool, matter-of-fact tone he might have used to another man: "All right, have it your own way."

He took my hand and guided me to the side of the house. We stood looking, through a gap in the curtains, into a kitchen. It had a flagstone floor, a square wooden table, and facing us, seated in a rocking chair, black boots on the range fender, was the fierce little witch who'd shooed me off the doorstep.

The chair rocked: back, forth, back again. My nerves tightened: she seemed to be staring directly at us. Then I saw that behind the steel-rimmed glasses the eyelids were sealed. She was asleep. My glance shifted, caught by a bright silver object above her head.

"A bell! What's it doing there?"

"Tarrand's grandfather brought it back from America. It's a bell from a railroad engine. When you get close you can read the name, Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe."

"But what's it used for?"

"Nothing." His hand closed over my shoulder. "Let's get going. I had to make sure where she was. Any noise we make won't disturb her, but I didn't want to surprise her prowling round upstairs. Can you climb this shed? I'll go first and pull you up."

Before I gained the sloping roof of the shed that adjoined the house I was bruised, winded. Mark edged along the ridgepole and across onto the narrow window sill. There was the sound of wood straining against wood, and then the grumble of the window going up.

He beckoned, held out his hand. I slithered and scrambled, then, when he told me to, jumped. We were inside.

Suddenly it was pitch-dark. Panic struck me without warning: frantically I whispered Mark's name. My hand caught his sleeve, and simultaneously he flicked on the flashlight, aimed its beam ahead of us. The light touched the head of a flight of stairs, then rested successively on three doors, fastened on a fourth.

"Well, it's all yours, Charlotte," he said coolly. "Don't you want to start looking?"

No fondness in his voice now. No pleading. He was an eyewitness, not a participant.

Three bedrooms, all so neat, so Spartan that they gave no clue to their occupants. The fourth door gave on to a short, steep flight of steps leading up to an attic.

In a niche near the top of the main stairs there was a tiny oil lamp. By its light we felt our way downward. The hall below was long. I could make out the solid oblong of the front door ahead. To the right was another door, half open, the room beyond it dark.

And opposite that open door was one that was closed, dark, except for a very small shape of gold halfway down—a keyhole with no key in it to block the light that shone inside.

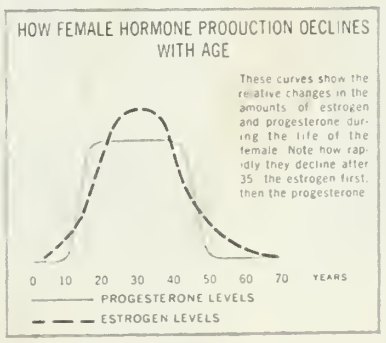
I put out my hand. It made no contact. I turned, startled, and saw Mark walking toward the open door. I heard the scrape of a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 115

How New Wonder Drug Face Cream Restores Young Look to Skin

A Report by Helena Rubinstein

What makes young skin so firm, resilient, smooth? It is rich in the two vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone. These are the very hormones that have helped shape every inch of every woman from Venus to you and me—the same hormones contained in my new Ultra Feminine® Face Cream.



Why does a maturing woman need a supplement of these hormones? As she gets older, her body does not produce estrogen and progesterone as lavishly as before (see chart below). We see the difference in the skin—the dryness, the age lines.

HELENA RUBINSTEIN
First Lady of Beauty Science

Almost every one of us, in an attempt to turn the tide, has tried many of the oils and moisture ingredients that are on sale everywhere. No surface additive of moisture, no man-made lubricant can duplicate the results of nature's own precious estrogen and progesterone.

Throughout my life, I have sought to recapture the female hormone benefits of young skin for the mature skin. Out of my exciting research with the celebrated Dr. Joseph Kapp of Vienna, some thirty years ago, came the first estrogenic hormone face cream. It won half the battle against aging skin.

In recent years I have again been involved in a vast and exciting hormone research project, this time aided by doctors, research scientists, hospitals, universities, clinics all over the United States. The result is my Ultra Feminine Face Cream, the first face cream to contain both vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone.

Medical tests show that Ultra Feminine actually reverses two aging processes of the skin! Now you can look young again!

With renewed estrogen, the cells deep within the skin layers can hold maximum moisture once again. These cells, plumped out once more, support the surface firmly. Lines smooth out. Wrinkles due to dryness are reduced. Young skin tone is restored. With the help of progesterone the oil glands are reactivated to produce at a younger rate again. The skin is soft, dewy, protected. The whole expression of the face looks more youthful!

Ultra Feminine actually replenishes physiological substances within the skin. It comes to you with the highest recommendation, for it meets the same rigid testing as drugs in a doctor's prescription.

Because skin cannot store up hormones, I urge you to give your skin its daily hormone quota: use Ultra Feminine every night. Within one month, your skin will look—and act—young again, and continued use will maintain these results—at a cost of pennies a day—$3.50 for a 30-day supply, $5.50 for 60 days.

You will be fascinated to find out how the female hormones determine your womanliness—how they put lustre in the hair, softness in the voice. Write to me for my free booklet, "The Hormones That Make You Every Inch a Woman" which includes a special section of Vital Statistics of American Womanhood. Address your request to Helena Rubinstein, Department C, 655 Fifth Avenue, New York 22, New York.

© 1960, Helena Rubinstein, Inc.

Advertisement

#5672 A McCALL'S PATTERN EXCLUSIVE BY HANNAH TROY

For Women who Dream Big

Christmas dreams are special dreams. A little sparklier . . . a little bigger . . . even a little more likely to come true.

That's why many women confess their holiday hopes involve not just a sewing machine—but a SINGER* sewing machine, like the SLANT-O-MATIC* machine pictured above.

Lets you blind stitch hems, mend, embroider . . . just "tune" the knob to the stitch you want. The exclusive slant-needle angles forward to give you much better sewing visibility.

But you have to sew on this SINGER dream to appreciate its brilliance. See it, and its sister machine, the talented SLANT-O-MATIC Special. They are the only zig-zag machines for home sewing made in America by American craftsmen.

Big dreams start at SINGER for as little as $59.50

SLANT-NEEDLE Deluxe. Finest straight-stitching machine you can buy. Available as a portable or in a wide range of cabinet styles.

SINGER "Young Budget" machine with complete set of attachments. Sews beautifully; backtacks. Matching green portable case or furniture cabinet.

The SPARTAN* . . . handy economy model with basic features of machines costing twice as much. Back-tacking, drop-in top bobbin. Only $59.50.

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

Also headquarters for rug and floor cleaning equipment.
Listed in your phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHIN 'PANY

*A TRADEMARK OF THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY

ONTINUED FROM PAGE 113

atch, the clink of a lamp chimney within e moonlit room.

I waited, but he did not return. And then I iew. Having brought me to the end of my arch, he had abandoned me to whatever I ould find.

I stared, as if hypnotized, at the golden key- ole. I crossed the hall, and softly, as surrepti- ously as if I were indeed the thief whose part was acting, I opened the door.

It creaked in protest, and at the sound, loud the stillness, the man who was sitting in an mchair facing the door, oil lamp beside him, oked up from his book, took a pipe out of s mouth.

We stared at each other for a handful of conds, and then he rose, so quickly that the ook dropped to the floor.

"Charlotte! It is Charlotte, isn't it? Yes, it ust be."

And because he came toward me so eagerly, s voice warm with welcome; because he niled as if he found nothing but profound elight in the sight of me, I began to cry.

UNICEF GREETING CARDS HELP NEEDY CHILDREN

Would you like to help a new mother and child condemned to hunger and illness? Proceeds from a single box of UNICEF Christmas cards can provide them with 100 days' supply of vitamin tablets. A brochure picturing the cards is available, free, from the U. S. Committee for UNICEF, Greeting Card Department, United Nations, New York.

He stood very close, looking down into my ice. "You're not very big, Charlotte, but ou're too big to cry."

The uprush of tears was brief. I was labor- ig under an almost stupefying sense of per- onal triumph: it was almost as if I, by a lind, obstinate belief, had given Esmond life.

As I brushed my cheeks dry, he smiled, led ie to the chair in which he had been sitting. I'm so glad Lisa decided to tell you. I've been gging her on to ever since you arrived."

A dark hand raised itself against my joy. But Lisa didn't tell me."

"Then how did you know?" His voice oughened, and I could see his muscles tight- ning, as if he were tensed for instant flight. If Lisa didn't tell you, how did you know /here I was; that I was alive?"

I broke in, desperate to allay his fear. "I ame because a lot of small things made me hink . . . well, that you might be here. But here's no need to be afraid. They wouldn't ave meant a thing to anyone else. Even I adn't a clue as to whether I was right or com- letely crazy before I walked into this room. I till can't believe that it really is you."

I looked up, taking my fill of him. His hair, little too long, was light brown, the bones of is face under the lightly tanned flesh mod- led in a symmetry that would have pleased he most critical eye. Even as he was then, ense, nerve-ridden, there was a stamp of legance about him, a fluid grace, and that ura that defeats words: charm.

But he had kept a measuring glance fixed n me, from eyes so narrowed that I could ot, in that lamplit room, guess their color. I ensed doubt suspicion grow in him, so that, gain, I cried out, "Esmond, you needn't anic. I tell you, no one but me would have guessed. It was a dozen little things: your pipe on the window sill, your hand on the upstairs curtain . . . a glimpse of you on the day I arrived, when no one was supposed to be in the house but Nanny. In the end, all I actually knew was that someone was here."

"The devil you did!"

"But you must have seen me too!"

"Of course I did. I didn't bargain on your being able to see me from the cliff. And this morning I heard your steps on the path. You might have been anybody. I had to look. It's not an easy business playing dead for nearly five weeks, I can tell you." He turned his back on me in a quick gesture of displeasure.

I took a deep breath. "Why did you want everyone to think you were dead? You faked your own death, didn't you? Why?"

With a swift movement that was all grace, he swung about. He was smiling again, but his face was haggard, and I thought, He looks old, years older than he should.

"You don't know? Lisa didn't tell you?"

"No."

"You can't blame her, I suppose. It's a pretty sordid story, particularly when you don't know the people involved." He stopped suddenly. And then he said accusingly, "But you've heard of Danny, haven't you?"

"Yes. Almost as soon as I arrived at Glissing I heard all about Danny."

"Not all." His voice was cool; somewhere there was a note of arrogance in it. "Not all, little sister, not quite all." An then he added almost as if he'd been conscious of that note of unseemly pride, and was anxious to cloak it with a casual modesty, "You don't, for instance, know that I killed him."

The silence that possessed the room after his last words died away was a physical thing, crowding into every corner, squeezing out the air itself. Esmond watched me as I fought for words, even for one coherent thought.

It came: This was what Mark had known. But how? The answer would have been plain to a child: the diaries. But a dead man can't write. Danny, still living, couldn't have accused Esmond of killing him.

"Sorry, Charlotte, if I've shocked you. I had to give it you straight on the chin." My brain still wasn't functioning normally. I lost whole sentences of what he was saying, they were no more than a meaningless drone. And then my ears began working. "Daniel Wargrave was a miserable, posturing little cheat. He broke every common rule of decency. In the end he got what he deserved. Unfortunately for me, I happened to be the chosen instrument."

Carefully I smothered the horror, even the surprise out of my voice before I spoke. "But you didn't murder him?"

"First-degree murder? Perhaps not. I took a gun and shot him. And when I found he was dead I had my first happy moment for months. To the average jury that would spell murder. If I could have brought him to life, I wouldn't have done so."

I said with a revival of spirit, "It seems a clumsy way to commit murder if, to get away with it, you have to fake your own death."

"You don't think all this was deliberate? Even making an end of Danny wasn't worth the hell I've been through these last weeks."

"What did you mean to do?"

"Scare him. Give him such a fright that he'd take to his heels and run, and we'd be rid of him. That's all I intended."

He leaned forward into the light. "I'd had ten months of watching him worm his way into Edwina's affections. Fawning on her: playing the piano, reading her to sleep, painting his little daubs for her, taking her driving, waiting on her every minute of the day and half the night if need be, flattering her until any decent man would have been sick to the stomach. By the time he'd been in the house six months she'd made a will leaving him every penny she possessed except for an annuity to me of a thousand a year. That's the sort of louse he was. He was prepared to steal my money, Lisa's and Timmy's, leave us to exist on a pittance while he was a near-millionaire."

"Danny died on the night of the fire. How?"

"As you say, on the night of the fire. But things had been working up to a crisis for weeks. What brought it on happened to be a dinghy I'd bought. I'd always had a boat down here, even as a boy, and I had borrowed

SINGER has a Gift for Floor Care

VACUUMS FROM $49.50

SINGER* "Magic Carpet"

For gentle but extra-thorough cleaning of fine carpets. Automatically adjusts to any nap, or to bare floor. Has dual-fan suction, king-size bag and headlight. Reaches w-a-y under low furniture, hangs flat to store.

*GOLDEN GLIDE Cleaner

Terrific suction for maximum cleaning power. Rolls without snagging: stands up for stair cleaning or storage. Has triple-capacity throw-away bag, comes complete with accessories.

SINGER "Roll-A-Magic"

Matches the cleaning power of many vacuums costing twice as much! Rolls along with you while you work. With attachments, only $49.50.

RUG-CLEANING FLOOR POLISHERS FROM $29.95

New from SINGER

This wonderful, work-saving appliance scrubs, waxes, polishes floors—shampoos rugs, too! Built-in dispenser with fingertip control releases liquids through brushes. De Luxe Model (shown), $59.95. Economy, $29.95.

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

Listed in your phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHINE CO.

*A trademark of THE SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.

enough from Ivor to make the down payment on this one. Edwina wasn't to know, and neither was Danny.

"But somehow Danny got wind of it; he got a look at it and, true to form, he told Edwina. When she found out I'd got it on the installment plan, she threw a tantrum, threatened if I didn't return it the next day, she'd turn Lisa and me and Timmy out of the house.

"And Danny strutted about like a peacock. He sat in Edwina's big chair and jeered that by tomorrow I'd have lost my boat. Edwina had asked him to come down here and make sure I took it back. Silly, when you come to think of it, that the straw that broke my back was a boat; not even a decent seaworthy yacht, but a twelve-foot dinghy. But I had a right to it, and I was going to keep it. Danny might be going to filch Edwina's fortune from me, but I wasn't going to let him rob me of that dinghy."

As Esmond spoke I saw the stubborn set of his mouth.

"Eventually, after an ugly scene, he did roll off to bed. Lisa went up soon after. That left Ivor and me to chew the fat and try and find some way of getting rid of him. You see, in a way, Ivor stood to lose as much as Lisa and me. Not only would Danny have delighted in firing him as soon as he was in a position to do so, but he'd have had to leave this house." He glanced round, shrugged his shoulders. "God knows why, but he's attached to the place, because his family once owned it.

"It must have been about midnight that one of us, me in all probability, decided the only hope was to scare Danny rigid, make him believe that if he stayed on some physical harm would catch up with him."

He paused so long that I said, "How were you going to scare him? How could you hope to persuade him to go?"

His head was angled away from me. "I took a gun along. An old rifle that had belonged to my father. The idea was to threaten him with it. We'd pictured him in bed, imagined we'd have to shake him awake; but when we got there he was still prowling round that so-called studio, admiring those ghastly daubs of his. When he saw the gun he was scared, all right, but perhaps because he had so much at stake, more than would ever come his way again if he lost it, he didn't lose his head. I told him it was loaded and that if he didn't pack up and clear out, I'd let him have it. He laughed. He went on laughing. He had the foulest laugh I've ever heard, like a pig squealing. Then suddenly he came at me, fists beating the air, screaming that not only was I going to lose the dinghy next day, but he was going to take the gun from me, take it to Edwina." He stopped. "And that's your story, little sister. I fired and he dropped dead at my feet. I couldn't have missed him if I'd tried and I didn't try. When I bent down and found his heart had stopped beating, it was a glorious moment. One of the best I've ever had. I thought, 'Danny's dead. I've cooked his goose forevermore. That serves him right for trying to do me out of my boat.' You're shocked, aren't you? Shocked to the marrow of your soul, if souls have marrows. But if you'd known Danny you'd have felt the same."

He seemed to be waiting for my confirmation, and when I couldn't force it through my lips he went on with satisfaction: "Neither Ivor nor I panicked. We sat down, smoked a cigarette and thought what to do. We hadn't intended to kill him, but since it had worked out that way, we didn't spill any tears over his corpse. The way out was obvious, but none the less foolproof for that. There were two old oilstoves in his rooms, and we kicked over one of them. Then all we had to do was make sure there were a couple of Danny's oil paintings nearby, a few bottles of turpentine and other inflammables, shut the door and walk away.

"Ivor went up to the room he uses when he sleeps at the house. Nobody was in the west wing except Danny. And I ——" He stopped dead. His rage was so unexpected that it took me by surprise. He jumped up from his chair and began striding up and down the room as if only physical movement could support his fury. "All I had to do was to clean the gun, put it back, go to bed too. But I had to be clever. I went round the house and threw it into the lake. As I came back I could see the flames scarlet in the windows. Then I got undressed, rumpled my bed, waited ten minutes, and when the west wing was well afire, I woke Lisa, roused the house and called the fire brigade. By the time they arrived, that side of the house was blitzed. There wasn't a reason in the world to think we hadn't got away with it. We didn't have a qualm—not until, at the request of the police, the inquest on Danny was adjourned."

He became stationary, standing above me. I didn't look up. I didn't want to see his face, but his voice was quietly casual. "You see, Charlotte, we hadn't let Danny's corpse burn quite long enough. The coroner had found the bullet, lodged in his spine—not that we knew that, until a few days later when a C.I.D. man, a certain Inspector Adkins, began making inquiries." He paused, and I heard the splatter of rain against the window.

"It didn't take the law long to pinpoint the one man who'd wished Danny Wargrave dead. Not, of course, that they ever came right out with it. They remained thoroughly polite, just inviting my co-operation. It was the devil's own luck that when they came to the house that last time, asking to see my rifle, I was here with Ivor. As I wouldn't have been able to produce the gun if I'd been there, they'd have had me.

"Lisa put them off with a tale that Ivor and I had gone out with the gun to do a little shooting, and might not be back for hours. As soon as they'd gone, she telephoned me here.

"And that was it. I was about to be arrested. Danny, damn his rotten little soul, had won, even though he was in his grave. Even if I was lucky and got away with a verdict of manslaughter, I was finished forever as far as Edwina's money went. She'd know I'd killed her darling. The only hope was to get something out of her for Lisa and Timmy." He sat down, beat a fist into the palm of his hand. "There wasn't any time: no more than five minutes to think up a plan to save my neck. Ivor and I could only come up with one idea between us: I was to play dead. A gale was blowing up, so Ivor rushed back to the house, concocting some story that I'd changed my mind about the shooting and decided to sail. I took the dinghy out, abandoned it two miles offshore. By that time it was getting dark, and I swam into the cove without being seen. There nearly wasn't any fake about it, though: I came close to drowning in that sea."

"And the police really believed you were dead?"

"They were very suspicious. They had the coast watched for days and even searched this house. I had to stay in my private burrow for forty-eight hours, and that set off one of my blasted asthma attacks. We had to get Nanny over here to nurse me."

I looked round the dark, comfortless room, and shivered at my thoughts.

"So far we've had a fiendish run of bad luck." He leaned his head against the back of the chair, as if his strength had run out. "You weren't exactly a piece of good news, you know!"

"I don't count, not in that way. I don't want any of Edwina's money." His head had come upright, and the light from the lamp struck his face. Because I couldn't bear the weight of the suspicion that was in his glance, I blurted out, "You'll never get away with it."

"Yes, we will." The spirit that had sagged a moment before was buoyant again. "We will, Charlotte, we will. At long last, we're in sight of the end. After Saturday night I won't be around to be caught, not by them."

"Where will you be?"

"Never mind where. All I've got to do is to reach Wellmouth. There's no moon, and at one A.M. Sunday, at high tide, Sam Webster will be waiting with his yacht. As soon as I'm aboard, he'll set out for Cherbourg. There I'll be picked up by Souvisant, who runs a smuggling racket between North Africa and the Balearics. He's promised I can jump ship at any port I please." He grinned like a small boy talking of a picnic excursion. "And I've got a new passport. Ivor wangled that. From Saturday night I'm Erik Appelberg, journalist, born in Stockholm. Don't you think I'll make a good Swede?"

"Until another Swede starts up a conversation with you."

"Oh, I know enough to get me by in a crisis." He reached for his pipe. "Poor Charlotte, I have shaken you! I'm sorry. But it'll go all right on Saturday. Everything's timed to a split second. The eight miles between here and Wellmouth are a cinch. I know this coast, every rock and pool of it, like the back of my hand. I grew up on it. There isn't a policeman or a coast guard who'd stand a chance against me. If it came to a chase—and it won't—I'd back myself against any flatfoot living; furthermore, I've got my own way out of here. By Sunday morning I'll be in France."

As he spoke I'd been watching the door move inward. I was on my feet before it was fully open, and my movement startled Esmond. With an oath he jumped up.

It was only Mark, but the cry of relief that came to my tongue was stifled before it found sound. There was no smile on Mark's face; no kindness in it. He gave forth such an impression of chill ruthlessness that instinctively my hand went out to protect Esmond.

"Mark!" Esmond's cry was explosive.

"He came with me," I said.

Esmond's glance swung round. "And he's been here all this time, hiding somewhere? Did you need a witness when you and I met? Someone to eavesdrop? Is that it?"

"I brought her, when I'd done my utmost to persuade her not to come" Mark said. "And if it sets your mind at rest, Esmond, I'm too tall to be comfortable listening at keyholes. I heard nothing. After hanging about in an icy room for over an hour, I consider this reunion has lasted long enough." He gave a businesslike glance at his watch. "Nearly ten, Charlotte, and there's half a gale blowing. I suggest we push off."

"Where to?" As he spoke Esmond's fist doubled. "Now you've found me out, what do you propose to do about it? Run to the police? I warn you, Mark, don't try it!"

I said, "Esmond, please. Mark would be no more likely to run to the police than I would. He ——"

Suddenly Esmond checked me. "Quiet, Charlotte. I want to listen."

He moved to the curtains, parted them to catch the final cough of a car engine before it was switched off. "O.K. It's Lisa's car. Ivor promised to bring her home this way."

We heard the click of a key in a lock, the front door opening, the sound of high heels on a hardwood floor. Lisa, hair streaming in a wet mask across her face, her evening shoes muddied, came into the room at a run. Her eyes were blurred with terror.

Esmond's arms flew out, salvaged her from fear and held her as tightly as if she were his whole world and we two were threatening to steal it from him. "It's all right, my darling." He spoke to her soothingly. "Charlotte knows all about me. She's taken it very well. Didn't I tell you all along we should trust her? As for Mark ——"

From the door, Major Tarrand barked. "What's going on here?"

"Plenty." Esmond answered. "Mark's arrived on the scene. Consequently there are a few things to be settled right now."

Mark said, "Nothing's going to be settled tonight. Charlotte and I are leaving."

"Wait!" I turned my head at the harsh imperative command, stared reluctantly at Ivor Tarrand, and knew that I was seeing him for the first time. The amiable man with the rich, booming laugh did not exist any more. A different human being stood in his place: ruthless, steel-cold. "Just where do you propose to go and for what purpose?"

Mark's voice was crisp. "I quite understand that my arrival on the scene is hardly welcome. That's why I propose to remove myself and Charlotte at once." His glance traveled from Esmond to Ivor. "And much as you both may resent the idea, there's not much you can do about it, short of murder, and I'm assuming you don't want another on your hands."

Esmond cried, "So you do listen at keyholes!"

"I don't need to. A child could work it out. It's unfortunate for you that I happen to know that for the last months of his life Wargrave was convinced you'd try to murder him. He spent a lot of time conjecturing what means you'd employ: brute force, poison or a faked accident. Presumably you chose the latter. I'm not particularly interested." He turned on Tarrand. "Is the Land Rover in the garage?"

"Why?"

"Because I intend to borrow it to take Charlotte back to Glissing, to save her a soaking."

"It won't be much use to you without the keys. And I certainly don't propose to hand those over, let you walk out of here and drive to the police station."

"All this is rather silly, isn't it?" Lisa said, soft-voiced, demurely smiling: the ingenuous mediator in a men's foolish and brutish quarrel f course Esmond and Ivor are upset at you d Charlotte breaking in like this. So am But why should we all jump to the conclu- n you'll go to the police? What would you ve to gain? I don't think Charlotte would nk very kindly of you, Mark, if you denied mond his last, his very last chance." She ned to me. "Would you, Charlotte?"

And suddenly all their eyes were focused on . "Of course I want him to have a chance," aid. "He shall have it."

"There," Lisa's voice soothed. "Danny's th was an accident, Mark. Whatever you y think, Esmond certainly never planned murder him. You know as well as I do that nny's diaries were the ravings of a semi- niac. He had a persecution complex. And for Esmond being punished for any part he d in Danny's death, he has been punished; ll go on being punished for a long ——"

Tarrand broke in. "All this is very well. t we want a clear statement from Halliwell."

COME AND SEE

By JAMES HAYFORD

The doctor came right in with his rubbers on,
Straight through the kitchen to the downstairs bedroom.
He felt her pulse and listened to her heart,
And never spoke a word to anyone.
To her, he smiled and shook his head and sighed.
After a while he turned his chair around
And said, "Some snowfall for the time of year."
Like any workman with his rubbers on!
Still, what can we expect of anyone
But that he come and see, do what he can,
And sociably await the miracle?

"Of what?" Mark stared at him.

"That when—or rather if—you leave here, 'll have your oath and Charlotte's that u'll neither of you go near the police nor mmunicate with them. That you won't dis- se to a living soul that Esmond is alive."

"For how long?"

"Until Sunday night." Esmond's voice s eager; he was on the verge of hope. "After t I'll be away, and it'll take more than a sse of Devon police to catch me."

"Mark!" It was my voice that spoke his me, and his glance came to me. "You can't it, Mark. I don't believe you would."

He smiled and turned his head so swiftly m me that I could not tell the nature of the ile. Then he said lightly, as if there were no ama in his decision, "Tell you what, I'll give u my word not to go near the police without arlotte's permission. Will that satisfy you?"

"Not good enough," Major Tarrand barked d his voice collided with Esmond's: "Not your life."

"It is," I cried out. "Because I'd never agree. Mark promises that, Esmond is in no dan- r from him. And you do?"

"Sure. Haven't I just said so? The Land wer keys, Tarrand."

As he still hesitated, Mark went on: "You've lly no choice, have you? You're on a spot. u've got to trust me; or rather trust Char- te to keep me to my word. It's rather up to r now, isn't it? You can't keep us prisoners. ys, Tarrand. I'm tired and so's Charlotte."

Esmond said, "Give him the blasted keys, r." He turned savagely on Mark. "If you to double-cross me, you'll be sorry. And t for the record, it wouldn't do you much od if you did run to Adkins. He'd still not tch up with me."

age now looked younger, little more than a boy cornered, resentful at fate. "It's up to you now, Charlotte. You've turned into the king- pin. If you let me down, I've had it."

"I won't."

He bent and kissed me. As he straightened, I saw his lower lip shake, and his hand on mine was cold as death.

"Charlotte!" Mark held the door open and I went ahead of him.

The breakfast room was empty. Either Lisa or Mark had eaten, and there were the remains of tepid coffee in the pot. I got a cup from the sideboard, gulped the liquid down.

The morning was fine; sun filled the ugly house, for once warming it. My one thought was to find Mark, to try to untangle the threads of what had happened the night be- fore. The garden seemed the likeliest place for him to be, but from the terrace I searched ev- ery part of it within my sight without seeing him. When I knew Mark wasn't within call, disappointment enveloped me.

I walked down the steps into a landscape that was feasting idly in the sun. After the rampaging storm of the night the stillness of the sunlight was astonishing. Except for the drifts of fallen leaves, it might have been summer.

Right: Gibson "Jewels" and "Gems"—25 cards to a box, all alike, 1.50 and 2.00, two extra envelopes are included.
Above: Lovely gifts wrapped with Gibson papers, ribbons, bows and package decorations wherever Gibson Christmas Cards are displayed.

something wonderful happens when you "take time to remember"...

To friends and loved ones your thoughtfulness adds to the richness of Christmas joys. Take time to visit your Gibson card shop or department . . . choose cards and wraps for every person on your list.

Gibson Greeting Cards, Inc., Cincinnati, Ohio

GIBSON
Christmas Cards

I walked across the unkempt lawn and along the lake. Opposite me was what had once been a tennis court, now no more than a rough paddock, enclosed by a high wire fence, and bounded on the far end by the orchard wall. Someone was walking across this space, quickly but circumspectly. I stared, shaded my eyes with hands against the sun, prepared to run, to call Mark's name; and then, again, I suffered that plunging disappointment. Too short for Mark, this man wore a coat, a soft hat. I thought I recognized him. I stood still, watched him travel along the path at the other side of the tennis court, and disappear through the gate to the orchard. Then I began to run toward the house, fear more than exertion making my heart pump.

At the bottom of the terrace I stopped, pressing my hand so hard on the rough balustrade that I felt the palm prick. I'd imagined it. Or, granted there had been a man walking along the path, I'd jumped to the panic-born conclusion that he'd been Adkins.

I looked up. In a cane steamer chair outside the open French window sat Edwina. Her glance was fixed ahead, to the left of me, and though I called her name she did not see me. When I was no more than a few feet away, I called again urgently. The curious immobility of her pose, as still as death, the eyes open, staring at nothing, alarmed me. I caught her arm.

It moved. So did her head, but only a fraction. Then her eyes came to mine, reluctantly, as if I'd stirred her out of a trance which she was loath to leave. Not a muscle beneath her old, stained flesh moved. The eyes were as blank as if they were staring at a stranger.

I touched her again. "Grandmother!"

She said, "Oh, it's you," and shifted her limbs.

"Have you been asleep?"

"Asleep? Why should I fall asleep at this hour of the morning?"

"Have you been sitting here alone?"

"Alone!" Again she repeated my word, turned my question into one of her own. "Why shouldn't I sit here alone?"

Then I saw her looking at me, eyes as shrewd as on the first night when she had commanded me to kiss her. Then very slowly she began to smile, with a grimace that was the embodiment of wisdom that has been distilled from evil, as she said half under her breath, "What are you afraid of, Charlotte?"

Then Mark's shadow fell over her, and she turned her head. He bade me, after greeting Edwina, a casual good morning, and then centered all his attention on her.

I heard him telling Edwina that he was planning to return to London on Saturday. She made no comment; merely gave a slow, almost sleepy nod, as if he, like me, were a shadow form of no importance. Silence hung over us for a moment, to be broken by Kelly, who came panting up the steps, pink tongue lolling sideways from his mouth. He sniffed at my feet, then jumped, barking, at Mark.

He patted his head, and Edwina's voice struck. "He was Esmond's dog. He's still looking for his master."

Still watching the small white-and-black blob that was Kelly, she began the contortions that preceded her rising from her chair. "It's time I went indoors." She turned on Mark. "I want you to find Russell, order him to bring the Daimler round at three-thirty sharp. Not a moment later."

"You're going out?"

"We're all going out. You, Charlotte, Lisa and Timmy. We're going to have tea at the Sea House. Don't look so startled, Charlotte! What's pleasanter than a picnic on a fine day? We're not likely to enjoy many more of them this time of the year. When your grandfather was alive, we always had one last autumn picnic at the Sea House. In any case, I wish to see Nanny. It's high time I found out what foolishness she's up to."

Remembering something Lisa had said when she had come into my room early that morning, I said, "Didn't Lisa tell you? Her grandson fetched her by car this morning. She's gone to spend a—a holiday with them."

Edwina snorted. "She'll soon tire of them."

Mark said, "Shouldn't we warn Tarrand of our arrival? Five people to tea unannounced may not be welcome."

"No reason at all why we should. I'd remind you that the Sea House is my property. When I gave Ivor permission to live there I retained my right to visit the house whenever I chose. I want Russell here at half past three."

With a grunt she maneuvered herself through the French window and shut it behind her, closing us out.

Mark moved a little way along the balustrade, stood with his elbows on it, staring down at the verdigrised fountain bowl.

"I think I know why she wants to go to the Sea House," I said. "She's seen Adkins."

He turned, giving me his full attention. He sounded faintly surprised, but not shocked. "Edwina's seen Adkins? When?"

"I saw someone coming from this direction just now, going out through the far orchard gate. I think it was Adkins. And now Edwina's going to see for herself if Esmond is hiding at the Sea House."

"You're only guessing. Besides, bona-fide detectives don't go skulking round gardens to meet people like Edwina. They announce themselves at the front door."

"He's probably tried that; just as he tried to telephone her, and got nowhere. You don't believe me, do you?"

Before he could reply, I went on, the heat rising in my voice: "See how wrong you've been about everything so far! Esmond wasn't alive. He couldn't be, you said. But he was. And now we've got to keep Adkins from finding him until he can get away on Saturday."

Mark frowned. "Charlotte, you don't believe in Esmond's escape plan, do you?"

"Why shouldn't I?" I said, thinking back over the details as I had reported them to Mark on our way home the night before.

"Because now that I think about it, it's got a queer smell. One yacht anchored at Wellmouth, another waiting to pick him up in

CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Holiday Color

Martha Wolford, our Barbara J., needed one final addition to make her fall-winter wardrobe complete. She wanted a good basic dress—one which she could depend on for almost any day. Her choice, in the brightest of reds, was practical enough for office wear, pretty enough for the gayest of holidays.

In October she bought a black-and-white jacket dress; in November she made bright separates for casual wear, black-and-white separates for parties . . . and she already had a black winter coat in her wardrobe. Keeping her new clothes investment low (Martha still had Christmas shopping to do, too) she had more than enough fashion 8's to add pretty accessories.

By BET HART

The neckline takes prettily to accessories, and Martha chooses a pink chiffon scarf to wear for a special occasion. For further glamour, she adds a pink rose too.

Gold beads at the neckline, a leopard belt in make-believe fur are both plus accents for red. Belt is $1.95.

For everyday, Martha adds a white Orlon dickey with a high turtle neck. She likes to accent with her gold pin. Knit dickey, $2.00.

Martha leaves the office, goes right out for dinner . . . and she wears her new dress. The waistline is elasticized to give a soft bloused effect. For evening, Martha adds a pink satin belt. Red wool dress, $10.95.

PRIGENT

Busy hands stay beautiful with Jergens Lotion

Smooth on creamy Jergens Lotion after every job! Only Jergens gives you all this care: Stops detergent hands! You can actually feel dryness soothed into softness, as Jergens helps replace the natural oils and moisture that water and harsh detergents drain away. Protects! Absorbs in seconds . . . penetrates deep into the skin to combat red roughness. Beautifies! No other lotion is as lovely to use as Jergens. Rich beauty oils leave your hands lightly scented, soft, alluring.

Jergens beautifies your hands as nothing else can

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

France, an undercover smuggling operation—it sounds like a movie script dreamed up by an amateur. Besides, Wellmouth is a small port, not more than half a dozen yachts tied up there at a time. If the police have any idea that Esmond's alive, every new arrival will be under a twenty-four-hour watch. It would be insane to try and get out that way."

"But Esmond is going to. He is going to get away."

"So you've said."

"But if you don't believe it, what is going to happen to him?"

"I don't know precisely, but I'd hazard a guess; and curiously enough, it was you who put me on the track by telling me that Lisa and Tarrand are in love. You know," he said slowly, "there's no more foolproof way of committing murder than killing a man who's already presumed dead."

I stared at him stupidly. "But who'd want to kill Esmond?"

"Ivor, with a little help from Lisa."

"I don't believe it," I said violently. "It's just a theory you're building up, to scare me into letting you hand Esmond over to the police. You want him brought to justice."

"No," he said steadily. "No, you're wrong."

"I don't even begin to see the logic of your argument. It doesn't make sense. When did they decide to murder him—before Danny was killed? Was that in the plot too?"

"I don't know. I imagine it was a plan conceived on the spur of the moment by two desperate people—two people in love with each other. How much chance do you think they have as long as Esmond is alive?"

"I don't know. Lisa may be one of the women who can love two men at the same time. She may ——" I broke off.

"This so-called escape plan is the work of a credulous fool. Tarrand isn't that. He's a sane, logical man, a first-class organizer. Lisa's no fool either. Esmond's the only one who'd be likely to have any faith in it. And Tarrand is running a risk in letting Esmond escape. If he's caught, brought back to England to stand trial for Wargrave's murder, Tarrand would be on the run, too, as an accessory.

"But if Esmond died before Adkins could prove that he'd ever been alive after he was supposed to have been drowned, the future for Tarrand and Lisa would be bright indeed. They'd merely have to preserve the status quo as long as Edwina lives, and then they'd be free to marry, live on their loot without a care. All that stands in their way is Esmond."

I said desperately, because it was the one weapon I had against him, "You were wrong before ——"

His face darkened with anger. "Damn it, Charlotte, there's only one sane course to take, if you want Esmond to stay alive. When I said I'd not go to the police without your permission, I never imagined that you'd be so bigoted as not to let me go. Otherwise I'd never have made that promise. I wish to heaven I hadn't."

"But you are going to keep it?"

The tension went out of his face. "Yes."

"Why?"

"Why?" He smiled gently. "Because I love you." My glance couldn't stay on his face; it fell away, focused on a rose. "And if you love someone, you want to make her happy. Odd, isn't it, after all the millions of words that have been written on love, in the end that is all that it amounts to. That's the test: you want to make her happy." He turned my face up to his, but before his lips could touch mine, I wrenched back.

"If you're right about Lisa and Ivor, it would mean that I'd have killed my brother. That's what you're trying to say, isn't it? That if I don't let you go to the police, Esmond will die, and I'll be responsible."

"No." The word was a harsh staccato, and then his voice softened. "You're forgetting something. If you happen to be right about Adkins' seeing Edwina, about the reason behind her going to the Sea House this afternoon, the whole business may be out of your hands and mine."

"Adkins has searched the house before, Esmond told me. Why didn't he find him?"

"Because it's a foolproof house to search, unless you know every inch of it; which is why Adkins, if he has, has enlisted Edwina's help."

"Then she'll find him?"

"Most probably."

Esmond was asleep, as innocently asleep as a child, hands folded across his breast, legs neatly crossed at the ankles. At Lisa's command I had come to warn him of Edwina's visit. It was ten minutes to two. By half past three I had to be back at the house, ready to leave with the picnic party. I sat down on a bentwood chair that must have been short in one leg, for it tipped forward under my weight. As it did so, Esmond opened his eyes, held them narrowed against the light.

He stretched out his hand, pleasure and lassitude in the gesture. "Charlotte! I hoped you'd come back." He yawned. "Sorry to be a bit dopey. I had a slight attack after you'd gone last night. Meant I didn't get to sleep until about six this morning."

"If I went down and made some tea, would you like that?"

"No, don't bother. The kitchen fire will probably be out." His smile was carelessly affectionate. "Did Lisa tell you that Nanny went this morning? Her grandson came for her. With Adkins snooping around, we thought it was best not to let her go back to the house. Poor old Nanny, her mind's practically gone. By the time she comes back, she won't be quite sure herself that I've been here, let alone be able to convince anyone else."

He had thrown his legs off the bed, was feeling for his slippers. Suddenly he stretched in front of me, pulled aside his pillow. "Take a look at that."

It was, I saw, the Swedish passport he'd mentioned the night before, made out in the name of Erik Appelberg: journalist. The photograph stuck into it was of Esmond.

I gave it back to him, and as he lifted the pillow to replace it I saw something else. "What do you want with that revolver?"

"Let's just say that for the next three or four weeks I'm going to mix with some rough types. I want to be able to hold my own if the need arises."

"But you said these two men were your friends."

"Not exactly friends. Acquaintances more."

"But you know them, don't you?"

He gave a grimace of exasperation. "For crying out loud, Charlotte, my sweet, what does it matter whether I know them or not? Actually, I don't. Ivor does."

"But you've got letters from them, or you've talked to them on the telephone?"

"Use your head," he said roughly. "I'm dead. Hence I don't write letters or use a telephone. The police searched this house from attic to kitchen. For all I know, they've kept the telephone tapped. What letter writing has been done to contact Webster and Souvisant has been done by Ivor; if there's been any telephoning, he's done it from a public booth."

"If the police searched the house, why didn't they find you?"

He stared at me, suspicion suddenly narrowing his eyes so closely that the lashes met.

"You're a curious person, aren't you, Charlotte? Even just a little nosy."

I said, angered, "All this business of yachts picking you up and putting you down strikes me, as well as Mark, as awfully cloak-and-dagger."

"Does it, indeed!"

"Oh, Esmond!" My anger collapsed. "It may well be true; I'm not saying it isn't, but equally so it could be bogus."

"Bogus!" He rolled the word around on his tongue. "Bogus for whom?"

"You, if you've no actual proof that the yachts, the men owning them, exist."

He nodded his head. "And what," he said slowly, "does Mark imagine is going to happen to me if the whole thing is, as you term it, bogus?"

"He doesn't know. That's what's worrying him; why he wants to go to the police."

Suddenly he laughed, harshly, triumphantly. "Now I've got it. Mark wants to turn me in, salving his own conscience, and keep in with you! As an inventor of cloak-and-dagger mysteries, he's not doing too badly." He got up and, keeping out of range of the window, walked to the dresser, picked out a tie. Our eyes met in the mirror. "Supposing this absurd notion of Mark's were true, how does it carry through? Who does he think is likely to bump me off?"

"Major Tarrand."

"Ivor! But for heaven's sake why? He's as deeply involved as I am; he was with me, an accomplice, when Danny died. And when Edwina goes, as long as Lisa plays her cards cleverly—and she'll do that—he'll get this house and enough to keep him for the rest of his life. What reason could he have for wishing me dead?"

"He would have a reason if he were in love with Lisa."

He turned his back slowly on the mirror, came toward me. For a second I thought from his face that he might be going to strike me, and then, quite suddenly, he was smiling.

"Dear Charlotte!" He sat down on the bed beside me, folded his hand over mine. "I'm going to explain something to you. Lisa and I have been married more than five years. Within three months of our wedding day I had to face up to the fact that fifty per cent of the men, married or single, who see Lisa fall in love with her. They can't help it and neither can she. If I'd allowed myself to be jealous, I'd have laid myself open to one long series of little hells. It was a hard fight; I nearly lost it."

He turned a face that was gently proud upon me. "But I won, Charlotte, I won. All manner of men fall in love with Lisa. But she's my wife; she loves me, that's the only thing that matters."

"Yes." It was all I could find to say.

"You don't believe me!" Esmond turned on me furiously. "Well, that's enough. I've taken a fair amount from you this afternoon, a sight more than I'd have taken from anybody else. If you've finished, perhaps you'd better get back to Glissing."

I glanced at my watch. It was a quarter to three. "I haven't told you why I came. I've wasted a lot of time ——"

"Why did you come?"

"Lisa sent me, to warn you that Edwina's coming here this afternoon. She's had a sudden whim to have a picnic ——"

He swore violently, explosively. "Why? In heaven's name, why?"

"I don't know. We're none of us sure. But I've an idea Adkins —— She could have spoken to him."

"Did she say Adkins had seen her?"

"No. All we know for certain is that she is coming here this afternoon, with Lisa, Timmy, Mark and me. And she mustn't find you. Lisa said you'd know where to go."

"Which would be the first place she'd look for me. No fear! I'll go up to the attic. If she climbs those stairs, she'll drop dead at the top, and good riddance."

He moved toward the door, and I said urgently, "But will you really be safe from her there?"

"Nowhere's safe from her. But it's the best bet. Tell Lisa where I am. Edwina will look first in the obvious place, and may she break her blasted neck doing it." Suddenly he glanced at the bed, came back, and took the revolver from under the pillow.

"No ——"

"Don't interfere with what doesn't concern you."

He stood by me as I straightened the bed, and then I saw that he was shivering. "Esmond, you're ill."

His face was ashy, his teeth chattered, but he shook his head and went out of the room, with me staying close behind him. The attic stairs were an almost perpendicular flight boarded in at either side a door at the bottom and another at the top. Halfway up Esmond fell to his knees and began to gasp. By the time the top door was undone and we were in the attic he was fighting for breath. Frightened, I bent over him. "Esmond, tell me what to do."

"Nothing you can do. Don't fuss—all right in a minute."

And in little more he was able to haul himself into a broken old armchair, grin as he said, "Don't worry, Charlotte. I'll beat Edwina yet."

"I've got to go. Can I get you anything?"

"Not a thing." He looked up at the mildew-encrusted window. "Push me forward a foot, will you, and rub the bottom pane clean. There's something I want to see."

I did as he asked. "There's no lock on the door. What happens if Edwina manages to get up here?"

"There's a bolt on the inside. As soon as you've gone and I've got my wind, I'll fasten it. Now bend down, right down, to the level of my head." He pointed. "Without anyone outside knowing I'm here, I can see that patch of garden from halfway up the lawn nearly as far as the bridge. Do you see?"

"Yes."

"Keep Timmy there for five minutes, play with him or something, anything so that I can keep my eyes on him. Will you do that for me, Charlotte?"

"Of course I will. If he'll play with me."

"Make him. Goodness knows how old he'll be the next time I see him."

Edwina gave a grunt of triumph, slotted the key into the lock and, leaning on her stick, crossed the threshold of the Sea House.

Behind me, Mark said in an undertone to Lisa, "Hang on to that dog. It was madness to bring him, with Esmond upstairs."

Edwina's voice cut across his last syllable. "Charlotte!"

I went into the room where I had first seen Esmond. She was seated in a chair, prying into every corner with her eyes. "Come here and tell me what you think of my house. You haven't been inside it before, have you?" She fixed her hooded eyes on me, while I fumbled for an answer that wasn't a lie.

Mark saved me, asking from the doorway, "Do you want the hampers in here, aunt?"

"Set them on the table. You can open them, and then we can help ourselves when Lisa brings the tea." She began to heave. "But first I want to show Charlotte round the house."

"Why don't you sit there and rest? Surely I can go round by myself?"

"I've no doubt you'd prefer to, but I'm afraid you'll have to put up with my company.

"I can't afford you!"

I want to take the opportunity of inspecting n property. From what I can see, Ivor's let it deriorate shamefully. Move out of the door-w, Mark. Charlotte?"
There was nothing for me to do but follow
h.
Lisa stood in front of the kitchen range, a pker in her hand, prodding at some half-lit
cls. I said, "Lisa, can I do anything?"
She managed a shadow of her old, comed smile. "I don't imagine you're any re of an expert with antique cookstoves n I am. Why don't you all wait in the sit-g room?"
Edwina meanwhile had cumbersomely cir-d the table. To distract her, I touched the ge silver bell that hung beside the dresser, t I'd first seen when I stood outside the dow with Mark. I read aloud the words raved on it: "Atchison, Topeka and Santa F" adding, "What a long way it's come!"
Edwina was staring at me. "I think Char-e should be privileged to see what the bell or; don't you think so, Mark?"
"If you say so, aunt."
"That is, if it still works. The mechanism y have rusted by now. Does it still work?"
"I wouldn't know, aunt."
"Then try it." She had begun to tremble. I nted to suggest she sit down, but I didn't
e. "Move back, Charlotte."
For a moment Mark hesitated. Outside I uld hear the faint sigh of the sea cut through a sharp, excited yap from Kelly, at play h Timmy. Then Mark's hand closed round clapper of the bell. He pulled hard, and wly, without a sound, on oiled hinges, the sser, its shelves set with china, moved away
m the wall, as if propelled from behind.
Edwina, without looking at me, said, "Now see what the bell is for, Charlotte."
I stepped forward, past her and Mark. "A pboard, a secret cupboard!" And in my ref that it spelled no immediate danger to nond, I laughed. Plainly it was where he'd den while the house had been searched by kins. Where he'd hide —— I turned. Edna was looking into the darkness, at the end which I could now see a rough flight of ck steps. And in that moment her purpose g clear to me. She was displaying her owledge, arrogantly, carelessly. Knowledge which hung Esmond's life.
"A very big cupboard, Charlotte!" Her gh was harsh, near to a croak. "And ap-ently it's one part of the house Ivor keeps excellent repair." She paused. "And use."
"But what is it?" I asked.
"A relic from the old smuggling days," rk said. "A secret exit and entrance from house to the cliff. It made an excellent he from the excisemen."
I stepped to the edge and listened. The nd of the sea was plain, but it might have ne through the open window. "All the way?"
"To the cliff face, up flights of steps and n through a series of caves." There was no erest, no excitement in Mark's face as he ve the bare recital of fact. But then he, like a, knew that Esmond was momentarily e in the attic. "Shall I close it, aunt?"
"Yes." She seemed suddenly to have lost erest in it.

As the dresser swung back, Lisa called, he kettle's boiling at last. If I can only find tea."
Mark answered, "This looks like it," and ed a tin caddy from the mantelpiece.
I followed Edwina back into the sitting om. Timmy and Kelly romped in, and mmy sat down at Edwina's feet. Briefly she ted her hand on his head, and he turned his e up to her. "Can I have a tart, granny?"
"Bring me one first, and pass them to your nt Charlotte."
He scrambled to his feet, and Kelly, scent-g the advent of food, jumped up at him as sa and Mark came through the door.
"I'll take him. He'd better go outside until t is over."
Mark made a grab for Kelly's collar, but he dged, and Edwina snapped, "Let the dog be.
ou'll make more disturbance catching him an leaving him alone."
It was an odd, tense meal. Except for an casional interchange between Lisa and mmy, no one spoke.

At last Timmy grew restless. "Kelly and I want to go outside," he said, pointing to the dog lying nose glued to the crack in the door.

"Let him go," Edwina grumbled. "There's no peace in any room that contains a dog and a child."

Mark went to the door. "Take Kelly outside, Timmy. Don't bring him back indoors. He only disturbs your grandmother. We'll all come and join you in a few minutes."

They went out in a rush. We saw them pass the windows, but by the time Lisa had refilled Edwina's cup they were back again. There was the sound of small feet, dog's claws scrambling up the stairs.

Lisa seized the teapot, hurried out of the room, and immediately Mark began to talk to Edwina, recalling some trivial incident that had happened when he was a boy staying in this house with Esmond. Was she listening? I couldn't tell. Her face was bent deep over her cup. I heard Lisa go upstairs, then the yelp of a dog. She came in, Timmy held firmly by the hand, Kelly under her arm. But before she could close the door, Kelly dived from her grasp and was through it, back in the hall. There was a wild scrabble of his feet on bare wood. Then a shadow passed the window. From the doorway Ivor gave a start of astonishment that might have been genuine or simulated. "Well, this is a surprise, but a pleasant one," he said genially. "I'm afraid you've had a poor welcome. If you'd let me know you were coming. Mrs. Elliot, I'd have got someone down from the village to look after you."

"We've managed. I had no wish to put you to any trouble, merely to give Charlotte the opportunity to look over the house."

As she spoke the sound of Kelly's frantic yapping had grown louder. Ivor said, "If you'll excuse me for a moment, I better go and see what that dog is up to."

"We'll all go." Edwina heaved on her stick, and was on her feet. "Now that we've finished tea, I propose to look round upstairs."

This is the season for families to be together! You can be...in brief hours... for the miles-that-separate vanish like magic by Boeing jetliner. A call to an airline listed below, or to your travel agent, is the first step in making this holiday season truly memorable...with all the family together! Call now.

BOEING 707 and 720

These airlines now offer Boeing jetliner service: AIR FRANCE • AIR-INDIA • AMERICAN • AVIANCA • B.O.A.C. • BRANIFF • CONTINENTAL • LUFTHANSA • PAN AMERICAN • QANTAS • SABENA • SOUTH AFRICAN • TWA • UNITED • VARIG • WESTERN • Boeing jetliners will go into service later with: CUBANA • EASTERN • EL AL • ETHIOPIAN and IRISH; NORTHEAST and PAKISTAN operate Boeing jetliners under lease...

As we reached the landing we could see Kelly in a frenzy, scratching, scuffling at the narrow door that barred the attic stairs. Mark reached him first, picked him up, but Edwina was close behind. Before any of us realized what she was doing, she had lifted the latch, pulled the door back. Kelly struggled, and in a gigantic leap was free of Mark's arms and up the steps. Edwina moved forward, blocking the opening.

And then, as he reached the top door, the tenor of Kelly's barking altered. He began to howl, his nose pressed to the crack at the base of the door. Mark touched Edwina's arm. Without glancing at him, she shook him off.

She put her foot on the lowest step, her stick on the second, lurched forward, groped for a handrail, and finding none remained poised there helplessly. Then she stepped back, defeated.

Ivor said "Let me. I'll get him down."

She stepped aside to let him pass. It was the work of a moment for him to grasp Kelly, bring him down. "I don't know what's got into the little mutt."

"Don't you?" Edwina said. "Then let me tell you. You've got a rat trapped up there, Ivor Tarrand, a filthy murdering rat that's got to be smoked out. A rat that deserves to die. Get out of my way, all of you." And using her stick as a flail, she went toward the head of the stairs.

I beat with my fists upon the attic door. "Esmond, Esmond! Let me in."

Twice I called, my voice growing higher, more urgent, before I heard the bolt drawn back. I plunged in, expecting Esmond to be immediately inside the door, but he stood instead at the window, his forehead pressed to the pane, staring downward.

"Edwina's gone. Mark went after her, but it was no good. She wouldn't even speak to him. We're convinced she knows you're here." I pulled at his arm. "You've got to get away."

He did not move a muscle, continued wit complete absorption to stare out the windov

I looked over his shoulder. Ivor and Lisa whom I'd left in the hall, had moved to th path outside the front door. Ivor's back wa toward us; no angle of his face was visible, bu Lisa's was tilted upward. She might have bee looking at us, but she wasn't, the whole of he attention was concentrated imploringly upo Ivor. She was speaking rapidly, urgently.

I spared a quick glance at Esmond. His e pression was one of graven concentratio "Where's she going?" he asked.

"Home. She must. Timmy has to be take away."

Without turning his head, he said, "Yo could take him home, or Mark, for that ma ter. Lisa can't go. I've got to see her."

"There's no time, Esmond, not even mi utes." And then it happened. The angle c Lisa's face altered, Ivor's head bent. Perhap at long past the eleventh hour they tossed cau tion overboard; maybe they believed then selves unobserved. Or maybe, again, the didn't care any more.

As their lips parted, Lisa began to mov away quickly, and I found myself throw aside as Esmond made for the door. H plunged down the attic stairs. I ran fast, but h was in the downstairs hall ahead of me. Ivo was waiting for him, huge, ominously still.

"Lisa," Esmond shouted. "Lisa!"

"It's no good calling, she's gone." An Ivor's arms stretched to bar the door. "No let's get down to business."

Esmond said, "I'm going after her." H lunged at Ivor, but was forced back.

He turned to me, said as urgently as if were his last hope, "Go and fetch her. You do that for me, won't you, Charlotte? Quick

I went past him, and down the stone patl Lisa was bending over Timmy, who wa splashing in the reeds.

"I'll take Timmy home," I said. "You wanted ——"

"Go away." She spoke as if I were a smal distracting hindrance to be brushed off. "G back and tell whoever sent you they're wastin your time. Timmy and I are getting out."

"Where are you going?"

She stood upright now, Timmy's han clamped fast to her side. "It's no concern o yours. Nor of anyone else's. I'm through."

I said, "It wasn't Ivor or Mark who ser me."

"Do you think I don't know who sent you And I'm sending you back to him. You see"– she smiled with absolute calm—"I don't war him any more. I've had five years of him. I'm finished with him forever. You can go bac and tell him that."

I cried, "Where are you going? Where ar you taking Timmy?"

She didn't bother to answer and then I sa what I hadn't seen before: the little bunch o car keys dangling from her hand. Wit Timmy skipping beside her, she began to ru up the zigzag path to the garage. She pause only once, to aim a thrust of her heel towar Kelly. He cowered, then came scuttling bac to me. As we went into the house I heard th sound of the Land Rover engine starting.

Entering the sitting room, I was caught in clash of voices, Mark's and Ivor's, directed to ward Esmond, who lay sprawled in a chair, h indolence in direct contrast to the urgenc dominating the two other men.

"—— out of your hands now, Esmond. Th only sane course is for you to let me take yo in to Glissing police station, not wait here t be caught, or be tracked down on the cliffs.

"You damned well keep your nose out o this, Halliwell."

They might have been flies buzzing roun his head for all the notice Esmond took, as h stared at me. "Wouldn't she come?"

"No. I tried ——" And as I spoke, Kell leaped from behind me into Esmond's arms He patted his head, set him down on the floo

"Why didn't she come back?"

"She's scared. You can't blame her. Sh wants to get Timmy away."

He turned his head slowly from me to Ivo "You've stolen my wife, Ivor. Odd, isn't it, Charlotte hadn't turned up, I'd never hav known it." He appeared to be ruminating t himself. "And then, cooped up in that blaste

NEW RONSON® BEAUTY TRIO HAIR DRYER

Beauty Tria with brush, comb and adjustable hood in smart luggage style travel-storage case. Petal Pink or Dawn Blue.

Portable, too! Beauty Trio has fold-away handle for convenient hand drying!

New Beauty Trio brush-dries beauty right into your hair—as warm air circulates directly through soft nylon bristles. Also comb-dries your hair, making your hairdo much easier to style and much quicker to set. Then Beauty Trio hood-dries your hair for a perfect professional result. Why settle for less efficient hair-drying methods? New Ronson Beauty Trio soon pays for itself with beauty parlor savings! 26.95*.

• Dries hair perfectly in minutes • 3-Way adjustable temperature control
• Durable, compact, portable • An exciting new gift to give or get

Also: Ronson Hood 'n Comb Budget-priced hair dryer, performance proved. 19.95*

*suggested retail price

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

RONSON®
International Standard of Excellence
Also available in Canada Ronson Corp., Woodbridge, N. J., U. S. A.

ttic I began to think about things I'd never aid attention to before. The flying club; the ours you and Lisa spent there."

Ivor came toward him, his voice cold with erocity. "I tell you, you've got no time for nything now but to save your own neck."

"And yours," Esmond said, and he smiled. Four miles to the flying club, ten minutes' lrive. Is that where Lisa is making for? How ong before you join her? She hasn't a pilot's icense, so she has to wait for you, hasn't she?"

Mark came forward, put his hand on Esnond's shoulder. Esmond shook him off. "Keep out of this, Mark. It's between Ivor and ne. Get out, take Charlotte with you. And let ne tell you something, all of you. I don't care for anything now except my own skin. Thanks o Ivor, it's all I've got left; and when that happens, your skin becomes a precious com-

AT EVENING

By DOROTHY LEE RICHARDSON

My twilight mind is a sky where the thoughts change
Like blown vapors of sunset, like puffed-on cloud
That shapes to things as various and strange

As the mysteries at the bottom of the ocean,
As the secrets in the heart's loneliest lair.
The gentlest breeze of suggestion sets them in motion.

They pile up like seaside castles made of sand:
Resolve to fantastic monsters;
extend to a shroud
Over a lifeless woman around whom stand

Bent mourners. But now they all have shortened and thinned
To young children—with lifted faces and fine yellow hair Blown back (as it used to be) by a summer wind.

modity, not lightly to be thrown away. In fact, I intend to put up a tough fight for it." He swung himself upright.

Ivor barked, "That makes more sense. I calculate we've got about ten minutes, presuming that Mrs. Elliot sent a message to Adkins immediately she reached the house."

Though he was standing, Esmond still showed no sign of urgency or of moving from the room. As he rocked gently backward and forward on his heels, Ivor said sharply, "Come on. Don't forget I'm in this too. With you in the hands of the police, my freedom wouldn't be worth a damn."

"That's what I am thinking. In fact, I've been thinking of little else all afternoon. Consequently, I calculate I'm worth much more to you dead than alive." A grin twisted his face. "That was Mark's idea, and he may, for once in his life, have hit the bull's-eye."

Ivor swung with an oath on Mark, and Esmond chided. "Don't waste your energy on him, Ivor. You're going to need it all for me."

Ivor's hand reached backward for the kitchen-door latch. Esmond said casually, "Where do you think you're going?"

"You bloody fool, where do you suppose? I sent Webster a wireless message. He's managed to make Wellmouth ahead of time. He's tied up there now, waiting for us. Are you coming?"

Mark said coldly, "If you listen to that claptrap, Esmond you deserve what's coming to you."

"We go the way we'd planned?"

"There'll be police posted all along the cliff. They'll be waiting for you." Mark caught Esmond's arm. "Think, you fool."

"For the last time, Halliwell, I'm warning you to keep out of this." Ivor turned on Esmond. "There are too many caves for the police to watch every one. We've a chance, a good one, but I'm not waiting a second longer."

Esmond nodded desultorily. "Keep it as it was, eh?"

Mark shouted, "Esmond, you'll never be allowed to fall into the hands of the police alive. Can't you see the type you're dealing with?"

Esmond gave him a polite turn of the head. "You mean Ivor will put a bullet through me. You know, that had occurred to me." He smiled slyly. "But he'll find it more difficult than he imagines, even though he's quicker on the trigger than I am. You see"—and then I felt his arm slide round my waist—"I'm taking a witness with me or, if you prefer, a piece of insurance. Not all the way. Just far enough."

"Charlotte's not leaving this room!" cried Mark. He took one step, and then Ivor's fist clenched, drove upward. Mark dodged it, and he'd have recovered his balance if Kelly hadn't at that second jumped, growling, and tangled in his feet. As he stumbled, Ivor's fist drew back again. I did not see it strike, but the sound of it, of Mark's head hitting the floor, set me struggling. I screamed, plunged forward, but before I could reach Mark, Esmond had pinioned my wrists behind me.

"No need to panic, Charlotte. He's a long way from dead, just suffering from a healthy uppercut that will leave him out cold for twenty minutes. Meanwhile, you're coming with me. But you'll be quite safe. I won't let anyone hurt you."

He shoved me forward, into the barrier of bone and muscle that was Ivor.

"What do you think you're doing?"

Esmond's voice came over my shoulder. "I told you, I'm out to save my skin. Charlotte's going to help me. She's the only one who can." He shook my pinioned wrists. "Stop struggling. In half an hour you'll be back here ministering to Mark's headache. Behave, and no one's going to harm you."

And so, for a second time, I saw the dresser swing out. As Ivor went through the opening, Esmond bundled me ahead of him, held me back against a wall that was cold, sticky with damp, while Ivor swung the dresser back into place. Instantly we were shut into impenetrable darkness, so enveloping of eye and spirit that I was struck into silence.

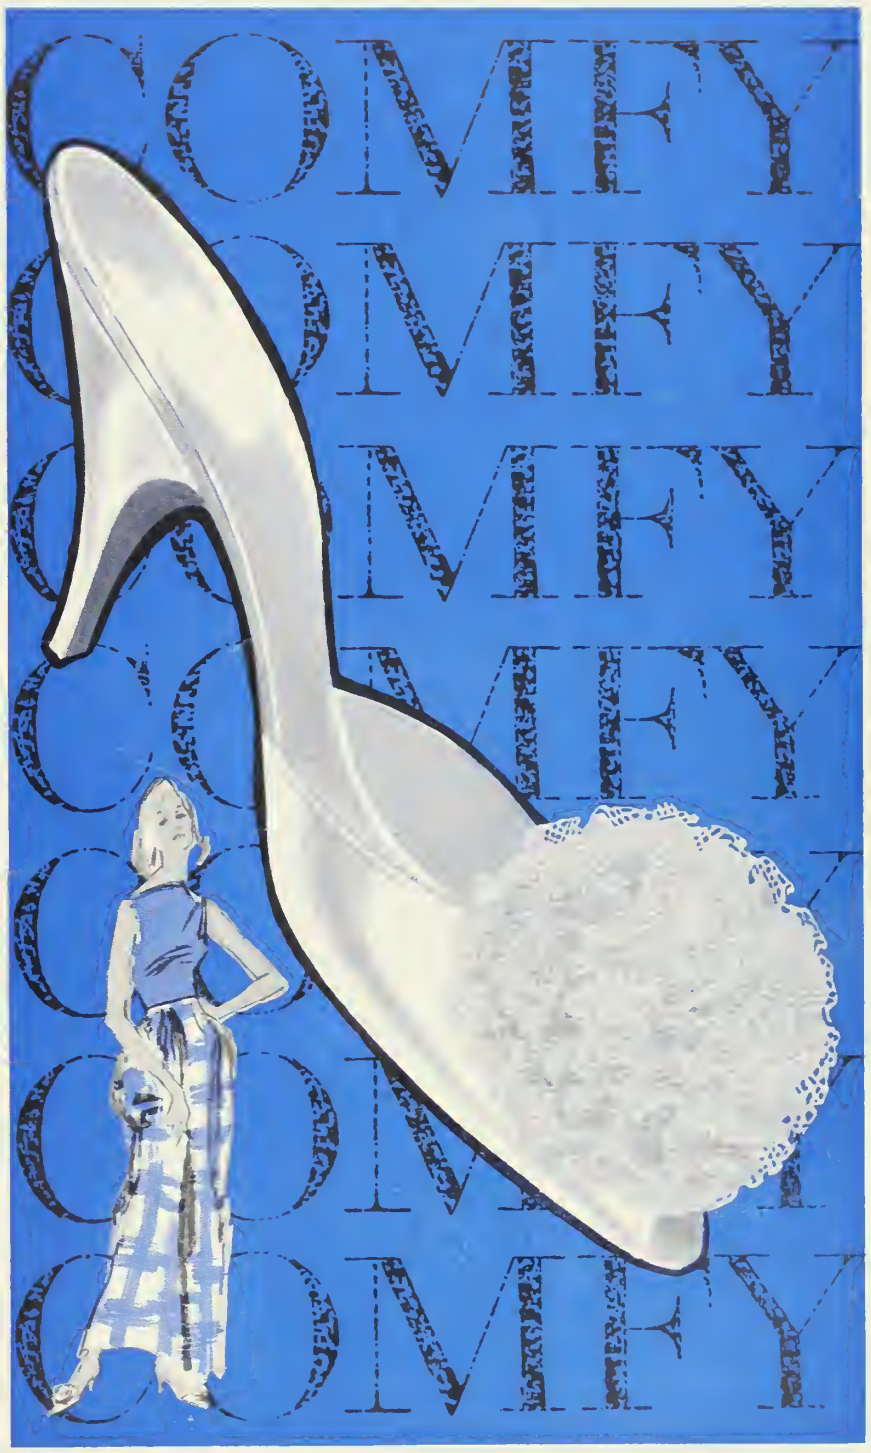
Light came, blinding, dazzling as from an undimmed headlight. Behind it stood Ivor, holding a flashlamp. Esmond grunted, "Bolt the door. It'll give us an extra half hour while either Mark or Adkins gets hold of a crowbar. Then you go first, shine the light backward."

There was the long, sustained whisper of oiled metal moving, and then Ivor stumbled over my feet. My wrists, stinging with cramp, were free from Esmond's grasp. "Now don't start making another fuss, Charlotte. Save your breath. You're going to need it. Follow Ivor. I'm right behind you."

Despite the light, my feet fumbled on the steps. Always they went up: sometimes steeply, sometimes on a wide, low incline, and the depths of the treads varied from a few inches to a foot. After ten minutes Ivor had gone so far ahead of us that it was dark. Simultaneously my head struck rock, my feet misjudged the step and I fell with a scream.

Esmond's arm came round my waist. "You've only about another hundred yards to do. Come on," he said. He heaved me upright, and half carried me to a point where the steps ended.

Ivor had set the lamp on the floor. As far as I could judge, the cave in which we were was circular the roof higher than the radius of light. I could hear the drip of moisture. The sense of being confined in this hole in the earth, the exit blocked behind us, no other that I could see ahead, set loose in me a frantic, animal fear. As Esmond set me down, I began senselessly to beat my hands against the slime-covered rock, crying out one word over and over again: it was "Mark."



"Don't, Charlotte." With hands suddenly protective, Esmond turned me round, brushed the hair from my forehead. "You and Mark have got the rest of your lives to fix yourselves up. But this small piece of you belongs to me. If you don't stay with me until I get into the open, have a chance of making a run for it, I've had it, Charlotte."

"You've no chance," I said, echoing Mark. "There isn't a yacht waiting for you."

"Probably not." He shrugged his shoulders. "And, equally probably, if Souvisant and Webster exist, they've never heard of me. No, I'm not counting on them. All I've got are my own wits, and you to help, Charlotte. If I can get clear, make the beach, I'll find some sort of boat. I'm good at boats; always have been. Now I've got to be a genius with them, or else ——" His laugh was soft but harsh.

I glanced over my shoulder. Ivor had moved a little out of the range of the light. "What's he doing? What's he going to do?"

"Don't panic. He's clearing the way ahead. Except for an air passage, the exit to this cave is blocked with stones, old rubbish. After that, there's a low tunnel, one last cave. From there, out on the cliffs, the odds are against him, not me. He hasn't got a head for heights; I have, and I know every foxhole a darned sight better than he does. I'll leave you there, Charlotte, and you can double back to Mark. He'll have the door down by then." He raised Celeste . . . angel-toed mule with a flair for entertaining.

In satin-lined satin with nylon net pouf, full Louis heel. Black, heaven blue, pink, white.
AAA, AA, B widths. 7.50, slightly higher west of the Rockies.

DANIEL GREEN

IF YOU CANNOT FIND THIS COMFY® SLIPPER IN YOUR LOCAL STORE, WRITE: DANIEL GREEN COMPANY, DOLGEVILLE, NEW YORK

his voice that he had held to a whisper. "All clear, Ivor?"

As he pushed me forward Ivor moved back into the light. There was a glint of metal in his right hand. Esmond laughed, and in the same second pulled me back hard against him, a living shield between him and the threat of the gun.

"Just as I thought. My insurance has paid off."

I froze against him, not struggling, mesmerized as Ivor, seemingly giant-size in that low cavern, the lamp which he had picked up gilding his hair, his mustache to a metallic gold, moved one step, then another toward us. I felt Esmond's right hand, which was free of me, grapple in his pocket. Then he shouted, "If you want to kill me, you've got to kill her first." And an echo mocked "kill her first."

"You're at the end of the line, Elliot." Ivor's voice overlapped Esmond's, got trapped in the echo.

"You never meant me to get out of here alive. Webster, Souvisant, they were a pack of lies. Mark was right."

"Of course he was right. You're as good as dead, Elliot, and the girl with you."

The gun in Esmond's hand spat. The light went out. In the sudden blinding darkness with a purely animal reaction I managed to wrench myself free of Esmond's grasp, dive to the ground. Ahead of me there was a tumult of noise—shots, their echo. Something struck my arm. There was no pain after the first searing blow, only numbness, and sticky warmth trickling over my hand.

For a moment I crouched there, dazed. Almost immediately I heard the scrape of heavy, stumbling feet, a voice choking in curses, a fall; then silence again, and after timeless seconds a long-drawn-out shudder that ended in a choke as if someone were drowning.

"Esmond! Esmond!" The echo mocked my cry. I fumbled frantically in the darkness, brushing the wet, filthy floor with my hands. And then I fell over a prone figure that was still moaning, dropped to my knees. I whispered "Esmond!" not sure in the darkness whether it was he or Ivor.

He breathed the first syllable of my name. I shifted his head to my knee. It was heavy, and when I felt his face it was wet . . . or was it my fingers that were coated with my own blood or slime from the floor of the cave?

My hands moved over his shoulders, to his chest, and then flew away as he gave a terrible scream. I bent my head until my face was over his mouth, trying to make words out of the senseless mumble that was following the cry of agony.

And then, behind me, I heard another sound: slow, dragging, torturous. I froze, my body curved over Esmond, my hand grasping the gun that was, miraculously, on the ground beside me. Ivor was moving. That he was hurt was obvious, but not what his purpose was: to make sure, before he left the cave, that neither Esmond nor I was living, or merely to escape.

The movements were intermittent. There were seconds when there was no sound at all. Then he was on me, his foot tripping over my leg; my teeth bit into my lower lip to stem the scream, and my free hand with a reflex action covered Esmond's mouth. Beneath the weight of Ivor's body I willed my limbs to stay stiff, lifeless. I waited for a long moment to feel the searching hand that would tell him that Esmond and I weren't dead, and in that moment my finger found the trigger of the gun.

Would I have pulled it? I do not know, because Ivor's weight gradually heaved itself from me, and I heard him stumble toward a corner where a small patch of darkness dimmed to gray. The footsteps, dragging, scuffling, uncertain, sounded for seconds that were outside the measure of time, and then, finally, there was silence.

I lifted my shoulders, eased the burden on my knees, and waited.

And so it was Edwina who, more than any other single person, committed the final act of betrayal that sent Esmond to die in darkness and ignominy in my arms. The overfaithful heart was Kelly's, the shot was Ivor's; the misjudgments, the prejudices, the blindness were mine, but the will that a Biblical retribution should be exacted for Danny's death had been Edwina's. Returning from the Sea House that day, she had stumped through the front door of Glissing straight to the telephone, told the police that Esmond was alive, where he was, and how he would most probably try to escape.

Thereafter, in the remaining days I spent at Glissing, Esmond's name never passed her lips. She spoke no more than she had to. She mourned, with a terrible iron-hard, unmelting grief, not for Esmond but for Danny. For three days she did not leave her bedroom, and when she did appear it was to treat Mark and me, the servants, as if we had connived at the felony which had robbed her of Danny.

Lisa we assumed to have left the country. The police had found the Land Rover abandoned at the airfield, from where it was obvious she and Ivor had planned some sort of getaway in his private plane. She and Timmy had been traced as far as Southampton through the truck driver who gave them a lift, so we thought she must have been making for Le Havre. And there she would have learned from the papers that she was a widow, and that Ivor had been killed falling down the cliff. It seemed unlikely we would see Lisa, or Timmy, again.

Mark and I were married in December, in a London church. It was a time of biting cold and penetrating sleet, with trampled snow a brown sludge in the churchyard, ice crowning the puddles, but for me it was a golden day. Perhaps all wedding days seem so, but mine with Mark, grave and for once undeniably nervous beside me, was aboundingly so.

For a wedding present Edwina sent me a diamond-and-emerald tiara, which I left in my greedy mother's keeping. In fact, its possession gave her such blissful satisfaction that it would have needed a harder heart than mine to tear it away from her.

In the end, all that Mark and I inherited from Glissing, a keepsake of those few days in which Esmond had briefly lived in the flesh for me, was a tough wire-haired terrier. Kelly came to live with us because the sight of him made Edwina brood and weep, not for Esmond but for Danny. He's learning better manners now, and appears content to be a city dog. Only when I have him out and off the lead does he scamper in excited anticipation up to every small boy he sees. END syrup reaches 260° F. on a candy thermometer, or hard-crack stage. Wipe any crystals from the sides of the pan with a wet pastry brush. Remove immediately from the heat and place syrup over simmering water to keep hot. Working with two forks, drop some nuts into the hot syrup and then arrange them on the tops and sides of the two cakes. Add only a few nuts to the syrup at a time so that it will not cool down. If the syrup has a tendency to lose its shine, add more corn syrup and increase the heat under the water. This topping eats best if the cake is decorated two days before using. Makes 4 pounds fruitcake.

SUCH SWEETS REMEMBERED

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 55

Tutti-Frutti Date Pudding

2 cups flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 cup butter
2 cups stale bread crumbs
½ cup sugar
2 teaspoons grated orange rind
½ cup candied cherries, quartered
2 cups slivered candied fruits—a mixture of candied orange rind, pineapple and citron
½ cup pitted dates, quartered
1⅓ cups milk
2 well-beaten eggs
½ teaspoon almond flavoring
Good pinch nutmeg

Sift the flour, baking powder and salt into a large bowl. Cut in the butter with a pastry blender. Add the bread crumbs, sugar, orange rind and fruits. Mix the milk and eggs together. Add the almond flavoring and nutmeg. Stir into the flour-fruit mixture. Blend well. Pour into a well-greased 2-quart steam pudding ring mold. Cover tight. Place on a rack in a deep kettle, filling the kettle with enough boiling water to come halfway up the mold. Cover the kettle. Steam for about 3 hours, adding more water if necessary. Remove from steamer and let stand 5 minutes. Turn onto a hot platter and serve with Honey-Lemon Sauce. Makes 8 servings.

Honey-Lemon Sauce

2 eggs
5 tablespoons sugar
1 tablespoon honey
1 tablespoon grated lemon rind
1 tablespoon lemon juice
Pinch salt
½ cup heavy cream

Beat the egg yolks well. Gradually add 1 tablespoon sugar and the honey and beat until light. Add the lemon rind and the juice. Beat the egg whites until they stand in peaks and gradually beat in the salt and remaining sugar. Fold into the egg-yolk mixture. Whip the cream until stiff and carefully fold into the egg mixture. Chill. Makes 4 cups.

Christmas Snow Cake

½ gallon vanilla ice cream
1 cup Nesselrode sauce
1 package cherry-flavored cake mix

Meringue Frosting

2 cups sugar
⅔ cup water
¼ teaspoon cream of tartar
4 egg whites
Green food coloring
Red cinnamon candies (garnish)

Line both an 8″ round layer-cake pan and a mixing bowl, measuring 7″–8″ across at the top, with strips of waxed paper. Arrange strips so ends come over edge of pan and bowl about 2″. Soften ice cream and stir in the Nesselrode sauce. Divide ice cream equally between pan and bowl. Freeze until firm, 2–3 hours. Prepare cake mix according to package directions, pouring it into 2 greased and floured 8″ round layer-cake pans. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes, or until cake tests done. Cool in pan 10 minutes before turning out on wire racks. Cool thoroughly while making the topping.

Measure the sugar, water and cream of tartar into a 1-quart saucepan. Bring to a boil and continue boiling until the bubbles are large and syrup forms thick drops. If you have a candy thermometer, cook to 200° F. Beat the egg whites until creamy (very soft peaks). Gradually add the hot syrup in a fine thread, beating continually, until the meringue is thick and glossy and will hold swirls. Tint with green food coloring.

Working quickly, remove frozen ice cream from molds. Place one layer of cake on a large platter and cover with the ice-cream layer. Add the second layer of cake and top with the ice cream molded in the bowl, round side up. Quickly frost the entire surface, using less than half the meringue, to seal in the coldness. Shape into a beehive effect. Return to the freezer for about 3 hours. Place remaining meringue in the refrigerator. Before frosting the second time, beat the meringue until thick and glossy again. Remove the ice-cream cake from the freezer and once more cover with meringue, working rapidly. Then, using the back of a teaspoon, touch and draw up the meringue lightly, over the entire cake, to give holly-leaf texture. Dot with cinnamon candies. Return to freezer and continue to freeze for several hours or overnight. Makes 10–12 servings.

Chestnut-Mocha Roll

1 can (2-lb.) water-pack whole chestnuts, drained
½ cup butter
4 squares unsweetened chocolate
½ cup sugar
¼ cup water
2 teaspoons vanilla
¼ teaspoon cinnamon

Mocha Butter Icing

½ cup butter
¼ cup cocoa
1 egg
2 teaspoons instant coffee
½ teaspoon vanilla
¼ teaspoon salt
3½ cups confectioners' sugar
Holly leaves cut from angelica or lime rind (garnish)
Glacéed cherries (garnish)

To make the Chestnut Cream: Purée the chestnuts by pressing through a strainer. Melt butter and chocolate in the top of a double boiler. Remove from the heat and add the sugar, water, vanilla and cinnamon. Mix well. Add this mixture to the chestnut purée, a little at a time, beating well after each addition. Make sure the mixture is thoroughly blended. Turn out onto waxed paper and chill slightly. Then roll into a log shape approximately 12″ x 3″. Wrap in waxed paper and chill until quite solid—about 4 hours. Unwrap and place on serving platter. Spread the surface with the Mocha Icing. Trim ends, decorate and chill again for ½ hour before serving. Makes 8–12 servings.

To make the Butter Icing: Soften the butter in a bowl. Add the cocoa, egg, coffee, vanilla and salt. Beat until the coffee and cocoa have dissolved. Add the sifted confectioners' sugar, a little at a time, beating well after each addition. The frosting should be moderately stiff. Spread on chestnut filling and run the back of a spoon lengthwise in a wavy pattern over the entire surface to give the appearance of bark. Garnish with angelica or lime-rind holly leaves and glacéed cherries.

THE EISENHOWERS' HOLIDAY DINNER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

ROAST BEEF

Allow about ½ pound meat and bone per person. Be sure you know the oven-ready weight of the roast so you will be able to calculate roasting time. Wipe the roast with a damp cloth. Rub a little corn or vegetable oil and pepper well into the meat. Place roast, fat side up, in an open roasting pan. The bones act as a rack. If you use a meat thermometer, make an incision with a metal skewer or pointed knife through the fat and insert the thermometer directly into the center. Roast, uncovered, in a slow oven, 300° F., 18–20 minutes per pound if you like it rare; 22–25 minutes per pound for medium; 27–30 minutes per pound for well done. Or use the markings on the meat thermometer as a guide—really the most accurate method. Baste occasionally. When the roast is done to your liking, remove immediately to a warm platter and keep in a warm place while you make the gravy.

STRING BEANS AMANDINE

Ends are removed from 1 to 1½ pounds fresh green beans and the beans are cut French fashion into long strips and then tied with string into portion-sized bundles. They are cooked as usual in salted water. The bundles are lifted to a serving dish and the strings removed; then the beans are seasoned with ¼ cup butter heated with 3 tablespoons shaved almonds until almonds are golden brown. Makes 4 or 5 servings.

TOMATOES PROVENÇAL

Choose a ripe tomato for each guest. Cut a ¾" slice from stem end of each. Chop these slices; mix with half the quantity of packaged dry bread crumbs, a little minced onion, a pinch of finely chopped garlic, some snipped parsley, salt and pepper to taste. Set tomatoes in baking pan. Top with crumb mixture. Dot with butter. Bake, uncovered, at 375° F. for 35 to 40 minutes.

BAKED STUFFED POTATOES

The baked potato is first emptied by cutting an oval of skin from the top and scooping out the center. Mash the potato with enough sweet cream to moisten, a bit of butter and grated cheese. Add salt if desired. Then return mashed potato to the shell with a pastry tube, making one or more potato rosettes on top. Return the stuffed and decorated potato to 400° F. oven to brown.

DEVIL'S-FOOD CAKE

2½ cups sifted flour
1 teaspoon soda
1 teaspoon baking powder (rounded)
¼ teaspoon salt
½ cup butter
2 cups sugar
3 eggs
1 teaspoon vanilla
⅔ cup cocoa dissolved in
½ cup boiling water
1 cup sour milk

Sift flour, soda, baking powder and salt. Cream shortening, slowly beat in sugar. Add beaten egg yolks, vanilla and cocoa. Add flour mixture alternately with milk. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into 2 greased 9" layer-cake tins; bake 25 minutes in a 375° F. oven.

SEVEN-MINUTE FROSTING

2 egg whites, unbeaten
1½ cup sugar, finely sifted
5 tablespoons cold water
½ teaspoon cream of tartar or 2 teaspoons light corn syrup
Few grains of salt
1 teaspoon vanilla

Combine all ingredients except vanilla in top of a double boiler. Stir until sugar dissolves, then place over simmering water. Beat with egg beater until stiff enough to stand up in peaks (6 to 10 minutes). Add vanilla. Beat until thick enough to spread. During cooking, keep sides of double boiler cleaned down with a rubber spatula. With an electric beater the process may take as little as 4 minutes.

FROSTED MINT DELIGHT

¾ cup pure mint-flavored apple jelly
2 (1-lb.) cans crushed pineapple
1 package unflavored gelatin
1 pint whipping cream
2 teaspoons confectioners' sugar

Have all ingredients chilled. Melt the jelly and mix the crushed pineapple into it. Dissolve the package of gelatin in one cup of the juice from the pineapple. Mix the gelatin mixture into the jelly mixture. Whip the cream, sweeten it with the sugar, and fold it into the mixture. Put into the freezer until firm. Do not freeze solid. This recipe will serve 10 or 12.

PEPPY TUNA MACARONI

New Recipe

Saucy tuna casserole at a low net cost

When you have FRANCO-AMERICAN Macaroni on hand, already cooked in its own smooth Cheddar cheese sauce, you can pop this peppy casserole into the oven in minutes.

In 1½-quart casserole, combine 2 cans Franco-American Macaroni, a 7-oz. can tuna (drained and flaked), 1 tbsp. chopped dill pickle, 1½ tsp. prepared mustard. Top with ¼ cup buttered bread crumbs. Bake at 400° F. for 20 minutes. (If you like, use a 7¾-oz. can of salmon in place of tuna.) 4 to 5 servings.

In recipes like this, or just as it comes from the can, you'll find thrifty Franco-American Macaroni easy to enjoy. Got plenty?

FRANCO-AMERICAN

MACARONI WITH CHEESE SAUCE

FRANCO-AMERICAN IS A TRADEMARK OF Campbell SOUP COMPANY

Pyrex gifts...today's look for today's cook

Just add your love and Christmas greetings! Pyrex Ware gifts are welcomed by everyone who cooks or entertains, are cheerful reminders of your thoughtfulness. So attractive on the table, so easy to care for! Cook-serve-store casseroles and carafes in all sizes are just a few of the Pyrex gifts at your favorite store. 4-quart Casserole with cradle, $5.95. Deluxe Carafe with electric warmer, $9.95.

PYREX® WARE a symbol of modern living, is a product of CORNING research

Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.

Chip and Dip Set, $4.95

Divided Server with cradle, $2.95

Coffee Serving Set, $9.95

Hospitality Casserole with cradle, $5.95

Presenting Emily Tyler

One unforgettable year—a whirl of frivolity and fun—the delicious excitement of coming out in society!

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN
Photographs by JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Highlights of the year: gay and glamorous mid-June ball, dignified, traditional german during Christmas holidays.

Change of pace—an informal swimming luncheon gives a chance to chat, relax. In a single week last June Emily attended eighteen parties, including six dances.

Emily improved her backhand at Mary Baldwin College, deplores lack of keen partners. Summertime fun means, besides debutante parties, "county" picnics, swimming.

Fireworks, a flavor of old Vienna, a formal debutante "figure"—first important ball of the season, the festive Bal du Bois.

As the Christmas holidays approach, forty girls scattered in colleges from Coral Gables, Florida, to Poughkeepsie, New York, are beginning to skimp on their studies and dream of home. "Home" is Richmond, Virginia; and the visions that dance through most of the pretty heads are not of sugarplums but of parties. Letters fly from Randolph-Macon or Hollins or Mary Baldwin or Smith: "Mother, did you ever get my yellow evening dress shortened?" . . . "Guess what band Frances is having to play for her dance!" . . . "Last week at W. & L. someone stepped on my white gloves and absolutely ruined them." Their mothers, patient or frantic according to temperament, write back advice and forward more party invitations. And, in her home not far from the white-columned Country Club of Virginia, society editor Mrs. Allen C. Goolsby Jr. sits at her worktable juggling calendar dates, marking names off lists and adding others, soothing harassed hostesses.

There's a crisp edge of excitement in the December air as Richmond prepares for its final climactic round of 1960 debutante parties.

Emily Thomason Tyler, a slender brunet girl of nineteen whose face shows intelligence and breeding rather than mere surface prettiness, is as anxious as any other debutante for the holidays. But when Emily gets home on December 16, her first act will probably be to pull on heavy boots, call her springer spaniel, Rip Van Winkle, and go for a long, happy, muddy walk through the woods. Putting her long hair up in curlers, deciding which dress to wear to which party, telephoning friends—all these are matters to be postponed until she makes sure the holly trees are bright with berries, the goose pond glazed with a thin crust of ice. "Emily may be a debutante," says her mother, in the husky voice that seems always to hold a chuckle, "but she's no party girl!"

If not a party girl, what sort of girl is she?

Almost any description of Emily would include the words "county girl," or "home-loving girl." The county is Charles City County, fertile farmland extending southeast from Richmond between the Chickahominy and the broad James rivers; home is Sherwood Forest, a comfortably shabby white clapboard house first built in 1780 and renovated sixty-odd years later by John Tyler, tenth President of the United States and Emily's great-grandfather.

Here in the countryside thirty quiet miles from Richmond, Emily grew up with her younger sister Mary and her brother Jimmy, their dogs, pet raccoons, possums, skunks and deer. She learned to swim in the spring-fed sun-dappled pond where President Tyler once kept decoy geese, played underneath century-old magnolias, fished and hunted with her father and brother over the thousand-acre estate where Tylers have hunted since 1842. Her family dines on venison steak or home-cured ham around the handsome Duncan Phyfe table which has graced the dining room for well over a hundred years, a table laid with perhaps some of the same china and silverware great-grandmother Julia Gardiner Tyler spirited away during the Civil War.

From childhood, Emily heard stories about how the Yankees stuffed hay under the house and were about to burn it when their general stopped them; how blue-coated looters made off with the two heavy iron dogs that guard the entrance, then abandoned them in a field where they were found after Appomattox; how the Swiss music box which now stands on the piano was set to playing by the weary returning footsteps of sixteen-year-old David Gardiner Tyler, trudging home from the defeated Confederate army, and how he stopped in the ravaged and deserted hall, and listened, and knew he was truly home. The whole house is pervaded by a sense of history—and if anyone should forget the dignity and tradition of these quiet old rooms, he is silently reproved by John Tyler, staring down in haughty elegance from a gilt frame in the parlor; by his lovely wife Julia Gardiner, presiding over the library with appealing wistfulness. Like most of the famous old mansions along the James River on the John Tyler Memorial Highway (or Route Five, as it is locally known), Sherwood Forest is open to the public; unlike most of them, it is not kept "immaculate" for visitors, and although Katherine Tyler sincerely enjoys guiding people around the house, other members of the family usually beat a quick retreat to the tourist-proof Gray Room, leaving their capable and cherished cook, Annie, to conduct the tour.

If Sherwood Forest is steeped in Virginia tradition, so are its owners. J. Alfred Tyler, Commonwealth's Attorney of Charles City County, is well known locally, partly as the son of David Gardiner Tyler—a distinguished Charles City resident who served under Lee, was elected to the state senate and the U. S. Congress, and served for twenty-three years as circuit judge—but mostly because of his great concern for all matters of interest to the county and his public service in the community. A tall, complex man whose manner shifts from dignified formality to frank joviality, Alfred was brought up on the family estate with two sisters and a brother. After finishing at St. Christopher's School in Richmond, he went on to the University of Virginia for his law degree and had a couple of years' experience in a Wall Street law office in New York. Never for a minute did he plan to stay there—but by the time he got back home his father had died, his sisters were married, his brother away. Alfred opened a law office in Richmond and for some years practiced both there and in the country; during this time, as an eligible bachelor, he attended most of the Richmond germans and debutante balls. Perhaps it was because she was so used to seeing the attractive young lawyer around town that Katherine Thomason addressed his invitation to her debut to "Sherwood Park, Richmond," instead of to "Sherwood Forest, Charles City." Alfred never received it.

The "longest private dwelling in America" has rare century-old trees, many planted by President Tyler.

Katherine Thomason, youngest of six children, was only seven when her mother died. Her gay and adored father never remarried, and her seventeen-year-old sister Emily took care of the younger children and saw that the girls were properly presented to society. Katherine, following the Richmond pattern, went to St. Catherine's School, made her debut, and entered into community work with characteristic zeal. Somewhat less conventionally, she had a fling at newspaper reporting before she married the man who had not come to her coming-out party, and went to live in the country. CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

Decorating, caroling, attending candlelight services on Christmas Eve are important for the whole Tyler family.

Tylers have lived in Sherwood Forest 118 years—beginning with John Tyler, twice governor of Virginia and tenth President of the United States. "Honest John" so named his country estate because he thought of himself as a political outlaw.

Gathering partridge berries for Christmas wreaths is a family custom. This year Emily probably won't have time to hunt with father, Jimmy.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

IN TIME FOR CHRISTMAS TEX TAN MAKES THIS

FANTASTIC free bonus OFFER

INTRODUCING THE SUPER-NEW

880 MAN'S BILLFOLD

SHOWN IN ACTUAL SIZE • MAROKINO COWHIDE • $5 PLUS FEDERAL TAX

buy this TEX TAN "880" billfold and get a $2.50 man's belt FREE!

A beauty in black or brown
Attractively price-ranged Genuine Marokino cowhide, $5
Imported English Morocco, $7.50
Imported Samoli kid, $10 plus federal excise tax

TEX TAN

Here's the newest, the latest, the most practical billfold ever designed for a man.

Made in three finest-quality supple, soft leathers . . . genuine Marokino cowhide, imported English Morocco, and imported Samoli kid.

The "880" makes it finger-tip easy for your man to find his credit cards, calling cards, credentials . . . carries a big load without losing its flat, compact, comfortable shape.

Presto-A-Card Case
Credit cards and calling cards in plain cut . . . quickly, easily. Here's the billfold for the push-button age.

Two Bill Compartments
one is an extra-deep well for the money, the other is regular depth. Slit end speeds access.

Patented Presto Pocket
The perfect address for carrying credentials . . . ideal for the active man.

Soft Poly-Film Windows
Holds fast snap-shots . . . license . . . drivers license.

free BONUS OFFER • CLIP THIS HAPPY BUDGET-SAVING COUPON and DELIGHT HIM TWICE AT ONE PRICE

PRESENT COUPON AT YOUR FAVORITE MAN'S SHOP OR DEPARTMENT STORE

"THE STATESMAN"

Sold nationally at $2.50 for years, this belt has been a hit in Tex Tan's 2,000 item line . . . Made of stipple-finish cowhide in your choice of black or brown. Sizes 30 to 44. Beautifully gift-packaged for this special offer.

COPYRIGHTED • 1960 • TEX TAN, INC.

TEX TAN

THIS COUPON IS REDEEMABLE FOR A $2.50 TEX TAN "STATESMAN" BELT (Nos. 3811M or 3813M) WITH THE PURCHASE OF A TEX TAN "880" BILLFOLD

2.50

VOID AFTER JANUARY 15, 1961

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 131

Today Katherine Tyler is "county" to the bone, but she remembers yet her horror on learning just how isolated Sherwood Forest really was. "I had lived all my life in a big city house in downtown Richmond, and the country seemed right dull at first." By the time she had the house organized and running smoothly, though, Katherine had adjusted to county life, and soon decided that the casual county parties were much more fun than the closely circumscribed Richmond teas and receptions!

When their children reached school age, Katherine and Alfred decided to enroll them in the Charles City public school, rather than sending them in to Richmond. "We wanted them to have all kinds of friends," Katherine says now. "Even though the girls later transferred to St. Catherine's and Jimmy to St. Christopher's, they loved their years at the county school. To this day, Jimmy's closest friend is a boy he started out with at Charles City."

Transferring to St. Catherine's proved hard for Emily. Due to a series of catastrophes, her grades at Charles City had been subjected to twelve teachers during the seventh grade, and Emily was rather confused academically. Making friends took time—for if Emily is genuinely interested in others, she is also a bit reserved. Most upsetting was the wrench of leaving Sherwood Forest, her family, her pets. Her initial dislike of the city was, ironically, very bit as strong as her mother's early dislike of the country. Living with two sympathetic aunts helped, but for months she was happy only on weekends at Sherwood Forest. Then, without apparent reason, her attitude changed. The adjustment may have been slow in coming, but it was complete. Having capitulated, she flung herself into school activities so wholeheartedly that by graduation time she had made good friends among both students and teachers, who filled her yearbook with such extravagances as: "A loyal friend!" . . . "One of my most helpful students." . . . "The best batter on the team!" Because of her fondness for Sherwood Forest, some of the girls jokingly called her "Robin Hood"—an old name she didn't really mind. St. Catherine's had taught her she could be happy away from home; in the fall she would be going off to college.

There was talk of Sweetbrier, Randolph-Macon, Hollins, and visits to several campuses before Emily finally decided on Mary Baldwin in Staunton, Virginia. About her choice, however, neither discussion nor debate was necessary. For a girl of Emily's background and interests, making a formal bow to society seemed as natural as going to Westover Church on Sunday mornings, or gathering holly and running cedar for the traditional Christmas wreaths that hang in the hall windows of Sherwood Forest. By the time she left for Mary Baldwin, with two wardrobe trunks, two large suitcases and a supply of simple blouses, sweaters, skirts and "good" dresses, certain arrangements for her debut had already been made.

"Her debutante gaiety began a full year ago. Now Emily's this keyed up now, as a subdeb," Katherine Tyler had remarked as the party-filled Christmas season of 1959 drew to a close, "I hate to think of this coming year. Of course Emily's own dance next August will be very simple—we're not having champagne, and won't have the expense of an orchestra because some good friends are giving Emily that instead of a separate party. We hope to get through the whole year on a thousand dollars, including her debut dress."

At that time, Emily suggested rather offhandedly that she might just wear her old graduation dress from St. Catherine's, since it seemed silly to have more than one white formal.

August 27, 1960, then seemed a long way off, and a lot less exciting than the New Year's Eve ball she and the whole family had been invited to, at Westover. She could hardly wait for her escort to arrive, but at last they were driving through the cold starry night toward the lovely old house built in the early 1700's by William Byrd and tonight brilliant with candlelight, festooned with green garlands and scarlet berries, gay with laughter and young voices and music.

And it was a wonderful dance! While older guests drifted through the elegant rooms, pausing before a buffet to sample the eggnog or talking with friends before the crackling fire in the library, young dancers swept across the ballroom, vivid silk and subtle velvet gowns contrasting with sober black jackets. The music was good, and the stags breaking fast; it seemed far too soon when the waiters, who had been moving among the guests with trays of champagne, reappeared with silver trays piled high with paper hats, horns, serpentines. The lights flashed off; there were giggles, shouts, and suddenly a cacophony of horns and whistles.

It was 1960. Now the girls and boys danced through drifts of crepe-paper streamers; silly caps perched on their heads, confetti in their hair.

Across her partner's shoulder Emily met the eyes of her good friend Ellen Fisher. For Ellen, in whose honor the dance was given, the year of her debut was only beginning.

On New Years' Eve, the Richmond News-Leader officially launched the 1960 debutantes with a double-page spread of pictures. Mrs. Allen Goolsby Jr., society editor of the paper, studied the girls' pictures and speculated about the year ahead. Some of the debutantes' names had been listed with her for years; a few had wavered until the very last minute. "Richmond doesn't have a committee to decide which girls are eligible to come out and which aren't," she said, "so theoretically, any girl whose family can afford it can make a debut. But you can practically tell, by looking through the entering lists of Richmond prep schools, most of the girls who will be debutantes one day."

She riffled through her big black notebook. "I already have the names of a few who plan to come out in 1968, and important party dates—New Year's Eve, or dinner before the Bal du Bois—may be requested three or four years in advance. As a rule, though, people don't plan that far ahead. Since most of the debutantes are in college, we have a long season—a couple of weeks in June, before most of the girls go off to Europe or Virginia Beach or camp or visiting; a couple of weeks before school reopens in the fall; and ten days or so at Christmastime."

Thus far, the trend toward "mass debuts"—in which a girl is presented to society at a charity ball or cotillion instead of having a separate party of her own—has not reached Richmond. Of the 1960 debutantes, most had "small" dances at home, or at the Country Club of Virginia, or the Deep Run Hunt Club, either alone or in conjunction with one or two other debutantes; some were presented at formal dinners at the Commonwealth Club or Rotunda Club; several more at tea dances. In addition to these, of course, there were innumerable breakfasts, luncheons, receptions, swimming parties and dinners given by interested friends and relatives.

Richmond is much admired by out-of-town debutantes for its custom of "placing" girls with specific escorts for each affair. Mrs. Goolsby, who often assists mothers in planning parties, is well aware of the problem this system presents for a hostess: "Sometimes the girl already has a date, or the boy doesn't telephone her. At the last minute there's usually a scramble to straighten things out. Sometimes I get help from the boys and girls as to which boys are most dependable about escorting, which are likely to refuse, which are going steady with one girl or not speaking to another. 'You can't put him with her!' they'll say, and then I take their advice."

Mrs. Goolsby added honestly, "Of course in every group some girls are more popular than others, either because they're beauties, or vivacious, or easy to talk to. They'll be able to use their evening dresses over and over, because they'll be asked to men's colleges, and to lots of parties in Richmond as post debutantes. You'd be surprised how much that year means to them—and to their mammas! And it really isn't so expensive. Oh, maybe some of the mothers buy a whole new wardrobe for their daughters. But a lot of the girls watch for sales in the local department stores, or wear hand-me-downs from cousins and older sisters. And they seem to have just as much fun!"

Emily, who feels that many things in life are more important than clothes, actually added only a few dresses to her basic wardrobe during the year. Most of these she probably would have needed even if she had not made a debut: a black dinner dress, a blue shantung suitable for an afternoon reception or tea, a glazed chintz which can be dressed up or down, a few classic shirtwaist dresses, a coral taffeta with velvet jacket, a new bathing suit, Bermuda shorts, and a few accessories such as shoes, handbags, gloves—including the long white kid gloves essential for every debutante. She also added three new evening dresses: a pale green peau de soie with flat bows on the hips, an elegant ice-blue silk taffeta, and her lovely new debut gown. "I'm sure right many of the girls have more clothes than Emily," Katherine Tyler remarked early last June as she helped her daughter, just home from Mary Baldwin, get ready for the first big rush of Richmond parties. "Emily, thank heaven, isn't sophisticated and doesn't mind wearing the same dress to several different affairs, as long as it fits and is becoming. And then times have changed; people aren't so formal. You hardly ever see women wearing hats in town any more. Just yesterday I saw Emily head out of the house in Bermuda shorts, and called after her, 'I thought you were going to a luncheon!' She said, 'I am,' and went right on out. In my day, we wore dresses and hats and gloves to luncheons."

"It was a swimming luncheon," Emily defended.

"If it weren't for church and formal dances," said Jock Garst with an engaging grin, "you'd never know what a girl looked like in a dress."

Jock, a dark-haired English boy now in law school at the University of Virginia, was Emily's escort for the elaborate Bal du Bois—which endeavors to hold creeping informality at bay by stipulating that every debutante must wear a ball gown that touches the floor and gloves that extend above the elbow. The only charity ball given in honor of the debutantes, the Bal is a most important source of income for Richmond's beloved Sheltering Arms Hospital—which is, as far as anyone knows, the only all-free general hospital in the country. Launched four years ago by the enterprising junior board of the hospital, the Bal du Bois was an immediate success and brings in $8500–$10,000 net profit every year, at $100 a ticket. Perhaps because of the extravagance and gaiety of this summertime dance, perhaps because Richmond takes such pride in supporting the Sheltering Arms, the Bal du Bois is gradually coming to be thought of as "the" debutante ball—a distinction which has traditionally belonged to the far more exclusive Richmond german, held in December and open to only old-guard members and their guests.

This year the Bal du Bois fell on June 13, in the midst of a whirl of parties, and Emily had arranged to stay in Richmond for several days, dividing her time between two good friends, Mary Rutherfoord Mercer and Mary Gardner Florance. Most of the debutantes had barely got home from college before plunging into social activities; Emily herself had not even time to unpack. She arrived in town with baskets of home-grown strawberries for her hostesses, a suitcase full of party dresses, and a confused conviction that she had left half the things she needed at Sherwood Forest. (As a matter of fact, she had to telephone her mother that very afternoon for a cardigan and extra white gloves.) The luncheon that day at the Colony Club was pleasant, although, this early in the season, the girls still felt a little shy. Some had been friends from boarding-school days, but others had met only casually, and a few were virtually strangers. Long before the June "season" ended they would all feel like old friends and old hands—having attended, like Emily, some eight luncheons, five dinner parties, two dinner dances, a tea dance, a swimming-and-supper dance, three "regular" formal dances, a barn dance, three receptions and a couple of breakfasts; not counting such peripheral activities as family outings, ordinary dating and perhaps a wedding or two.

Later in the season, some of the girls would find the hectic round of parties too exhausting, would begin to look nervous and pale; others, more sophisticated, would profess to think them rather a bore. But this day in June, all were chattering enthusiastically as they emerged from the cool Colony Club into the sunny mild afternoon. Emily and Mary Rutherfoord drove west along Carey Street to the Mercers' attractive brick house on Exeter Road, listened to Mrs. Mercer's stern admonition to take a good long nap, and went upstairs to giggle and talk. By the time they settled down, it was nearly time to get ready for the dinner party which was to precede the Bal du Bois. Emily wore her pale blue evening dress with matching high-heeled slippers; Mary Rutherfoord was delicately lovely in white tulle. Just inside the entrance of the formally elegant Rotunda Club, two of the season's debutantes stood with their parents to receive guests, while a small orchestra played quietly in the background, and candlelight fell softly on masses of fresh flowers and gleaming silver. The dinner itself was delicious, and although one girl was heard to whisper wistfully, "We're going to miss the fireworks!" no one seemed in a hurry to rush off to the country club.

"B in Associative Rapport, C in Social Empathy, C in Maturity Development, B in Class Adjustment. . . . How we ever going to beat the Russians with a card like that?"

Quite a few of them did, indeed, miss the fireworks, which were shot off promptly at ten o'clock, blazing dramatically across the dark skies south of the clubhouse, drawing gasps of admiration and bursts of applause from spectators gathered on the terrace. But to the debutantes who arrived too late for the last flaring skyrocket, it was thrilling enough just to see the familiar surroundings transformed into exotic old Vienna, with painted gondolas afloat on mock canals, and masked cardboard ladies resplendent in bright gowns and jewels peering down on the dancers from ornate theater boxes.

"When we were out here this morning practicing, they were decorating," one blond debutante told her date, "but I never thought it would be so effective!"

What the girls had practiced was the "figure" which they were now about to perform. There was a quick scramble as daughters and fathers sought each other out, and then a fanfare of trumpets and a spotlight trained on the stone steps where, one by one, the debutantes appeared on their fathers' arms, to make the traditional formal bow to society. As each name was called, a ripple of applause and approving comments came from the relatives and friends who watched. One comment was heard again and again:

"One thing you have to say for this season's debutantes, they all look sweet and unaffected. Usually they seem so blasé!"

And truly, as the forty pastel-gowned girls moved through the intricate figure, as they waltzed with their fathers, as they smiled up at the first young man who came to cut in, they seemed appealingly fresh and youthful. "And I sincerely hope Emily stays that way," Alfred Tyler said, as he and Katherine stood watching their daughter jitterbugging with Princeton sophomore Freddy Fisher. "I hope she manages to get some sleep before tomorrow," Katherine said. "Do you know those girls have to go to a swimming luncheon and a reception, and another dance tomorrow night?"

Emily didn't get much sleep, but at the pool side next day she looked bright and rested. "The dance was wonderful, just wonderful," she said in her rather serious way. "Afterward, we took off our shoes and walked on the golf course. Then at Mary Rutherfoord's we had milk and cake, and then someone suggested we join a bunch that was going swimming and"—she broke off to swim across the pool, and climbed out, dripping, to join the other guests on the terrace for a pretty luncheon plate of crab meat and avocado, hot rolls, fresh fruit and sherbet—"well, as I was saying, we didn't get to bed very early, which is an understatement, but we certainly did have fun!"

During July and August, parties were fewer and more informal with many of the debutantes abroad, at Virginia Beach or in the mountains; and Emily had time to help her mother plan her own debut, which was to take place at the beginning of the late-summer rush. Most of this planning (and later, the addressing of invitations) took place in the Gray Room, which, because of the inevitable tourists, is the only room in which they were certain of being undisturbed. Since she planned to leave refreshment problems to a caterer, Katherine's biggest worries were the tricky related questions: "How many will accept?" and "Suppose it rains?"

"Maybe I'll write on the invitations to everybody except the actual debutantes and their escorts, 'Come if it's clear, stay away if it rains!'" she said half seriously. "I'm told if you invite 350 you can expect about 200 to come, but that seems risky to me, and Alfred thinks even 200 is too many."

Emily's worst headache was placing. Her thick loose-leaf notebook gradually became dog-eared and marked with complicated symbols and cross references as she sought to keep track of acceptances, refusals, "probablys" and "probably nots," extra men, house guests. It soon became apparent that the much-desired ratio of two boys to one girl was not going to be achieved.

Even the day before Emily's debut, the two most difficult problems were still unsolved, for the weather looked bad—it was chilly, dark and drizzling; and three girls were still without escorts. "If I have to go into Richmond and drag three boys out to Sherwood Forest by sheer force," Emily vowed, "every girl's going to have a date for that dance!" She did go into town, and spent most of the afternoon at her aunt's house, telephoning. By the time she got the last debutante placed and drove out to Sherwood Forest it was after six, she was due back in Richmond for a Gay Nineties party in less than two hours, three house guests were expected momentarily, and another, Jock Garst, had come already. Emily was simply too excited to eat any dinner ("She's going on nothing but nerves!" said her mother) but disappeared upstairs, presumably to rest.

The others had barely finished a pickup supper when a car on the drive announced the arrival of Dr. and Mrs. Hornbarger, who had driven up from Hot Springs with their daughter Margie, Reed Carter, and Ann Hogshead from Wilmington, who would stay with Emily over the weekend. The girls, classmates of Emily's at Mary Baldwin, rushed upstairs to Emily's room, while the Tylers showed the Hornbargers the small but elegant ballroom with gracefully arched ceiling and gleaming sweep of floor. A door led directly out onto the back lawn, where, if the night proved fair, lawn chairs and tables would be set up for the overflow from the ballroom.

"Suppose it rains?"

Katherine and Alfred Tyler exchanged a look; the old problem! "We'll simply have to make a decision by noon," Katherine said firmly. "If it's rainy then we'll move all the furniture out of the Gray Room and the library, and serve inside. But we hope we won't have to. Reed, why don't you go help Jock with his costume?" She told the others that, although Emily had rented her Gay Nineties costume in Richmond, Jock was wearing a British officer's uniform which had belonged to her father. "Father was in India for some time with the British East India Company," she said, "but I never did find out what he was doing in the British army!"

Soon Emily came down in a becoming green-striped dress with high prim collar and leg-of-mutton sleeves; and Jock appeared quite dashing in a crimson jacket trimmed with gold braid, and carrying an enormous pith helmet. "I don't believe it really goes with the uniform, but it's great for a party!" he said. Mary, pinning an antique brooch on her sister's collar, decided Jock needed a sw ran up to Jimmy's room and came back wi beautifully polished saber. "We've got ev thing in this house," she explained lightly.

At last Emily and Jock were ready—" won't be but two hours late," Emily c mented cheerfully—and drove off under st orders to come home early. "Although I d really expect them to," Katherine confesse

The Tylers—even Mary and Jimmy- tired early, anticipating a long, deman day ahead. But Margie, Ann and R wrapped in bedspreads, sat up in the libr and talked, giggled, and dozed until 3 when Emily and Jock came in. Then the went to the kitchen, where they feasted peanut-butter sandwiches, cake, milk, cin mon toast and whatever else looked "inter ing." Emily sat rather abstractedly ea grapes and sour cream.

"Four boys at that party tonight said t couldn't come tomorrow," she said. "Do know what that means?"

(But they couldn't really know wha meant—they hadn't wrestled with placing, placing and placing again.) "That me you've got to find new escorts for four gir said Margie.

"Listen, Emily," said Ann, "I'll give my date—won't that help?"

Emily thanked her, but refused. "I'll get on the phone tomorrow and call s more," she said. "And please don't tell mo how late we got to bed!"

It was five o'clock and already light w the girls finished putting up their hair and sided into sleep.

By ten o'clock on the morning of August the heavy clouds were beginning to break, Alfred Tyler, striding about Sherwood Fo in hunting boots and competently directing crew of yardmen, correctly decided that night would be clear. There was still plenty do. The grass must be freshly cut and ra the hurricane lamps and garden torches out, the lawn furniture placed. He had alre pressed Jimmy and his friend Henry into s ice; when Jock and Reed came out, he them to raking grass, and the girls to deci where the two refreshment tents should go. side, Mary and her mother were engage the formidable job of arranging flowers for parlor, hall, library and Gray Room.

"When I came out," Katherine recal adding a few more yellow chrysanthemum the huge bowl on the grand piano, "it was custom for friends to send bouquets on day of the debut—it was a nice tradition, such an extravagance! Nowadays, if a per wants to send flowers she calls the florist leaves an order, which may be filled any t the debutante chooses. We're fortunate have so many good friends; they don't they tell us they're sending over fifteen l chairs, or a dozen roses. For instance, in ju little while a friend is coming over to do an rangement for the dining-room table." At t moment the telephone rang; it was Mrs. B man, whose husband is rector of the West Church, wanting to know if she could run Richmond errands for the Tylers. Kathe said no, thanked her, and hung up just Jimmy and Henry came into the hall, trail leashes, and whistling for Rip, Curly King. Someone had remembered it was day they must be taken to the veterinarian rabies shots.

Emily, in Bermuda shorts, came down stairs in time to hear this, took a careful l at a slight skin infection on Rip's foot, cried accusingly, "I bet nobody's been gi Rip his pills! I put them right here on the t and asked if someone would promise fa fully to see that Rip got them, and now t aren't even here! Where are they?"

Nobody could remember having seen pills. "Maybe I've been taking them," Kath ine said.

"Oh, mother!" Mary laughed. "W maybe it will give you healthy skin." She her mother went back to the storeroom yond the kitchen for more flowers, and En ran back upstairs to do some telephoning. the moment, the wide hall was empty and lent. That was the moment a man, a woma a pink cotton dress, and an adolescent

NEXT MONTH

Who handles the money in your house?

If you are a wife and mother, you spend it—you are the authority on how far it will stretch. Or are you? Find out from our compelling new series, "How America Spends Its Money," beginning in January. A response to your overwhelming demand for real-life studies in the "How America Lives" pattern, the series will open the bankbooks and purses of actual families every month. We think it will open your eyes too. First family: the Bruns, who built their own home in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Pregnancy can be poison

"Your wife doesn't have toxemia yet, but she is headed for it unless you persuade her to follow my directions. Women of her type require special attention. Neglect or ignorance can be fatal." Do you know someone with Georgia's danger signs? If so, it is important that she read this article. "Tell Me, Doctor."

The "Happy New Year!" smorgasbord

Hot oysters in the shell, shrimps with dill, herring salad, ginger sausage, liver pâté, ham in aspic, stuffed beets, eggs and spinach with bacon sauce—make you hungry? Make you full of rejoicing too! Then, for dessert, tiny traditional pancakes with lingonberry preserves. This is smorgasbord the Dag Hammarskjold way, perfect for entertaining your own neighbors or a world's worth of United Nations delegates.

A. J. Cronin's new best seller

"Native Doctor," by the author of "The Citadel" and "The Keys to the Kingdom," tells the pulse-pounding story of a Caribbean island where evil coiled about the young Scottish doctor and his pretty nurse like lush, malignant vines; and where the flowers (especially the human ones) were unnaturally brilliant.

Also, part two of "China Court"; "I Feed a Family of 5 on $1 a Day"; Dr. Spock on what makes teenagers so steamy; exclusive fashion news from Paris; and much more, including your own letters in the January Journal.

the one shampoo that's really two NEW TANDEM

you suds twice—same as always—but what a difference!

For perfect cleaning twist cap to TANDEM GOLD

Cleans hair completely, the way no other leading shampoo can. Unlike other shampoos, TANDEM GOLD contains no conditioning agents to dilute its deep-down cleaning power. Nothing stops its richer, fluffier suds from getting hair clean. Perfectly clean because TANDEM GOLD is made to clean—and nothing else

For perfect control twist cap to TANDEM GREEN

TANDEM GREEN shampoo lathers your hair into beautiful behavior—immediately. Controls so completely there's no need for cream rinses. Light suds cleanse gently; bring body and moisture to make hair alive and obedient. Your hair sets easily. Stays easy to set—you can even pass up a pin-up or two!

NEWEST BRISTOL-MYERS DISCOVERY

came hesitantly through the front door, and stood looking about them in some confusion at the big black register book on the hall table, the "Sherwood Forest" post cards, the big vase of flowers, the scissors, and the cut stems scattered on the floor.

"Anybody home?" the man called tentatively. His wife walked to the flung-open back door and stared out—saw chairs stacked under magnificent old trees, a striped canopy going up, boys and girls raking grass and leaves and sticks, piling them onto a little cart pulled by a team of mules decorated with red tassels. "They must be having a party," she said, disappointed. "I guess they're not open today."

Before they could leave, though, a girl ran onto the porch barefooted, stopped in some surprise, and then smiled. "Oh, you must want the tour," she guessed. "I'm afraid I don't belong here, but I'll go find someone to take you around. As you can see, things are rather confused today because Emily—that's the daughter of the house, President Tyler's great-granddaughter—is making her debut tonight. But if you don't mind waiting ——"

The woman in pink, who had listened avidly to all this, looked about her with increased interest. "Why, no," she said, "we don't mind waiting at all. It sounds just fascinating!"

After all the years a girl has looked forward to her coming-out party, the evening itself seems to pass in a dream. First the formal dinner at Westover, given by close family friends—and what could be more fitting than for Emily to begin the first evening of her young adulthood in the beautiful old Georgian manor where she had spent so many happy hours of childhood! Looking poised but unsophisticated in her girlish white organdy frock, Emily stood with her hostess to receive guests, then joined the others at the richly laden buffet. Like most of the young people, she took her plate outside, where card tables had been set up on the moonlit lawn sloping down to the dark slow-flowing James River. With all the difficulties behind her—the placing problems solved, the skies starry, the breeze pleasantly cool—she was free for a moment to savor the beauty of the surroundings, the pleasant sound of voices and laughter, the delicious cold meat and hot biscuits.

Then it was time to race back to Sherwood Forest, in order to be there before the first guests arrived. Emily, not ordinarily noted for promptness, pleased her mother by arriving early enough to make a rapid change; for, against the possible disaster of spilled punch, it had been decided that Emily would wear her "St. Catherine's dress" to Westover, and save her new, more elegant white gown for the debut itself. Katherine, looking with approval at her family, deplored the fact that she herself had not had time to set her hair or take a nap; but actually, as she moved to the parlor to receive the first guests, she looked well-groomed and far more rested than she felt.

Once the guests began to pour in, the evening kaleidoscoped into color and movement. Girls in summery pastel frocks and their escorts drifted out onto the lawn and gathered about the buffet tables, which offered an attractive assortment of nuts, mints, dips and cheese straws, relishes and petits fours as well as pale rose punch in cut-glass bowls. Then the orchestra struck up, and Emily descended into the ballroom on her brother's arm for the first waltz—her father had insisted that Jimmy have the first dance. With the ball officially opened, dancers soon filled the floor, and from ten-thirty until two hardly paused for breath. Those less hardy congregated by the refreshment tables, or, dragging the carefully arranged lawn chairs into big circles, sat and talked. Alfred and Katherine moved among the guests, making sure everything was going well; Jimmy and the several boys Emily had asked to do "sentry duty" circulated quietly, seeing that all the debutantes were looked after and danced with. Mary was having a marvelous rush, while Emily seemed to change partners every few steps. Just after midnight, a tantalizing smell of charcoal smoke drifting across the lawn drew some dancers out to the charcoal braziers, where cooks were broiling savory miniature hamburgers, and serving them with tiny homemade biscuits. About this time, too, Emily's surprise was revealed—jauntily feathered Robin Hood caps for everyone. Boys and girls alike fell upon them with delight.

One of the best parts about Emily's dance, according to one of the boys, was the fact that the light supper was served fairly early. "Usually they give you breakfast at two and after that you just naturally go home. At Emily's you could eat almost as soon as you arrived, there wasn't any sharp breaking point, and people tended to stay."

Certainly no one seemed in a hurry to leave Sherwood Forest, even after the music stopped. At four-thirty a hard core of youngsters—Emily's house guests, the Fisher children from Westover, and a few more good friends—were gathered around the piano in the parlor singing college songs, show tunes, and the inevitable Dixie. Jimmy went to rescue the dogs, who had been penned up all evening, and all three bounded into the room wagging their tails ecstatically. At five o'clock someone suggested swimming.

HOW AMERICA SPENDS ITS MONEY

Compelling new series beginning in January. Can the Average American Live on What He Earns?

We launch our new series with the story of the Donald Bruns, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, whose annual income of $5803.20 is the national average for employed America. Here is a story of young love, faith, financial struggle, hard work and rich rewards in living. Over the coming months you will meet a different family each month and through these families you may learn more about managing your own family's money. You'll meet yourself and all your friends trying to make ends meet. You will study our financial counselor's recommendations for realizing your life's goals as well as meeting your month's bills.

Katherine Tyler protested, but mildly. All evening she had nursed a private fear that some of the more high-spirited youngsters might remember the goose pond and decide to take a plunge, evening clothes and all—a time-honored debutante gambit not unknown in Richmond circles. Now, however, she didn't really mind if this relatively small and familiar group wanted to rummage around for bathing suits and take an early-morning dip. She reminded them, though, that they were all expected to rise and shine for the brunch being given in Emily's honor by the Jamiesons at nearby Berkeley.

Perhaps the water was too chilly, or the boys and girls too exhausted; the swimming party didn't last long. When Ann, Margie, Emily and Mary climbed wearily up the stairs to bed, there was little danger that they would keep one another awake laughing and talking. Emily, still a bit wound up, felt a curious mixture of letdown and relief. It was all over. But now she could relax and enjoy the rest of the summer without that feeling of responsibility. And her debut had been a success. Everyone had seemed to be having fun, all the girls had been provided with suitable escorts, the Robin Hood caps had made a hit. And it hadn't rained!

In mid-September, Emily was back at Mary Baldwin, renewing old friendships (as a freshman, she hadn't been content until she knew every single classmate by name); getting reacquainted with the steeply terraced campus and the old yellow-brick buildings; taking up her new courses with enthusiasm. (A conscientious student, Emily works hard and gets good grades, likes Spanish best and expects to major in languages, participates strongly in extracurricular activities—mostly sports.) With friends at both the University of Virginia and Washington and Lee, Emily could expect to be invited to the men's colleges for several big weekends. By Thanksgiving she had collected a formidable stack of invitations to Christmas debutante parties.

Christmas at Sherwood Forest has traditionally been a family time. "But we may have to do without Emily this year," her mother predicts. "Why, last summer, friends of ours who wanted to give a party for her tried to get a date during the Christmas season, and there was nothing left—parties scheduled from the seventeenth straight through to the end of the year."

Emily being Emily, it is unlikely that she will ignore certain Tyler customs, even if it means missing some of the debutante parties. With the dogs at their heels, she and Mary and Jimmy will tramp down to the woods to gather bright partridge berries, running cedar, the rare and dainty nonesuch and princess pine—some of which will be mailed to their aunts in St. Louis and Seattle, some used for wreaths and garlands. A few days before Christmas she will go deep into the woods with her father to find a perfect spruce pine, and help decorate it with lovely old ornaments that have been in the family for years. She and Mary will arrange the figures of the crèche made years ago by one of Katherine's sisters. If she possibly can, she will be on hand for the Nolting family's eighty-fourth Christmas Eve party, at her cousin's in Richmond, and will attend midnight service at the Westover Episcopal Church. This year, as always, she will shoot off skyrockets and Roman candles, hang up her stocking at the fireplace in her parents' bedroom, wrap up a present for Rip.

But there will be little time this Christmas for walks in the woods, leisurely visits with relatives and friends, spur-of-the-moment drives to Richmond for shopping. Among the scheduled debutante parties are some eight dances, eleven lunches, ten dinner parties, as well as assorted brunches, teas and receptions.

Most important among the Christmas festivities is the german, held at the formal and elegant Commonwealth Club and permeated with the atmosphere of Old Richmond. Formerly, when few girls went to college and the coming-out season was concentrated in the fall, debutantes were presented to society at the First German, held in September. Now the First German has been discontinued, and by the Christmas German most of the debutantes have already officially come out; still the prestige of the dance remains undimmed and the honor of being the debutante chosen to lead in the figure is great. For many years, debutantes were allowed to attend the german with suitable escorts from out of town; this year, only members and sons of members, with their guests, will be admitted. Consequently most of the debutantes have had to cast about for elderly uncles or cousins to escort them—and some have been unsuccessful. Emily is going with a cousin. Her mother is glad that she was invited, though she recalls that as a debutante she herself found the german a little stuffy. "All the same," she admits with a smile, "I wouldn't have thought of not going. The german was just as much a part of life as anything else."

It would seem that most Richmond debutantes have the same casual, accepting attitude toward coming out in general. Since the parties are relatively inexpensive and simple ($1000 may be spent for a "small dance" in Richmond whereas it may take $12,000 to entertain 400 at a supper dance in New York), a Richmond family of modest means can present a daughter to society without mortgaging the white-pillared house. In fact, there is little to gain by extravagant and ostentatious entertaining, since Richmonders do not admire flashiness.

The mother of one debutante was high in her praise of Richmond's manner of presenting its daughters. "We live in Connecticut, and Belinda came out last year with the New York debutantes," she explained, "but since we have connections here, we decided to let her make a 'little' debut in Richmond this year. And she's having so much fun! She especially likes the placing—in the East, so many of the boys and girls go steady that the whole purpose of a debut seems defeated. Belinda has made a lot of new friends this year; it's been a most rewarding experience for her."

At one party last summer, a discussion about coming out sprang up among the debutantes themselves. "I had a chance to go to Russia with some college friends this summer," said the girl who had started the debate. "Now don't you think going to Russia is more important than going to a lot of parties? But my mother would have never got over it if I hadn't made a debut."

"Coming out's just a necessary part of life, like going to school and college and getting married," another defended. "It's automatic."

"Well, I'm not very popular," a third girl confessed. "I'm hoping to meet some boys and have some fun."

"It gives you experience," another said firmly.

Katherine Tyler's explanation of why she wanted Emily to come out is simple. "Out here in the country," she says, "there just aren't many people. Jimmy happens to have a whole crowd of friends, and Mary has a group she sees at the church; but except for the Fishers, there simply aren't any boys and girls Emily's age much closer than Richmond. Last summer the Fishers were abroad, and if Emily hadn't been going to all the debutante parties, I don't know what she would have done for companionship. And of course she's gained self-confidence and experience."

"The way she was working at that placing," her father jokes, "I was afraid for a while there she was going to turn into an executive."

Emily herself says succinctly, "I've made a lot of new friends. I've had a lot of fun. It's been a wonderful year." END

"I don't care what it is, please close the drapes!"

"...when Bill has a rough day ahead, one of the few ways I can help is to feed him right at breakfast...and to me, that means taking a minute to fix hot oatmeal...like Bill says, oatmeal sticks to his ribs...kind of gives his spirits a lift until lunchtime..."

(from a taped interview with a Davenport, Iowa housewife)

YOU KNOW YOU'VE DONE YOUR BEST_WITH HOT QUAKER OATS OR MOTHER'S OATS

HAROLD FOWLER

Old-fashioned charm in a lovely old Virginia house. A sense of history and a love for old things are reflected in the glowing warmth of the J. Alfred Tylers' sitting room, pictured at Christmastime.

GLOWINGLY TRADITIONAL

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor

This inviting room in the old President Tyler home of "Sherwood Forest," in Virginia, is the gathering place for the whole Tyler family. The historic house has two "parlors" which, along with the center hall and dining room, are open to tourists the year round. The rooms on display are kept pretty much the way they were after the War Between the States, and do not lend themselves to quiet reading, entertaining or any other normal function of a living room. So this is the warm, cozy refuge for the family, pictured here looking its best decked for Christmas.

Traditionally called the "Gray Room" in honor of the first owner's wife, a gentle Quaker lady, the walls have always had a gray paper. Wallpaper now has a stenciled effect, provides traditional yet not too formal a background for the Tylers' old, comfortable furniture and casual way of life. The open-to-the-public rooms contain the best furniture and most important heirlooms; here are second-best pieces, but kept in excellent condition, the sofa and chairs covered in bright, sturdy cotton velveteens. Curtains are very full and simple, in a silky synthetic mixture, tough yet beautiful. A vibrant red wool rug makes this room glow with cheer all through fall and winter, is especially right for the Christmas season.

MY UNCLE PEPE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 78

cried. "Well," he said and shrugged, "either it is there or it is not. I tried desperately to catch that fire and beauty in paint. Desperately and, finally, in despair. Because, my boy, it was not in me. Slowly I came to realize this. The drawing was creditable. The color good. But that which is beyond, that which lifts a man's soul and which, without understanding it, we call beauty, this evaded me.

"Florencia was not conscious of it. To be frank, La Florencia knew little of painting, great artist though she was. Her art was all in the dance, which is the rhythm of the blood. Paint her with a pretty face, with a rose in her teeth and she would cry, 'Magnificent! Superb!' But I myself knew. And finally, in a naked moment of the soul, in the most honest moment of my life, I destroyed my pictures. I tore them from their frames and shoved them into the stove. Florencia turned on me in great anger. Not that she minded that the world would lose an artist. For this, I believe, she cared very little. 'You will go back to your family,' she cried. 'You will smother yourself in soap and you will marry some woman they pick out for you.'"

My Uncle Pepe lifted his shoulders and let them fall again. "It happened very much as Florencia prophesied. I returned home, where I was received gladly. A place was made for me in the soap business and I did indeed marry a woman acceptable in every way to my family." Uncle Pepe hesitated. "You do not remember your Aunt Teresa? An admirable woman and beautiful too. I have the greatest respect for her memory. We prospered, as you know. But here was a strange thing. I could no longer go to the Prado. I could not face the futility of my own soul which faced me there, on those walls aglow with beauty, with the works of the great ones. I could no longer look at a Goya, my child, and still respect myself. They showed me too plainly what I lacked.

"Of Florencia I lost track. I heard she had gone to South America. It was only after years that I again had news of her. She had been very ill. She was back in Madrid, passing through on the way to her childhood home in the north.

"Clearly, for the sake of my youth, I must call. I expected that there would be a change. There had been the wasting illness, the passage of years. Still, I steeled myself and with a bunch of the yellow roses of Sevilla which she loved, I went to her hotel. It was more dreadful than I had feared. Ah, my poor Florencia.

"'You should not have come,' she cried when she saw me and her hands fluttered as if she wanted to hide her poor face. 'I don't want you to remember me like this.'

"What could a Spaniard, a man of gallantry, do? 'But my Florencia,' I said, 'to me you are more beautiful than ever.' And because the words came straight from the pity of my heart, the Mother of Mercies lent them the ring of truth. Then something very like a miracle happened. For an instant, summoned up by the words, all the beauty came flooding back. The blinding beauty. I was speechless before it.

"That was the great experience of my life.

"My Florencia returned to her home. I have never seen her again. But my life after that was different. Now I go walking every day in the Retiro and now and then, when I see a woman coming toward me, I know the moment has arrived. As she passes—sometimes an awkward young girl, a poor unfavored one without hope; perhaps a weary little woman who has forgotten or one whose bones hint of a past beauty, blurred by disaster—then I speak. And sometimes (rarely, it is true, but how unforgettable!) when I say into an ear, 'You are beautiful,' I see again that indescribable beauty touching the face. It lasts only for a moment, but for that moment it is of an unbelievable radiance.

"Now once again I go to the Prado. Now I stand with confidence among the spirits of the great ones and I am not ashamed. There, among those glowing pictures, we meet as equals, Goya and I. For I, too, am a creator of beauty."

"YOU ARE MY REAL MOMMY"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 67

duration," could look out at their big yard, or study the children's stories illustrated on the pink paper covering their nursery walls. It was a charming room, meant for happiness.

We did not expect everything to run smoothly. After all, children are children! We lavished affection on them and wanted them to learn to return love and respect. But very soon Grace began answering Karen insolently; not in my presence I suppose because it was a novelty to have a father who wore that impressive black suit. Grace's behavior typical for her age, was aggravated by her unhappy confusion of "mommy and daddy . . . my real mommy and daddy . . . Glenda's mommy and daddy." (The last-named were the previous foster parents.)

It was quite some time before Karen gave Grace the spanking she deserved—and wanted. (Grace was unusual. She sometimes thanked us for a spanking.)

The matter came to a head about three months after the girls' arrival. We were in another city, where I had to attend a meeting. Karen had taken the girls to a park, and when the time came to leave attempted to get Grace away from the swings.

"I hate you! I hate you!" Grace screamed and ran into the bushes, Karen after her. "And I don't like your house, and I don't like your car. My real daddy has a nicer one—a pretty car!"

When they picked me up at the cathedral, I shared Karen's feeling that this was a testing point of our parenthood. Grace and Mary were "special cases," it was true; but their happiness, their sense of belonging could not be built on indulgence.

I turned to Grace. "I hear you told mommy that you hated her, and that you are going to tell Mrs. Forrest you're not happy."

A pouty face, a stony silence.

"If you don't like living with us"—steady now, the anger, the disappointment, the pride are showing—"then we will call Mrs. Forrest for you. We are your mommy and daddy not because we have to be, but because we want to be. We love you and Mary. But if you don't want to stay at our house any more, you don't have to."

That little speech, prompted by the fear of failure, and followed by tears, seemed to turn the tide. From then on Grace accepted love in its many forms—joyful, tender, protective, severe. And we began to learn not only about parenthood but about Grace and Mary.

Our picture of their sweet young mother, suffering for one false step, was fading. Grace chattered often about her "real mommy and daddy" and about staying in "lots of hotels." Once, while Karen was ironing, Grace asked, with intense seriousness, "Mommy, if a bobo man tried to hurt me, would you kill him?"

Karen, with no time to think, blurted out, "Of course not. I would never kill anyone, Grace. It's wrong to kill."

"My real mommy would. One night a bobo man came and wanted to hurt the baby. We got into a car and ran over that bad bobo man."

From the beginning we had noted Grace's fear of the police and tried to reassure her. She eventually told us that she had been in the hotel room when the police took her mother away. "My mommy cried and cried ——"

We took the children to a friend's wedding, and Grace watched in wonder as the bride walked down the aisle in her white dress. She could talk of nothing else for days, and once mentioned casually, "My mommy and daddy aren't married. They haven't had time."

Our families were amused. They all had fallen in love with deep, sensitive, beautiful Grace, and magazine-cover Mary who was always hugging, kissing, laughing. "Well, you never know," my mother said. But after all, one could not take seriously what a little child said.

Summer heat and humidity made us happy to say good-by to home for a month, spent partly with our parents and partly at the beach. It was a wonderful summer in which the four of us drew even closer in love and understanding. We prayed earnestly for the girls and their future, although we knew that future did not include us. I had baptized them shortly after they came to live with us; a conditional baptism, since we had no way of knowing if it had been given earlier, though it seemed doubtful. Both girls loved Sunday school but even Grace had never heard of God or prayer until she entered our house.

Before long an early winter was upon us with months of gray cloud and rain. One gloomy morning, before I left for the church, the bell rang and I opened the door to a large, hearty woman in a trench coat.

"I'm Mrs. O'Bannion, from Welfare."

She explained that the girls had now been resident long enough in the county to qualify for welfare funds. Previously the Probation Department had paid us a monthly sum for their care (although it did not cover what we spent on their food, clothing and recreation, much less pay the premiums on their educational annuities).

Mrs. O'Bannion asked us several questions which we could not answer. She finally exploded. "What's the matter with those clunkheads over at Probation! Don't you know you could have your foster-home license revoked? You're supposed to know these things!"

So we listened to the truth about the girls' mother. By James Wilson she was the mother of five children, whom she deserted to go off with Ray Todd. Mrs. O'Bannion said that Grace, who was Todd's child, had been born while Josephine was still legally the wife of James Wilson—though later events added still another strand to this tangle of human relationships.

Josephine Todd's background was that of comfortable middle-class family life in a large Midwestern city. Her father and most members of the family worked for the Federal Government in minor positions of responsibility. She had attended the local university; had left it to marry Wilson. Later she had received an art degree from a fine-arts academy in New York City.

How did she meet Todd? She never told. But Todd took her, without much difficulty, from the normal pattern of life she had always known. His career was crime. Although a craftsman, his police records stretched back to his fourteenth year, when he was sentenced to an Arkansas juvenile detention home. By the time he came into Josephine's life he had already served one term in a state prison.

Wilson started divorce proceedings, gaining custody of their five children. Ray and Josephine set out on a cross-country tour, forging checks, changing money orders, and were involved in the theft of Government bonds. Both were arrested. Josephine, because she had no past criminal record, was given a suspended sentence and placed on probation. Ray went to Leavenworth. Josephine returned to her home town and several months later was pregnant by another man. Mary bears Todd's surname, although technically neither child is his. Was Josephine still married to Wilson? The confusion about this point would arise again.

When Ray got out of Leavenworth, Josephine broke her probation, and the Todds resumed their frantic pursuit of wealth and happiness. In the back seat of their car, Mary and Grace have been in forty-four states of the Union. Mary's bottle was her comfort. At night the girls were frequently left alone in hotel rooms. By day the two went with their mother to local stores. Who would question the honesty of such a wholesome young woman buying beautiful clothes for her little girls?

When they were particularly "hot" Ray and Josephine packed the girls off to his mother's home in a remote Arkansas town, or left them for several weeks with this relative or that casual acquaintance.

The FBI finally caught up with the pair, first Ray, then Josephine. It was here that the separation scene occurred, as a tearful Josephine was hauled away to police headquarters, and the bewildered children were taken for a two-week stay in the county juvenile home, where they shared facilities with other children and adolescent delinquents. From there, Grace and Mary went to "Glenda's mommy."

We sat stunned. This was the mother who had twice in the year written those charming letters to her girls.

"Huh!" Mrs. O'Bannion snorted skeptically. "She wants to get out on parole. Her little darlings need her. And she'll make it. The parole board will be a pushover for a story like that. Remember, somebody's read those letters."

I could not help confessing how deeply we loved the girls. "If this is the way it is, couldn't we adopt them?"

"Oh, there might be ways. But it would be pretty tough. California law is all on the mother's side."

"But her character ——"

"So what? She's their mother. The only chance you'd have would be abandonment, and you would have to prove that for a year she hadn't been in touch with them. If she sent even a post card, it would be enough. Just so long as she was in touch." Mrs. O'Bannion shook her head definitively. "No, my friends, you'd just let yourselves in for a lot of heartache. We all hate to see it, but there's nothing to do about it, at least as long as the present laws are on the books, and they're administered the way they are. Of course a real sharp judge would take care of it, but ——" She pounded her fist into the arm of the chair. "I'll tell you one thing, if this weren't a split custody—if they were entirely under Welfare—we'd never let her have these kids again, whether she'd give them up for adoption or not. But Probation is prepared to hand 'em over when she gets out. And that won't be long."

What was ahead for Mary and Grace? It was not just that we loved them. Selfishly we had wanted them all along, but not a family that belonged to someone else. Now we could think of nothing but the injustice if the girls should return to their natural mother, "an incorrigible criminal," in Mrs. O'Bannion's phrase.

Her account was verified by other workers who followed after her (she returned to New York State). Some tried to soften the estimation of the mother's character by saying, "She's not really that bad; just very weak." Or, "Mrs. Todd took good care of her children, and she has an I.Q. of almost a hundred and fifty."

This did not give us much comfort. What was "good care"? Buying expensive clothes? She could afford to do that, by raising five-dollar money orders to read "five hundred." Good food and lodgings? A racketeer has an excellent expense account. But if "good care" has anything to do with faith, morals, manners, decency toward one's fellow man, stability, and a love expressed in more than words—had Josephine Todd really given it? I had to search my soul. Was I using Mrs. Todd's faults as a screen for the fact that I coveted her children? Could she rear these children in the right way in spite of everything?

Then I would look at the girls and think about how this family love affair had "happened." We were the ones who fed, clothed and sheltered them. We soothed away bad dreams. It was our bed they leaped on like commandos every morning. We took them to church, to the doctor, to the store. They shared the happy circle of our families, enjoying the affection poured upon them by all. We drove them to the beach and to the park and the zoo, to the movies, to the woods. We read stories to them, talked to them about God and animals and where the sun goes at night.

We even felt an obligation to keep alive the parents who became more and more a blur in Grace's memory, who were purely mythical figures to tiny Mary. Each night "real mommy and daddy" were mentioned in prayer. We taught the girls to look forward to the day when they would return to their very own parents. I made up a story. It was about Belinda, whose mommy and daddy sailed away over the sea. And while they were gone she stayed with Mr. and Mrs. Poppitt in the little brown house with the little yellow roof and violets in the garden, and a great black dog and a little gray cat and a pretty green bird. Belinda was very happy, and so were the Poppitts, and they loved each other very much. But when Belinda's mommy and daddy came home, she went once more to her own house—a white house with a little green roof and shutters and her very own little tan dog and her very own little white kitten. And she and her mommy and daddy loved each other very much. It was a cloying little story, but Grace listened and seemed to divine its meaning. Nevertheless, "real mommy and daddy" began to take on the characteristics of Eric and Karen Simpson.

"My real daddy is a priest, too," Grace declared one day.

Another time out of the blue, she asked Karen, "Mommy, what is my last name?"

"Todd—Grace Todd is your name."

"What's your last name?"

"Simpson, honey. Both daddy and I are named Simpson."

The child looked up at Karen, a serious, intense expression in those amazing eyes. "I wish Mary's and my name was Simpson," she said.

"Todd's a nice name, too," Karen said, trying to look casual and unconcerned. There was no choice, whatever her heart might feel.

We were informed shortly before Christmas, 1957, that the mother had been released. From day to day we expected a call, a letter, a knock at the door. None came. And there were no Christmas presents from her.

We made that Christmas a glowing one, since we knew that the end of our life together was near. Mary got a rocking horse, and Grace a tricycle, along with mountains of packages from grandmother and grandfather—"gammy" and "gampy"—from aunts and uncles, as well as from many members of the congregation. The people of Saint Thomas were devoted to the girls, and during coffee hours after late Sunday-morning service had long since learned to steady their cups against a sudden onslaught, as Mary raced up to them for a hug and a kiss. A snapshot we took that Christmas Eve shows the joy and pride in Karen's face, the delight of little girls enjoying their first big Christmas celebration. We let them stay up quite late: almost until time for us to head downtown for the midnight Eucharist. We tucked them in just before the baby sitter arrived.

In Lent came a discipline far beyond anything the church might impose. Early in the afternoon, before I had set out on my parish calls, one more in the long succession of social workers arrived.

"I am sorry to say that the girls will be leaving Monday," she said. "They are to be sent to ——" and she named a large California city. "I'll come back another time, when the girls aren't napping, and take them out for a ride to get acquainted with them, before we make the trip. What would they consider a treat?"

Karen's composure was magnificent, but I could tell by the flush of her cheeks how this long-expected moment had hit her. "They love to visit the children's Wonderland in the park," she said.

"Then I'll call tomorrow about three," Miss Antonini said. She got up to leave. "I know this is hard for you," she told Karen. I turned to see the tears rush hotly into Karen's eyes. Miss Antonini made a hasty exit.

Karen is a quiet person, and it takes much sorrow for her to lose control. But now, when she spoke, there were little stifled cries from deep within her. I thought I was being brave. But the awful, aching reality took hold at last. Karen and I clung together, sobbing. It was worse than losing children in death. Before us rose pictures of the life ahead of them. We thought of the obscene language these two little girls had used, quite naturally and innocently, when they first came to us. We wondered if they would grow up loving God, or follow their mother's path. Did she really care for them? Would we ever see them again, even after many years?

Grace, up from her nap, came into the living room. We had washed our faces and regained self-control. Thinking back, as I write these words, the scene appears melodramatic, but only because those hours are part of the past.

"Sweetheart, we have a surprise," we said, after some preliminary remarks, calculatedly matter-of-fact. "You know, you've always talked about the time when you would be with your real mommy. Now you are going to take a trip, and you will see her. And when she can, she is going to make a home for you."

Grace had settled on my lap. She said quietly, "I don't think that's a very nice surprise." There was a silence. We had tried to

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCENE COX

Our gratitude at Christmastime
Might be, more frequently than not,
As much for gifts we did not get
As for the ones we got.

Steaming windows may be a signpost of the pressure under which mother is working.

A MAN IS ——

As young as his smile, as old as his pouts,
As young as his faith, as old as his doubts,
As young as his joys, as old as his prates,
As young as his loves, as old as his hates.

Some families are in debt because they spend an amount comparable to what they think their neighbors make.

Our youngest, who, under pressure, mastered the slide rule, vows she's going to wait until her children graduate from college before telling them they are poor in mathematics.

If the marriage counselors have failed probe plumbing as a possible cause of breakup of happy homes, they have ssed a vital point. In far too many ases, the days when everything is run- g smoothly in the water department few and far between. Either you have much water or not enough. If you ct have it you are washing out under- gs in bath water, then saving it to sh the floor. If you do have it, it's es- ing via a leaky faucet, or it isn't es- ing because the sewer is clogged with ce grounds, baby toys, mail-order cogues, grease. Or it may be gushing lik Niagara from the twisted and broken pi of a bowl just ripped from the wall lik hurricaned tree from the ground bes one of the children decided to stamp in it to wash his feet.

"ave never known an overscrupu- lou housekeeper who was fat," says our neighborhood philosopher. "It's always the skinny ones who worry families and them on edge."

You save without having to learn how! Savings pile up almost by themselves when you buy Bonds on the Payroll Savings Plan.

A plan that takes the struggle out of saving

Setting aside part of your money for savings isn't easy these days. But there's one sure way: save some of it before you get it. You simply ask the company where you work to set aside any amount you wish every payday for U. S. Savings Bonds. The Payroll Savings Plan makes sure it goes into savings before you can dribble it away. And after you're in the plan for a while, you don't even miss the amount that's been put away for you.

WHY U.S. SAVINGS BONDS ARE SUCH A GOOD WAY TO SAVE

You can save automatically with the Payroll Savings Plan.

You now get 3¾% interest at maturity.

You invest without risk under U. S. Government guarantee.

Your money can't be lost or stolen.

You can get your money, with interest, anytime you want it.

You save more than money, you help your Government pay for peace.

Buy Bonds where you work or bank.

GIVE A GIFT FOR PEACE THIS CHRISTMAS

Bonds are more than money-in-the-sock for college, for retirement or for a vacation trip. Every Bond dollar helps pay for Peace.

NOW every Savings Bond you own —old or new—earns ½% more than ever before.

You save more than money with U.S. Savings Bonds

The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the magazine publishers of America.

How to play Santa for $5.00

Give the fountain pen that never goes near an ink bottle! Sheaffer's cartridge fountain pen writes free and easy...has a precision-ground, tapered, wrap-around point. Refills cleanly and quickly with drop-in Skrip cartridges. Choice of colors and point gradations. Pen $5, or handsomely boxed set with matching pencil $8.75.

SHEAFFER'S®

©1960, W. A. S. P. CO., SHEAFFER PENS, MAICO HEARING AIDS

put the matter simply, and help her understand. Suddenly she looked at me with the eyes of a frightened little animal. It was an hour before we could quiet her completely. She promised to be a big girl for Mary's sake. We told her how much we loved her, and that we would do everything possible for her. We explained that someday, when she was much older, she could go to school because we had put aside money for her to use. And for Mary too.

Each day left was "special." There were picnics, trips to the zoo, dinners out at our favorite restaurant. All of us must learn how to "let go." It was not easy. We grieved that Grace and Mary must be freed from our love and reconciled to the move; yet there was no other course open to us. Soon they began to talk about seeing their real mommy again.

A spring storm blew over the countryside with terrific force. Miss Antonini called to say that the trip must be postponed because of the damage. We were torn between agony and relief. We would have Easter together! She came meanwhile to take the girls riding in her car, and spend a happy afternoon in the Wonderland. When she brought them back, the young social worker asked if we had told the girls. We said that we had. "I'm so grateful." There were tears in her eyes. "I just couldn't bring myself to say anything."

Easter came, with special services and our families for dinner. The day passed unmarred by mention of what lay ahead. It was enough to have that day. Later in the week Miss Antonini called to say she would come at six A.M. the following Monday.

We packed the girls' clothes, including the new outfits. I wrote a letter for Grace to open on her fourteenth birthday, explaining how very much she and her sister had meant to us when they were small, and that we could be reached through the Episcopal Church, if ever we could be of help to them. The mother had agreed to let us continue the educational policies, so their college careers were provided for. We also packed medical records, baptismal certificates, and an album of pictures for the girls to keep, which they could show to their mother as a record of their fifteen months with us.

We got them up at five, so that they could be fed properly before beginning the ten-hour drive to the city where their mother now lived as a parolee of the Federal women's prison, and so there would be time for a fitting good-by. But at five-thirty sharp Miss Antonini was there, with another worker. The girls had not completed their breakfast. Hastily we packed their playthings into the back of the borrowed station wagon. Grace began to cry, but we reminded her that she must help Mary and she got hold of herself. Mary did not cry or speak. She simply would not budge; she refused to put on her coat. Finally it was forced on her. We carried her to the car, said a quick good-by and shut the door.

We spent the day alternately talking the whole thing out and being silent for long stretches of time. By the end of that day I made a firm resolve. Tears, hand wringing and meek passivity were not the solution. There must be some means for a Christian and a father to look out for Mary and Grace, if not actually to regain their custody.

Karen had been discouraged by social workers, as well as the welfare director of another county who had tried earlier to help interest Mrs. Todd in allowing us to adopt the girls. She thought I was foolish to try, but she went along. So began a time of earnest and continual prayer; not ours alone, but our families', and parishioners', and those of priests in our diocese.

I wrote a letter to the probation department of the county to which the girls had been taken, explaining the situation as fully as possible, our readiness to adopt the girls, or even to take them permanently as foster children without remuneration. If neither move was possible, we wanted the mother's approval to become "aunt" and "uncle" to the girls, see them occasionally, and do for them.

The following Sunday a woman stopped me at the church door after service. "Father Simpson, my son-in-law is a state senator. I've told him, and my daughter, who's also a lawyer, about this business. They would be glad to help you. Write to them, put down every detail of the case, and see what they can do."

I addressed a letter to the senator. Two days later his administrative assistant replied that the case was under full investigation.

Then from Sacramento came an official-looking envelope. A high official, interested in Grace and Mary, to our surprise and pleasure, told us that the probation worker assigned to their case was "discussing with the mother whether or not she could ever give the girls the kind of home they need." Our hopes mounted. I reiterated our desire to adopt the girls, adding that we were also trying to adopt a baby through the county welfare (whose director had tried to help us with the girls). We did not want one action to interfere with or counteract the other.

We heard next from a Mrs. MacMahon, the foster mother now caring for Mary and Grace. "The girls talk about you constantly.... They spent a week in the Juvenile Hall before coming here." She thanked us for the detailed notebook regarding the habits, temperaments, likes and dislikes of the two. Her observations agreed with ours. We were relieved to find this woman was sincerely religious, and that the girls were attending Sunday school.

(The helpful county welfare director later wrote that the probation officials in the county to which the girls were removed had been horrified by the action of our county. They saw no necessity for the uprooting. The mother's attitude pointed up the futility of such a drastic step. As a result Mary and Grace spent that week in the unfriendly surroundings of a lockup-type juvenile hall, in which most of their clothes and toys were confiscated, as well as the letter referred to earlier; and then they had to make the adjustment to another foster home.)

Mrs. MacMahon mentioned Josephine Todd. "She married recently. She and her husband came once. Although the girls are usually so friendly, they would not make up to her at all and did not seem to recognize her. She promised to take them for a day's outing, but she called later and said the car was in for repairs. That was the middle of May. We have not seen nor heard from her since. She did not remember the girls' birthdays."

In succeeding letters Mrs. MacMahon revealed that the mother had not been at all curious to see the girls' room, had not kissed them, nor shown any more interest than she might have in a neighbor's children running through the house. She impressed Mrs. MacMahon as a "flashy blonde in her late thirties." Both the MacMahons offered to testify whenever necessary.

In the same month we took home from the county hospital our son Alec. He was four days old, bright red, lusty-lunged, alert and well formed. (Now legally adopted and over a year old, he is a handsome, delightful boy, full of fun, his eyes alive with mischief.) After we had had him a few weeks we visited the girls. At first they were shy, as though bewildered by our appearance. Mrs. MacMahon was surprised. "They have talked of nothing else but your visit since I told them about it yesterday." Soon, however, they were in our laps, happy, clinging, and we were a family again. We dressed them up and set off for our day of fun.

"Do you like me, mommy?" Mary wanted to know after a while, in a matter-of-fact little voice. And when it was time the girls bade us a stoical good-by.

Our minds were eased about their present welfare. They were in a happy home, where they found warmth and friendship. But only temporarily. The MacMahons' persuasiveness had halted the normal process of foster-home placement. Originally Mary and Grace were to be with them a maximum of six weeks, after which there would be another transplanting, if not to the mother's home, then to another foster home, which would be changed every few years. Most foster-home licensing is on an age basis.

According to the administration of the law in California, it was possible for a woman who had received two prison sentences, broken probation, deserted five children, borne these two

How to play Santa for $8.75

Give the year's newest quality fountain pen! Sheaffer's new Target Pen combines modern styling with traditional Sheaffer craftsmanship. Tapered wrap-around point makes writing smooth, effortless. Single-stroke Touchdown filling action holds a large supply of Skrip writing fluid. Choice of colors and point styles. Pen, $8.75; matching pen and pencil set, $12.75.

SHEAFFER'S®

©1960, W. A. S. P. CO. SHEAFFER PENS, MAICO HEARING AIDS

out of wedlock by different lovers, to control the disposition of her children's future. The court was willing for her to regain entire custody. She was a "fit mother" when she could provide the right kind of bed. And even if she were declared unfit, she could successfully block the girls' establishment in a permanent home. Like countless thousands of others, they might go trudging from foster home to foster home, without ever knowing emotional security. Would this fate really be preferable to life with their mother?

Because of the interest of influential persons, every effort was being made, we later learned, to talk the mother into giving up her children. Mrs. Lundgren—her new married name—had finally agreed. The social worker wisely gave her several months in which to change her mind. By September, 1958, her decision to give up the children had been established sufficiently long for the probation department to contact us. A court hearing was scheduled for October, and we were told we could pick up the children immediately afterward.

The lawyer who was handling Alec's adoption got busy. He received a favorable letter from Mrs. Lundgren. We secured a foster-home license in the county to which we had moved a short time before. Then followed the usual medical examinations, tests, shots and home studies. We wasted no time in taking care of these proper and essential matters.

Another trip to see the girls. . . . We asked them if they would like us for their real daddy and mommy. We had to pry them out

Vanity is the quicksand of reason of our car, as they were determined to go home with us at once.

GEORGE SAND

The day of the hearing we were waiting at the MacMahon home. Mrs. MacMahon had requested permission to accompany the girls to the Juvenile Court since, on their court visit several months earlier, they had been called without notice and taken off, hysterical with fear and foreboding, by a stranger. This must never happen again, she had decided, even though she could not attend the actual hearing or the girls see their mother.

We had been told by letter what the outcome would be. Mrs. Lundgren would tell the judge that she had agreed to give up the girls for adoption, he would continue them in the custody of the court and place them in our care as foster parents. Then we could begin adoption proceedings

It was several weeks before our relationship was on its old foundation of trust. Once Grace asked, "Mommy, how long can we stay before we have to go away again?" Another time she wanted to know, "Will Alec still be my brother when I grow up?" It was necessary to repeat the nightmare stage, but that has passed, and to overcome Mary's fright whenever we were out of her line of vision. Many reassurances had to be given. But even little Mary is now certain. "You are my real mommy . . . you are my real daddy," she has told us, patting us gently.

The girls love Alec, and he is delighted by their attentions, their antics. Grace and Mary had asked us repeatedly for a little brother; now they have him. The girls were much impressed by the brief ceremony in the judge's chambers which made Alec a permanent member of the family. Alec looks much like his adoptive father, and the girls are constantly asking us, "Which one do I look like?" Mary has Karen's coloring, my eyes. Grace's blue eyes are much like her adoptive mother's. At the suggestion of the probation worker, we have delayed any discussion of the other mother until the adoption is final.

This ceremony was to have taken place several months ago, but Josephine Lundgren disappeared the very day on which she was to have signed the final adoption papers. She left a note for her husband, with whom she was managing an apartment house: "Have gone downtown to the Bureau of Adoptions. Back soon Love, Jo."

Why did she disappear? Was it a feeling of guilt at voluntarily relinquishing these two children? Was it an unwillingness to be a party to the action, a feeling that society was pressing down upon her? That is logical, but there are other considerations: Ray Todd was due to be released from a Federal prison at about the time of her disappearance. Did he induce her once more to join him? Or, in the light of what was discovered soon after, did Josephine fear a charge of bigamy?

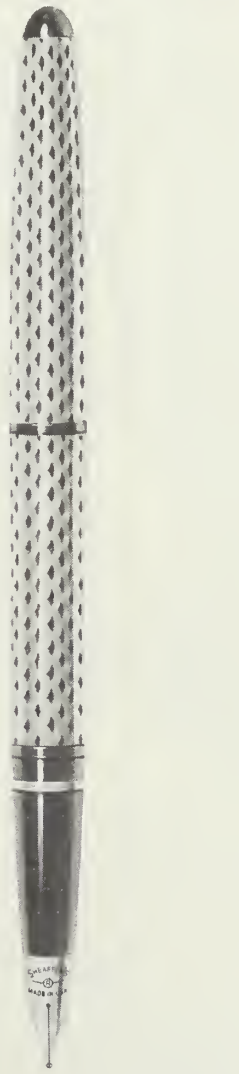
By the end of May, 1959, it had been a year since her last contact with her children (through Mrs. MacMahon). So abandonment proceedings were instituted by our lawyer. A copy of a warrant was sent to Mrs. Lundgren's address, and four successive weeks of public notice in the local paper followed giving her thirty days to get in touch with the court. She failed to appear, but one week from the date of the abandonment proceedings, again within sight of final action, we received a letter from our lawyer, forwarded to us while we were on vacation: ". . . Josephine Lundgren was married to a Mr. John E. Burr at the time both of the girls were born. Therefore, even though we know to the contrary, he must be considered the presumptive father. It will be necessary for us once more to give four weeks' public notice, citing Josephine Lundgren, John E. Burr, and all other interested parties. A hearing will be set for October of this year. . . ."

We are assured that this latest step is merely a legal technicality, a protection of both our interests and the girls'. It has necessitated more X rays, blood and tuberculin tests for the girls, and other heavy expenses, beyond the considerable cost of legal counsel.

Even now, in these last weeks, Josephine Lundgren could appear and wipe out all chance for Mary and Grace to have a secure and inviolable family life. Her refusal to sign final papers could end all our hopes. Perhaps we would be allowed to keep the girls indefinitely as foster children; perhaps not. It would depend upon the humanity of one or two people, or—even more chancy—on the amount of attention they gave to the case If she demanded it, there is little question that a judge could and probably would give her custody under present laws. And if she turns up at our house? We would not let her have the children but would require her to get a court order. Then we would begin a lengthy and expensive legal battle. For we believe that a higher will than ours has given us this child of grace and her little sister to love and protect, to nurture in the truths and values which make life beautiful and livable. We want for them the same deep security and sense of belonging which all children need for proper emotional and psychological growth.

We issue a direct challenge to all state governments now administering child-welfare laws like those of California: Can the interests of a mother like Josephine Lundgren be paramount over the welfare of children? One can appreciate the desirability of safeguarding parental rights. But is there not some point at which any person loses such rights?

Although there have been some mistakes made by welfare workers in handling Mary and Grace, they were understandable in view of present laws. Grace and Mary are not exceptions but typical. Caseworkers impressed us often with their sympathetic desire to help these thousands of American children who face the same dread uncertainties which were Mary's and Grace's, children who will not always encounter the same great need as ours, or someone's stubborn determination to give them a home. One postal card a year is enough to make it possible for thoughtless, callous self-seekers to "dump" their children on society and still control them.



Karen and I are not experts on law. But we would like to know if there is not a more merciful justice, directed to a greater good, than present legislation allows.

Jesus taught that it was better to have a millstone tied round your neck and to be tossed headlong into the sea than for one of His little ones to perish. END

Since the above narrative was written, adoption proceedings have been completed and the girls now have a permanent home and "real" parents. —The Editors

How to play Santa for $10.00

Give her Lady Sheaffer, a jewel of a pen! The warmth and charm of a lady's handwriting can only be captured by a good fountain pen. And here's the most feminine one of all! The Lady Sheaffer pen shuns ink bottles, refills cleanly, easily with drop-in Skrip cartridges. Illustrated: Paisley pen with gold-colored accents, $10; set with matching pencil $14.95.

SHEAFFER'S®

©1960, W.A.S.P. CO., SHEAFFER PENS, MAICO HEARING AIDS

How to play Santa for $15.00

Give him Sheaffer's new PFM, Pen For Men. Styled to fit a man's hand and a man's way of writing...with Sheaffer's exclusive Snorkel Pen clean filling action. Distinctive inlaid point. Holds a man-size capacity of Skrip writing fluid. Choice of point styles. Illustrated: PFM III (pen, $15; pen and pencil set, $20). Other PFM pens $10 and up, sets priced from $14.95.

SHEAFFER'S®

©1960, W.A.S.P. CO., SHEAFFER PENS, MAICO HEARING AIDS

SOUTHERN HOSPITALITY UNLIMITED

MENU

Scalloped Oysters

*Virginia Christmas Ham Roast Turkey with Dressing Cranberry Sauce

Whipped Sweet Potatoes with Walnuts in Orange Cups *Spinach Ring with Creamed Mushrooms

*Potato Rolls

Watermelon-Rind Pickles Brandied Peaches Green-Tomato Pickles

*Lemon-Chess Pie Christmas Cookies

Coffee or Tea

By JEAN ANDERSON

Christmastime in Tidewater Virginia begins about now; at least it does at the Alfred Tylers' of Charles City County. December has blown a chill into the air, but indoors at Sherwood Forest and in other plantations up the James River toward Richmond you'll find a special warmth—of the home and of the heart. Soon the big ham will be brought up from the smokehouse, a wondrous mahogany-hued ham hung to hickory-smoked perfection. There will be "sweets" whipped until fluffy, then mounded high with a crunch of walnuts in orange cups, a smooth green ring of spinach with its mountainous ladling of fresh creamed mushrooms. From the pantry—pickles of green tomato and watermelon rind, brandied peaches and spicy cranberry sauce. For Christmas Day there must be a turkey, too, proud and plump. And a giant tureen of ocean-sweet oysters.

In the kitchens fragrant fruitcakes are now baking. Soon plum puddings will be set to steam, there'll be Christmas cookies by the dozen, feathery potato-yeast rolls and that most golden and irresistible of pies: lemon-chess. The children will be home to gather holly and groundberries, to fashion wreaths of greenery and red ribbon and gilded cones, to set a pine spray on the table for that most memorable of meals—Christmas dinner in the best Virginia tradition.

Virginia Christmas Ham

1 Virginia-smoked-type ham (about 10 lbs.)
1 cup soft fine bread crumbs
1 cup light brown sugar
2 tablespoons light corn syrup
Melted butter (about ½ cup)
Whole cloves

Scrub the ham well with a stiff brush in lukewarm water. Rinse well and then soak the ham overnight in cool water. In the morning, scrub the ham again and rinse. Now place the ham in a large, heavy oval kettle (you may have to saw off some of the hock to fit the ham into the kettle). Just cover ham with water and simmer, covered, until a fork will pierce the ham easily (this will take about 3 hours). Since Virginia hams are very salty, the ham will be much less salty if you change the cooking water twice. Never allow the water to boil; keep it at a slow simmer. When the ham is tender, remove from the cooking water and cool overnight. In the morning, remove hard rind and trim off excess fat—Virginia hams have a thick covering of fat. Now mix together the bread crumbs, brown sugar, light corn syrup and enough melted butter to hold the ingredients together. Pat well over the fat surface of the ham, score crisscross fashion and stud with cloves. Place ham in a baking pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 45 minutes or just until crumb coating is browned. Virginia hams are best served cold. Decorate the ham, if you like, with glacéed cherries and angelica in a poinsettia or holly motif. Makes 8 servings (with plenty of leftovers for good eating later).

Spinach Ring with Creamed Mushrooms

SPINACH RING:
10 (10-oz.) packages frozen chopped spinach
¼ cup butter
1 tablespoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper

CREAMED MUSHROOMS:
3 pounds small mushrooms
½ cup butter
1 cup heavy cream
1½ teaspoons salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Wipe mushrooms with a damp cloth and remove stems (save them for soups or stews). Heat the ½ cup butter in a large skillet and saute the mushroom caps until golden. Remove about ⅓ of the mushrooms from the skillet and drain on paper toweling. Reduce the heat under the skillet to low, add cream, salt and pepper and heat, stirring, for 5–8 minutes. Thicken the sauce, if you like, with 1 tablespoon flour mixed with a little cold water. Add the flour-water paste to the hot sauce slowly, stirring. Continue to heat and stir until thickened and smooth. For the ring, cook the frozen spinach until just tender according to package directions. Then drain very dry in a strainer. Mix in the butter, salt and pepper. Now pack the hot spinach tightly into a lightly buttered 6-cup ring mold and invert at once on a hot platter. Fill the center of the mold with creamed mushrooms and arrange clusters of the sautéed mushrooms about the base. Makes 8 hearty servings.

Lemon-Chess Pie

1 unbaked pie shell (9″)
1½ cups sugar
⅓ cup melted butter
Juice and finely grated rind of 3 lemons
5 eggs, lightly beaten

Mix together thoroughly all filling ingredients. Pour into pie shell and bake in a hot oven, 425° F., for 5 minutes. Reduce temperature to a moderately slow oven, 325° F., and bake for 35–40 minutes longer or until filling is golden brown and set. Remove pie from oven and cool well. Decorate the pie, if you like, with fluffs of whipped cream or meringue puffs and chopped pistachio nuts. (To make the meringue puffs: Beat 2 egg whites until frothy with a pinch each of salt and cream of tartar. Gradually add ½ cup superfine sugar, beating all the while until stiff peaks form. Put the mixture through a pastry tube to form puffs or drop from a tablespoon, swirling the mixture into peaks, onto lightly buttered heavy brown paper. Bake on the paper, on a baking sheet, in a very slow oven, 250° F., for about 15 minutes or until puffs are firm and just lightly golden.) Makes 8 servings.

Potato Rolls

1 package active dry yeast
½ cup lukewarm water
1 cup hot, smoothly mashed potatoes (you may use the instant, preparing them by package directions but omitting salt, pepper and butter)
½ cup hot water and ½ cup hot milk combined (if you make fresh mashed potatoes, substitute 1 cup of the cooking water)
1 cup butter
⅔ cup sugar
1 tablespoon salt
2 eggs, beaten
8 cups flour

Soften yeast in lukewarm water and set aside. Combine the hot mashed potatoes with the water-milk mixture, butter, sugar and salt and stir until butter is melted. When this mixture is lukewarm, add the yeast and the eggs. Now work in 4 cups flour, 1 cup at a time. When well mixed, work in 3½ cups more flour (the final ½ cup is for flouring the board). Knead the dough on a well-floured board or pastry cloth, working in the final ½ cup flour as you knead. When the dough is smooth and satiny, shape it into a ball, place in a buttered bowl, cover with a cloth, and set aside to rise in a warm spot. When the dough has doubled in bulk, punch it down. Now, working about ¼ of the dough at a time, roll it to a thickness of ¼″ on a well-floured pastry cloth. Cut into 2″ rounds, brush with melted butter and then fold round over, overlapping the top over the lower portion and pinching the edges well together. Place rolls on a baking sheet, cover with a cloth and allow to rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk. Then bake in a hot oven, 425° F., for 10 minutes or until golden brown. Serve piping hot. Makes about 12 dozen small rolls (including second rolling).

New! Country Pie...Beef makes the crust

...And you'll make the savory filling double-quick —but only with Hunt's Tomato Sauce and Minute Rice.

Here's a new one! A rice pie with an unexpected beef crust!

And the filling—tender, fluffy Minute Rice, rosy and spicy with Hunt's Tomato Sauce—hearty with melted cheese.

Rich in vitamins too! You don't wash or boil Minute Rice —so the added nourishment is right there when you eat it. And Hunt's is the most tomatoful sauce of all—thick and smooth—fresh, ripe tomato through and through.

NEW! COUNTRY PIE

The crust

½ 8-oz. can (1½ cup) Hunt's Tomato Sauce
½ cup bread crumbs 1 lb. ground beef
¼ cup chopped onion ¼ cup chopped green pepper
1½ teaspoons salt ⅛ teaspoon oregano
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Combine these ingredients and mix well. Pat meat mixture into bottom and pinch 1-inch flutings around the edges of a greased 9-inch pie plate. Set aside.

The filling

1⅓ cups Minute Rice 1 cup water
1½ 8-oz. cans (1½ cups) Hunt's Tomato Sauce
1 cup grated Cheddar Cheese ½ teaspoon salt

Combine Minute Rice, Hunt's Tomato Sauce, salt, water and ¼ cup of the cheese. Spoon rice mixture into meat shell. Cover with aluminum foil. Bake in a moderate oven (350°F) 25 minutes. Uncover and sprinkle top with remaining cheese. Return to oven and bake uncovered 10 to 15 minutes longer. Cut into pie-shaped pieces. Makes 5 or 6 servings.

Hunt's Tomato Sauce is a product of Hunt Foods, Inc.

Minute is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

THE NICE BOY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 69

could care about pickled mushrooms! He bit his tongue.

"Mrs. Gogarty drinks," Billy said. He aimed directly at Mary Alice.

Tom snatched his gun. "Mrs. Gogarty's perfectly reliable," he said stiffly.

"Billy Hall, you're wild," Mary Alice laughed heartily. She laughed into Tom's eyes. Of course, he knew it was only out of politeness and the goodness of her heart that she had bothered to notice him.

"Don't fergit the stuff for Baby Kitten's diapers," Mimi reminded him loudly.

Let me die, he breathed inside himself. Let me die soon before my life gets any worse. He said something ignoble, trite, mundane. Mary Alice replied in her usual intelligent and witty fashion. Then she disappeared and he was left with the three gypsies before he could bring himself to mention this evening and the dance.

"She likes you," Mimi said. She held his hand, licked his thumb lightly and then bit his finger.

"Stop that."

"Well, she does like you."

"She does not. She doesn't know I'm alive."

"Ho! Why'd she belch, then?" Billy asked loudly.

"She did not belch," he said, at his wit's end. Baby Kitten began to cry, suggesting to everyone that he was abusing her. He bolted out of the market, piling all of them and the groceries into his old red heap. His mother had not asked him to do these errands, but he had wanted to help on a bad day when they were worried about his grandmother.

His mind was not on the family crisis, though. He was trying to decide why Mary Alice had not mentioned tonight. He decided that Bud had told her, but she had forgotten. She must have many more important matters to consider—a girl like that.

"Don't hang out the car window, Mimi, you'll fall on your head."

"Fall on your head, Mimi," Billy dared her.

"Mary Alice Farnum, Mary Alice Farnum," she sang loudly out the window. People turned to see her.

His mother said, "Were they good? You're a grand person, dear, to help out. Mrs. Gogarty can't shop. I don't think I could leave if I didn't know you'd keep an eye on things, Tom."

"The dance isn't so much. They have them every Saturday night, so if you want me to stay home ——" He was getting scared now.

"I should say not!" his mother insisted. "Mrs. Gogarty's perfectly reliable. We've been having her for ages and ——"

"She smokes. She keeps toads in her purse. And she makes you eat cold soup," Mimi said. She wrapped her arms hard around Tom's left leg.

He touched her forehead. She felt hot. "I thought you liked Gogarty."

She motioned for him to bend down to her. "I smell grandma dyin,'" she whispered hoarsely.

"You do not smell anything," he said, but he was surprised. "And stay out of the tree. You'll fall and kill yourself."

Billy chuckled. "She only bounces." He shot her in the head again.

Tom went upstairs to begin to get ready. He needed time tonight. He was not going to worry about anything, not even his grandmother—or Mimi. His sad, inhuman eyes looked back at him from the mirror. He was a failure, and he loathed himself sixteen years' worth of loathing. "I hate you—you blump," he said, sticking out his tongue.

Mimi heard him, as she heard everything, and she put her head around the door. His room was forbidden territory to her. "I see you! I hear you. I spy," she said in that hoarse falsetto which sent chills up his spine.

"Get out! You want to drive me out of my mind?" he shouted and made windmill gestures with his arms.

She stared up at him. Her face broke up, she clutched the doorway dramatically as she sobbed, and tears like huge grapes rolled down her flushed, freckled cheeks.

"Oh—what now?" he moaned.

"You don't love me," she accused.

"Ah-h-h, Mimi," he sighed. He gathered her, reeking of sweat and chocolate titbits, into his long, skinny embrace, knowing he would kill to protect her. He held her sheltered like that. "Sure, Tommy loves you." Love was a word that stuck in his throat like a hard, stale gumdrop. "Don't I give you things? Don't I let you pretend to read to me until I'm nuts? But you mustn't spy on a man. You've got to give him a little privacy. See?"

She sniffled and long-eyed him, pouting. "You love Mary Alice Farnum is who," she said. Her mouth trembled. Her eyes filled with the orange fires of jealousy.

He made a great effort at patience. Lately, he was often nearer suicide and murder than any of the adult virtues he admired. "You don't understand, Mimi. You and Billy and Baby Kitten are still too young." Well, it was all over town if Mimi knew. Here was a big part of his trouble—he had this big family thing as well as his own dreary self-hatred.

"Then lemme go with."

"It's not your kind of party." This would be the very worst night of his life. There was his mother downstairs, telling his father about the dance. Her voice rang with triumph. She's brought her eldest into safe harbor, he thought bitterly. This summer he was capable of sophisticated attitudes of mind. No use letting them know any sooner than necessary I'm a big stupid failure in my life. They've got enough worries right now. Not that grandma isn't like Mimi—a real tough one. He kissed Mimi's sweaty cheek.

"I wanna go. Mary Alice adores me."

"Yeah—I bet."

"She says I'm a doll. I heard her."

"This once, I can't take you. Don't I take you and Baby Kitten and Billy everywhere? Don't people say I'm a candy cane of a baby sitter? A mother's boy? And all of that? Isn't that what they all say about good old nice Tommy Hall?"

"No." She fixed him with her deadly cold stare. "You're a brother is all."

"Someday I'll be driven to—to robbing banks," he said and sent her out. Still, Mimi was often the smartest. She went down the hall with that heavy-bottomed amble she affected this summer, dragging her semirotten rag doll with the awful blue hair.

Had Mary Alice Farnum ever been like Mimi? He had known her more than eight years, and she must have been born wonderful—pretty and clean, with starchy white collars and nice long legs flashing over the tennis courts as she played with Bud Hickey. It was crazy that for a moment, as he was consoling Mimi, trying to help her with her jealousy and whims, he had seemed to come almost close to something that was also true of Mary Alice.

"Stop teasing your big brother," he heard his mother scold. He went downstairs. He saw the sheer, beautiful pride and hope for him in his mother's eyes. "Let me look at you, dear. . . . Close that suitcase for me, Billy, sit on it with both guns. . . . Oh, you look so—so handsome, Tom. So like your father."

"Lookit, Tom," Billy said, bouncing on the old suitcase.

"Got enough gas? And dough?" his father asked.

All this was because they believed he had a date with Mary Alice. He had not meant to deceive them. Somehow this had happened and he could not bring himself to explain. Bud Hickey's car was in hock to the Do-It-Urself Garage, and this time Tom had refused to lend Bud his own red heap. "I'll drive you and the others to the boat club, if you let me call for Mary Alice myself—first—alone. And I get four dances with her," he had bargained, not daring to look at Bud's face. He was coming to the end of being his family's nice boy. Where did niceness get you? Failure would not be too difficult to bear, if only his family and Mary Alice Farnum were not witnesses to it.

"I've got plenty of gas and money, dad."

But his father insisted on making a new, historic gesture. He handed him ten dollars. "A little extra never hurts when you're dating the best girl in town—hey? And don't I know!"

He was cheating them. They were too good to be cheated and shamed like this. Now his worst fear was that one day his mother might go wild over the telephone or at her bridge club, bragging that he had taken Mary Alice to the dance.

"You gonna kiss her?" Mimi asked.

"Stop that!" his mother commanded.

"Kiss her one fer me," Billy cackled. He was going on seven and, next to Mimi, the world's greatest spy.

Mimi was now studying his face with a grave, frowning, scared expression. "I love you," she said in her teeny-weeny voice. She clung to him. "Take me or I'll hold my breath till I turn black," she threatened, dragging on his arm. Usually she waved him off cheerfully.

Tom bolted from the house, unable to endure the circle of happiness and pride the family formed around him. According to them, even Mary Alice Farnum was not good enough for him. They think I'm so much because my grades are good, and I don't stink or lie the way I used to when I was a kid, he thought. No one shared their high opinion, except a few people like Mr. Feldman, the math teacher. You were nothing if you were an odd type without a crowd of your own or a steady girl, if the only people who admired you were adults. Like Mrs. Maudie Hegerty who kept calling him to start her crazy car. And Mr. Murtz, the lawyer, who liked to corner him downtown to talk politics. And the two owlish women who firmly believed he could foretell the weather. I'm a crazy cupcake. The Faceless One. No one sees me or remembers me or wants me around much. Wouldn't Mary Alice Farnum be right out of her mind to prefer him to Bud Hickey?

When he arrived at the Farnums', shaking and trying desperately to act worldly, Bud was already there waiting. He was spread over the living room in a handsome, casual disarray of arms, legs, black curly hair and winning smile. He seemed to own the place.

"Why—hello, Tom," Mr. Farnum said, shaking hands warmly.

Tom's bitterness knew no limits. I'm the friendly neighborhood Airedale, he thought.

Bud ignored his anger. He made suave, witty remarks, and Mrs. Farnum laughed every time. Mary Alice floated down the stairs in a mist of pale blue and gold sun tan and bright, clean hair.

Bud said, "Oh, I told you we had a chauffeur tonight, didn't I?"

"No, but I'm glad, Tom." She smiled at him and asked if his parents had got off on the night plane. This was Mimi's kind smile when she was being motherly to her limitless doll family.

"No one needs to worry with Tom driving," Mr. Farnum said in a hearty voice.

He felt much worse. He muttered something to Mrs. Farnum, his mother's good friend, and fell over himself. He had a light, feverish sensation, as though he had left his flappy hands and feet loose under the Farnums' gold sofa.

"Care if I drive, Tommy?" Bud asked.

"I'll drive," he said. If he couldn't do anything else for her, at least he would be the man at the wheel taking her where she wanted to go.

She was there beside him, scarcely touching him. He could not breathe well. I'm the type that can be satisfied with crumbs, he thought, loathing himself. He had been stupid again, trusting clever old Bud, that tricky operator. He was certain that Bud intended to rob him of even the smallest moment with Mary Alice. He deserved to lose her, but it was awful to realize that his whole life would be one failure after another. Yah, peasant! Yah, stupid! he called himself.

When they reached Lois Barker's house, the others were already waiting in the driveway. Lois was with Harry Howland, who was a great athlete like Bud but also very solid all around. There was this extra girl for him—Bud had arranged that without asking him—and he was shaking with rage as he got out of his car. This was Lois' Cousin Nancy, from Maine.

"I'll explain later—honest, pal," Bud muttered. Tom knew Bud would have a great explanation that would defy argument, but the strange girl beside him was not Mary Alice. As soon as they reached the boat club, in the pale, pinkish light of the dance floor with its red, white and blue tables, he knew the strange girl was like him. They were soul mates. They were doomed. She smiled and talked a lot—too much, too fast—and her big, sad eyes begged him to be nice.

He maneuvered so as to sit between her and Mary Alice, hoping people might think Mary Alice was with him. You're out of your mind, boy, he warned himself. Everyone in town would know Mary Alice was with Bud.

Momentarily, he was shocked by a sudden darkening in the strange girl's eyes. "Dance, Nancy?" he asked at once. He would give her a good time. None of this was her fault, and he was not going to give Bud the satisfaction of thinking the evening was a dead loss for him. Bud was all right. He had often been a good friend, but everything came to him too easily, so he had no real perspective.

"They dance different in Maine, I guess," she said.

"My fault. My feet are like snowshoes."

They both laughed too much and too loudly at this inane remark. He kept turning so that he could see Mary Alice. He had no chance to ask her for a dance, this strange girl stayed so close. She talked about life in Maine as though she spent days and nights, without interruption, dancing and partying and breaking hearts, but he knew, absolutely, that she was like him: a Faceless One.

He smiled into her eyes. Often, when Mimi was having a tantrum not even his mother could calm, he would hug her and look into her eyes like this, and she took the look to mean adoration—and was completely happy again. The girl, surprised, smiled back. "Bud says you're a big brain in town."

He blushed. His kind of brains were useless if he allowed Bud to outwit him so easily and take from him what he most prized—Mary Alice Farnum. "Oh—brains," he said, scarcely hearing her. Well, he was not going to think about Mimi and her queer mood—or his family or anything. Not tonight.

"Yes, who cares for brains?" she agreed. She made a quick nervous gesture as though she were throwing away his brain, and hers as well. After that, they no longer tried to entertain each other. Once he caught her staring dreamy-eyed at Bud, who was still dancing with Mary Alice. Bud danced as though he had been born dancing.

"Well, let's get out of this coffin," Bud suggested when the girls disappeared into the powder room.

"Band's still playing," Tom said.

"Who cares? We can go to Mick's. Might be a nice change from juke joints."

Tom moistened his lips. "You promised me four dances with Mary Alice. Then you asked this Nancy, and ——"

"Lois was the one. What could I do? Why can't you dance with her at Mick's?"

"Lois's folks would scalp me if I took her to Mick's, Bud," Harry said. "We can go to the Dance and Drive Inn out by the river."

"But we always go there. It's stale."

"Not Mick's," Tom said firmly. Last week Mick's had been raided. The second Pierce girl had been picked up in that raid, and Mrs. Pierce had come to cry in his mother's kitchen. He had left the house to get away from the sound of her painful crying.

When you can't leave home

SHOP BY PHONE!

There it is—just the item you've been waiting to buy! But maybe you're tied down with the children, or your husband has the car.

No matter—you can go shopping by telephone! It's quick and easy. And you get the things your family needs —when they're needed, at prices that fit your budget.

Remember—any time you can't go in person, send your voice to do your shopping!

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

He ought to call home about Mimi, he thought, but she might know he was calling and make a scene for Gogarty. He wished she hadn't gone into one of her odd, witchy moods tonight.

Bud had no time to argue over where to go next because the girls returned, and in Mary Alice's presence he was everything a girl could ask for. They all piled into the car.

When they reached the long clear stretch of county road along the dark river, they began to sing. Tom singled out Mary Alice's voice. It surprised him because it was thin and off key, very like his mother's singing voice when she was doing dishes at night. Women are . . . terrific, he thought, though the word was inadequate when you considered that they started out like Mimi and developed into a Mary Alice Farnum.

For some time there was no traffic. The moon was fiery orange. He felt like driving on forever.

"Hey! Toot Magee's coming up behind you," Bud warned. "You know old Toot."

"Let him come." Tom knew he sounded grumpy, a real sour type. She would think he had no desire to compete and win. Bud would have given Toot a fair race, he knew.

Toot had a flashy new sport car and one of his flashy girls from the city. He beeped and pulled even with Tom, then passed on the right along the loose gravel shoulder. He sent up a fine spray of dirt as he skidded. The girls squealed. Beside Tom, Nancy shrieked with delight. Harry yelled at Toot, and Toot stuck his red, cocky face out of the car and jeered.

"Ignore him," Harry said. "Toot will get bored."

"You can pass him, Tommy," Bud urged. He was used to contests—and winning.

Tom felt a painful new sensation. He needed to show off. He had built the engine in his heap out of scraps, and it was fast and true. He kept it perfectly tuned. He would be happy and satisfied to show Mary Alice what he could do.

"You sure make old Toot happy," Bud said. "He brags nobody can pass him, but you could, Tom—you could!"

"Yeah." Why—right now—did strong, tender memories of Mimi suddenly claim him? It wasn't fair. She was perfectly all right back there with Gogarty. His mother had said so. Still, he could not forget that remark about his grandmother's death and her sudden dislike of Gogarty and the way she had acted when he was leaving.

"Lemme at her!" Bud shouted. He started to climb over from the back seat.

"No." He drove as slowly as possible. He had known all along this evening was bound to be a big mess, but he had continued to foster the faintest hope she might notice him. Now he had to admit everything was lost.

"Chicken!" Toot yelled, turning and coming toward them. His car skidded. There was a momentary impact against Tom's left front fender. Toot's flashy red car, glinting richly with heavy chrome, seemed to spin in the air and then, in a kind of lucky magic, to settle onto all fours. Tom, keeping his old heap upright and steady, let it slide a bit and take the shock. Slowly it settled into the roadside ditch, swaying precariously for only a moment. Toot was already roaring down the highway.

"That fool," Harry said.

Bud was helping the girls out of the car. "With Toot, Tommy, the thing to do is to race him and get him out of your hair. Otherwise, he'll murder you."

Tom held his tongue. They would think him a real knothead if he went into the dangers of racing with an overloaded old heap that had bad springing and an engine far too powerful for such a light chassis. That, he felt, was not their language at all, and so he did not look at them—at her—nor listen as he carefully maneuvered the car out of the damp, slippery ditch. The bent fender made a crazy clatter, and they did not sing again as he drove toward the blurred, cool lights of the roadhouse. He parked beside Toot's little car. There was only a slight dent in Toot's shiny red fender.

He was still sweating. He was at the end of this evening—at the end of himself too. "I'm sorry, Nancy," he said as they got out. "I have to go back to town."

"But it's—it's so gay here!" She fussed with her hair.

"Well, why don't you stay? Bud, you can pick up a ride here with someone, and ——"

"Sa-ay, you can't leave us stranded," Bud argued. "I know things didn't work out the way you expected, but gee, Tom ——"

"I'm sorry." He did not look at her, even now, and she said nothing.

"Why do you have to get back there?" Bud asked.

He did not care what they thought. "It's a family thing—my kid sister. I've got this feeling about her, and my folks never stayed away all night before. So I thought I'd make sure, Mimi—she's a crazy little girl."

"It's not eleven yet," Bud said.

"Oh, come on, Bud," Harry said. "Come along, Nancy. Tom knows what he's got to do."

Mary Alice said, climbing into the front seat of the car, "I'll drive back with you, Tom."

"Hey!" Bud shouted.

"Oh, Bud"—she laughed—"you take care of Nancy. Have some fun."

Quickly, before Bud could get into the car, too, Tom turned in a close, irregular circle. Bud was left shouting foolishly.

"Toot could have been killed. Or killed us," she said. She sat quietly, without fussing with her hair or talking senselessly. "Mimi's like me. When the boy next door died, I was scared I'd catch the same thing and die too."

Send food to hungry people:
$1-per-package thru CARE
Food Crusade, New York 16

"Yeah." She was being polite and kind, driving back to town with him, and he must be careful not to twist her consideration into something more.

"Mimi thinks you're the greatest."

"Well—Mimi's a primitive," he said.

She leaned slightly toward him. The bright orange moon lit the world like a huge bonfire. Her face was changed—graver, older and more mysterious—and her full, babyish mouth looked almost severe. She said slowly, in wonder, "People ought to listen to children. They know things."

"What things?"

"About life. They have pure insight. Mimi's been trying to tell you about me for ages. I guess I've always known. A deep part of myself was sort of moving toward you, and you were standing there. Like in a dream. You know?"

Something marvelous, incredible and correct was happening to his dreadful life. The two parts, the wishing and the being, were moving together neatly, as a ball to its own true socket.

"I've been getting bored with the old things, I guess. They don't satisfy—I mean, things that used to be. Like crazy racing with Toot and all." She hesitated. She asked wistfully, "Is it true what Mimi says? You—you think about me, sometimes?"

"It's true."

She put her hand to her cheek. "I couldn't go with Bud after tonight. All of that with Toot—I don't know, but Bud belongs to the things that used to be. He seems so long ago—part of a time when I wore braces and rode a trike. I couldn't go with him again, after tonight, Tom."

"I'm glad," he said. For the first time since the third grade, when he got wise to himself, he was happy in his life, happy to be Thomas Hall, and he liked himself. He was no longer a Faceless One. END

Printed in U.S.A.